THE trees were flushed with red and gold,
As, in the warm September weather,
Among the country lanes we strolled,
And picked the blackberries together.

Standing among the russet-brown
And withered leaves that hid the roots,
I pulled the bramble branches down,
And watched her pluck and eat the fruits.

With tender, purple finger-tips,
That shunned the thorns with dainty skill,
She put them to her pouted lips,
And laughed, and looked more pretty still.

Her ringing tones awoke the air
To joyful echoes as she passed;
Each opening prospect seemed more fair,
Each lane more tempting, than the last.

And even now, when strolling through
The by-ways hedged with bush and bramble,
I pull a blackberry or two
In memory of that far-off ramble.

MISS PHIPPENY'S HEIR.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

POOR Miss Phippeny! Though why I should call her poor, when her bank account is thousands of times what mine is ever likely to be, is a question. She lives, too, on Fifth Avenue; she is a head-centre of charity; her fiat in the church is fate whenever she ventures to declare it; she has coaches and horses; she has a herd of servants. When I knew her she had plate—real old Golconda; she had laces spun from the very Virgin's Threads themselves, and Heaven only knew what else she had.

[illegible] to her; as, for instance, she had no husband, she had no child, she had no protector; she was at the mercy of the Bedouins encamped in the basement beneath and in the attic above her; and what made all this lacking the more emphatic was the counterbalance of a timidity that hardly dared call her soul her own after dark; of an affectionate heart, with no one on whom to lavish her affection; and of a tall and lean ungainly person, round which no lover had ever slipped an arm, and in whose bony embrace no child had ever voluntarily cuddled.

Miss Phippeny's house was certainly one of the handsomest brown stones on the avenue; the flight of steps at the entrance might have answered for a palace. There were immense rooms on both sides of the immense hall; the hall itself was paneled with a rose-colored marble, carved in floral bosses and projections, and was paved with tessellated jasper and serpentine, and the frescoes of the ceilings and the rich woods of the finishing were a delight to the eye.

But there, except for some deep-piled carpets and luxurious chairs and dark old book-cases, the pleasures of the interior of the house ended. The day the Phippenys had moved in the father had been brought home dead, and the mother, always of delicate nerves, had sunk under the stroke with an illness lapsing into idiocy; the carpets had been laid, the yellow satin curtains had been hung, the drawing-rooms had been used for the funeral, and had never been used again; the packing cases of costly furniture provided for the new house were brought in and ranged against the walls of the rooms unopened; no one could attend to their opening, with that illness of life or death on hand; and afterward, when the mother sat mumbling and grinning and crying, nobody had any more heart to do so, and there they stood. Nobody had the heart to take out the pictures that had hung in the old home, and they remained on the floor, tilted back against the white and gold wainscoting in their wooden cases, and, of course, nobody ever had the heart to go and buy new ones. Years had passed now since the piano had been opened, since the chamois leather had been drawn off the harp, since, indeed, any one but the house-maid had entered the great, lonesome rooms at all. One day Miss Phippeny had the boxes of books opened and the contents ranged on the library shelves, and in the library they lived, she and her mother—her mother sleeping in an anteroom behind the library, fitted up for a bedroom, while her nurse stretched herself out every night on a sofa-bedstead in the same room, and Miss Phippeny stalked up stairs to the first pair front, shivering at every step she took, creak of stairs or slam of doors, rattle of casement or rumble of chimney, and, after casting wild glances up and down the galleries, bolting herself into her own room. If callers came, they were first surveyed across the barrier of the chain, and then suffered to enter the reception-room next the entrance—a place half bay-window, in which the house-maid had trained some roses and ivies unrebuked to redeem its cheerlessness; and here Miss Phippeny, tall and thin, and moving silently in sables, received them. The calls were never long, and presently she returned to her mother and her wrapper; and at night the door was never opened, chain or no chain, till the visitor's name had been announced through the walnut.

The meals of the Phippenys were served in a room down stairs adjoining the great dining-room, whose chill and tarnished splendor would have been a mockery of the simple fare of the two forlorn creatures and the old nurse waiting on one of them. The safe in the great dining-room was crammed with plate—dishes whose mere vibration was music, salvers on whose rims the frosted flowers stood up as on a meadow where the hoar-frost has fallen, urns, tea-kettles, nests of dish-covers, gold-lined butter-boats and tureens and tankards, and all manner of fanciful splendors, that had been handed down from Phippeny to Phippeny for generations. The closets there were filled with china—old and ugly, rare and beautiful, Sèvres and Dresden—and cups out of which the yellow dragon of the Chinese dynasty might have invigorated himself. But Miss Phippeny dined and supped off delf under wire covers, and her mother was fed with a spoon from a bowl she liked because of its red butterflies and blue roses; and if any of their old friends—who had never quite forsaken them, perhaps through pity for their desolate lives, perhaps because people seldom do forsake millionaires—if any of them dropped in, a tray was passed around in hospitable wont, and though the wine there was in a precious decanter of Venetian crystal, a Phippeny heir-loom from time out of mind, yet the cake lay on a napkin in a wicker basket, and the nuts and fruits were in a crockery vegetable dish. In truth, every body said that paupers in a work-house were more comfortable and happy on their alms than the Phippenys were on their millions. Nevertheless there was something that did give Miss Phippeny unmitigated pleasure; for more than plate, or house, or stocks did she value the contents of a secret closet in her own room—gifts from friends on Christmases, Easters, and festivals in general. They were wealthy people themselves, all these friends, most of them relatives; and offerings of a ring for Matilda to-day, and a brooch another day, a cross on some particular day, and fans and trinkets on all sorts of days, had become customary, till her treasury was laden; partly because her father thought nothing too good for her, and never realized but what she was fair and sweet enough to carry off [illegible] [illegible] attention to their ugly and awkward cousin. Some of these tokens were dear to her because she had loved the givers, and all because they were her own, and were relics of a youth as dead as many of the givers. Dear! She valued them like her soul; they were the history of her life, and her heart was locked up with them. Moreover, they were very precious intrinsically, a fact no Phippeny was likely to forget; for though this one spent a large income on charity, she knew the value of money as well as any of her tribe, and all their charity had been more the nature of sacrifice to the evil genius of poverty than of love to man. Miss Phippeny never wore these treasures, but she often took them out and looked at them. This emerald—a great, square stone, fit for the high-priest's breastplate, Tom had given her (her father's ward, brought up with her at home). Perhaps if he had not sunk on the ill-fated Oceanica that winter, just after he came into his property—who knows? Tom used to say things to her that nobody else had ever said, and Tom's will was found to have given her all his fortune. That necklace of diamonds was her father's gift when she came of age herself. Miss Phippeny remembered the day every time she took it up when her father came in and tipped up her chin and kissed her mouth as he hung the sparkling string round her throat, and there were as many tears in the box as diamonds whenever she shut it up.

This bracelet Nina Van Maull gave her when the two vowed eternal friendship; Nina was dead twenty years ago, but the great turquoises were as soft and blue and heavenly as her eyes were then. This locket, a mere crust of brilliants, held Cousin Harry's hair. These diamond bracelets were Aunt Matilda's bequest. These rings were funereal ones. This watch, whose case was a bed of sapphires, stopped at the very moment when brother Lawrence ceased to breathe. This cable of pearls Cousin Ralph twisted round her wrist the time after the waltz for which he engaged her and forgot to claim her: poor Ralph! he was dreadfully sorry next day—a handsome, dashing fellow then, but now the pearls were not so yellow as that bald skull of his, and cent. per cent. was written in wrinkles all about his face; and Miss Phippeny had thought whether, if she went to him and divided the half of her surplus with him, he would think he had enough to sit down and enjoy it. He was one of the railroad kings now, but she was sure that if he did not leave scheming and worrying soon he would end in an asylum, with half a dozen gold pieces for his playthings, as so many of the rich men were doing. Then there was her father's picture, and her mother's—a quaint little miniature, that—with its painted puffs and combs and laces, and impossibly blue eyes and rosy cheeks. But, though the jeweled backs of both were a wrought-work of splendor, it was not of that which Miss Phippeny thought in declaring that she would rather lose all she owned than those two little pictures: it was of her kingly old father, deified in her remembrance, and of the weary little mother down stairs in the library, stringing glass beads the whole day long. Sometimes Miss Phippeny closed her closet quickly when the fancy came that, if she did not take care, these things, instead of sacred symbols, would become nothing but glass beads to her, and she would not go near the place for weeks. No one would have imagined there was such a place there—a cell in the chimney side that opened with a spring. It was a miracle to many how Miss Phippeny's days passed without wearying her to death. But they did; and she was always looking eagerly forward to the next one, and rising with the sun to meet it. She took a drive in the morning, and did her shopping or made her calls. She never rode after the accident that caused her father's death till air and exercise were ordered for her mother; and now the oldest and staidest of coachmen was obliged to come in and go through the ceremony of having his breath tested every day, and after that the fat horses were not allowed to leave the decorum of a walk; the rest of the day she sat in the dreary library, stitching away for dear life on an altar-cloth for a chapel, or flannels for the church poor—she knew no other—picking up her mother's beads, or threading her needle, or making knots in her silk unmurmuringly, till dinner came; after dinner she sang her mother to sleep with nursery ballads in a cracked and piping voice; and then, the gas being lit and the shutters fastened, and the doors locked and double-locked, and the house inspected processionally with a brace of servants from top to bottom—Miss Phippeny, armed with a poker, leading the way, because, with all her timidity, she could not make another do what she would not herself—and the form of reading the evening paper aloud to her mother, who no longer knew A from ampersand, gone through with, after an instinctive shrinking from the breaking up of old habits, there came a little more stitching, the house prayers, the dreams; and at daybreak rising with the laborers again, to finish flower or scroll or seam, as if there were not enough days in her life for all she wished to do in them.

Yet Miss Phippeny was by no means satisfied, though she never made complaint. In spite of servants and acquaintances and altar-cloths she was lonely. She longed for something to love her intelligently. Her mother cared nothing for her any more, except to whimper to her if her gruel or her whey was wrong, just as she would whimper to the nurse. She could not keep a dog, though she would have been delighted to [illegible] have one lie of nights in the [illegible] always [illegible] than [illegible] dies [illegible] [illegible] of the present imbecility might be owing to the past virus. Parrots bit, too, and their noise was maddening; canaries all seemed to die in that library; and even the house-girls, as soon as she had taken a fancy to them, began to be too topping for any thing. Poor Miss Phippeny! she would have taken one of the little foundlings home long since if the very idea of the thing had not been hooted by her whole round of gossips; and the Mordecai in her gate was the speech of people.

But all this even tenor of Miss Phippeny's life—the early rising, the stitching and shopping and stringing of beads, the processional safeguards at twilight, the satisfaction of bolts and bars and locks and chains at night, to-day the same as yesterday and to-morrow—all this was doomed to destruction, the fell fiend who wrought the havoc appearing in the person of a boy heard on the steps just as Miss Phippeny, with the house-maid, coachman, and poker, had finished her evening tour of the house, and was preparing to double-lock the door, see if the chain was right, shoot the bolts, and fetch the big bar across from side to side for the night.

Miss Phippeny paused, held a hand behind her ear, went on, listened, paused again.

"John," whispered she, "did you hear a noise?"

"The rats, mum," said the coachman.

"Hark! That's no rat."

"It's the wind in the chimbly, miss," said the glib house-maid.

"Wind? Oh no; there isn't a breath abroad to-night."

"Oh, miss," said the house-maid, reconnoitring through the key-hole, "it's only one of them beggar brats a-whining on the step."

"Oh, that's it, is it?" said Miss Phippeny, whose teeth had been chattering. "Well, I suppose he'll go away when he gets through. It's cold for him. How big is he, Ann? Only so high? Poor little mite! You don't imagine it's a—signal for any thing, or—a trap, do you, John? Perhaps you'd better send him off."

"Packing, miss!" said Ann.

"Could you open the door again, John? It's not very dark—"

"Not dark at all, mum; there's a moon the size of a cart-wheel."

And at that Miss Phippeny, taking the proper position, lifted her poker, ready for fatal descent on the offender's skull if he proved to be a fraud, while the coachman let down the bar, drew back the bolts, turned the great key, and, opening the door a crack, disclosed what might be called a bird's-eye view—for certainly one would suppose nothing but a bird's eye could have obtained a view through such an opening—of a morsel of a bare-headed and barefooted imp, crying fit to break his heart.

Miss Phippeny shuddered back a moment in dismay, gathering her skirts about her. She had never touched, she had never approached, an object of this class; all her charities had been on the grand abstract scale, where the giver recognized poverty but not the poor, and she had never seen a pauper in her life, to know him. But in a moment the shrinking had given way to pity. "Do you think it's safe to take him in, John?" she asked.

"He can't do no 'arm," said John, sublimely. And bidding Ann pull the child in, since she could not linger with the doors open at that hour, Miss Phippeny waited only to see the locks and bolts in place before following her guest and the house-maid into the dining-room. There she sat down and mournfully surveyed the ragged, abject little being standing before her, and with his fist in his eyes rubbing rolls of dirt off his knuckles and kneading them with his tears, only answering Miss Phippeny's questions with fresh wails, so that all to be made out of him was that he'd lost Jim, and hadn't any home, but had Jim and sometimes Bets, and didn't know what his name was, except they called him Jim's cub, and he was freezing, and he'd lost Jim!

"Oh dear, dear!" said Miss Phippeny. "This is deplorable. I just meant to give him a supper and something warm to wear, and send him home. No name—to think of it, in a Christian city—nor any home—and a piece of a shirt, and only part of a pair of trowsers!"

"Lor sakes-a day, miss, there's heaps of 'em, miss! A idle set as doesn't earn their salt, and doesn't have it! They just swarms. And all our thieves and murderers come out of 'em, like flies out of corruption, miss!"

"Oh, Ann! that is dreadful talk. Turn up the gas, Ann, and let me see him; he isn't bad-looking, Ann; he wouldn't be if he were clean!"

"Deary me, miss," said Ann, approaching and bending over him, though holding her skirts delicately back from any contact, "he's act'ally crawling!"

"Why, Ann! how you talk! he is as straight—"

"Oh my!" with a toss. "I mean—he's perfectly alive, miss!—creturs!"

"What!" cried Miss Phippeny. "A human being! Ann, it's incredible!"

"It's the truth, miss. If he was dead and buried this day twelvemonth, he couldn't be otherways."

"Monstrous!" said the amazed lady. "Oh, Ann, isn't it shocking? Isn't it too bad, Ann?"

"Yes, 'm; I'm sure it be."

"Well, then, take him to the lower bath-room at once, Ann. I won't ask you to do it," as she saw Ann fling back aghast, "but tell John to wash him and shave him thoroughly, [illegible] and down some of my mother's flannels [illegible] we can do better. I suppose [illegible] clothes in the shops that [illegible], Ann?"

[illegible] said Ann, utterly [illegible] with the other's innocence; "I should think so! There! get on!" to the boy; and closing the door behind her and her shuffling charge, who had apparently forgotten to cry in his bewilderment, but was now on the full blast again.

But before Miss Phippeny had been able to collect her scattered senses Ann re-appeared.

"Please, miss," said she, "the coachman says as he's very sorry to disoblige you, and he'd wash and shave the boy 's soon as not, only it wouldn't be best for the horses, he says. Horses is delicate, he says, and has to be humored, and—"

"I don't suppose, Ann," said her hesitating mistress, "that you could—"

"Oh, deary me, no, miss! I couldn't hold my stummick over him one minute; 'twouldn't be any use to try. I don't know what to do, miss, for the cook says she'd throw up her place fust."

"I'll do it myself, then, Ann," said Miss Phippeny, rising into heroism. "Bring me down a suit of my mother's flannels and that old dressing-gown of mine."

"Miss Phippeny! Well, I declare! Sooner 'n that— As if we were going to put up with such doings! Well, I'll see, miss. There! I'll put him in the tub. Though it ain't wholesome, that it ain't. To think you, Miss Phippeny—oh, my sakes a day!" and Ann left the room abruptly, and an hour afterward led into the library a ridiculous animated bundle that had an air of shame from its innermost to its outermost thread, and seated it on a stool at an awful distance from the three occupants of the place, Miss Phippeny, her sleeping mother, and the nurse.

"There, miss," said Ann. "I've scrabbed him so 't I don't think there's much of his first skin left; and I've burned his rags; and there isn't a spear of hair on his head, for it's shaved as clean as the back of your hand; and I held him and turned him under the spigot a good half hour, miss, though he squirmed and bit well—yes he did, miss; for I thought if the water didn't run away with him the—the—others—would; and I don't believe he ever was so clean and sweet before, or ever will be again!"

"Ann, you're a good girl," said Miss Phippeny; "and I'll make it all right with you."

Meanwhile the wretched little object of this charity sat sneezing and sniffling and panting, not half recovered from his cruel mercies, and following Ann's movements with round eyes of apprehension, and now and then clapping his hands in a terror upon the perfectly pink scalp of his rather large head, and bursting out in a lamentation, over his locks, perhaps, and the memory of his outrages.

"You can't do nothing with him, miss," said Ann. "He's a great, blubbering baby, he is, boo-hooing like a calf—"

"I ain't!" roared the little bundle then. "I don't! Godammer! She drownded me, she did! Hell!" roared this child of a Christian community. "She burned my close so 't Jim won't know me. She's made me as bald as a dam scalthead. Jim 'll give it to her, he will. Jim 'll black yer dam sarsy for ye! And put me in women's close!" cried the creature that an hour before had none, and preferred it. And then there came such an outburst of oaths from these infantile lips, that apparently could not articulate them plainly, so far exceeding the poor interjections already uttered that Miss Phippeny was forced to put her fingers in her ears, while Ann, for one instant throwing her apron over her head, in the next rushed for the blasphemer, and shook him till his teeth would have rattled in their sockets if he had but cut them all.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, Ann, it's dreadful! Oh, Mrs. Felch, did you ever hear any thing like it!" cried poor Miss Phippeny. "Oh, you poor child, you poor child!"

"Have you any idea," said the sepulchral voice of Mrs. Felch, the nurse, "where you'll go to? Didn't any one ever tell you of the lake of fire and brimstone where you'll lie, with the smoke of your torment going up forever?"

"Yes," cried Ann, "a real lake of fire and brimstone, where you'll burn—"

"Lemme go!" yelled the morsel, springing up, but stumbling over his wrappings and sprawling on the floor. "Lemme go! I'd ruther freeze, a dam sight! Call the p'lice— Oh, where's Jim, where's Jim!" And his cries woke the old lady, who immediately took it for granted that the house was in a light blaze, and proceeded to gather up her beads and threads and make for the door, requiring all Mrs. Felch's energy to convince her that the fire of which they spoke had not yet invaded the Fifth Avenue mansion.

But Miss Phippeny had darted to the boy's side, and had lifted him up, and was kneeling with her arm around him, wiping his face with her handkerchief. "There, there," said she, sweetly. "Good boys are safe enough, and you're going to be good; you didn't know it was naughty to talk so. Don't cry; you shall have some supper now, and new clothes to-morrow, and we'll try and find Jim. And you shall go to school, and we'll make a man of you yet;" and possibly won more by the kind tones than the words, the child looked up in her face, that still towered far above him, and hid his sobs on her shoulder. Then Miss Phippeny, moved by such confidence from the little rebel, led him solemnly down stairs to the remnants of a beefsteak pie and a cold custard, and afterward, with her own hands, put him to bed in the room prepared for him behind her own, sitting beside him till he was sound asleep, and touched to her heart by his ignorance of civilization and comfort, by his awe before the great snow-piled bed, by the rapture that swam over his face on being lifted and laid in its centre, with the satin-soft sheets and the eider-down coverlet falling all about him, and by the thoughts into which these simple facts led her. "You won't go 'way?" were his last words, still clutching her hand. "You'll stay here, and you'll keep her off? She 'most drownded me, she did!"

Miss Phippeny's preparations for her own slumber that night, after locking the door of her room, were portentous. To be sure, the child was the least atom of a child that ever found himself cast away upon the world; but then she had heard a portion of "Oliver Twist" read aloud, and she knew that little fellows might sometimes be put through window-panes to slip bolts and the like; and though in Miss Phippeny's eyes it was just as utterly out of the question that this mite could be a member of a gang of burglars as that he could be enchanted into this form to assume gigantic proportions and his own shape at midnight, yet his introduction into the household was an unusual thing, happening at an unusual hour, under unusual circumstances. He was a creature of the slums, a creation of their slime and sin. A phantom procession of crimes and wrongs had followed him into the place, and had aroused a train of timid thoughts as to improbable possibilities, and Miss Phippeny thought best to provide for all emergencies.

Having secured the entrance, she next turned her attention to the folding-doors by which her room communicated with the one where her protégé was sleeping. They had no fastening; but knotting the handles together with her garters, she wheeled a lounge against them, and set up a chair on the lounge, and some books on the chair, so that if one opened the doors the chair would fall backward and the books forward, with a crash; then, having made her hasty night toilette, she ranged a barricade of chairs around her bed, and scattered a dozen sheets from a pile of pious papers about the floor, in order that a terrifying crackling should announce any strange footfall; having then laid the poker within easy reach, and slipped under her pillow an open penknife with which to defend herself in last resort, though she would as soon have dared to wield a thunder-bolt, and having felt round in her closets, and opened the deep bureau drawers, and wound around her wrist the string connected with a watchman's rattle hanging just outside the window, she lowered the gas and sprang into bed, with a sincere conviction that some one had tried to catch her by the heel, and resigned herself, after many starts and turns, to dreams. Feverish dreams they were; for, mingling incoherently in her sleeping fancies her mother's consternation in the evening and her own thought in relation to the crackling of the papers on the floor, she awoke toward morning screaming "Fire!" with all her might, and pulling the string that sprung the watchman's rattle in such a manner as to bring a bevy of Dogberrys to the spot, whose sapience and whose separation she furtively observed through the shutter, a little alarmed lest, seeing her, they should see her curl-papers, and scared to the point of shivering to think that such an alarm and outcry could be made and the whole family sleep through it.

Miss Phippeny lay the rest of the night listening for thieves, and determining by what name her foundling was to be known; only to be very much disturbed in the morning when, having decided upon Reginald Theodorus, the bairn stoutly refused any thing of the sort, until, mollified by the new clothes which Ann brought in, and particularly by the boots with heels on them, he so far relented as to submit that they might call him after Jim; perhaps with a vague idea that the name might attract Jim's attention on the street. He had already imparted the information that Jim sold a paper which he called the "Daily Yell."

Frequent ablutions, wholesome food, open air exercise in the coach with the ladies, and occasional romps in the stable soon made a metamorphosis in the appearance of Master James—he had no surname, for Miss Phippeny was undecided as to whether she should bring him up as a son or a servant, and was awaiting the developments of a year. He did not grow any, except in the way of filling his clothes, but his hair did, and the big pink scalp was soon obscured, and by the spring-time was adorned with quite a curly and flaxen fleece. In that time, too, he had learned to read, to string Mrs. Phippeny's beads and thread her needle, to run a score of errands about the house, and to amuse himself in a gymnasium fitted up for him at the top of the house. He tore his clothes, and spilled his milk on them, and carried gingerbread and strings in his pockets, and lost his ball, and mislaid his top, and carried his marble in his cheek like any other boy. Once he had seen Jim, and the carriage was headed post-haste in Jim's direction, while Miss Phippeny held on the sides in a terror, but Jim disappeared down an alley, and her boy threw himself sobbing on the floor of the carriage; and another time he declared an old woman picking rags in the gutter, with a bag on her back and a hook in her hand, to be his Bets, although she proved to be somebody else, with similar results on his part. Such accomplishments as were his before entering the Phippeny mansion he had wisely learned to keep out of sight; but his mental ability was not small, and his skill in finding Miss Phippeny's purse, which she was always losing, was something remarkable. He had dropped the ornamentation of his language, which had so shocked his hearers on making his acquaintance, and though never very affectionate, yet he was so gay and willing and obliging as to be a favorite even with the critical Ann herself, though she frequently administered severe doses of morality to him on the principle of Mrs. Squeers's treacle processes. Mrs. Felch, indeed, had always looked upon him with disfavor, as something utterly out of place; and in the way of her duty, as far as in her lay, she did her best to make his life a burden to him. But to Miss Phippeny the boy every day grew nearer and dearer; he was on the point of just filling that void in her heart that had been so long waiting for some one. Often now when of an evening she sang her plaintive songs to her mother, and, taking the boy on her lap, felt his curly head nestling on her shoulder, it seemed to her that her cup of bliss was being brimmed at last. One day, however, Mrs. Felch rudely dashed this cup aside a moment, spilling some drops in the act.

"Did you know, miss," said she, "that our James is a hunchback? And if our Ann knew B from a broomstick, miss, she'd have found it out the night he came. But you can see it for yourself. I suppose the tailor thought you knew it. It's slight, to be sure. But it's there. Perhaps it would be better to say he was a dwarf. You may depend upon it, he's got his growth. He's twice the age he makes out to be—seven years old, indeed! If he ever sees seventeen again— Miss Phippeny," said Mrs. Felch, impressively, "that's an old head on young shoulders, and there you may stick a pin in!"

Poor Miss Phippeny hardly heard the close of these remarks, so amazed and hurt was she by the beginning. A hunchback—this object of her affection—and her own physician out of town, and she could trust no other. The Phippenys never went out of town. But it might be remedied yet, when Dr. Grey came back. It should be remedied if it took the whole of the Phippeny money to do it; for in spite of all it had not done for her, the good soul had an idea still that the Phippeny money could do every thing. When she put Master James to bed that night, she gently passed her hand about his neck, and ascertained the truth for herself, and burst into tears, and laid her face in the pillow beside his own while she sobbed; the effect of that incident upon the boy was singular; for, though he manifested no emotion at the moment, he was detected next day in an attempt to run away.

But when this interlude was forgotten and the boy forgiven—for Miss Phippeny was sure that he had penetrated the secret of her tears, and had run away to avoid giving her more pain—then Master James had firmer hold on his protector's affections than ever; and as the days went by, and the summer came, her mind was made up. Heaven had sent the child to her door; he should have her name legally given him, and he should be her heir. She would not speak of it as yet—her lawyer was away, and she did not wish to turn the boy's head—perhaps she never should speak of it till the last; but he should have a governess in the fall, and by-and-by a tutor, and then college and a profession—and he would marry, and his wife and his children would be delights and comforts to her; for, as to Mrs. Felch's notion regarding his back, the trouble there was indeed so slight that Miss Phippeny had not an idea of its being serious; and she fancied he had grown a little already, though that might be his new boots.

Of course then Miss Phippeny took her heir about with her wherever she went. Most of her friends were out of town, indeed, and her church was closed; but it seemed to her that the boy's life must be gay when compared with his old one. She frequently, in the warm weather, walked up and down the cool and splendid halls with him, telling him legends of the past and present grandeur of the Phippenys. She meant to make a thorough Phippeny of him; she wanted him to love every thing she did; and she had him up stairs in her room, at various times, showing him her father's miniature, and asking him if he would ever fancy the little old lady stringing her beads now in the library once was the fairy being of the other miniature; telling him of dear Tom and poor Harry, and warning him against the love of money, lest it made him like wretched Cousin Ralph.

"I suppose all them things are worth a good deal of money?" once said the urchin.

"Those things, James? Yes, I suppose so."

"Much as this house is?"

"Oh yes, indeed, and more. The Phippenys never have any thing but genuine."

"My! And this house ain't the beginning, Ann says, of all you've got."

"Why, James, what set you to thinking how much I had?"

"I wasn't. I was thinking why you had so much and old Bets hadn't nothing."

"Hadn't any thing, Jamie. I am going to try and find her, dear, and we'll make her comfortable. I suppose that is why I have so much—to do good with."

"You don't do good with these things."

"No; they do good to me," said Miss Phippeny. "But seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you," she said, softly.

"You never showed 'em all to me before."

"Didn't I? I don't take them out very often, Jamie," said she, closing the spring.

The boy went down stairs by-and-by. He looked into the great, dull drawing-rooms and shivered, though it was so warm. He went to the vestibule window, that opened noiselessly on the porch, and dropped out the kitten which he had brought into the house the day before, and watched her scrambling descent to the steps. "Old Bets always said Jim's cub could go where the cats go," said he, and then went down for a game of ball in the lower hall, and for a bowl of bread-and-milk in the dining-room, where Ann waited on him in the intervals of putting back in the safe of the great dining-room beyond the mass of ringing plate which had just undergone its yearly cleansing. "Ann, don't you think it's slow here?" said he, meditatively, at last, getting down and taking his bowl to the table in the great room.

"Slow, Master James?"

"Well," said he, apologetically, "you have more to eat, I know."

"More to eat?"

"But there's old Felch—"

"Who's old Felch now, Master James?"

"Don't you hate her, Ann?" said he, laying both arms along the table. "I do. I'd like to fill her mouth with that whiting and run straws up her nose! Old Bets is worth a dozen of her. I say, Ann, wouldn't it be high if one had all these things, and could get away with them where there warn't any Felch to make you sit and learn verses about Babylon and the Philistines and the fire and the worm? Guess I'll have some things to spring on Bets! 'They shall roar together like lions: they shall yell as lions' whelps,'" said he, suiting the action to the word.

"Hush now, hush, Master James! That puts me in mind. Mrs. Felch says you're to come right up and learn the last ten verses of the third chapter of Luke."

"I sha'n't, Ann! I ain't a-going to. I can't. Any body 'd be a bad boy. I got down to Cosam, which was the son of Elmodam, which was the son of somebody; and I won't learn another one. I told her so. They're all just like that. I'll swear just as true as she makes me! I'll make her hair stand right up straight." But the dialogue was cut short by Ann's locking the safe, in which the last piece was deposited, and throwing down the key while she seized his arm and dragged him bodily to Mrs. Felch's territory.

But fortune being with Master James, by the time he had comfortably repeated "which was the son of Jorim, which was the son of Matthat" a hundred times or more till the words had lost all significance, his nose somehow began a furious bleeding, and he was sent down stairs to Ann again. But the young gentleman staid down stairs only the single second necessary to snatch something off the table, and then hurried up the two flights. Miss Phippeny had just descended; the bleeding went as miraculously as it came, by-the-way, and he entered the chamber next his own, and remained there some five minutes, coming out with a great Turkish towel in his hand, with which he went into his own room, where he skipped about vigorously till Ann fetched him to spend the rest of the afternoon in tears over the nine concluding verses of the third chapter of Luke, and to leave them unlearned at last.

"You'd better kiss me good-night, Ann," said Master James, with a twinkle, as Ann rebuked him for his stupidity while putting out his gas. "Maybe I sha'n't be here in the morning. Old Felch says I'm so delicate I'm likely to pop off any time."

"Very like. I've heard of bad boys as died in their sleep," said Ann, tartly, "and had their part in fire and—"

"I know all about that now, Ann. But maybe I'll go where there isn't any of the fire and brimstone you're all so fond of. I guess Bets knows as much as you do; nobody ever heard of fire and brimstone where she is! I'd rather be back with Bets again than have to learn that chapter. So!"

"There, you go to sleep!" said Ann, slamming the door.

If Miss Phippeny had been listening that night, perhaps she might have heard again the same rats she heard on the bitter winter's night when Master James first came to her house. But she heard nothing; nor did any of the others hear a sound through the thickness of their dreams. No watchman saw a little figure slide down the way the kitten went, and slip from porch-shadow to porch-shadow in the summer midnight darkness; and if any old hag in the reeking purlieus of the town welcomed a little cad getting home before his pal from a job it had taken eight months to work out, no one on Fifth Avenue was the wiser. Only when Ann went up for Master James to come to breakfast, no Master James was to be found then or ever afterward, and no sign of his way of departure was visible except the open window over the porch, descending from which might have broken a cat's neck, as Mrs. Felch remarked.

"It's just as I said, Miss," said the worthy and astute Felch, as Miss Phippeny, in her stupor, felt for a seat. "An old head on young shoulders, if they were young. We've had a thief in the house. He's had all our bearings. He's a dwarf. He's been play-acting for eight months here. And now you just look to your valuables!"

Her valuables! All at once, with a new light on it, there flashed over Miss Phippeny the remembrance of her conversation of yesterday morning with Master James—the closet, the spring, the treasures. She flew to her room and threw open the recess, a smile irradiating her face one moment, for there were all the old shagreen cases just as she had left them. She opened them one by one, and one by one they were empty. Miss Phippeny's heir had taken possession; and except two mangled little pictures that relentingly came back to her by mail, torn from their settings, she saw none of her treasures again. While she stood there, open-mouthed, Ann came up in a shaking fright to announce that the safe in the big dining-room was wide open and with nothing in it; all the great plate ringing with silver vibrations, gold-lined vessels, salvers, urns, and covers gone, and nothing to tell the way they went but two kitchen spoons crossed on the sill of the open window through which they might have been passed to a confederate. "He must have had an accomplice waiting under that window every night for half a year," cried Mrs. Felch, following close on Ann. "And he's torn out the third chapter of Luke and taken it with him!"

Poor Miss Phippeny! all her gushing springs of kindness shrank to their source. If there is one object in the world which she detests, it is a boy. "Go away!" she cries to Cousin Ralph's son, or to the beggar that pulls her skirt. "Go away! You're all alike! Why, for mercy's sake, the world can't be kept going without boys—" And nobody would ever suppose that the withered and sour old spinster's voice was choked with tears for the loss of her own.

IN A CLUB.

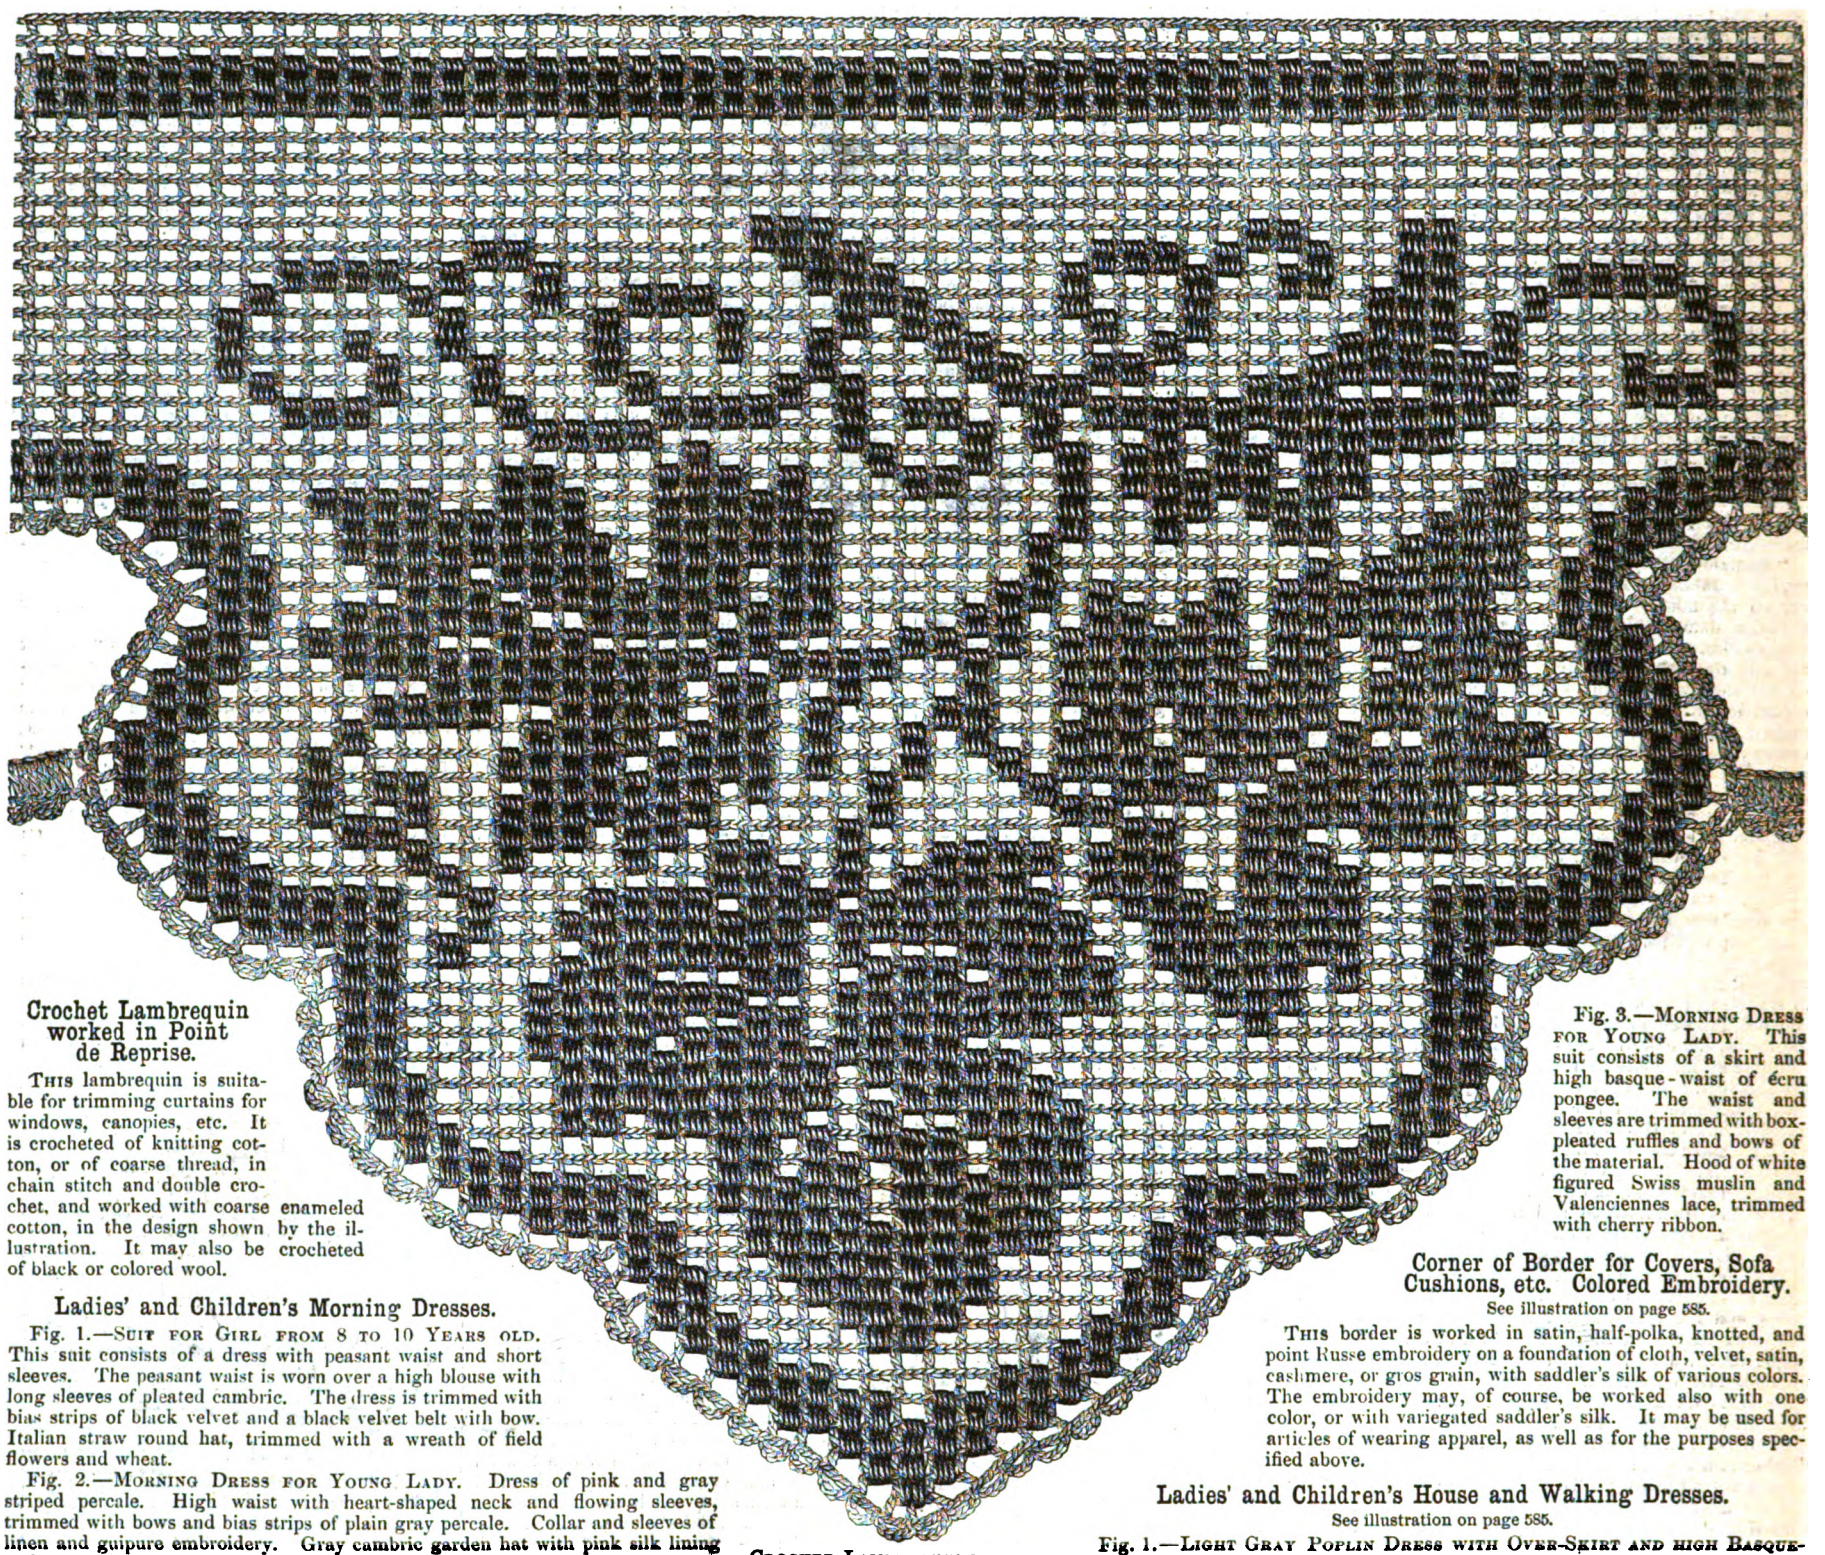
WE do not feel bound to declare in what club, nor even in what city, our artist witnessed the rather free-and-easy scene depicted in the illustration on page 588, nor should it be understood as an example of the kind of life to be met with ordinarily in clubs. As a rule, very little drinking is done in the club-rooms of gentlemen, and any member who should allow himself to be overcome with liquor at the club would be requested to resign, in terms that would admit of no hesitation in taking that step.

We are not sure but that our artist may be in league with those ladies who, like Miss Frances Power Cobbe, advocate the establishment of mixed clubs, as a sort of compromise between the champions of women's clubs and those who maintain that such institutions would be a direct blow at the existing social system. This lady, with characteristic boldness, inquires:

"Why should there not be a club with two wings and a centre—one wing exclusively for men, the other exclusively for women—the centre containing the reading-room, the principal dining-room, and a drawing-room for both? Each wing, of course, would have its own entrance, and there would be no necessity for a misogynous gentleman even so much as to behold the shadow of a chignon, or a shy lady to catch sight of a chimney-pot hat, should either prefer to remain in his or her proper domain. On the other hand, for those who like society in common, who desire to learn masculine politics, or are not averse to the rather feminine gossip which, I imagine, is not wholly unknown in Pall Mall or the cover-side, the centre of the club-house would have chief attraction. Many husbands and fathers, I am sure, would be delighted if their wives and daughters could share with them the comforts of which now they partake alone; and, if such a club were once started, I have little doubt it would soon be extremely popular."

Pleasant and easy as this scheme appears to be in theory, there would, doubtless, be many practical obstacles in the way should any association attempt to carry it out; but we notice in one of our daily papers a suggestion which is really worthy of consideration. It is this: Large numbers of ladies reside in the environs of New York who come to the city frequently to shop and visit. If comfortable quarters could be arranged where they could rest, get refreshment, read all the journals and magazines, have their parcels sent, and enjoy other conveniences, an accommodation of great value would be furnished, and one that many persons would gladly use. Great care would have to be exercised in the arrangement of details; but we believe no insurmountable obstacles would be found in the way.

Digitized by Google



Crochet Lambrequin worked in Point de Reprise.

THIS lambrequin is suitable for trimming curtains for windows, canopies, etc. It is crocheted of knitting cotton, or of coarse thread, in chain stitch and double crochet, and worked with coarse enameled cotton, in the design shown by the illustration. It may also be crocheted of black or colored wool.

Ladies' and Children's Morning Dresses.

Fig. 1.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD. This suit consists of a dress with peasant waist and short sleeves. The peasant waist is worn over a high blouse with long sleeves of pleated cambric. The dress is trimmed with bias strips of black velvet and a black velvet belt with bow. Italian straw round hat, trimmed with a wreath of field flowers and wheat.

Fig. 2.—MORNING DRESS FOR YOUNG LADY. Dress of pink and gray striped percale. High waist with heart-shaped neck and flowing sleeves, trimmed with bows and bias strips of plain gray percale. Collar and sleeves of linen and guipure embroidery. Gray cambric garden hat with pink silk lining and ruches of the material of the hat.

CROCHET LAMBREQUIN WORKED IN POINT DE REPRISE.

Fig. 3.—MORNING DRESS FOR YOUNG LADY. This suit consists of a skirt and high basque-waist of écru pongee. The waist and sleeves are trimmed with box-pleated ruffles and bows of the material. Hood of white figured Swiss muslin and Valenciennes lace, trimmed with cherry ribbon.

Corner of Border for Covers, Sofa Cushions, etc. Colored Embroidery.

See illustration on page 585.

THIS border is worked in satin, half-polka, knotted, and point Russe embroidery on a foundation of cloth, velvet, satin, cashmere, or gros grain, with saddler's silk of various colors. The embroidery may, of course, be worked also with one color, or with variegated saddler's silk. It may be used for articles of wearing apparel, as well as for the purposes specified above.

Ladies' and Children's House and Walking Dresses.

See illustration on page 585.

Fig. 1.—LIGHT GRAY POPLIN DRESS WITH OVER-SKIRT AND HIGH BASQUE-WAIST. The skirt is trimmed with flounces of the material, bows and folds of

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S MORNING DRESSES.

Digitized by Google

dark gray gros grain, and braiding of dark gray silk cord. The over-skirt and basque-waist are trimmed in the same manner, and finished with silk fringe and revers. Black lace hat, trimmed with velvet ribbon.

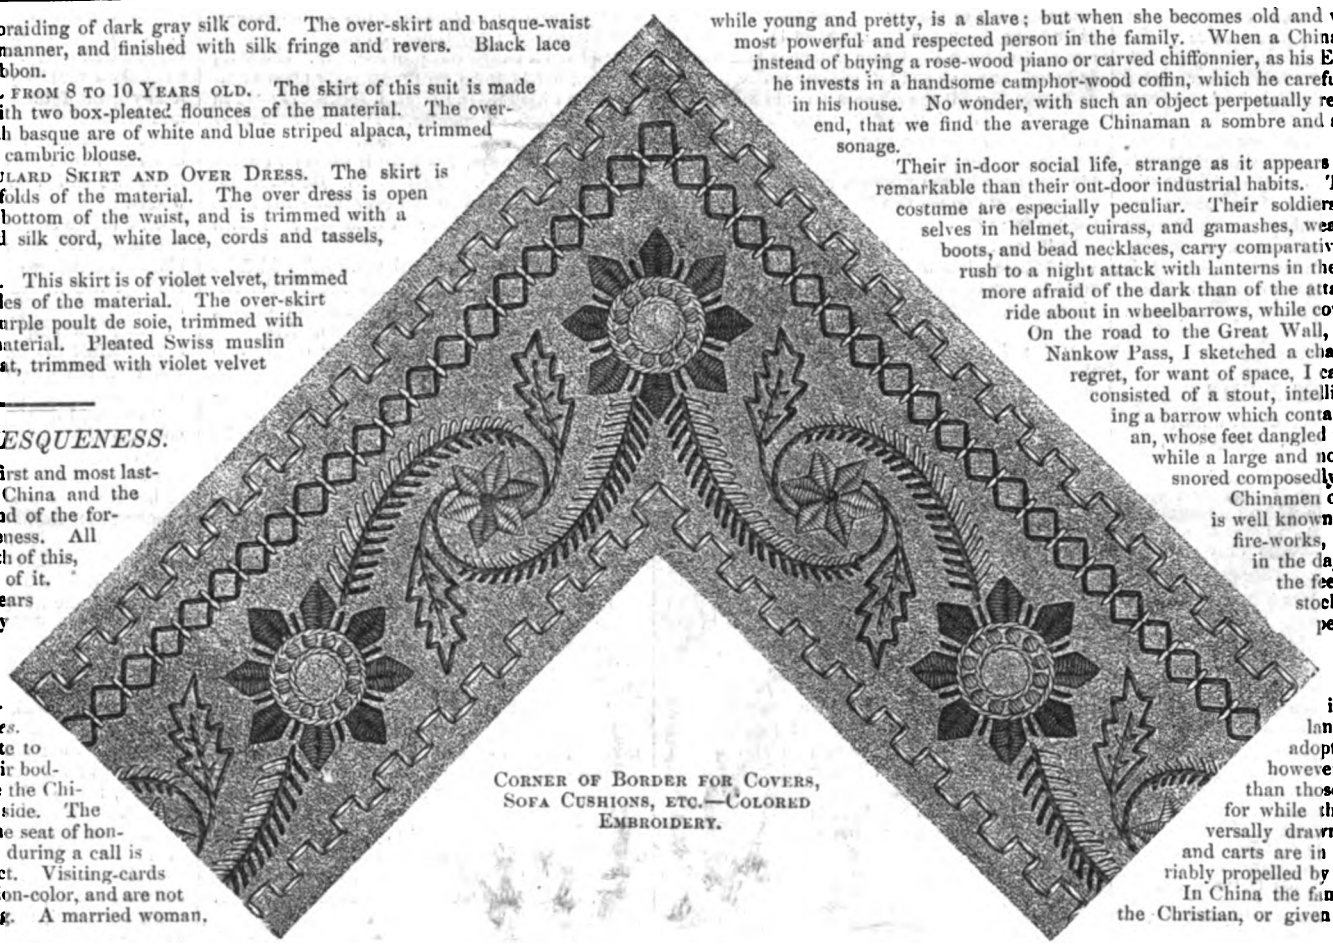
Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD. The skirt of this suit is made of blue alpaca, trimmed with two box-pleated flounces of the material. The over-skirt and peasant waist with basque are of white and blue striped alpaca, trimmed with blue velvet. Pleated cambric blouse.

Fig. 3.—GRANITE FOULARD SKIRT AND OVER DRESS. The skirt is trimmed with ruffles and folds of the material. The over dress is open down the front from the bottom of the waist, and is trimmed with a braiding of granite-colored silk cord, white lace, cords and tassels, and bows of the material.

Fig. 4.—WALKING SUIT. This skirt is of violet velvet, trimmed with wide and narrow ruffles of the material. The over-skirt and basque-waist are of purple poult de soie, trimmed with ruffles and folds of the material. Pleated Swiss muslin chemisette. Neapolitan hat, trimmed with violet velvet and feathers.

CHINESE GROTESQUENESS.

UNDOUBTEDLY the first and most lasting impression which China and the Chinese convey to the mind of the foreigner is that of grotesqueness. All instinctively realize the truth of this, yet few know the reason of it. To Europeans China appears grotesque simply and solely because the customs and manners of the people are so opposite to our own. Socially no less than physically they are our antipodes. Their habits are as opposite to ours as the direction of their bodies. In getting on a horse the Chinese mount on the right side. The left-hand seat at table is the seat of honor, and to retain your hat during a call is esteemed a mark of respect. Visiting-cards are painted a bright vermilion-color, and are not unfrequently three feet long. A married woman, while young and pretty, is a slave; but when she becomes old and withered is frequently the most powerful and respected person in the family. When a Chinaman furnishes his house, instead of buying a rose-wood piano or carved chiffonnier, as his European brother would do, he invests in a handsome camphor-wood coffin, which he carefully keeps in the best place in his house. No wonder, with such an object perpetually reminding him of his latter end, that we find the average Chinaman a sombre and somewhat melancholy personage.



CORNER OF BORDER FOR COVERS, SOFA CUSHIONS, ETC.—COLORED EMBROIDERY.

Their in-door social life, strange as it appears to us, is, if possible, less remarkable than their out-door industrial habits. Their military customs and costume are especially peculiar. Their soldiers, instead of casing themselves in helmet, cuirass, and gamashes, wear quilted petticoats, satin boots, and bead necklaces, carry comparatively harmless weapons, and rush to a night attack with lanterns in their hands, being apparently more afraid of the dark than of the attack of the enemy. Ladies ride about in wheelbarrows, while cows are driven in carriages.

On the road to the Great Wall, between Peking and the Nankow Pass, I sketched a characteristic group, which I regret, for want of space, I can not reproduce here. It consisted of a stout, intelligent-looking cooly wheeling a barrow which contained a buxom young woman, whose feet dangled from one side of the wheel, while a large and not over savory smelling pig snored composedly on the other.

Chinamen of every class and grade, as is well known, are passionately fond of fire-works, but prefer to exhibit them in the daytime. While, in Europe, the feet of culprits are put in the stocks, among these strange people the stocks are hung round the neck.

China has long been famous for its canals and its wonderful system of inland navigation. The means adopted for land locomotion are, however, scarcely less peculiar than those in vogue on the water; for while their boats are almost universally drawn by men, their carriages and carts are in favorable weather as invariably propelled by sails.

In China the family name comes first, and the Christian, or given name, afterward. Their

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S HOUSE AND WALKING DRESSES.

Digitized by Google

mourning color is white, instead of black as with us, and they mourn their parents three years. They resemble us in one thing, however, though they differ slightly in their method of showing it: they are fond of good living, and, indeed, are great epicures in their way. A Chinaman will not drink a drop of milk, but he will devour birds' nests, snails, and the fins of sharks with the keenest relish. Instead, however, of indulging in the discordant clatter of knives and forks so characteristic of an English dinner, they toss their meat into their mouths to a tune, every man keeping time with his chopsticks. The tune, however, is not generally either musical or provocative of appetite, and a Chinese dinner is usually a very tame affair.

HOW DID IT END?

'Tis a packet of letters, time-faded and worn,
Which have lain in a dusty corner neglected;
Undated, for lovers laugh time to scorn,
But signs of their age are soon detected,
For their spelling is bad and their grammar is weak,
And quaint are the phrases in which they speak:
They were written before you or I was born,
And we see an old love through their words reflected.

There's a mellow savor about each line,
Like the odor of rose leaves dried and time-rusted;
Like the rich bouquet of some choice old wine,
Which ripens and glows all mould-incrusted.
The times of patches and powdered tresses,
Of broidered coats and brocaded dresses,
Speak to us out of these letters of mine,
And tell how of old they loved and trusted.

"Sweetheart," he calls her—the fine old word
Rings tender and true in its Saxon simplicity—
He tells the old tale: how his heart is stirred,
Yet wavers and faints at its own felicity;
How he feared to speak and was nearly undone,
How he spoke at last and the fear was gone;
And now he is tender and now absurd,
As lovers will be who write not for publicity.

And how did it end? There is nothing to show.
The beginning only is here presented.
Did the love grow cold, and the lovers go
On their separate ways? or was bliss prevented,
As it sometimes is, by a cruel father?
Or, one proving false, did this love end rather
In wailing and passionate weeping? Ah, no!
Let us hope that they married and never repented.

Ladies' Fall Carriage and Visiting Dresses, Figs. 1–3.

See illustrations on page 589.

FIG. 1.—Plain pearl gray gros grain skirt, without tunic, demi-trained, and trimmed on the bottom with a single flounce of black lace. Garnet velvet basque, with black lace sleeves, and edged with a double flounce of black lace in two widths. Garnet velvet and black lace bonnet.

FIG. 2.—Stone gray faille trained skirt, brocaded with small sprays of green leaves and lilac flowers. Mexican blue faille basque, scalloped on the bottom and in front, with half-flowing sleeves trimmed with deep ruffles of scalloped silk, and opening in front over a frilled cambric bosom. Leghorn bonnet trimmed with Mexican blue ribbon and flowers. Mexican blue parasol.

FIG. 3.—Tourterelle gray faille dress. Under-skirt trimmed in front with broad bands of sultane velvet and Capucine guipure lace. Over-skirt of the same material as the under-skirt, open in front, falling straight, and simply cut in points. Basque with long tabs in front, trimmed with velvet and lace like the skirt at the bottom. Sultane velvet fichu trimmed with Capucine lace. Sultane velvet bonnet trimmed with flowers of the different shades in the dress. Tourterelle gray parasol. This is a most effective toilette, the tints of which resemble the gorgeous autumnal foliage.

BERT'S MONOGRAM.

WE were just fairly established at Aunt Rebbie's for the summer, and I was waiting for Rob to come down on the evening train from the city, my hands folded in delicious idleness, with nothing to do but watch the evening shadows darken over the fields of blue timothy. Aunt Rebbie nodded over her knitting in the corner, while the kitten played with the ball of yarn, and Rite sat at the table slowly shading the Ural Mountains on the map she had drawn for the geography lesson at school next day. There were voices out on the veranda at the end where the trumpet-creeper grew thickest; and, moving my chair a little, I could see Bert Morley lounging lazily on a bench, with Miss Kate Devine, at a distance of about two feet of moonlight, entertaining him. Bert was smoking his cigar; but some girls seem to take pride in making a man free to do that after an hour's acquaintance, and Miss Devine was no prude. I smiled as I thought how becomingly she had arrayed herself that morning after she heard that Bert Morley was expected by stage, with rifle and fishing-tackle, to spend two weeks' vacation. She had previously confessed to me that she found the country horribly dull. And as for Bert, when he came, I fancied a look of not unpleasant surprise in his eyes as he bowed to Miss Devine, for he had heard of her in society, and he need not fear stupid evenings with a town belle, and no other man near for a rival.

"It is a case of diamond cut diamond," I said lightly to myself; and just then the step I had been listening for sounded on the walk, and I ran to meet Rob, who came in with his pockets full of magazines and papers, making me feel as if we were not in the country, after all.

Next morning Rob was off to the city again by six o'clock, and even earlier than that Bert Morley had betaken himself to the lake for a long forenoon of fishing. I heard him whistling as he went down the lane. Miss Devine and I met about nine o'clock at a delicious late breakfast; and as we sipped our creamy coffee together I gave her all the glances I could spare, admiring her little slippered feet, the dainty fluting on her white wrapper, her magnificent hair and long lashes, and her languid grace. Aunt Rebbie was busy in the kitchen, and Rite had gone off to school; so we two had all the cool part of the house to ourselves, reading a little, practicing a little, and talking a little. Miss Devine was very affable; but afterward, thinking it over, I tried in vain to recall any charm deeper than the charm of manner, of attitude, of glance, and inflection.

"But I am not very brilliant myself," I thought, humbly, "and, of course, she wouldn't shine out in full radiance on a little gray moth like me."

In the afternoon she put on a bewitching gypsy hat, and went strolling down the lane, while I wandered out among the raspberry-bushes, and stumbled upon Rite, who was there studying a long review lesson in history. I liked Rite—she was such a bright, honest little school-girl—so I sat down by her, and by-and-by took the book to hear her lesson. It was Roman history, and Rite recited in her own words, with original comments. I really felt, for the first time in my life, that I was getting a clear idea of the stately line of Cæsars. We had just got down to Constantine when there was the sound of laughing voices in the lane, and, looking over the raspberry-bushes, we saw Bert Morley and Kate Devine coming home. She had met him and turned back with him. He had had good luck, as the long string of fish he carried bore witness.

"Oh dear! I do think it is too bad," said Rite, with a frown. "So many pretty perch and mullet dragged out of the blue lake in an agony, just to make sport for a man!"

"And far below, in the coral grove,
The purple mullet and gold-fish rove," sang Bert, in triumphant tenor, as he came through the gate and laid down his trophies. "There was no coral grove, but I am sure these are the genuine purple mullet, Mrs. Hathaway; for look at the splendid colors!"

And he pointed to the flashes of red and purple on the still quivering scales. Kate Devine bent to examine them, with smiling admiration; but little Rite, turning her back in girlish disgust, walked away to the house. We had some of the mullet broiled for supper, but I am bound to say that their flavor did not equal their color; and when I saw the rest thrown carelessly away I wished, with Rite, that they were alive and happy again in the blue lake. But, dear me! when Rob came he entered right into Bert's enthusiasm, and wished he could have gone fishing all day too.

He had his chance the next morning, however, not being obliged to go to the city. He and Bert were off by dawn, with a big lunch in their basket, and singing like minstrels. The rest of us being left to our own devices, Kate Devine secluded herself to write letters, and I, most unexpectedly, got my treasure out of the day by discovering something new in Rite. I had taken a book, and was going across the fields to a picturesque old oak-tree that shaded a corner of the pasture. I kept along by the wall, carefully skirting the tall timothy, with its bluish-purple heads, so as not to spoil the mowing, when suddenly, nestled down in the grass, I came upon Rite; and she was making a sketch—the daintiest thing you ever saw! She had her sitters; and they were patient ones, all but one—a great blue dragon-fly, who soared uneasily just over the grass tops. But she had him already safely soaring in her sketch as natural as life. She was drawing a single clump of grass, with its feathery heads, a gold-belted spider weaving her web from stem to stem, and a patient caterpillar ineffectually climbing at the base.

"Oh, Rite, Rite!" I cried, watching her pencil, "how did you ever learn to do it?" For she was only a little fifteen-year-old school-girl, you know, going to a country district school.

She threw back her hair, and looked up.

"I suppose I take it from my father," she said, simply: "he was an artist." And then I remembered how Aunt Rebbie had told me of the poor artist who died young, and, quickly followed by his wife, had left this child an orphan. He had never attained to any eminence, but that there was something genuine in him was proved by this heritage of his child. She had had no training; her eyes and fingers seemed to travel right of themselves. The short of it was I took her over to the pasture with me, where she made me a drawing of my favorite gnarly old oak, with the empty crow's nest in it, and then another of the gray mossy rock behind us. I was in an ecstasy.

"I will make you my little comrade," I told her, "and you shall go with us in all our sails and rides, and make me gems of pictures to remember the summer by; and when Rob and I go to Europe we will take you to sketch us an album full of delights."

"I will go if you will take me," said little Rite, eye and cheek kindling.

It was past noon when we got back to the farm-house, and found the fishermen had returned. Rob was cleaning perch in a corner of the yard, but Bert and Miss Devine sat at ease in the veranda earnestly discussing monograms. It was when monograms were first the rage, and Bert had some pretty specimens in his note-book to show. He had made a few scrawling attempts to weave together his own initials, but in vain.

"I wish some one would design me a monogram," he exclaimed, laughing—"something really original and artistic, you know. Come, Miss Kate, isn't that the sort of thing you ladies are supposed to do? Make me a monogram, and I'll give you any thing you like."

"That's a dangerous promise, Sir!" she said, bending her lustrous eyes meaningly upon him.

"Can't help it," he replied, recklessly; "I'm perishing for a monogram. Take my name, my purse, my life, but give me a monogram! The truth is, Miss Kate, I believe it to be an impossible combination. Just listen, Bertram De Witt Morley! Who could ever make any thing of such a set of initials? Could you? I wish you could."

"I'm afraid I have not the power," said Miss Devine, with what sounded like a real sigh; but she made quite a show nevertheless of writing his full name down upon her ivory tablets.

I had stopped, with Rite, a few minutes to glance over the monograms; but just at this point Rob called, and we went to watch his amateur performances.

Two days after, as I was passing through the parlor, Bert Morley stopped me with a very pleased face, and said he had something pretty to show to me. It was a slip of paper with a monogram on it—his own, B. D. W. M.—as pretty and graceful a design as you can imagine. I can't really describe it, but perhaps you can compose it for yourselves out of these materials—two rustic bar-posts, with two bars slanting down and two in place, and then a perfect wealth of a running rose-vine twining in and out.

"Isn't it charming?" he asked; "and would you have thought it was in her to do it?"

"In whom?" I inquired.

"Why, Kate Devine, you know. I've been thinking her all along a mindless flirt; and here she puts me to shame with this pure dainty bit of fancy. How long it takes to find you women out! I am really beginning to like her now—I could hardly help liking any one with such a touch of grace in her as this shows."

"Don't be a rash boy, Bert," I said, warningly. "First impressions are often right, after all."

But a moment after he was looking all through the house for Kate Devine, to tempt her off with him for a delightful row upon the lake after water-lilies. Of course she went, in a bewitching boating costume, and came home three hours later wreathed with the beautiful white lilies, lustrous-eyed and stately as Helen of Troy.

She did not seem so much like a stately Helen, however, when toward twilight I heard her over the garden wall talking with Rite as I walked down the lane.

"—on the stair-way, after you had gone up with your arithmetic," she was saying (what could she mean?); "and now I want so very much to keep it."

"You may keep it and welcome," said Rite.

"And you won't tell any one?" pleaded Miss Devine, in an eager, anxious way: "you won't tell, if you happen to see it again, that it was yours—that is, that I did not do it myself, you know? And I will give you such a pretty gold set, with ear-rings, Rite."

"I don't want the set," said Rite, slowly. "I don't know what you mean, Miss Devine; but, of course, I shouldn't speak of the paper unless some one asked me."

By this time I had joined Rob, and was out of hearing.

After this Kate Devine was very gracious to Rite, and took unusual notice of her—except, indeed, when Rob and Bert were around. One sultry afternoon we three—Kate, Rite, and I—sat out under the shadiest apple-tree fanning ourselves, and now and then talking a little. Rite said she would like to be strong and brave, like Ida Pfeiffer, and go traveling all over the world.

"Alone?" asked Kate Devine, incredulously. "Would you leave love out? Now don't tell me, Rite, that you don't think of lovers and husbands just like other girls, for I sha'n't believe you!"

I was provoked at Kate for speaking so to the child; for what is the use of giving a girl fancies till they come of themselves? But Rite surprised me by having her ideas already formed; and, child that she was, let her heart's chords be played upon even by the careless hand, and respond sweet music.

"Yes, I do believe in love," she said, blushing and honest. "But I believe a lover ought to be brave and lofty and noble and like a stainless knight. And I should not think of looking for him, for he would be sure to find me."

"Then you are sure there is this wonderful 'he' somewhere for you on earth?" demanded Kate Devine, with a laugh.

"I don't know," said Rite, gravely; "but if there is, I pray to God every day to keep him good."

A little hush fell over us at this, and then Aunt Rebbie called Rite from the window, and away she ran.

"Was there ever such an odd little thing!" exclaimed Kate; and when, presently, Bert Morley joined us, languidly fanning himself with his palmetto, she told him as a good joke poor Rite's heart-speeches.

"What! that sunburned little school-girl!" ejaculated Bert. "Does she have fancies like that? Why, what a darling she is, just like Mrs. Browning's little Ellie, that had the swan's nest among the reeds! It used to be the dream of my youth to go roaming about till I found just such a love as that. But the world knocks the notions out of one. You and I have grown more practical, haven't we, Miss Kate?"

She smiled half absently.

"Oh, Bert!" I said, with sudden feeling, "don't throw away all the gold of your youth so lavishly."

"Perhaps there's a mint that keeps coining," he said, smiling at me; and then, starting up, "I believe I'll go to the woods! I can get two hours' gunning before supper."

"If we were at the sea-shore," said Kate Devine, "I would ask you to get me a gray gull's wing, Mr. Morley. I want one so much for my hat. But maybe you can find something else: if any great brilliant bird comes in sight, shoot him for me."

"I obey, lady fair!" said Bert, with a lowly bow; and then he was off for his rifle, and directly we saw him crossing the fields to the woods.

Just before sunset he returned, tired, flushed, and successful, with three beautiful red-winged blackbirds, lifeless and swinging in his hand. He laid one at Kate Devine's feet and one at mine.

"Oh, how gorgeous!" cried Kate, in a rapture. "Just the thing for my black hat! But you'll cut the wings off for me, won't you, Mr. Morley; for that I never could bear to do."

"Oh yes, I'll dissect it," he said, lightly, "and yours, too, Mrs. Hathaway." I had taken the poor dead bird up in my hands. I did not want the wings myself, but I remembered two sisters at home whose hearts they would rejoice; so I thanked him cordially.

"The other bird is for the little heart that dreams," said Bert. "School-girls like such things. Where is Rite?"

"Out at the back-door feeding the chickens," replied Aunt Rebbie, concisely.

We all went out there, and found her surrounded by her flock of downy pets. Bert made his offering of the red-winged blackbird, and explained. Rite took it in a sort of pitiful amaze, caressing the dead, drooping head. Then, as we waited for what she would say, to our surprise she burst into tears.

"Oh, how could you—how could you!" she sobbed. "He was so free and glad and happy up in the tree-tops. Put his pretty wings in my hat! No, indeed, he shan't be robbed of a single bright feather! I am going to bury him just as he is, out under some beautiful tree."

Bert colored, and Kate exclaimed, "Well!" as Rite stopped crying and walked off, carrying the bird in her hands.

"La, child," called Aunt Rebbie after her, "it ain't so bad as if it was a robin. Those pesky blackbirds eat the corn up as fast as it grows!"

But Bert followed Rite silently, looking like the knight of the rueful countenance, and I imagine he made his peace with her, and helped her dig the blackbird's grave; for when they came back the indignation had died out of her honest young eyes.

I was amused when Bert sought me out the next morning with a sort of eager interest, and told me that Rite was really one of the brightest little things that ever lived.

"She's sitting out on the door-step now," he said, "drawing a map of Greece for a school exercise, and it's a regular gem. Do come and see her, Mrs. Hathaway!"

I told him, with an air of superior knowledge, that I was aware of it all, and that if he would look through her atlas he would find it a perfect port-folio of sketches and bits of design more charming than maps. "Her father was an artist, you know," I concluded. Away he went at once to take possession of the atlas, and I followed, well pleased to see my little comrade get appreciation.

She took it very quietly—his delight over her slight pencil sketches: studies of old stumps, bits of gray wall, lichens, a bough with a bird's nest, a clump of violets. Suddenly, as he turned over the leaves, he came to something that made him start and change color. He looked up in a dazed sort of way.

"What's the matter, Bert?" I asked.

"Oh, nothing," he said, drawing a long breath; "only I felt just as if some one had struck me in the face! Did you draw this, Rite?"

"Yes," she said, simply. I looked over his shoulder and saw on the paper he held out the first rough design of the monogram Kate Devine had given him—less elaborate, but the same dainty fancy.

"Then perhaps you drew this too?" he remarked, taking the cherished monogram from his note-book.

"Yes," said Rite.

Miss Devine, impelled by merciless fate, came strolling toward us just at that moment in one of her prettiest morning dresses, her hands full of honeysuckle blossoms.

"Ah, what have we here?" she asked, lightly, as she joined us.

"Oh, a host of pretty things—and—monograms!" said Bert, looking her full in the face, with a cold brilliance in his eyes.

She saw what he meant, faltered, tried to laugh carelessly, but failed; and then, with some half-uttered word of apology or explanation, turned and left us, gliding away over the green grass again, dropping honeysuckles as she went.

Ah, how the wheels of life turn round, if we only wait a little while and watch!

A few days thereafter, when I drove Bert Morley in the light buggy over to the station, his vacation being ended, I said to him a little maliciously, "Miss Devine has been quite an acquisition to our society this summer, hasn't she?"

He looked round at me with an almost comical earnestness in his handsome face.

"I've got a new idea about some things, Mrs. Hathaway," he said. "I'm coming back here next summer, and next; and I am going to win little Rite's love by-and-by, if I can!"

"Then you must make yourself brave and lofty and noble and like a stainless knight," I said, quoting Rite's words. "Remember that, Bert!"

"That's the work I have set myself to do," he said, gravely; and I put faith in him.

That faith has been fully justified. Bert Morley is to-day a noble man, and a blessing to the world. And Rob and I smiled gladly in each other's faces when last evening we received a wedding invitation, with a monogram of dainty design and curious interweaving. You could read "Rite" in among the larger letters, if you looked sharp enough at each vine, tendril, and bud.

Digitized by Google

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE king is dead! Long live the king! It was by these words that the end of the old reign and the beginning of the new one was formerly announced in France. In like manner we may say to-day, Fashion is dead! Long live fashion!

We are witnessing, in fact, the close of one world and the dawn of another, or, rather, its rejuvenation. Fashion, as we have beheld its workings for the last fifteen years, has seemed to take the place of an institution in France; but this has only been in seeming. It is, indeed, the collection, or, as one would say in the neo-scientific language now so much in vogue, the collectivity, of all the elegance, indolence, and riches of a country—the most exquisite and subtile expression of its civilization.

In countries which are not subject to those periodical convulsions which cause the wheel of fortune to revolve continually, endangering wealth, rank, and position, and to-day casting into obscurity those who were yesterday at the summit of fame, fashion becomes an institution in good earnest, with fixed foundations and traditions which can not lightly be set aside. But in France fashion knows neither past nor future; it is continually varying with the aspect of the times, and its changes bear a fantastic but nevertheless real resemblance to the political transformations which they accompany. Given the government, and you have the fashion; you may know the one by studying the other, and can prognosticate the future of the nation from the cut of its garments.

From this stand-point, to every acute observer the fashions must have presented an appalling horoscope during the empire. Never have there been seen, even in the most degraded epochs of the history of France, fashions and modes of life more devoid of refinement, more devoted to gross pleasures, more regardless of honor, more careless of scandal—more ill-bred, in a word—than under the Second Empire, which has just closed. Nameless men, adventurers from all countries, enriched by unscrupulous speculations, with the aid of a few French men and women of doubtful characters, have set the fashion in France for the last fifteen or eighteen years. An international fashion it might be called, preluding by its vices and scandals that International Society which deluged Paris with blood during the fatal reign of the Commune. Without morality, without education, without love of art, without traditions, without principles, what could imperial fashion do? It did what we have seen: it set the example for every kind of extravagance and folly; it lowered the intellectual standard of the country by degrading its standard of morality and showing itself brazenly and shamelessly materialistic, and planted the seed from whence sprung the brutal outbreak of the 18th of March, which was only the rude effort of all the lowest appetites of humanity toward satisfaction.

Among these leaders of fashion were seen neither the old nobility of France—save a few spendthrifts, burdened with debt, and who bought their release with their honor—nor the substantial citizens and merchants. It is from the latter elements that the fashions of the future will be reconstructed. The present office-holders and their families will form the nucleus thereof; and as they will no longer be chosen for the reason that their morals are easy and their intelligence mediocre, we may be sure that the outward appearances will be reputable, and the foundation honorable; as they will no longer be bribed ignoramuses, the arts will not be represented in their eyes by Offenbach's music and the paintings of artists who make nudity a specialty, and we shall see the elevation of that artistic standard the degradation of which in France is always accompanied with national disaster.

For the moment the leader of fashion is Madame Thiers, that "woman of great good sense and courage," according to the testimony borne her by her husband last year when the imperial police announced their intention of demolishing his house to punish him for opposing the war with Prussia. The official head-quarters of fashion are now at Versailles, where the graceful young matron, Madame Pothuan, who holds receptions at the Ministry of the Marine, attracts much attention. This lady is one of the most promising types of the coming fashions, inasmuch as she does not bear the faintest analogy with those of the past. Devoid of the silly vanity and affectation of hoydenish and pert manners that marked those "girls of the period" who, we hope, will soon be only a memory, Madame Pothuan is full of simple dignity and natural and sincere kindliness. In this she models after her husband, the admiral, and every one will admit that she could not have chosen a better example. The official circle, which is installed at Versailles for a few months, at least, will therefore give receptions, and set the tone for the coming season.

The new leaders of fashion will be recruited from among the nobility, the upper bourgeoisie, and the honorable financiers. The adventurers of all classes have had their day. They have this consolation; they can say, with General Fleury, "No matter; we had a good time while it lasted!" But it is certain that henceforth, having neither accomplices nor associates among those in high places, they will lose that protection and impunity which they have enjoyed for twenty years—almost a quarter of a century.

At this moment our future leaders of the fashion are to be found at the watering-places and seaports of France, as a matter of course. Henceforth Frenchmen will not go to German towns to spend their money, but will keep it to enrich their own country. The French artists, musicians, and actors having refused all engagements for Germany, Vichy, Biarritz, Dieppe, Mont Dor, and all the other beautiful sea-side places and hot springs which France possesses in such abundance, are crowded this year, a little to the detriment of Paris, which had hoped not to have any dull season. Indeed, it was at first the intention not to leave Paris this summer; but the war having laid waste the thousands of villas about the great city in which the bourgeoisie, merchants, and professional men had been accustomed to take refuge during the heated season, and the civil struggle having interrupted the work of repairs, it became necessary to go a little further, especially to the sea-shore. But it is certain that in a month Paris will see all her children home again, reinforced by the strangers who, before repairing to their winter residences, will wish to visit the great city and see the ruins caused by the incendiaries of the Commune. Foreigners are already in Paris in great numbers; the large hotels, such as the Hôtel du Louvre, are overflowing with them. But the true Paris season will be in September, for which time the theatres are reserving all their new pieces. The Gymnase announces a play by Alexandre Dumas fils, who is now Alexandre Dumas, since his father is no more. The Théâtre Français also has several pieces in rehearsal, among which is one by Emile Augier.

The literature of the day is wholly devoted to political and military questions. The tide is so irresistible that it hurries away every one, even those most averse by nature to this kind of thought. An anonymous pamphlet published at London under the title of "New Letters by Junius" has excited much attention. Rumor ascribes it to Alexandre Dumas, and as he has not contradicted it, rumor may be right. It is perhaps the most remarkable work of the times on this exciting question. It is firm, subtile, forcible, ingenious, and true; imbued with that internal truth which makes itself felt without being defined or proved. The book contains a series of contemporary portraits, the more remarkable inasmuch as they are drawn without passion, but with an accuracy which bespeaks a sort of second-sight of the soul.

Another writer, known hitherto only by sundry witty articles, published in what are called the petits journaux in opposition to the great political journals, Albert Wolf, has also attacked politics in a stout volume entitled "The Two Emperors," which, if not interesting and sincere, has at least the merit of adroitness. The author, a Prussian, who is this moment seeking to be naturalized in France, is forced by this very fact, and also perhaps by his character, to be two-faced. He might say, like the bat, I am a bird—see my wings; and a mouse—see my paws. The result is an ambiguous book, written in a manner to please the Germans, yet sprinkled with sentimentalities calculated to entrap the French, who, however, taught by experience, can not fail to discern the true meaning of the compliments paid them.

The races are rallying the fashionable world together. Those at Caen have been very brilliant, both through the value of the horses and that of the stakes. The owners of the studs having mutually agreed not to run their horses in Germany, the consequence has been that we have had more races than usual in France, continuing, at different places, through the whole summer.

The Orleans princes, who have patriotically held aloof from all political questions, are none the less destined by the force of circumstances to exercise a happy influence on the fortunes of their country. France, which has need of good examples after the demoralization of the last twenty years, can find none better than in this family, whose sons are all brave and whose daughters are all virtuous; and whatever may be the prejudices of the republicans, the Orleans princes will act on French society by the mere fact of their presence and lives. The Duc d'Aumale has regained possession of his estate at Chantilly, where he lives on a liberal scale on his private fortune, while announcing his intention never to set an example of the foolish extravagance to which France owes at least a part of her misfortunes—the extravagance of parvenues, the extravagance of adventurers, who, divining that they had no future, were determined at least to enjoy the present before it escaped their grasp.

Each of the Orleans princes is himself the father of a numerous, beautiful, and respectable family. This will create so many centres for the ensuing winter which will serve as models for French society. We can wish nothing better for all Frenchwomen than to imitate the virtues of the princesses of Orleans, so worthy, so modest, so charitable without ostentation; as we can wish nothing better for all Frenchmen than to have the respect for their parents, the love for their country, the bravery on the battle-field, and, in a word, the good qualities of which the princes of Orleans have given so many proofs.

A word, in conclusion, about the styles now in vogue. Paletots prevail, in spite of futile attempts to revive mantelets. Wrappings with sleeves must always be more convenient than those without them; and unless the mantelet can find means of annexing a pair of sleeves, it is almost certain of being thrown aside. Skirts and over-skirts are chiefly of the same color, or, at most, of different shades. Black is hardly ever worn over any thing but black of a different material. Flounces are varied with rouleaux of the material, covering the whole skirt.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THERE is something almost ludicrous in rushing away from the heat which is always supposed to envelop the city in midsummer, only to find yourself shivering with the cold in your chosen country resort. August, this year, may have been somewhat exceptional; and, of course, a bracing air is always expected in such a locality, for example, as the White Mountains, even in the hottest month. "We slept cold all night," said a friend, who recently lodged at the Tiptop House; "and when we mentioned the fact to our host, he suggested that we might need more bed-covering. Investigation showed that there were only eight pairs of blankets on our bed!" But blankets were comfortable during August in plenty of places far below the snow-clouds above Mount Washington—places where muslins lay unfolded, and warm wraps were essential. True, the sun shone blazing hot at mid-day; but when he sank behind the bright western clouds a chilliness came with the falling dew, and you shivered perceptibly. "Have a little fire in your room?" says your kind hostess. "A fire in August! not if I freeze!" you exclaim. But by-and-by you are glad to happen into the room of a good old lady who goes on the principle of having a fire when she is cold, and to toast your feet by her glowing coals. However, compensation for a little too much cold comes in the shape of the brightest, freshest, clearest of mornings, when a brisk walk or a long drive is a delightful luxury.

In Des Moines, Iowa, there is an energetic woman who has devoted her leisure hours since spring to the personal supervision of forty hives of bees. This season she will take out about twelve hundred pounds of honey, by which she will realize a pretty little sum.

A correspondent of the Evening Mail has discovered that, if fashionable women are foolish and frivolous, fashionable men do not always care to have their doings open as the day. She writes: "'Don't put me in the paper—my wife doesn't know I'm here,' says a gentleman, who has been chatting and laughing with 'yours truly' all the morning; and then learns, to his infinite terror, that she—dabbles in ink!"

The islands of the sea are experiencing divers calamities. In the Indian Archipelago there is a small island called Tagolanda, about fifty miles northeast of Celebes. Recently an outburst of the volcano of Ruwang was accompanied by a concussion of the sea, and a wave forty yards in height swept all the human beings, cattle, and horses from the island. The number of persons who perished is stated at 416.

When Sir Walter Scott left Abbotsford to take a tour, which, it was thought, might lengthen his life, he committed the care of his estate to a friend, who received written directions as to the keeping of the house, the books, and the garden. Many other details of instruction were given, among which was a characteristic one concerning his canine friends: "The dogs to be taken care of—especially to shut them up when there is any thing to quarrel about."

According to the census returns, there is one happy couple living in Ohio who have contributed eighteen children to the population of the State. The appropriate naming of such a flock must have been a tax upon the ingenuity of the parents. But they were equal to the emergency, as the following list of the names will indicate: Margaret, Alascus, Nelson, Aplinda, Almira, Serelzia, Alcina, Ellet, Eugene, Mase, Henry, Ruth, Syrenicus, Rebecca, Felarria, Florence, Landice, and Robert.

Caution and fear are by no means identical; nor is the person who uses careful preventives against disease the one who is most fearful when it stands at his door. Excessive fear will doubtless excite certain diseases; but a uniform observance of hygienic rules, in a temperate and nutritious diet, scrupulous cleanliness of person and premises, regular sleep and exercises, and the avoidance of excesses of every kind, will tend to ward off all diseases. Supposing, therefore, that any epidemic is impending, wisdom points to a quiet, systematic, and thorough attention to all those sanitary measures which, important always, then become imperative. An inactive fear is the grossest folly; indifference is equally folly. Cheerfulness, discretion, care, and cleanliness will create an atmosphere in which disease will not long linger.

During the investigation of the late explosion on the Westfield a valve-maker testified that the safety-valve was only one-fifth the proper size; and the "engineer" who patched the boiler owned that he had never learned the trade of a machinist.

New Jersey may subside; Boston takes the palm for the biggest and best mosquitoes. A reliable witness—feelist, we should say, since coining words is allowable in these days—says that they "sing like locomotives, and sting like the piercing of porcupine quills." A woman lately claimed admission to a Boston hospital on the ground that she had the small-pox. After a few days it was discovered that the eruptions were only mosquito bites. This circumstance, however, has a bright side, as it proves by inference that the "Hub" is a tolerably healthy place, since its physicians don't see small-pox often enough to know it.

Rockaway Beach is said to be "free from mosquitoes and other insect annoyances." What a blessed place it must be!

Lightning performs strange antics. A few days since it ran down the ridge-pole of a New Hampshire house, and, separating, tore one side of the building down, and demolished all the windows on the other side. A table was thrown down, a looking-glass smashed. Three persons were in the house; none were seriously injured, a slight singeing of the face and hair of a young lady being all the damage done to them. But one would suppose that if fourteen persons were in a house struck by lightning the escape of all of them would be little short of miraculous. It was an Albany house. But with the greatest dexterity the electricity passed down the stove-pipe, and, bursting out within two feet of a man and his wife, struck the wall, scattering the plaster over half a dozen children, splitting timbers, and making a big hole in the ground. Finally it departed, leaving to the frightened occupants of the house only smoke and a sulphurous smell.

"Howard Glyndon" writes that Toronto would be a paradise for our lady shoppers, as kid gloves with two buttons, and of the best make, are only $1 25 a pair. Dress stuffs, which in the States sell at 50 or 60 cents a yard, can be bought there at 20 and 25 cents. Button boots, made to order in the best style, are $5 and $6. Dress-makers charge only $4 and $5 for making an elaborately trimmed dress.

It must afford the French some slight satisfaction to have found it in their power to a small extent literally to repay the Germans in their own coin. The authorities at Strasburg witnessed with dismay the arrival of 18,000,000 francs in German silver pieces. This sum forms a collection of most of the money imported into France by the invading army. Finding the French gold and silver much cleaner and far more handy than their own, the Germans were naturally very ready to part with the latter; the desire of the French, on the other hand, to rid themselves at the earliest opportunity of the unpleasant souvenir can occasion as little surprise. Of course this mode of payment imposed upon the German commissioners the task of counting over the whole sum, whereas the simple process of weighing suffices for French money. The thickness and weight of German coins varying greatly in the same species, the use of the balance is quite out of the question. Possibly the inconvenience experienced in this instance may accelerate the adoption of a new coinage, uniform throughout the empire.

Within the last year Brooklyn has added 17,000 or 18,000 persons to her population, and built 2214 houses for their accommodation.

What is the use of having "railroad commissioners," when they conduct their examinations of the track in such a superficial manner that rotten timbers in a bridge are not discovered?—as was the case on the Maine Central Railroad—and therefrom an accident occurred.

Even youth does not protect royalty from official harangues. The young Prince Imperial of Austria has just made a tour through Bohemia, where he received the usual public attentions. On returning from one of the oratorical receptions, while passing along a shady and sequestered alley with his preceptor only, the latter asked him, "Well, monseigneur, do you like this promenade?"

"Yes, certainly," replied the prince: "trees at any rate do not make speeches."

Three magnificent white Russian horses have been purchased by the Germans in Moscow, at a cost of four thousand rubles in silver, and are intended as a present to Bismarck.

One day, not long since, the warden of Bellevue Hospital received from the ladies of the Flower Charity, of Yonkers, five hundred handsome bouquets for distribution through the various wards. The sick and friendless there will bless that Charity.

Hear a wail from the West:

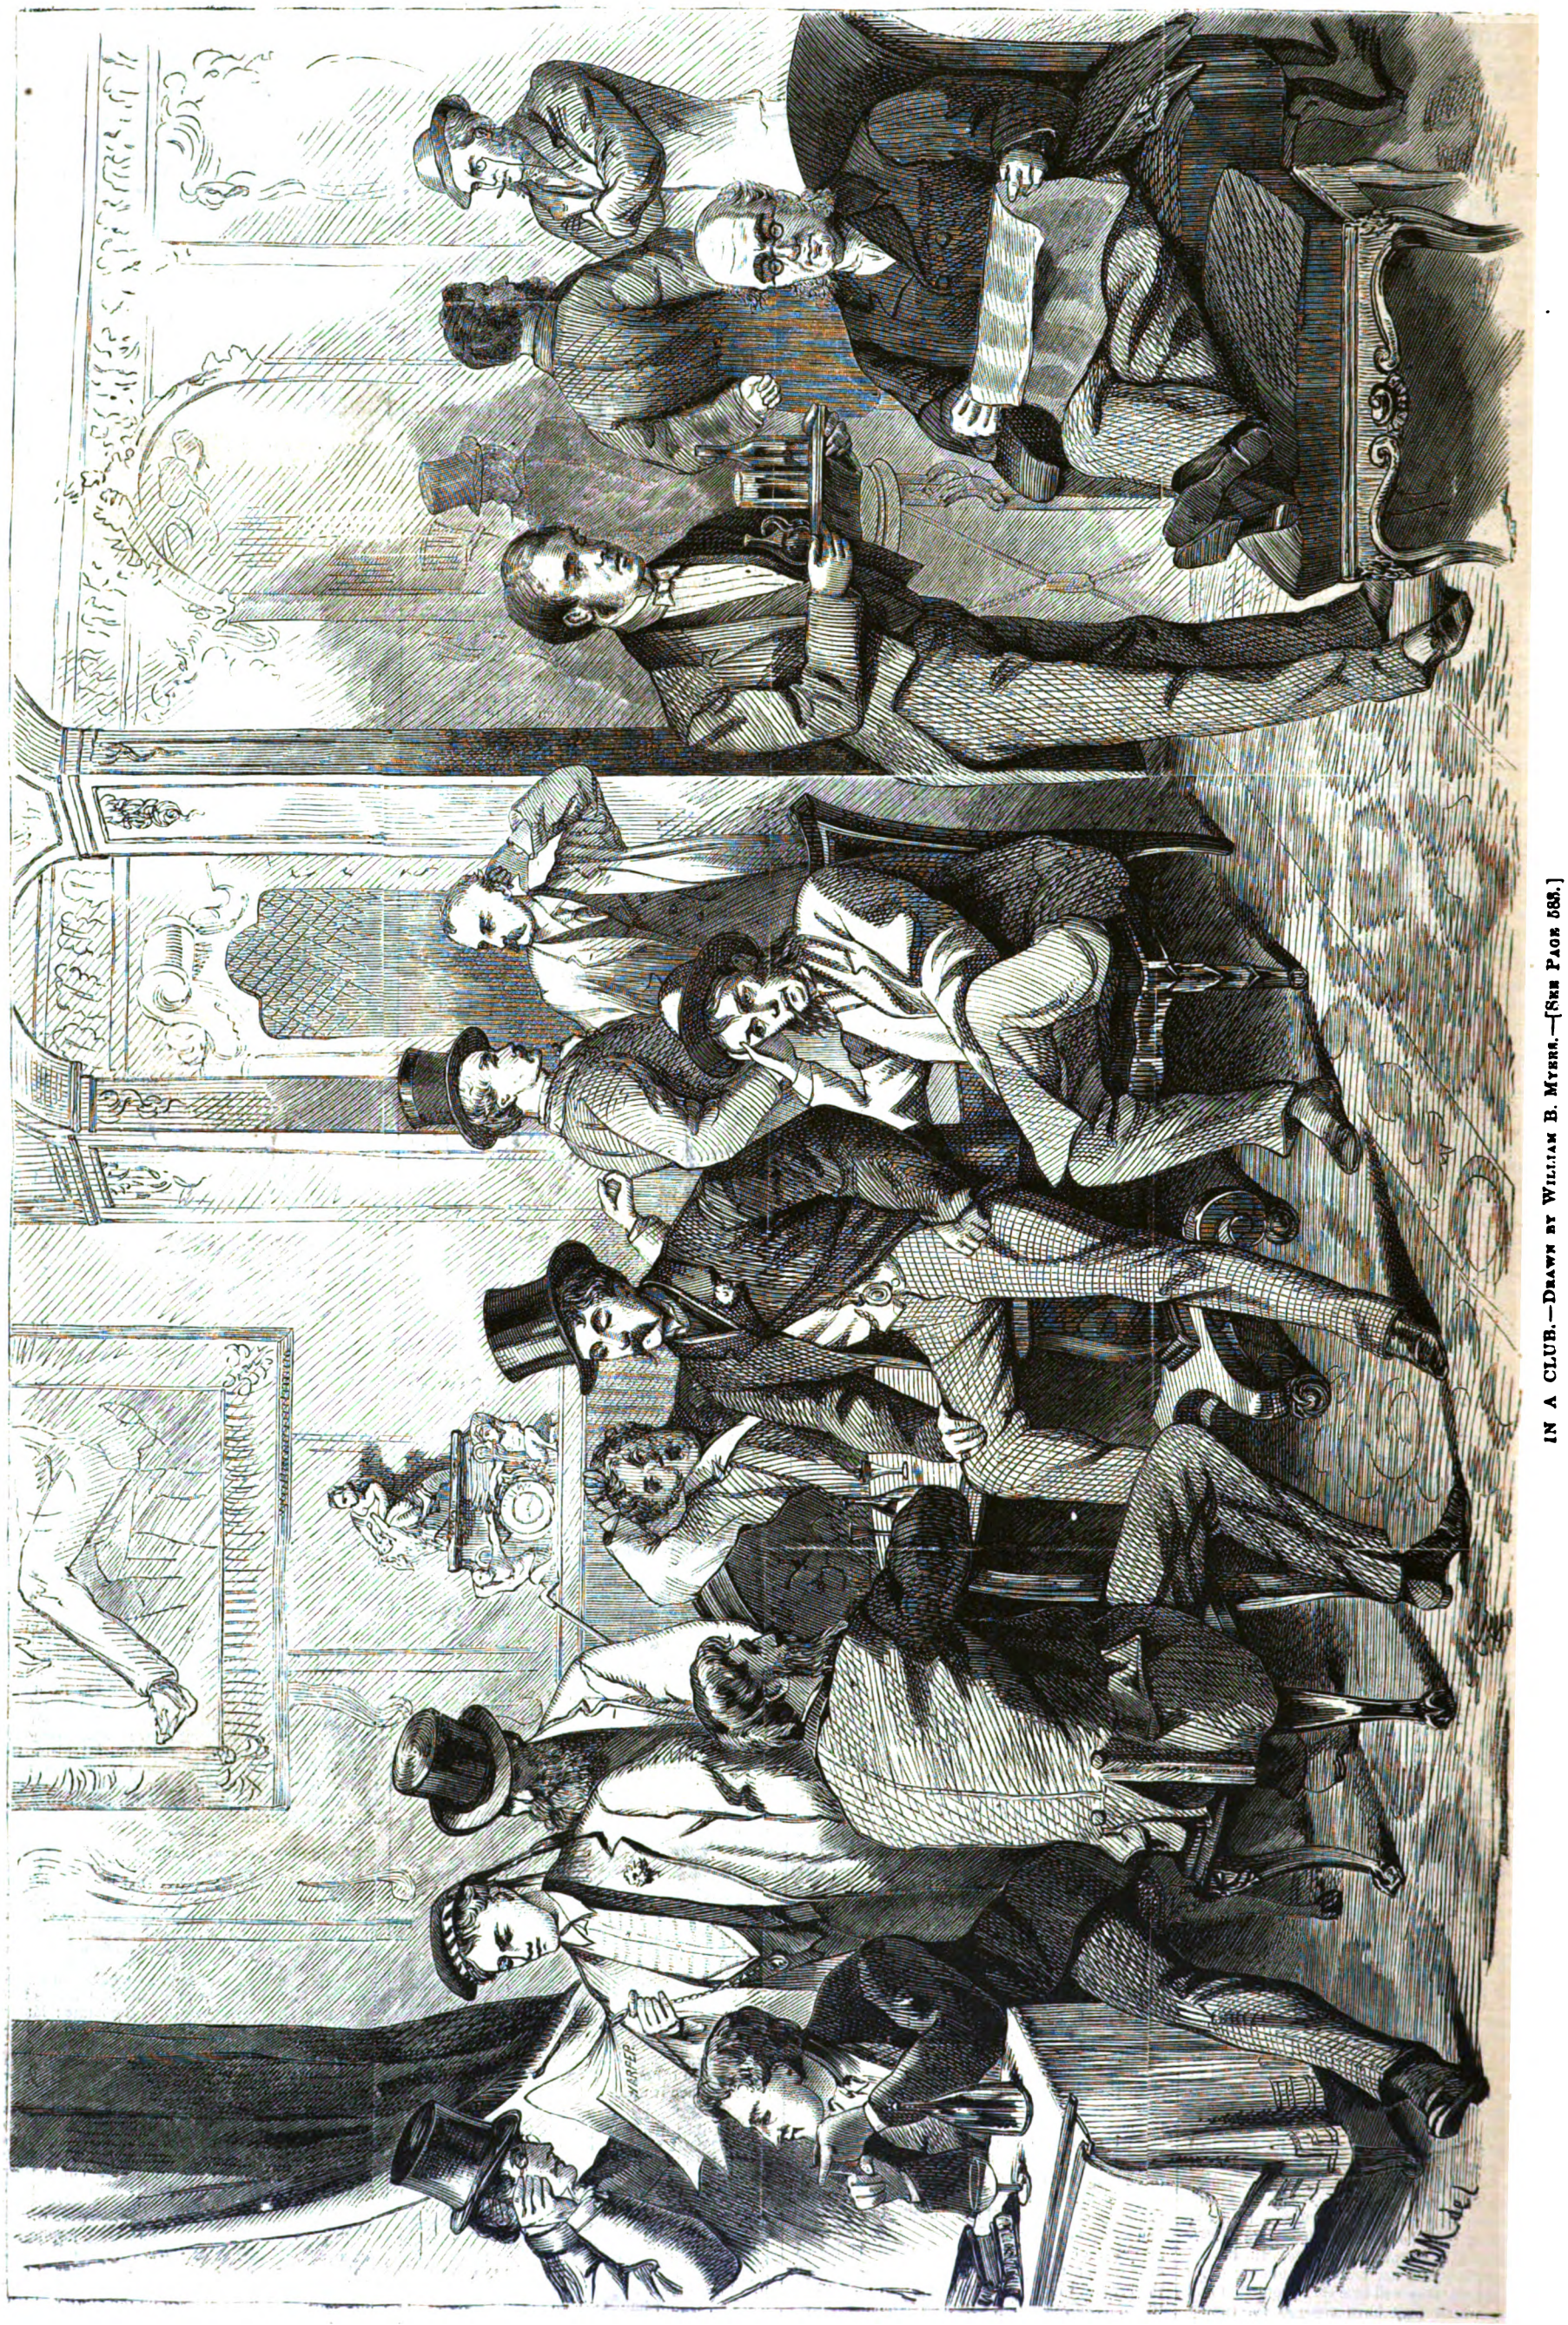
"I have stopped the Monthly, Weekly, and Bazar in sheer self-defense. Not less than nineteen of my neighbors were constantly haunting me for them. Half a dozen times a day somebody came to the door for Harper's. I had no chance to read them myself. I could not do my house-work, nor attend to my children. I had no peace of my life. So I gave them up in desperation."

The "Lady of the Lake," the most popular of Walter Scott's poems, was a great pecuniary success. It was first published in 1810, and no less than 20,000 copies were sold within a year.

"Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" A Boston physician says that four young girls, full of intelligence and promise, have been killed outright by the severity of the tasks imposed upon them in a high school in that vicinity. An article, apparently from a medical practitioner, which has appeared in a Hartford journal says that study, and hard study, promotes digestion, that it is favorable to high physical health, and not unfriendly to rosy cheeks and roundness of form, and all the functions for which God has designed woman in her peculiar sphere. It is not a difficult matter for careful, watchful parents to discover when their young daughters are overtasking their mental strength. But parents should give personal attention to the matter in each individual case, and not throw the responsibility on teachers. When the fresh, elastic spirits of youth begin to flag, there is danger ahead.

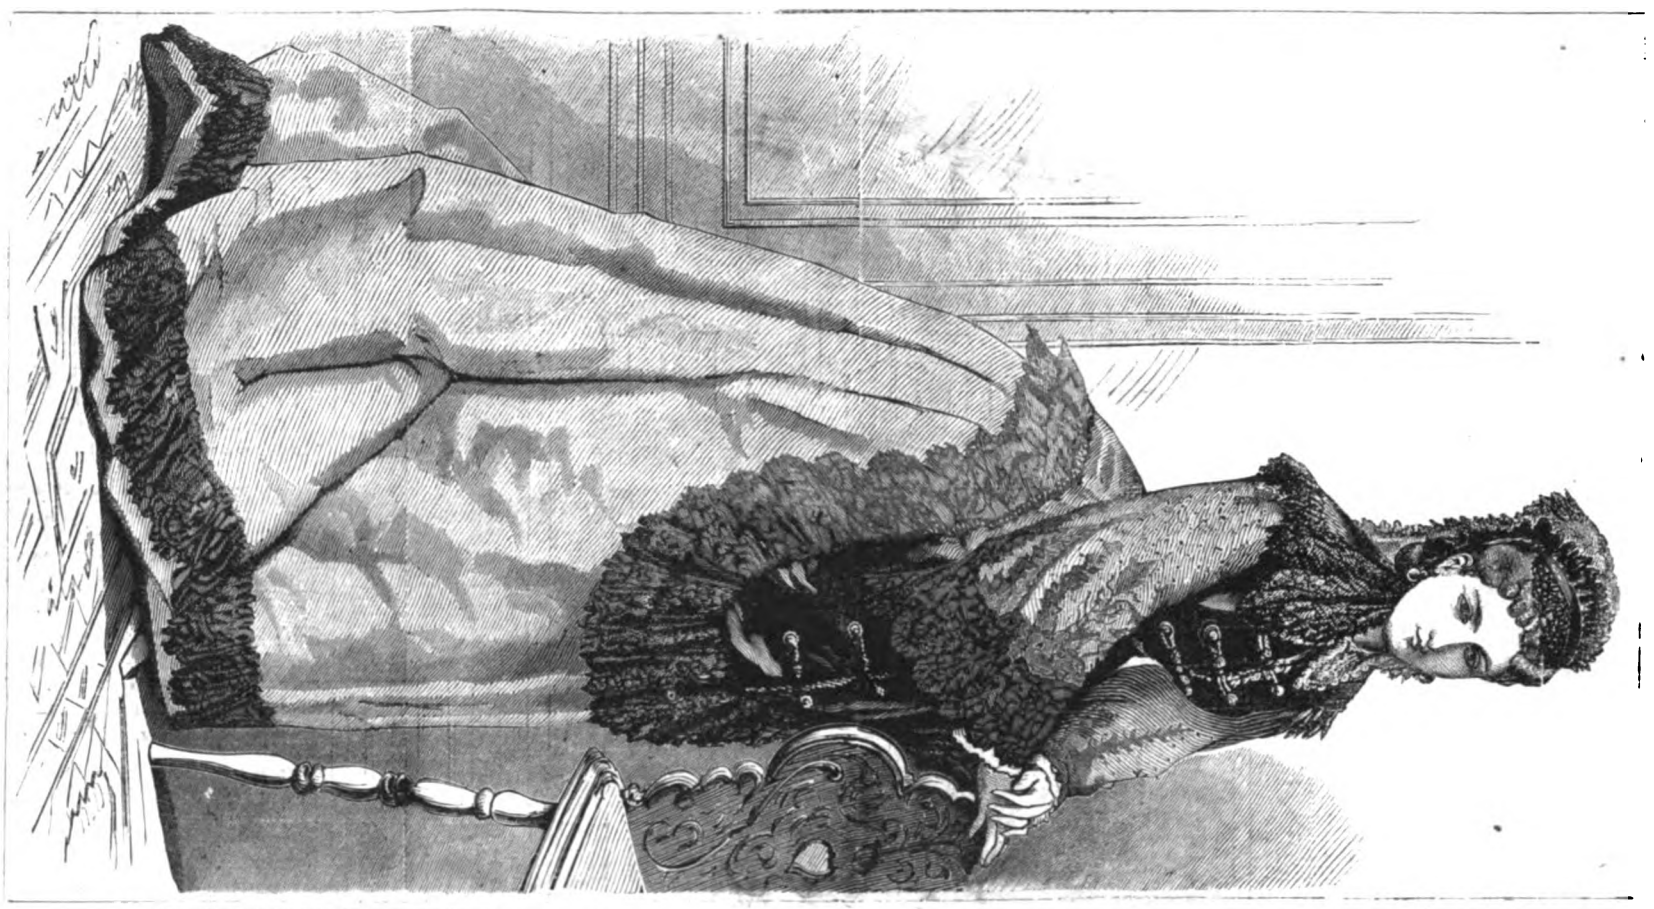
Rowing is, perhaps, the most favorite amusement of summer visitors at Lake George. On a pleasant moonlight evening that clear sheet of water presents a very animated scene—scores of boats flitting over its surface. As the shores about Lake George are full of historic interest, so almost every one of the 365 islands with which its waters are studded is crowned with a legend. There is one beautiful islet to which the name of "Tea Island" has been given; and this is the story concerning the origin of the name: Many years ago, before Lake George had been thoroughly explored, a party of ladies and gentlemen started from Ticonderoga on an excursion through it. The night overtook them; they were anxious and tired and hungry, and looked for some hospitable shore where they might pass the night. When they had almost given up hope of shelter on land they found themselves near an island. At once they landed. They sought something to eat. Nothing could they find except a paper package lying in a tin pan. This being examined, mysterious directions for cooking the contents of the package were found on the paper. These directions were implicitly followed, and plenty of warm tea soon restored the spirits of the party. In remembrance of this incident Tea Island received its name. A summer-house has been erected on the spot, and tea-parties are annually held there.

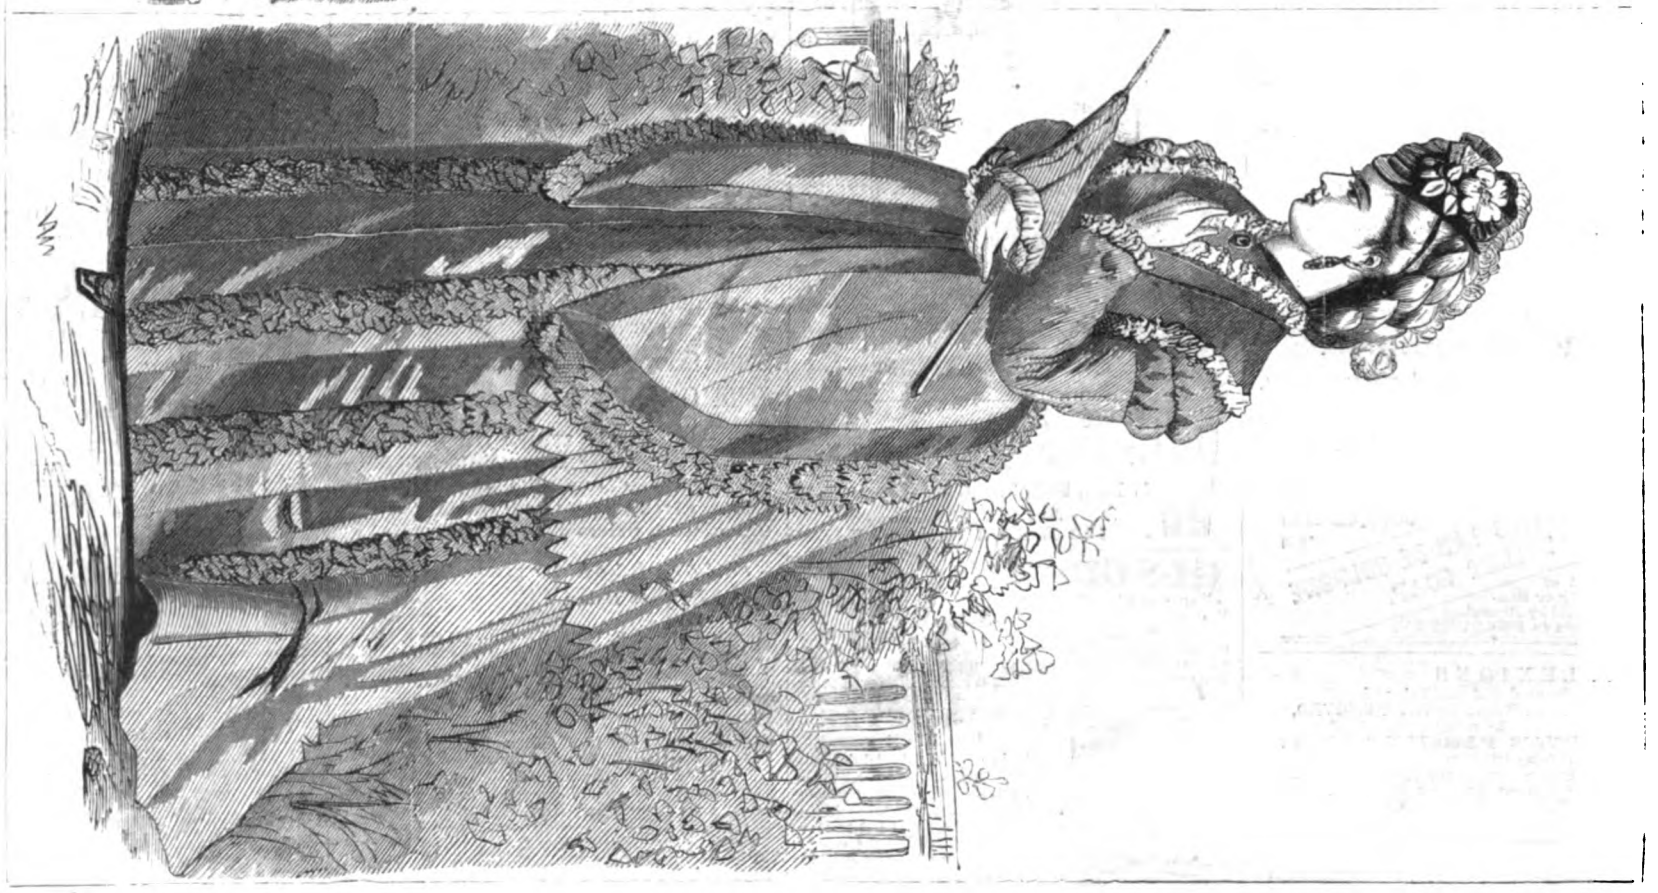
Digitized by Google



IN A CLUB.—DRAWN BY WILLIAM B. MYERS.—[SEE PAGE 583.]

Digitized by Google





LADIES' FALL CARRIAGE AND VISITING DRESSES.—[SEE PAGE 586.

Digitized by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ARTHUR.—It is a singular fact that Louis XIII. was the last ruler of France who was succeeded at his death by his son. Louis XIV. survived his son and grandson, and was succeeded by a younger son of the latter, the Duke of Burgundy. Louis XV. survived his son, and was succeeded by his grandson. Louis XVI. left a son behind him, who soon perished in prison. The son of Napoleon I., Duke of Reichstadt, died a colonel in the Austrian service. Louis XVIII., the brother of Louis XVI., was childless. Charles X. saw his son, the Duc de Berry, fall by the hand of an assassin, and his sole grandson, the Comte de Chambord, is now living in exile. The eldest son of Louis Philippe perished by accident during his father's lifetime, and his son, the Comte de Paris, is in private life. And now the last heir-apparent of France, the Prince Imperial, seems destined not to form an exception to the fatality which has doomed so many of his predecessors to die uncrowned.

F. B. W.—Get poplin or cashmere for traveling suit in September. For colors of this and church suit read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 34, Vol. IV. It is too soon to decide about your hat, but high-crowned turbans will probably be worn again. White silk at $2 50 or $3 a yard, with tulle pleatings, makes a very pretty dress. A cheap silk at 85 cents or $1 a yard will make most serviceable morning dresses. Trim your white alpaca with green silk, and make with box-pleated waist. For black silk suit read Bazar No. 33, Vol. IV. A black cashmere polonaise or double talma heavily braided will be the wrap to wear until you get a velvet cloak. An afternoon house and dinner dress should have a demi-train. It is safest to have your dress dyed black, or else dark bottle green.

WIDOW BEDOTTE.—Any loose sacque is a négligé paletot.

V. P.—The satin trimming is the only objectionable thing on your blue merino dress. Make a false postilion-basque of the merino, and belt it on. Use silk or velvet instead of satin cords.

MISS M. A. G. W.—You evidently do not understand that we do not prepare cut paper patterns of all the costumes illustrated in the Bazar, but merely of those mentioned in the list of cut paper patterns advertised in each number of the Bazar.

SEDALIA.—Bias bands of the cashmere or of lustreless silk are more appropriate trimming on a cashmere polonaise to be worn as mourning than worsted braiding would be.

MRS. BLUE BEARD.—The pattern of the Short-Sacque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV., is just what you want for cashmere. Trim with bias silk bands or ruffles. Embroidered black cashmere shawls will be worn by old ladies.

MRS. C. S.—Tucks, puffs, ruffles, crocheted lace, braiding, and embroidery are used for trimming pillow shams.

LILOH.—Trim your gros grain with ruffles of the same and lace; the blue Irish poplin with fringe and bias bands. Make the first a street suit with polonaise and single skirt; the last a demi-train and basque.

MRS. S. A. C.—On boys' shirt-waists put a turned-down collar made of narrow straight linen, doubled, and slightly sloped to fit the neck.

MRS. E. B.—Cashmere, poplin de laine, and serge will be worn this fall; also French merino.

ANGIE T.—Your sample is not Irish poplin, but the poorest Japanese. It does not wear well, gets flimsy, and water spots it. Make with a simple basque and over-skirt, trimmed plainly with folds of the same. Make brown Irish poplin with polonaise and single skirt.

J. T.—Chatelaine pins are worn to fasten the collar, or else lower down on the breast.

MRS. C. W.—Your address to this department is correct.

J. B.—Make your dress like gray sample with polonaise, cape, and skirt, by pattern of Traveling Dress Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 21, Vol. IV.

F. M. H.—We send the Worth Basque pattern, but return your remaining twenty-five cents, as we have no box-pleated blouse pattern. If you will send for Bazar with Supplement pattern of court train looped, you will have a model for altering your long train.

M. F. N.—The polonaise pattern sent you will remain in vogue during the winter.

M. E. B.—Get merino and cashmere for your little child's winter dresses.

GRAY hairs prevented, dandruff removed, the scalp cleansed, and the hair made to grow thick by the use of Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer.—[Com.]

WE should not suffer from a Cough which a few doses of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL will cure. Time, comfort, health are all saved by it. —[Com.]

ASK your Grocer or Tea-Dealer for Dooley's Yeast Powder, the best baking powder for preparing Biscuits, Rolls, Bread, Griddle Cakes, Waffles, Pastry, etc.—[Com.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE needs only to be tried. It dresses the hair beautifully.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES, and Tan, use Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists everywhere. Depot, 49 Bond St., New York.

It has the delicate and refreshing fragrance of genuine Farina Cologne Water, and is indispensable to the Toilet of every Lady or Gentleman. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in PERFUMERY.

COLGATE'S EAU-DE-COLOGNE TOILET SOAP.

COMPLEXIONS
Cleansed and purified, and FRECKLES PERMANENTLY REMOVED,
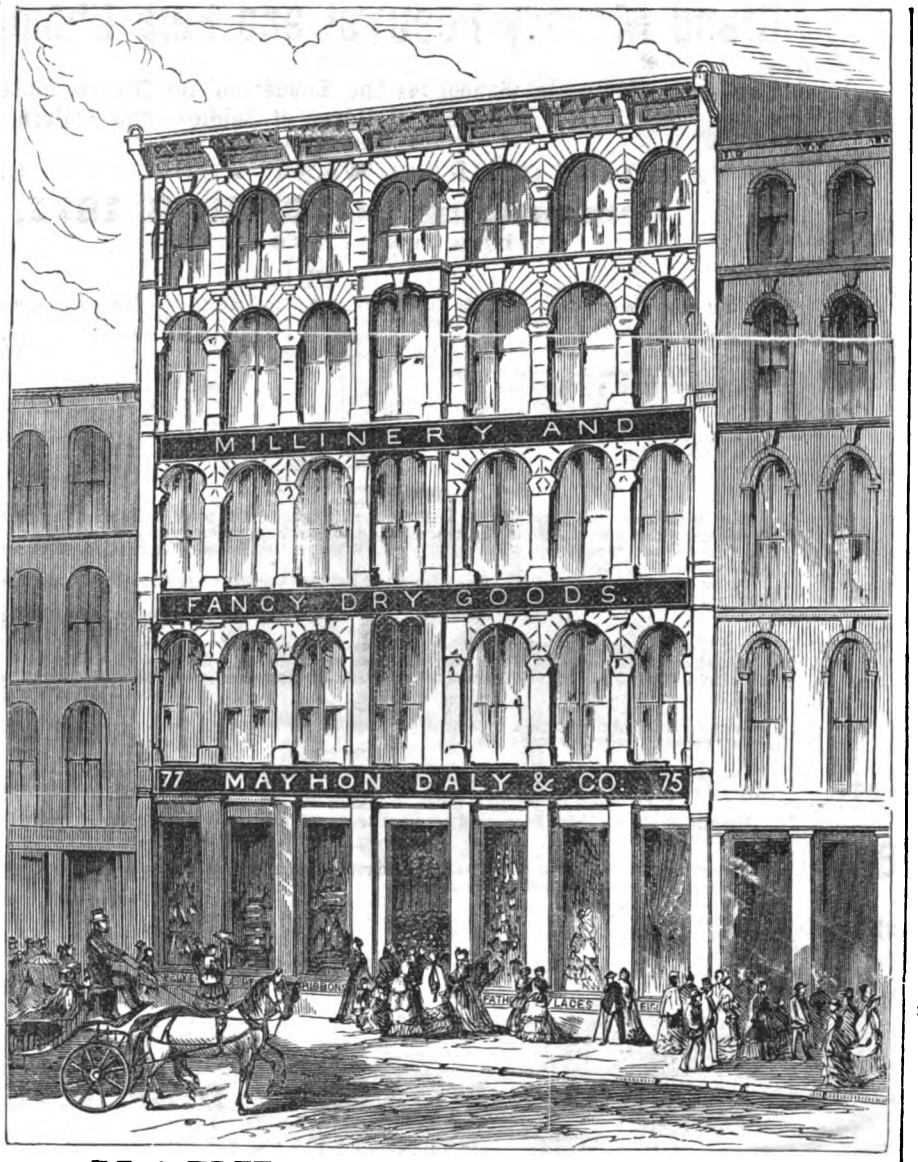
by using
DE VERNA'S PERSIAN SPRAY,
A purely innocent vegetable compound.
Every bottle prepared under the personal supervision of the eminent Perfumer, De Verna.
Depot, 37 John St., N.Y.
Sold by all Drug and Fancy Stores.

$290 For first-class Pianos—Sent on trial—No Ag'ts. Address U. S. PIANO CO., 645 B'dway, N. Y.



MAYHON, DALY, & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND DEALERS IN
SILKS, RIBBONS, LACES, STRAW GOODS,
MILLINERY ARTICLES, WHITE GOODS, EMBROIDERIES, GLOVES, &
FANCY DRY GOODS,
75 & 77 WABASH AVE., CHICAGO.
☞ ALL ORDERS entrusted to our care will be promptly filled and shipped the day they are received.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

Responsibilities of the Stomach.
The stomach is the most wonderful of all manufactories. It converts the nutrients taken into it into materials of flesh and blood. As the body wastes, it re-creates its tissues, fibres, and bones, renewing them, we are told, once in seven years. It performs this work by turning the food into the basis of the blood, which is the material of all of them. To tone this responsible organ when weak and disordered, to regulate its action and the action of its dependencies, the liver and the bowels, the most admirable of all medicines is
TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT.
It invigorates the digestion, controls the secretions, and purifies the blood.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

VINEGAR BITTERS
VEGETABLE FREE FROM ALCOHOL
PURELY DR. WALKER'S CALIFORNIA
CURE
VINEGAR BITTERS
Dr. Walker's California Vinegar Bitters. Made from the roots and herbs of California, free from all alcoholic stimulants. A gentle Purgative and Tonic. For Female Complaints, Inflammatory and Chronic Rheumatism, Gout, Bilious, Remittent and Intermittent Fevers, Diseases of the Blood, Liver and Kidneys, these Bitters have no equal.
DYSPEPSIA OR INDIGESTION, Headache, Pain in the Shoulders, Coughs, Tightness of the Chest, Dizziness, Sour Eructations of the Stomach, Bad taste in the Mouth, Bilious Attacks, Palpitation of the Heart, Inflammation of the Lungs, Pain in the regions of the Kidneys, are cured by the use of these Bitters.
FOR SKIN DISEASES, Eruptions, Tetter, Salt Rheum, Blotches, Spots, Pimples, Pustules, Boils, Carbuncles, Ring-worms, Scald Head, Sore Eyes, Erysipelas, Itch, Discolorations of the Skin they are excellent.
Pin, Tape and other Worms, lurking in the system are effectually destroyed and removed.
J. WALKER, Proprietor. R. H. McDONALD & Co., Druggists and Gen. Agents, San Francisco, Cal., and 32 & 34 Commerce St., N. Y.

WICKES' ECLECTIC OIL
Is Pure, Safe, Sweet, and Economical.
J. H. WICKES,
120 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

GLYCERINE CAKE.
RAWOLLE'S TOILET GLYCERINE CAKE is unequaled for Washing, Shaving, Shampooing, and Dentifrice. Removes pimples, blotches; prevents chapping; produces a clear, soft, and white skin. Warranted over one-half pure Glycerine. For sale by druggists. MARX & RAWOLLE, M'f'rs of Glycerine, 179 William St., New York.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA,
with the Green-Tea Flavor. Warranted to suit all tastes. For sale everywhere. And for sale wholesale only by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 8 Church St., N.Y. P.O. Box 5506. Send for Thea-Nectar Circular.

WALTHAM WATCHES
We make a Specialty of sending Single Waltham Watches by EXPRESS to any City, Town, or Village in the United States, with the BILL TO COLLECT ON DELIVERY.
You can open the Package
And examine the Watch
Before paying the Bill,
AND IF NOT AS EXPECTED
YOU NEED NOT TAKE IT.
The Prices are all REDUCED.
Solid Silver Watches ..... $15.
Solid Gold Watches ..... $60.
Do not order a Watch till you have first sent for our Descriptive PRICE-LIST, which explains the different kinds, gives weight and quality of the Cases, with prices of each.
Send for a Price-List, and state that you saw this in Harper's Bazar.
HOWARD & CO.,
No. 865 BROADWAY, New York.

BUILDERS and all who contemplate building, supplied with descriptive circular of "Village Builder." Address A. J. BICKNELL & CO., Publishers, 27 Warren St., N.Y.

FREE Try samples of our great 8-page, $1 00, illustrated weekly—30 years established. Fine steel engravings free to subscribers. Agents make $5 a day. Send for The Saturday Gazette, Hallowell, Me.

RIMMEL'S PERFUMERY,
PARIS, LONDON, BRUSSELS.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

THE NEW
ORIENTAL ASPERSOR,
For sprinkling Perfumes on the handkerchief, in apartments, sick-rooms, &c., &c.
Special Representatives for the United States,
EDWARDES & RUSSELL,
38 Vesey St., N. Y.

STRASBURGER & PFEIFFER,
(Successors to Strasburger, Fritz, & Pfeiffer),
IMPORTERS OF GERMAN, FRENCH, AND ENGLISH
TOYS,
China & Fancy Goods,
BOHEMIAN GLASS and LAVA WARES,
MUSIC BOXES, ACCORDEONS, HARMONICAS, CONCERTINAS, &c., &c.,
394 Broadway, near Canal St., N.Y.
Parlor Ornaments, latest novelties in Toys, Fancy and Ornamental Goods constantly arriving to supply the general demand.

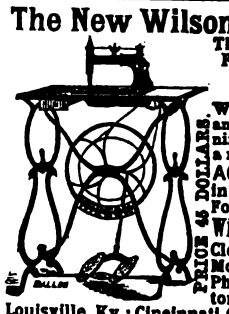
Great Treat for Boys!
Life and adventures of Robert Houdin, the most famous conjuror of the world, just commenced in No. 43 of HANEY'S JOURNAL, showing how, when a boy, he got his first lessons in magic: his youthful mishaps as an amateur; his amusing and thrilling adventures; how he invented and performed his marvelous feats; his great magical contest with the famous Arabian jugglers, &c. Every boy will long to read this fascinating narrative; and to give all the opportunity, HANEY'S JOURNAL, a handsome eight-page (forty long columns) illustrated family paper, will be sent SIX months on trial, to any new subscriber, for 25 cents.
JESSE HANEY & CO., 119 Nassau St., N. Y.
Single copies of any newsdealer—none free—no premiums.

FOR
Hand and Machine Sewing.
J. & P. COATS'
BEST
SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,
From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.
FOR SALE BY
All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions

DENSLOW & BUSH'S "SAFETY" OIL

Will not explode! Safest and purest oil ever produced! Stands over 150° fire test. We take regular Kerosene oil and by our new process expel all impurities and explosive elements. The Fire Underwriters of N. Y. recently recommend our oil as a protection to life and property. A lighted lamp may be upset and broken without fear of explosion or fire. For sale by all grocers, druggists, &c., in the U. S. Extra inducements to dealers. Address DENSLOW & BUSH, 150 Maiden Lane, N. Y.; 8 Custom H. St., Boston, Mass.; 34 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.; 51 S. Water St., Chicago, Ill.; or Cleveland, O.

The New Wilson Under-Feed.



THE BEST & CHEAPEST FIRST CLASS SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE IN THE WORLD.
Warranted for five years, and the warranty indemnified by a capital of half a million of dollars.
AGENTS WANTED in unoccupied territory. For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co.
Cleveland, O.; St. Louis, Mo.; Providence, R. I.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Boston, Mass.; Pittsburg, Pa. Louisville, Ky.; Cincinnati, O.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Memphis, Tenn.; Chicago, Ill.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Toledo, O.; Albany, N.Y.; St. Paul, Minn.; Richmond, Va.; Montgomery, Ala.; New Orleans, La.; Galveston & Houston, Tex.; San Francisco, Cal.; or
No. 707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

H. HENDERSON'S
FAMILY LIQUOR CASES.
Each Case containing One Bottle of
OLD PALE BRANDY, | HOLLAND GIN,
OLD RYE WHISKY, | OLD PALE SHERRY,
FINE OLD PORT, | OLD BOURBON.
Guaranteed Pure and of the very Best Quality.
PRICE SEVEN DOLLARS.
Sent by Express C. O. D., or Post-Office order.
H. HENDERSON, 15 Broad St., New York.

CURLS. One package of Prof. Leon' MAGIC COMPOUND will instantly curl the straightest hair of either sex (without injury) into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls, in every case, or money refunded. Price 25 cents a package, postpaid, or three for 50 cents. Address E. HOLBROOK, Uxbridge, Mass.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

UNPRECEDENTED SALES! — Wanted Agents to sell Pictures every where. One Agent has retailed over 9500 at 75 cents. Address, with stamp, WHITNEY & CO., Norwich, Conn.

$250 A Month easily made with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Secure Circular and Samples, free. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

Digitized by Google

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are receiving

ELEGANT NOVELTIES

in

MOQUETTES, WILTONS, VELVETS, BRUSSELS

CARPETS,

And a very large supply of

TAPESTRY BRUSSELS,

New Patterns.

AXMINSTER, AUBUSSON, and TURKEY

CARPETS

IN ONE PIECE.

RUGS, MATS, &c.,

With every variety of Articles pertaining to HOUSE-FURNISHING.

Prices unchanged, notwithstanding the very large advance in Europe of nearly 20 per cent.

PLEASE CALL AND EXAMIN'

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH & 10TH STS.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO AS to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	No.	26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	"	30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	"	38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	"	40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	"	46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	"	48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	"	1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	"	5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	"	11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	13
POSTILION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	15
SHORT-SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	17
LADY'S TRAVELING SUIT	"	21
MISS'S POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 7 to 15 years old)	"	23
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)	"	25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)	"	27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)	"	29
BOY'S BLOUSE, SHIRT-WAIST, and KNICKERBOCKERS (for Boy from 4 to 9 years old)	"	31
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)	"	33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt)	"	35

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,

31 & 33 VESEY STREET,

P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

WANTED—AGENTS are wanted to sell Brodhead's History of the State of New York, the Second Volume of which has just been published; Bench and Bar, the New and Enlarged Edition; Our Girls, by Dio Lewis; Light at Evening Time, by John Stanford Holme, D.D.; Autobiography of Rev. Lyman Beecher, D.D.; and Morning and Evening Exercises, from Writings of Henry Ward Beecher. Liberal Commissions will be given. Apply, for full particulars, to

AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

RIFLES, Shot-Guns, Revolvers, Gun Material. Write for Price-List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents wanted.

Grand Military Festival and Fête Champêtre

IN AID OF

The Union Home and School for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute and Orphan Children of Soldiers and Sailors,

TO BE HELD AT

FASHION COURSE, WEST FLUSHING, L. I.,

Commencing OCTOBER 2, 1871,

AND TO CONTINUE TWO WEEKS.

TO THE PUBLIC.

We, the Officers and Managers of the Union Home and School, ask the assistance of all benevolently disposed persons in aid of the institution under our charge. Through the kindness of Major-General Alexander Shaler, Hon. John H. White, Col. E. B. Lansing, George H. Purser, Benj. W. Hitchcock, and others, a grand Military Festival and Fête Champêtre has been arranged to be held in October next, and we earnestly invite the public to patronize and assist the undertaking.

Mrs. CHARLES P. DALY, President.
Mrs. VIRGINIA L. FARRAGUT, Vice-President.
Mrs. ALEX. SHALER, Vice-President.
Mrs. DAVID HOYT, Secretary.
Mrs. C. M. LYDIG.
Mrs. J. C. FREMONT.
Mrs. GEORGE F. HOPPER.
Mrs. R. JOHNSON.
Mrs. J. J. VANDALSOM.
Mrs. L. H. ROWAN.

CARDS.

In view of the approaching Military Festival, the Flushing and Northside Railroad Company have made ample arrangements to run special trains solely for transporting passengers to and from West Flushing Station. Special excursion tickets will be printed for the trip, at the usual rate, 30 cents, at which regular passengers are now supplied.

Desiring to assist the charitable undertaking, our Railroad Company has decided to donate one-third of the gross receipts for these excursion tickets to the Home and School.

JOHN J. LOCKE, President F. and N. S. R. R. Co.

It will afford us much pleasure to assist you in your very charitable enterprise. We will furnish you, free of charge, for setting up, cartage, and removal, one of our four-pocket tables for the Champion Billiard Match to be played in aid of the Union Home and School for the Destitute and Orphan Children of Soldiers and Sailors.

PHELAN & COLLENDER.

Wishing to aid the enterprise, I cheerfully tender the services of my Company to perform at the Festival any afternoon the manager may designate.

JOSH HART, Manager Globe Theatre.

The Mutual Base-Ball Club of this city will be pleased to participate in any game or games to be played during the Fête Champetre.

ALEX. V. DAVIDSON, Secretary M. B. B. Club.

Desiring to aid the Union Home and School, I tender my services on the Tight-rope for the first week of the Festival free of charge.

HARRY LESLIE, the "Hero of Niagara."

Subscriptions of one dollar each for single admission tickets, and ten dollars each for season tickets (twelve admissions), can be mailed to the undersigned.

With the kind letters of approval already received, the promoters of the Festival feel sanguine that the undertaking will not only prove a pecuniary success, but that, as a testimonial benefit from the public, it will enlist a widespread interest, and be one of the most enjoyable series of entertainments ever given in this country.

BENJAMIN W. HITCHCOCK, General Manager,
Store, 29 Beekman Street, New York.

The Festival will be opened on Monday, October 2, 1871, at 10 A.M., at the celebrated Fashion Course, in West Flushing, L. I., and will continue (Sundays excepted) for two weeks. About September 1 a complete programme, with order of exercises and appointments for each day, will be advertised and distributed in circulars. For the present the management can only announce the following general outlines:

GRAND MILITARY DISPLAYS,

Which will be of a highly interesting character.

TROTTING.

First—Gentleman's Purse, for horses that have never beaten 3 minutes—$300 first horse; $50 second.
Second—Queen's County Purse, for horses that have never beaten 2:45—$300 for first; $75 second.
Third—Long Island Purse, for horses that have never beaten 2:35—$400 for first; $100 for second.
Fourth—Manhattan Purse, for horses that have never beaten 2:25—$500 for first horse; $200 for second.

BASE-BALL MATCHES,

For the Championship of America—Belts and Gold Medals, valued at $100 each. Clubs are invited to confer with the General Manager at once.

SPORTS OF THE CARNIVAL,

As displayed by fifty fantastical Knights, full of fun and frolic for the occasion.

FOOT RACE, Professionals,

For Championship Belt and $100. Entrance fee and season ticket, $10.

MASS FOOT RACE, Amateurs.

No professional runners allowed in this race. Open to all others. First Premium, Amateur's Belt and $100; second, $75; third, $50; fourth, $25. Entrance fee and five admission cards, $5.

LADIES' EQUESTRIAN RACE.

First Premium, $100 and Gold Medal; second, $50 and Gold Medal; third and fourth, each $25 and Silver Medal. Apply at Manager's office.

RIDING FOR DIAMOND RING.

Ring to be suspended over the track, in front of judge's stand—value $200. Entrance fee and two season tickets, $20.

BALLOON ASCENSIONS

Will be made many times daily, by an experienced aeronaut.

WALKING MATCHES,

For the Championship Belt and $100. Walkists should apply at once to General Manager.

BILLIARD MATCHES,

For Championship, Golden Cue, and $100. Application to General Manager.

PRIZE DANCING,

For Championship Belt and $100. Apply.

SKATING MATCH,

On Parlor Skates. Belt and $100. Apply.

DRUMMING MATCH,

For Championship and $100. Apply.

TIGHT-ROPE WALKING.

Champion Belt and $100. Apply.

YACHT RACE.

First time on land. Will be a great sensation and novelty.

SLOW RACE.

A novelty in this section. The slowest horse to win $100. Open to all. Entrance fee and season ticket, $10. Who has the slowest horse?

VELOCIPEDE RACE,

For Champion Belt and $100. Entrance fee and season ticket, $10.

INDUSTRIAL RACES, Trotting.

These one-mile races must be driven by the owners or employés engaged in their business. Horses to be those usually employed in such business. Entrance fees (in each case), with three season tickets, $30.

FARMERS' (2 Horse Bolster Wagon) TROT.

First Prize.....New Bolster Wagon, $200.
Second Prize.....New Harness, 50.

EXPRESSMEN'S RACE—Trot.

To light Express Wagon.....First Premium, New Wagon, $200.
To light Express Wagon.....Second Premium, Harness, 50.

BUTCHERS' RACE—Trot.

To Butcher's Cart.....First Premium, New Cart, $150.
To Butcher's Cart.....Second Premium, Harness, 50.

CARTMEN'S (2 Horse Truck) RACE—Trot.

First Premium, New Truck, $300.....Second Premium, Harness, $100

GROCERS' RACE—Trot.

First Premium, New Wagon, $200.....Second Premium, Harness, $50.

BAKERS' RACE—Trot.

First Premium, New Wagon, $200.....Second Premium, Harness, $50.

MULE RACE.

Under the saddle. One mile for $100. Entrance fee and season ticket, $10.

DONKEY RACE.

Under the saddle. One mile, $100. Entrance fee and season ticket, $10.

OTHER ATTRACTIONS

Will undoubtedly be added, and no pains spared to heighten the enjoyment. Ample preparations will be made for DANCING THROUGHOUT THE DAY, enlivened by the

MUSIC FROM QUADRILLE AND BRASS BANDS,

With most Excellent Refreshments at the Club House, and Lunches at Refreshment Stands.

ADMISSION, $1. SEASON TICKET, Twelve Admissions, $10.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

BROUGHAM'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY. The Life and Times of HENRY, LORD BROUGHAM. Written by Himself. Vols. I. and II. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per vol. (To be completed in Three Volumes.)

THE COUSIN FROM INDIA. A Book for Girls. By GEORGIANA M. CRAIK, Author of "Mildred," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

LITTLE SUNSHINE'S HOLIDAY: a Picture from Life. A Book for Girls. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." With Illustrations by Frolich. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

COMFORT'S GERMAN CONVERSATION. A Manual of German Conversation: to succeed "The German Course." By GEO. F. COMFORT, A.M., Author of "A German Course," "A German Reader," &c. 12mo, Half Leather, $1 50.

POTTER'S MANUAL OF READING. A Manual of Reading, in Four Parts: Orthophony, Class Methods, Gesture, and Elocution. Designed for Teachers and Students. By H. L. D. POTTER. 12mo, Cloth, $1 40.

ABBOTT'S FREDERICK THE GREAT. The History of Frederick the Second, called Frederick the Great. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. Elegantly Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

JEFFERSON'S DOMESTIC LIFE. The Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson: compiled from Family Letters and Reminiscences by his Great-Granddaughter, SARAH N. RANDOLPH. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Illuminated Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Put Yourself in His Place," "Griffith Gaunt," "Hard Cash," "White Lies," "Foul Play," &c. With many Original Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 20 cents; 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

FOR LACK OF GOLD. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "Robin Gray." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE ISLAND NEIGHBORS. A Novel of American Life. By Mrs. A. B. BLACKWELL. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

WON—NOT WOOED. By the Author of "Bred in the Bone," "A Beggar on Horseback," "One of the Family," "Gwendoline's Harvest," "Carlyon's Year," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HER LORD AND MASTER. By FLORENCE MARRYAT (Mrs. Ross Church). 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

RALPH THE HEIR. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Sir Harry Hotspur," "Orley Farm," "The Vicar of Bullhampton," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 75.

NEW EDITIONS

OF BOOKS

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

SMITH'S PRINCIPIA LATINA. 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

DALTON'S PHYSIOLOGY. 12mo, Half Leather, $1 50.

ANTHON'S SMITH'S DICTIONARY OF ANTIQUITIES. Abridged. 12mo, Half Bound, $1 50.

APOSTLES AND EARLY MARTYRS. 18mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

MILDRED. By GEORGIANA M. CRAIK. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ALEC FORBES. By GEO. MACDONALD. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

READE'S THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ANTEROS. By GEO. A. LAWRENCE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Digitized by Google

LAPSUS LINGUÆ.

OUR ATHLETIC CURATE (who, with the young men of his parish, had been victorious in a great match the day before: please forgive him this once, only). "He-ar endeth the First Innings!"

FACETIÆ.

A CORRESPONDENT asks, and then answers, the following riddle: What is the difference between the passion for chignons and a storm at sea?—One is a raging main, and the other a raging mania.

RINGDOVES—Newly married ladies.

Young ladies in New Haven are learning to play the violin. The idea of having four strings to their bow is fascinating.

MOTTO FOR AN ADVENTURER—"One touch of cash makes the whole world kin."

Apropos of wicked men: Why was Moses the wickedest man that ever lived?—Because he broke all the ten commandments at once.

A ROOTED SORROW—The toothache.

When a New York wine-merchant sells you "old port from the wood," does he inform you that the wood it comes from is logwood?

ENGAGED.—The party who was found hanging about a large dry-goods shop, and who explained his presence by saying he was in search of an engagement, met with one on the spot. It was short, sharp, and decisive.

Can a parlor in which spirit-rapping is carried on be called a tap-room?

A DOUGHNUT TO CRACK.—An ingenious baker accounts for the high price of his loaves by saying that he has it on the authority of an eminent naturalist that the dough belongs to the dear tribe.

According to the Articles of War, it is death to stop a cannon-ball. This ought to be altered.

OUR "FLOATING POPULATION"—In the surf at the sea-side.

Some folks with too much go in them go to the bad.

DELICATE HINT.—Some people have such a delicate way of hinting their meaning that it is not always readily taken, but others speak more plainly. We read of an old man the other day who was in the habit of going to bed promptly at nine o'clock; but, being kept up by company after that hour, he became sleepy. Finally, seeing the clock marked half past nine, he turned yawningly toward the partner of his joys, and said: "Wife, hadn't we better go to bed? These folks want to go home." It is hardly necessary to add that the aged couple were not kept out of bed long after that delicate hint.

"Our children will have an immense tax on their hands," said a gentleman.

"Oh, horrible!" exclaimed an elderly lady. "What a blessing it is that we have nails on ours!"

Why is a man who marries an heiress a lover of music?—Because he marries fortune.

SLIGHT MISTAKE.—The Turkish embassador was at a public dinner with some of the magnates of the land. The President gave as a toast, in compliment to his Excellency, "The Sublime Porte and the Turkish embassador." The waiter echoed it down the table, "A supply of port for the Turkish embassador."

ADVICE TO ENGLISHMEN ABROAD.

Punch gives the following advice to English tourists. Some Americans might also study it to advantage:

Excepting for their money, English tourists are perhaps not highly valued on the Continent. We would, therefore, offer a few practical suggestions which, now that the tourist season has returned, will be found, no doubt, invaluable to Britons when abroad.

When you begin inspecting a foreign town or city, it is wise to stalk along the middle of the streets, and make facetious comments on whatever you think funny. Laugh loudly at queer names which you see above shop windows, especially if their owners, as is frequently the case, are lounging by the door-posts.

When you go into a church strut and stare about as though you were examining a picture exhibition. Display contemptuous pity for the worshipers assembled, and make in a loud voice whatever critical remarks you happen to think proper.

If, while you take your walks abroad, you encounter an unfledged and enthusiastic traveler who daringly attempts to enter into conversation with you, do your best to snub him in the recital of his exploits, and to render him dissatisfied with his most active feats. Interrupt his narrative with pitying exclamations, such as, "Ah, I see; you went by the wrong route!" or, "Oh, then you just missed the very finest point of view!" You may discover, very likely, he has seen much more than you have; but by judicious reticence you may conceal this awkward secret, and render him well-nigh as discontented as yourself.

When you are forced to start upon some mountain expedition, let every body learn what an early bird you are, and awaken them to take a lively interest in your movements. Stamp about your room in your very thickest boots, and if you have a friend who sleeps a few doors off, keep bellowing down the passage at the tip-top of your voice, although there may be invalids in plenty within ear-shot.

Should you gallantly be acting as a courrier des dames, mind that your lady friends are called an hour sooner than they need to be. A pleasant agitation will be thus caused near their bedrooms. They will amuse those sleeping next them with an incessant small-talk, and, as their maid will be dispatched on endless little errands, their door will be heard creaking and banging to incessantly, until they clatter down stairs.

When you come into a drawing-room or salon de lecture, make your triumphal entry with all the noise you can, so as to attract the general attention. Keep your hat upon your head, and glare fiercely at the quiet people who are reading, as though, like Gessler, you expected them to kneel down and pay homage to it.

Should your neighbor at the table d'hôte attempt to broach a conversation with you, turn your deaf ear, if you have one, to his insolent intrusion. If in kindliness of spirit he will still persist in talking, freeze the current of his speech by your iciness of manner, or else awe him into silence by your majesty of bearing.

If, despite your English efforts to remain an island, you find yourself invaded by aggressive foes to silence, strive to awe them by the mention of your friend Lord Snobly, or of any other nobleman with whom you may by accident have ever come in contact. For aught they care to know, you may be his lordship's hair-dresser; but the title of a lord is always pleasant hearing in the company of Britons, although benighted foreigners have not such respect for it.

In all hotels where service is included in the bill, be sure you always give a something extra to the servants. This leads them to expect it as a thing of course, and to be insolent to those who can't so well afford to give it.

When Edmund Kean appeared in London the entire town rapidly became excited about the new tragedian, concerning whom Lord Byron said "it was like reading Shakspeare by lightning;" and John Kemble, in company with several friends, went to see him. Richard III. was the character. John Kemble paid the most profound attention, without uttering any remark. After a time one of his friends ventured to say, in allusion to a peculiar huskiness that often gave a suppressed but rasping effect to Mr. Kean's voice, "Mr. Kemble, don't you think that he rather croaks it?"

"Yes," replied the sententious and magnanimous John; "but he croaks it as no other man can do."

A gentleman recently said to a physician, who objected to strong language, that he suffered the pains of the damned.

"What, already!" was the doctor's cool reply.

An old man of Aberdeen, who had been henpecked all his life, was visited on his death-bed by a clergyman. The old man appeared very indifferent, and the parson tried to arouse him by talking of the King of Terrors.

"Hoot, toot, mon, I'm no scaurt. The King o' Terrors! I've been living sax-and-thirty years with the queen o' them, and the king canna be muckle waur!"

QUERY.—Are sponges mostly found growing in truckle-beds?

The result of the first prize given for poetry by a board of education is the following scholastic production:

"I had a dreme—
I thought I was alone, alone;
Oh it did seme
So sad, away from home, from home!

"My head upon my hand
I lent, I lent;
My eyes upon the sand
I bent, I bent.

"I thort of other dase,
And things, and things;
Of happy, childish plase,
And strings, and strings."

Some people say that dark-haired women marry soonest. We differ: it is the light-headed ones.

POLITE SOORN.—A San Francisco editor thus addresses an Oakland brother: "You wallapus, you icthyodorulite, you bogus hammochrysos, you—you Oaklander!"

Good dogs lie down when you tell them; bad ones lie up and down generally.

Take away my first letter, I remain unchanged; take away my second letter, there is no apparent alteration in me; take away all my letters, and I still continue unaltered.—The letter-carrier.

Learned persons call a locust Cicada septemdecim, but it doesn't seem to be frightened.

A DISTINCTION AND A DIFFERENCE.

AUNT. "Candidly, don't you think you've had enough, Ethel?"
ETHEL. "I may Think so, Aunty, but I don't Feel so!"

AN ABSENT-MINDED MAN.

Rogers, the poet, related the following story: My old friend Maltby, the brother of the bishop, was a very absent-minded man. One day at Paris, in the Louvre, we were looking at the pictures, when a lady entered who spoke to me, and kept me some minutes in conversation. On rejoining Maltby, I said: "That was Mrs. ——. We have not met so long she had almost forgotten me, and asked me if my name was Rogers."

Maltby, still looking at the pictures, said, "And was it?"

Who was Richard the Third before he was "himself again?"

At a college examination the students were asked the meaning of the word "hypothesis." One candidate answered that it was "a machine for raising water." Another said it was "something that happened to a man after death."

A contemporary states that a lady sang at a concert who possessed "an extraordinary compass of voice;" for, on the occasion referred to, "she sang two duets for soprano and tenor."

Are good-looking women ever engaged as "plain" cooks?

At a meeting of a town council an alderman complained of the absence of a certain councilman.

"Sir," exclaimed a councilman, indignantly, "you ought to have made that complaint when he was present!"

A lobster never comes ashore without great risk of getting into hot water.

A good sitter is a pleasure to an artist. One at the shop door of a grocer has been utilized. The sitter is a cat, and around its neck the enterprising proprietor has hung a placard, with the announcement that "So-and-So's tea and coffee are unrivaled." To what base uses, pussy, we may come at last!

MADE TO SELL.

CUSTOMER. "I say—this Umbrella I bought here Last Week is all coming to Pieces!"
SHOPMAN. "Indeed, Sir You must have been taking it Out and getting it Wet, Sir, I think!"

A GLIMPSE OF THE FUTURE.

"Oh, Policewoman! that Person has been following me for several Blocks, and I'm afraid she's going to Speak to me!"

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 38.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Silk and Cashmere Walking Suit.

THE dress is made of purple silk, and trimmed with folds of violet silk. The over-skirt, basque, and basque-waist are of light gray cashmere; the trimming consists of lace insertion of the same color an inch and a quarter wide, and gray lace two inches wide. White straw round hat trimmed with ribbon and a spray of flowers. Violet silk parasol, lined with white lustring. Chemisette and sleeves of tucked Swiss muslin.

Poplin Walking Suit.

THIS walking suit consists of a dress and paletot, and is made of gray poplin. The trimming is composed of gray silk cord agrafes with tassels of the same color, and gray passementerie buttons. To make the paletot first join on the piece turned down in Supplement, Fig. 35^{b}; then join Figs. 35^{a} and 35^{b} along the line cut across according to the corresponding letters, and join Figs. 37^{a} and 37^{b} in a similar manner (see diagrams of Figs. 35^{a}, 35^{b} and 37^{a}, 37^{b}, which are reduced to one-sixteenth of full size). Cut of poplin and silk lining two pieces each from Figs. 35^{a}, 35^{b} and 37^{a}, 37^{b}, and cut the pocket welts from Fig. 36. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 41, No. XI., of the present Supplement. Baste the material on the lining, sew up the darts in the fronts, and join the latter with the back according to the corresponding figures, having first sewed up the back from 5 to 6. Run the material and lining together along the bottom and front, and cord the neck of the paletot. Work button-holes in the right front, and sew corresponding buttons on the left front. Fell the edges of the pocket welts together along the bottom and sides, work button-holes as shown by the illustration, and sew the pocket welts on the fronts along the straight line according to the corresponding figures. Sew buttons corresponding to the button-holes on the paletot, and sew the sleeves, which are trimmed as shown by the illustration, into the corded armholes. To drape the paletot fasten each point indicated by : on the point indicated by *, and finish with the agrafes with tassels.

POONAH-WORK.

ANOTHER name for this kind of fancy-work is Oriental tinting, it being an art borrowed from the Chinese. It is, in fact, a species of theorem-painting, by which various articles of furniture, such as tables, screens, port-folios, etc., may be ornamented very effectively even by persons who posess little knowledge of the painter's art. Flowers, fruit, butterflies, etc., may be copied in a very accurate manner. A piece of tracing-paper of a peculiar manufacture, which is sold at the artists' material shops as poonah-paper, is first laid on the object to be copied, and all the parts that are of one color are marked in outline upon it with a sharp-pointed pencil. The interior of this outline is then cut out, either with a sharp-pointed penknife or with little instruments made for such purposes, and to be had at the same shops. This forms theorem No. 1. Another piece of tracing-paper is then laid on, and all the parts of another color drawn carefully on that, and cut out in the same accurate manner; and so on until you have prepared as many theorems, or stencils, as you have colors in your picture. When all are done, the colors may be applied with a flat brush in the following manner. Begin with the principal theorem, and lay it flat down upon the article to be ornamented. Then pass the brush, charged with water-color or powder-paint slightly moistened with gum-water, carefully but firmly across the apertures, holding it in a perpendicular position. Do not paint around, but across the pattern, until you have obtained the proper outline. The shading is easily done, before you remove your pattern, by working it from the edges. If too much color is there, a drop of water will enable you to remove a little of it, and the brush itself can be washed. If the groundwork is white paper, a very little paint will be all you want to produce the required effect. As soon as the first application is dry, the second pattern may be laid on in its proper place, and the desired color put on through the apertures in precisely the same way. Wherever gold or bronze is called for it can be applied in this way: mix a small quantity of fine bronze powder in a drop or two of gum-water, and paint the place with it; then, before it is entirely dry, rub on more powder with a soft rag, continuing to rub until it is well polished.

The wings or bodies of brilliantly colored insects are sometimes ornamented with touches of gold or bronze. The rich dark specks on some are produced by lamp-black laid on afterward with a pencil. Antennæ of insects, as well as the minute and delicate streaks and marks, must be done with a fine

SILK AND CASHMERE WALKING SUIT.

POPLIN WALKING SUIT.
For pattern see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 35^{a}, 35^{b}–37^{a}, 37^{b}.

Digitized by Google

camel's-hair or sable pencil after all the groundwork of the pattern is done.

The colors to be used are chromes for yellows; orange mineral or cadmium for orange; carmine, vermilion, or scarlet lake for reds; ultramarine for blue; same with carmine for purple; neutral tints for dark shades. In painting a bouquet of flowers in this manner a very good effect is produced by coloring the wings of a butterfly on both sides, then cutting them out carefully, and tinting the edges also. The body of the insect need only be painted on one side, and the wings must be bent so as to stand up when the body is gummed flat upon the paper. If this is done neatly, it will have a close resemblance to a natural butterfly resting upon a flower; and if the picture be framed in a deep frame, it will be still better.

If the theorems are washed or wiped after being used, they will answer very well to use again.

FICKLE.

HE asked me, when the meadows
Were waiting for the spring,
Upon my heart to wear his name,
Upon my hand his ring.
The snow upon the hill-sides
Was not so cold as I,
And half though I repented then.
"No!" was my curt reply.

He came again when roses
Were dreaming in the bud,
Till June should pour, to waken th
Her sunshine like a flood.
The roses were not sweeter
Than his dear words to me,
Yet, though it made the day grow dark,
My "Yes" a "No" would be.

Ah! if my love would seek me
This fitful autumn day,
When all the winds are sighing
For the summer gone away,
I'd wear for him the brightness
He wanted long ago!
The winds alone can hear me,
And they only answer, "No."

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1871.

FOUR MONTHS FOR ONE DOLLAR.

"POOR MISS FINCH,"

a new and beautifully illustrated serial story, by

WILKIE COLLINS,

author of "The Woman in White," "The Moonstone," etc., was commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY for September 2.

New Subscribers will be supplied with the WEEKLY from September 2 to the close of the year, four months, for ONE DOLLAR.

☞ A Cut Paper Pattern of the new Louis XIV. Polonaise will be published with our next Number. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 607 of the present Number.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain a choice variety of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Ladies' Fall Walking, House, and Evening Dresses; Corsets, Paniers, Children's Lingerie, Fancy Articles, etc., etc.

DOMESTIC LIFE.

SPEAKING of domestic life, how rarely one takes into consideration the whole complex nature of it, judging that it is an affair of pots and kettles, of eating and drinking, of lying down and rising, sweeping and dusting; and though, to be sure, these are the frame-work upon which it hangs, so to speak, they are not its essence. A domestic life is not necessarily one of drudgery, a perpetual devotion to the fire-god, a continual opening of oven doors and watching of boiling pots. It is, rather, a life of unity, in which each part is subservient to the whole, of which no part is mean and insignificant, since the whole being the science of living, and life a gift from God, it follows that no fraction of it is beneath our attention. It is the old story of the convertibility of things.

"The flowers of the meadow, little Isabel, to-day are blue flowers, and to-morrow will be honey." The labor of the present insures a future holiday; so the graceful amenities of the household—duties fitly performed—make up the sweetness of life; and how can those duties become graceful that are done in a spirit of protest? Let us believe that whatever our hands find to do is our own appointed work, selected from the beginning, be it homely scrubbing, or calculating eclipses and the orbits of planets, and then we shall forget to reproach circumstances and to work with the finger-tips. One-half the shabby housekeeping in the land results from the feeling that we were made for better things. If we were, life would show it. Circumstances never defy God's purposes. He is in the circumstance; and in all His worlds what better, what grander thing could He appoint us to do than to resolve the discords of domestic life into perfect harmony? To be sure, housekeeping reminds us somewhat of Aladdin's wonderful lamp, since for every wish granted one must rub—for so much work, so much reward; so many trials and reverses, so much experience funded for future use. Nothing is lost, since it is an affair which converts its own waste into profit, and fashions its failures into successes.

"I thought it was such a fine thing," said Laurette the other day, "to be married and have a house of one's own; but, oh dear! it is nothing but care, care, care. The servants are cross and incompetent; the children fret; the roast is overdone; the vegetables are underdone; the ironing drags; the whole thing is topsy-turvy. What fools girls are to get married!"

"And Laurence?" I mildly suggested.

"I could not endure so much for any one else; that is all."

And here lies the gist: love lightens the most difficult labors. What we would not, perhaps could not, do for ourselves we gladly do for another. That is no drudgery which helps to make the world agreeable to the beloved; and thus domestic life exists for the education of bodies for time and souls for eternity. It is no merely transient business, which we may perform in a slipshod manner, or even leave undone, and hear no more about. It is like the web in the weaver's loom, and bears witness to every inattention, to every shade of carelessness or indifference; or else it shows a pattern as sublime and splendid as the stars in their courses.

"It is very well to preach," says Laurette at my elbow; "but when Laurence is waiting for his breakfast, and must catch the train, and the fire won't burn, and the coffee refuses to boil, and the servants give warning, and baby bumps his head, where does the splendor come in? How can you resolve such chaos into harmony?" Well, I shall suppose that Laurence lends a helping hand; that because things are twisted he doesn't mean to make them worse by sulks and sarcasms on the incapacity of women; that every thing does not depend upon his catching this particular train; that he knows how to put up with discomfort for a season; how, even, to make a jest of it to serve at more successful repasts; in short, that domestic life is not simply the agonies and mistakes of one poor little body, but a partnership of interests and a sympathetic interchange of helpfulness and forbearance.

All the virtues, all the excellences, are the natural efflorescence of domestic life. There the elements of greatness combine and act—for one may be great in small issues, as all the world knows; there temperament moulds temperament, will meets will, and clashes or submits. It is the school of the world, from which we all graduate with more or less of honor, with more or less of high-mindedness and submission to high ideals, according as the school has been well governed, according as its practice and precepts have been noble, as it has furnished us models of pure benevolence, of sincere endeavor, of patient unselfishness.

There are some homes which seem pervaded with an atmosphere of repose; where domestic life is like a melody, worn old, perhaps, but associated with sweetest reminiscences. It may not be a wealthy home: it may merely afford "a genteel sufficiency," or even a shabby gentility; but the tune never loses tone or descends to discords. And there are other homes where it is one hurry and skurry from morning to night; where the china drops into fragments at a touch; where the bread is sour, the cake heavy, and every thing at loose ends; where plenty masquerades in the garb of poverty; where there is waste instead of economy; because their domestic life is a thing of low aims and petty ambitions, does not move equably toward order and happiness, and is unrelated to the suggestion that this life is but the human phase of the heavenly condition, where we shall form one harmonious family, moved by one aspiration, informed with never-failing love.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Painting Red.

MY DEAR PAUL,—I was invited the other day to the house of a gentleman who owns very costly and beautiful pictures, which are admirably arranged in a spacious gallery. The company was bidden for the afternoon, that the pictures might be seen by daylight, and it was very pleasant to reflect that so many persons were willing to turn aside from business before sunset and to devote themselves to recreation. As I was loitering along from picture to picture, passing the most successful talent and genius in review, I stopped before a portrait which was very remarkable. It was the picture of a man perhaps sixty years old, and whose costume indicated that he must have lived about as many years ago. The form was admirably drawn, and the color was very brilliant. Indeed, the fascination of the work lay in a deep red glow that suffused it—a hue very warm and very rich, but certainly unnatural. Whether the portrait were that of a poet, a banker, a bandit, a philosopher, or a beggar, I have no remembrance whatever. All that I recall is that marvelous redness which overspread the whole.

Presently I remarked other works evidently by the same artist, and in all the observable distinction was that extraordinary red. At length it became absurd. I gradually fancied the painter looking at every thing with eyes perpetually blood-shot, and perceiving nature tinged by that fatal veil of blood. There was the portrait of a lovely young woman, I remember—a belle of your grandmother's time, perhaps—and she too glared at us in a red glory. There was a boy—I suppose he is a grandfather now; but if he is the worthy patriarch of topers, he has no redder face than in his portrait. The hue that seemed to me at first very warm and very rich became detestable. It was a mere mannerism. Every thing was equally red. It caught the eye. At the first glance it suggested richness and beauty. One such picture might have passed as fine, but twenty of them together were ludicrous; and to think that every work of the artist was equally red was preposterous.

Yet the drawing was good; and I am told that the likenesses were excellent. But they were drowned in the deluge of red. I looked to find some judicious friend to whom I could impart my views upon the subject, and ask him if he were equally troubled and tortured by the garish color of the painter, who was evidently famous and fashionable, or there would not have been so many of his works collected in one gallery. Firmilian was close by me as I turned.

"I see that you are admiring these exquisite works," said he. "Yes, yes; splendid, sple-e-e-ndid! I was sure a man of your taste would be charmed. There's nothing like them. You see, he chooses the older costume, because it admits brilliant treatment. Yes, indeed; splendid, sple-e-e-ndid!"

I was rather confounded by this outburst. But it was instructive, for Firmilian is a man from whom you can always learn the fashion of the hour in every way. He can inform you accurately of the very latest style of cuff buttons and of the last theory of the aurora. So, when he had spoken, I knew that the red painter was the hero of the hour in his art.

"They are very brilliant, certainly," I answered; "but they are so very red."

Firmilian, however, began again with splendid! and magnificent! and I soon found that we made no progress. Red is bright, undoubtedly; but something else than red is necessary to splendor. Firmilian locked his arm in mine, and we moved on. As we passed from picture to picture I listened to him, and discovered that what was not exquisite was execrable. There were works in which, with great excellences, I observed, as I thought, positive defects; but to Firmilian they were be-you-tiful unconditionally. Others, again, evidently not great pictures, had yet undeniable beauty in parts; but Firmilian had no mercy. "Off with their heads!" Awful! atrocious! was the mildest form of objurgation.

Presently I began to perceive a singular feeling, as if I were walking and talking with the fiery red painter of whose works I have been speaking. Firmilian's conversation had the same unmitigated glow. There was no natural key, no moderation, no neutral tint. It was a blood-shot style, so to speak—crimson criticism; and at length I said to him,

"Firmilian, if you were a painter you would paint those unmitigatedly red pictures, for, my good fellow, you have been talking red pictures all this time."

He laughed, and, as the afternoon was warm, we stepped out of a window upon the balcony which overlooked a little lawn. There was a children's party gathered there, and the little people, clad in white muslin, were playing in the cool shadow of evergreens. Two or three of them had pretty red jackets, and, as they darted about, the brilliant flash of those little garments gayly lighted up the lovely picture. I pointed out to Firmilian the beautiful effect.

"Let your uncle remind you, my dear friend," said I, with a smile, "that if the grass and the trees and all the dresses of the children were scarlet or crimson, the effect would not be beautiful. It is the occasional dash of the positive red that makes it so."

Firmilian laughed, and rejoined with a shower of such extravagant adjectives that I have wholly forgotten what he said. There was no tone in his conversation, no play and harmony of color, and consequently no effect. It was a tornado of tremendous adjectives; and presently that becomes as unnatural and absurd as those red pictures. My dear Paul, red is a condiment, not a food. You may put as many red spots in your picture or in your conversation as you please, if you do not smear both of them with the pure pigment. And so in dress: you know the value and effect of a judicious red cravat or a brilliant waistcoat; but I am sure that your good taste would not permit you to wear a red coat and red trowsers and red shirt and red cap, as well as a red tie. Yet there are those who constantly do it. The painter of whom I have been speaking was one; Firmilian is another.

How we have all looked with admiration when Lucia enters a room—Lucia, who is renowned for toilettes. I don't say that it is a very high kind of renown; but in a day of such woful extravagance and mad display in dress the belle who is clad simply and tastefully, yet who remains a belle, is also a benefactor. I have seen her with a red flower twisted in her hair, or worn upon her bosom, or pinned upon her dress, or with a red ribbon so run into the dress that the effect was incomparable. But it was a flavor, a scent only. The effect was not in the dead-weight of color, but in the skillful contrast. My aunt Terrapin used to appear upon social occasions of great importance in what she supposed to be a costume of great splendor. It was a superb red velvet dress, with red feathers and streamers in her hair, and red coral ornaments and red slippers; and I assure you when this astounding figure entered a room, with my aunt Terrapin's arms, which were not attenuated, but rosy and motley to behold, the apparition was that of incarnate scarlet fever. Literally, it turned the whole company pale. But my little cousin Red Ridinghood, skimming across the fields and going into the dark wood, with her red cape and hood, was a benediction to the beholder.

The same principle is true in all the arts. I read the other day of a concert at which Jenny Lind sang, and the writer, with a pathos which I fully understood, said that he could not believe it was the famous singer. No wonder, if she did not seem to him the greatest of all singers, as once she was. Yet in her prime, twenty years ago, when the door opened at the back of the stage, and the fair-haired, robust young woman advanced quietly to the front of the platform, and dropping her hands before her, held them one over the other, and calmly and brightly surveyed the great audience while the prelude was played, the simplicity of her dress, the simplicity of her manner, a certain noble womanliness which, as she stood there, did not appeal for admiration and applause, but was the assertion of the conscious power to command—all impressed you like the blooming youthfulness of Raphael's Sistine Madonna. Often she had a carnation nosegay in her bosom—I have seen her hold red flowers in her hand; but the color, sparingly used, only deepened the impression; and when she sang, the same just instinct showed itself. The expression was perfect, the effect indescribable, because the deep glow of intense feeling was never affected.

You have heard Goldenlips, the orator, and of course you have remarked that he does not paint every thing monotonously red. His tone is colloquial, moderate, composed, and therefore his red touches tell. He is not pointless by trying to make every thing pointed; but when he rises from the general level of his speech to a height of pathos, or invective, or appeal, the effect is wonderful, because it is only occasional. But Brasslungs begins in a storm of fury; he pours out expletive upon expletive; every thing is divine or detestable; and before he has spoken for a quarter of an hour you are tired and vexed, and believe nothing that he says.

Is it otherwise in poetry? There is Mr. Swinburne, whose volumes I have seen in your hand, and who has many admirers. To me, I confess, his poetry is like the pictures of which I began by speaking. It is suffused by a fine, rich hue; it is glowingly red, and the eye is fascinated. But gradually every thing is seen to be red, and red equally. Every thing in his movement is prestissimo, con fuoco. But how can a man dine on red pepper? In the poetry that comes flowing down through centuries the color is that of life, in which the red is occasional, but does not predominate. And painting, or singing, or writing red is a trick easily learned. The stage manner, as it is called, the strut in movement, the catch of the voice, are illustrations of the red style. But, monotonously red as they are, they suggest nothing but rant and insincerity. Too much red always does that. Let us remember it, dear Paul. The manner of some men is as red as those pictures—full of the most extravagant professions and vehement declarations. Indeed, it is much too red. Let us think of it, Paul, you and your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SILKS.

SILKS imported for winter are not increased in price. On the contrary, at many large houses fine failles are 75 cents or $1 a yard less than last year's prices, and lower-priced goods show a reduction of 25 cents or 50 cents each yard. Choice dark shades of gros grain for suits and pale tints for evening dresses were $8 50 a yard last winter; this season handsomer goods called double-chain faille will be sold in the new hues for $7. These are the richest fabrics imported. Failles for costumes brought out in three well-graded shades are $6 50 a yard, and the same grades of color are shown in gros grain of a finer quality for $4. Silks of very fair quality are sold for $2 a yard, though not of the rare new colors. Black silks striped with two shades of a color, or with two contrasting colors, such as blue and gray or rose and gray, the stripes in repped satin, are from $2 to $3 a yard. At the same prices are very lovely gray, violet, plum, and blue silks with an armure stripe of black. These are for tasteful dresses for afternoon and dinner.

Faille cashmere, called at some houses cachemire Sicilian, is now found on the counters of retail shops. It has already been described as the fabric of cashmere—fine wool and silk—worked in reps like poplin, instead of the twill of cashmere. The shades match those of the rich failles, above which they are to serve as over dresses. The widest of these fabrics is $10 a yard; a lighter quality, not three-fourths of a yard wide, is $2 50.

LADIES' CLOTH.

Ladies' cloth for winter suits shows improved fabric and coloring. The material is more closely woven, but soft and not heavy. The exquisitely smooth surface has a demi-lustre. Vandyke brown and myrtle green are the colors most largely imported; navy blue is third in proportion; then wine-color. It is a yard and a half wide, costing from $2 50 to $3 50 a yard.

CLOAKINGS.

White cloth of pure lamb's-wool is imported for children's cloaks. It is a third of an inch thick, fleecy on the under side, smooth and lustreless on top, and as soft as cashmere. This is usual cloth width, and $7 a yard. The same fabric is also shown in several colors for wraps for ladies as well as children. Among these are dark plum, cypress green, sailor blue, pale leather-color, and clear French gray. Lighter cloths, only heavy enough for house jackets, are woven with heavy ribs, diagonal or lengthwise, in imitation of corduroy. These are shown in white, brown, gray, and scarlet. The design for making is a short half-fitting jacket, with a seam down the centre of the back and wide side bodies. The end of the garment is cut in bold Gothic points faced with velvet, and each point is finished by a tassel. The sleeves are flowing. The collar pointed back and front, with tassels on the points.

TWILLED WOOLEN GOODS.

The fancy for twilled goods has brought a variety of such fabrics into market. Drap de Paris is a fine, soft material with cashmere twill, but is all pure wool, and only three-fourths of a yard wide: price $1 10 a yard. Drap de Nice is simply a very heavy cashmere. This is also single width. Three qualities are shown, costing $1 50, $1 75, and $2 a yard. Drap d'été, called also drap de France, is still heavier, as thick as ladies' cloth, indeed, and is double width. This is a good material for sacques and mantles, as it has body enough to support the elaborate braiding now in vogue. It costs from $2 50 to $3 50 a yard. Cashmere serge is the old wiry English serge, with fine irregular twill, like cashmere, instead of the bold diagonal twill formerly seen in serge. It is single width, and worth from $1 10 a yard upward. Cashmere, pure and simple, is marked at lower prices than those quoted two weeks ago. Qualities heavy enough for over dresses cost only $1 75 a yard, double fold. Manufacturers have taken care to make these of shades matching the silk with which they are to be trimmed, and over which they will be worn. This was necessary, as the new shades are very peculiar. The quaint olive green, Vandyke brown, and other grave tints admit no contrast or variation of color, and can only be correctly used with different materials of the same shade. The gay striped cashmeres for morning dresses are $1 50 a yard, double fold, but scarcely a yard wide.

Wool armures woven in diamonds or crinkled reps are soft, flexible, and substantial stuffs for winter dresses. The invisible shades are brought out in this goods for 85 cents or $1 a yard. Venice cloth, a sort of striped armure, is a variation of these goods, costing about the same money. This is commended for young girls' and misses' dresses for school and home. The plum and green shades are especially pretty.

LINGERIE.

New linen collars for fall retain the pointed front so long worn; but, instead of having a standing band behind, they are turned down all around the neck, the fall at the back being separated from the front points. They are cut to fit very high, are buttoned close about the throat, and are sometimes worn quite above the dress neck, the chemisette or dress protector of white muslin that is now attached to all linen collars serving to fill up the interim. This chemisette is no longer narrow, but is made several inches deep. It makes the collar fit properly, and also prevents the dress lining from being soiled by the skin. These collars, called the princesse, are made of very fine linen, finished with a slightly pointed edge of embroidery. They are exceedingly dainty for morning and traveling costumes. The square cuffs made to match are very broad, and are sewed to a full under-sleeve, on which a broad puff is sometimes placed to fill out the full sleeves now worn. A princess set, collar and cuffs, costs $1 60.

Another new linen collar without trimming also turns down all around, is slightly pointed, and is shaped to fit the neck without rising on the sides. The plain collar is 15 cents. Tucking and embroidery will be the trimming for linen in preference to the much adulterated Valenciennes worn lately. More expensive linen sets have wider turned-down collars, almost in Byron shape, nearly covered with the most exquisite French needle-work. The embroidery is in heavily wrought designs, each rose leaf artistically shaded, and is far more substantial than the open eyeleted work done in England. These sets cost from $3 50 to $12. The pointed collar with standing back is still much used, especially when finished with narrow edging of pointed embroidery. The collar and cuffs cost $1 25 when well made. Similar sets in small sizes for misses are daintily put up in fancy boxes, costing from $1 to $2 50, according to the trimming.

Under-clothing comes under the head of lingerie, but there is little new to tell about it. Neatly made chemises of Wamsutta or of New York Mills muslin are sold for $2 without trimming, for $2 50 if a ruffle is added. The first are quite plain; but by the addition of a linen ruffle rolled and overseamed to the band, or else fine tatting or needle-work, they make a welcome addition to a winter outfit. The bands of the neck and puffed sleeves are of cotton tucked or corded. The upper part of the chemise is tucked lengthwise in yoke shape. Ladies will find chemises tucked in this way fit handsomely over the bust, and there is less strain on the band than when the body of the garment is gathered to it. Drawers tucked to match these plain chemises cost $1 50. Valenciennes lace and transferred embroidery in medallions are the trimmings with which trousseaux for fall weddings are now being made at the furnishing houses.

LACES.

Lace will be largely used for trimming silk and cashmere suits for the winter. Guipure lace is seen on many French garments, even those made by the fastidious French modistes. A velvet garment just sent over has guipure in new designs imitating Spanish blonde. The heading is rich passementerie, with jet ornaments. Guipure laces imported in trimming width—that is, from two to three and a half inches—is in Gothic designs, arched points, and lines like columns. It costs from $3 to $5 a yard for the finest qualities. The German guipures are far cheaper, and are excellent in their way, substantial, and of pretty patterns. Colored guipure laces, in brown and gray shades to match cashmeres, are also shown. The quality is good, and the price from $2 to $3 50 a yard. Black duchesse lace, so much worn abroad, was seen at a few houses last year, and will be very fashionable for velvet and cashmere this season. The novelty in Chantilly lace is the designs of shaded figures hitherto confined to mantles, but now seen in laces for garniture.

For lace collars, the large empress shape, with round back three or four inches deep, and pointed in front, is still fashionable. It is shown in point duchesse lace, point appliqué, and round point. A duchesse collar for $9 makes the best appearance for the money, and is preferable to one of point appliqué that would cost twice as much. The empress collar in round point costs $35 or $40.

English Honiton lace for trimming is now among the importations. This is a showy and substantial lace, and its designs furnish models for the French duchesse point. The latter, however, is so fine that it is preferred to the original.

HINTS ABOUT COSTUMES.

The Marguerite polonaise, or a similar garment with basquine back, is the principal feature of costumes in preparation at the furnishing houses. This polonaise is made in every fabric—cretonne, alpaca, cashmere, silk, and velvet. Black alpaca, cashmere, and striped silks are the standard costumes for the present intermediate season, and self-trimmings are invariably used on them. A succession of overlapping bias folds, with one or two ruffles below, is the arrangement. The folds should be interlined with crinoline. Another favorite fashion is a straight wide flounce in pleats stitched near the top and half-way down the flounce. Button-moulds covered with the dress material are set on the pleats. Sometimes the pleats are at wide intervals, with bows between.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and JAMES M'CREERY & Co.

PERSONAL.

PROFESSOR GILMAN, of Yale College, has been employed by the Secretary of the Interior to visit the various agricultural colleges in the Northern States, to collect information for the Department of the Interior.

—Mrs. HUME, who died recently in England, at the age of eighty-six, was the wife of the well-known economist, and the daughter of a gentleman of Virginia, named BURNLEY. JOSEPH HUME, who died in 1854, would, if he had lived until now, been ninety-four. It is now almost forgotten that he discovered in 1835 an Orange plot, which had for its object the setting aside of the present sovereign, and the substitution of the Duke of Cumberland.

—Through the kindness of a relative of JOHN HOWARD PAYNE we have come into possession of a curious document, namely, two additional verses of "Home, Sweet Home," which were addressed by the poet to his friend and kinswoman, Mrs. BATES, of London, whose husband was well known as a partner in the opulent house of BARING BROTHERS. The verses have the true ring of the familiar poem, and offer a pathetic contrast between the darling of fortune to whom they are addressed and the homeless wanderer, who sang the delights which he was never to know in strains that will live while the world lasts. Our readers will be interested in the lines, which have never before been published, and which we copy verbatim:

TO MRS. BATES, LONDON.

To us, in despite of the absence of years,
How sweet the remembrance of Home still appears!
From allurements abroad, which but flatter the eye,
The unsatisfied heart turns, and says with a sigh,
Home, Home, sweet, sweet Home!
There's no place like Home; there's no place like Home.

Your exile is blest with all fate can bestow,
But mine has been checkered with many a woe;
Yet though different our fortunes, our thoughts are the same,
And both, as we think of Columbia, exclaim,
Home, Home, sweet, sweet Home!
There's no place like Home; there's no place like Home.

JOHN HOWARD PAYNE.

—That peculiar poet, JOHN G. SAXE, found himself compelled to ask a brief loan of a candle a few evenings ago, at Saratoga, from a beautiful lady. The next A.M. she found under her door the ensuing:

You gave me a candle; I give you my thanks,
And add, as a compliment justly your due,
There is not a girl in these feminine ranks
Who could, if she would, hold a candle to you.

—Things have changed in England. At the SCOTT centennial in London Mr. HEPWORTH DIXON presided, with the Duke of Manchester and Lord Lytton as vice-presidents. In old times Mister DIXON would have occupied a seat somewhere lower down the table.

—The Rev. LOVICK PIERCE, D.D., father of Bishop PIERCE, and the oldest minister of the Methodist Church in the South, being now in the eighty-eighth year of his age and the sixty-sixth of his ministry, preached a sermon an hour long at Haynesville, Georgia, a week or two ago, against the extravagance of female dress.

—The venerable Dr. TYNG, of this city, preached recently in Newburyport, and made reference to the fact that he was baptized in that church seventy-one years ago, nineteen years later was confirmed there, and first partook of the communion.

—The Rev. FERDINAND FAITHFULL, father of Miss EMILY FAITHFULL, of the Victoria press, died recently in England, aged eighty-two.

—German women are rapidly getting into business life. In Brussels the sisters EVERBERT have the most extensive house in the world for the manufacture of fine lace. The wife of Dr. DE LA PIERRE, chief of the Dental College of Belgium, is her husband's partner and associate. All through Germany the wives of professional men are book-keepers for their husbands.

—Mr. CHARLES FENNO HOFFMAN, a poet and novelist of the last generation, is and for twenty years has been an inmate of an insane asylum in Pennsylvania. His "Greyslaer, a Romance of the Mohawk," is a charming fiction, the scenes of the story being laid in the beautiful Mohawk Valley. It is founded on the celebrated criminal trial of BEAUCHAMP for the murder of Colonel SHARPE, of Kentucky, blending facts connected with the border annals of New York with the story of love, and displays the powers of a master painter of human passions.

—Mr. CHARLES LANMAN, of Washington, author of that very useful book, the "Dictionary of Congress," has been appointed American secretary of the Japanese legation at Washington, and has entered upon his duties.

—Mr. WADE, the new British envoy to Pekin, is the author of a text-book for the use of Englishmen studying Chinese, which is conceded to be the best method of surmounting the great difficulties that have hitherto puzzled grammarians.

—The Rev. Dr. SPRING, of this city, has concluded the sixty-first year of his pastorate of the "Brick Church" in this city. He was present in the pulpit on the anniversary, and at the close of the sermon, by Rev. E. N. WHITE, of Buffalo, spoke for fifteen minutes on the great changes which had taken place in the religious world during his pastorate.

—The most pecunious man south of MASON and DIXON's line is Mr. JOHN HOPKINS. Mr. JOHN HOPKINS is worth $8,000,000, which he commenced to make many years ago in Baltimore as a small grocer. Now Mr. HOPKINS proposes to spend most of the $8,000,000 in the building and endowment of the John Hopkins University, on the outskirts of the city of Baltimore.

—That good Quaker, JOHN KING, was the first teetotaler in Great Britain, is now seventy-four years old, and living with his fourth wife. All the teetotalers in the British monarchy are about to put up a penny each for the venerable Friend with his fourth wife.

—Queen VICTORIA has made a baronet of Mr. WILLIAM WALLACE, the heir of the Marquis of Hertford, as a reward for the activity and liberality he displayed in taking care of the sick and wounded in Paris during its great trial.

—Canon KINGSLEY, author of "Westward Ho," is coming over to look at the Ho he wrote about so pleasantly.

—Mr. SAGE, of Wisconsin, a gentleman who has accumulated many coupons in the lumber trade, has given $250,000 for the erection of a college for women at Ithaca. He also offers another gift of $100,000, on several conditions, chief of which is that the attendance on religious services at chapel in the morning shall be compulsory.

—Colonel GEORGE CHESNEY is announced authoritatively in the London Athenæum as being the author of the "Battle of Dorking." Over 200,000 copies of this clever magazine article have been purchased, and a translation is now being made into French.

—JULIA WARD HOWE, CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN, FANNY FERN, JAMES PARTON, Colonel HIGGINSON, Colonel WARING, Mrs. WARING, and some others have organized themselves into a picnic club at Newport, which meets every week under the greenwood tree for recreation. No need of Champagne among such effervescing spirits!

—Madame JEANETTE POWER, one of the most eminent female naturalists of the day, has recently deceased in France. She was known as the discoverer of the secret of the manner in which the shell of the nautilus is formed, and her experiments upon the subject are among the most curious of the age. It is to Madame POWER that we owe, likewise, the invention of the aquarium. She was much esteemed in the scientific world, a member of most of the European academies of science, and held a grade of high distinction at the Academy of Brussels, and, withal, so truly feminine and simple-hearted that all this honor and glory was freely forgiven.

—Mlle. LOUISE MUHLBACH, the most popular of Prussian female novelists, is about to be appointed reader to the Crown Princess. She is one of the high moral writers of Germany—what they disdainfully speak of as giving "a pailful of warm water to the tumbler of the milk of human kindness," seeking thus to extinguish the glow of youthful genius.

—Lord Houghton, in a speech at the SCOTT centennial, speaking of Miss HOPE SCOTT, the sole survivor of the line, mentioned the kind of loneliness in which the names of all the great littérateurs stand. They have rarely left descendants. "We have no SHAKSPEARE, no MILTON, no BACON, no NEWTON, no POPE, no BYRON; Italy has no DANTE, no PETRARCH, no ARIOSTO, or ALFIERI; Germany has no GOETHE, no SCHILLER, no HEINE; France has no MONTAIGNE, no DESCARTES, no VOLTAIRE, no LAMARTINE. There is no descendant known of LUTHER, CALVIN, or JOHN KNOX. The fact is remarkable, and not favorable to the theory of an indefinite progress of humanity. The race of the very great does not multiply, while the race of the very little is as the sands of the sea."

—It is said that the Emperor WILLIAM is declining in strength on account of age, and that he can not long continue in his present position. Many of the stronger officials of Germany are known to be in favor of a republic, and public opinion tends surely, if slowly, to its establishment.

—The Methodist clergymen in the United States—18,000—are asked to give one dollar each toward erecting a monument to the memory of PHILIP EMBURY, the founder of Methodism in America.

—Despite the injunctions of his physician, Vice-President COLFAX has made a speech—a little one—to a Sunday-school at St. Paul, in which he stated that when a child of three years his mother took him to the infant class of a Sunday-school. Afterward he became a teacher, and taught twelve years. "One of the pleasant events of my life," remarked Mr. C., "is this: not long since a gentleman, now in the ministry, came to me and told me that it was through words spoken by me in teaching my class that he was led to join the ministry."

—For reasons not made known to the common world of Italy, VICTOR EMANUEL has formally announced his determination never to sleep at the Quirinal Palace. "Uneasy lies the head where sits a crown."

—Royalty has again made obeisance to art, the Prince of Wales, the Princess LOUISE, and the Marquis of Lorne having recently paid a visit to GUSTAVE DORÉ.

—Mr. JAMES PAGET, an eminent surgeon of England, has been knighted by the Queen in recognition of his professional merits.

—Hon. ROBERT TOOMBS, of Georgia, who seems to be gradually feeling his way forward into public life, remarked recently to a newspaper man that his candidate for the Presidency is General HANCOCK, and that he will support GRANT rather than young Mr. ADAMS, Chief Justice CHASE, or any of the "new departure" Democrats.

—As though it were something to be proud of, it is sent through the papers that over $4,000,000 worth of diamonds were worn at Congress Hall, Saratoga, a few evenings since. Prominent among the ornamented were the wives of Commodore VANDERBILT, A. T. STEWART, Judge HILTON, POTTER PALMER, Mr. KENT, Judge GARVIN, General BAKER, and such.

—Mr. JOHN A. BROWN, of Philadelphia, gives $300,000 to the Presbyterian Hospital in that city, on condition that it shall be used exclusively for the support of the hospital, and not for buildings. Professor SANDERS gave the land and buildings.

—Speaking of the STANDISH celebration, the Boston Post emits the opinion that some of the speakers went Miles away from the subject.

—Professor MORLEY is writing a "First Sketch of English Literature, for Schools," to be published in November.

—Mr. GLADSTONE, the Premier of England, is about to give his daughter in marriage to the Rev. Mr. DUCKWORTH, lately tutor to Prince LEOPOLD, a great favorite at court, who has the merit of being a very good man, and the advantage of being considered very handsome. Should he retain the favor of Queen and minister, his chances of preferment are prime, and he is said to deserve it.

—The retirement in which Queen VICTORIA lives is not merely a freak on her part; it is, in a great measure, rendered imperative by the state of her health. She suffers very much from a kind of nervousness, which might very easily pass into a more serious malady under the strain of an exciting and fatiguing public life. She is also subject to giddiness and nausea when holding a levee, or in any other crowded assembly. The doctors recommend frequent change of air and a quiet life; and there can be no doubt that, considering the hereditary condition of the family, they have strong reasons for giving this advice in a very peremptory manner.

—Mr. FREDERICK KAPP, for many years a resident of this city, where he enjoyed the honors and the emoluments of certain valuable offices, has returned to his native Germany, and done himself the honor to write a book about us of more than common savagery.

—OLE BULL, the eminent violinist, is said to be hopelessly ill at his home in Maine. He first appeared in this country at the Park Theatre in this city in 1843. In 1845 he returned to Europe, revisiting this country again in 1851. In 1857 he again went back to Norway, and once more sought the United States four years ago, in the December of 1867. Since then he has married an American lady, and twice crossed the ocean, settling for the time being in Maine. He was born in Bergen, Norway, February 5, 1810, so that at present he is in his sixty-second year.

—The late Mr. WOODWARD, librarian to Queen VICTORIA, left a very full "Dictionary of Dates," compiled with special reference to the biographies of artists and men of letters, which is in press in London. It is to contain 1200 pages closely printed in double columns, and will be the most complete work of its kind.

Digitized by Google

Lace and Point Lace Collar, Figs. 1–7.

THE illustration, Fig. 1, shows a collar of point lace braid worked on lace in imitation of the real point, which can be worn with the most elegant toilette. The collar is made of fine Brussels lace, lace insertion, and various kinds of figured point lace braid. To make the collar, transfer the whole design, one-half of which is given by Fig. 34, Supplement, to paper, and on this sew a piece of lace of a corresponding size. Baste the different kinds of point lace braid and the insertion, which Figs. 3–7, on page 597, show in full size, on the lace following the lines of the design, and observing the illustration, Fig. 1, and the full-sized section, Fig. 2, on page 597; in doing this the needle must not be passed through the paper foundation. Run the outlines of the stems and the small scattered flowers and dots (see Fig. 2) with fine thread, and button-hole stitch them closely; then separate the collar from the paper. Fasten the different arabesques, flowers, and leaves formed of point lace braid on the under side of the embroidery with button-hole stitches of fine thread; in doing this lay on a thread of coarse tatting cotton to surround each figure on the right side, and catch this thread in working the button-hole stitches. Cut away the lace underneath the figures formed of insertion. For the remainder, trim the collar as shown by the illustration with lace stitches, and on the outer scallops with small woven picots (see Fig. 5). The collar may be ornamented at the back and front with bows of colored ribbon, and the scallops at the neck underlaid with similar ribbon.

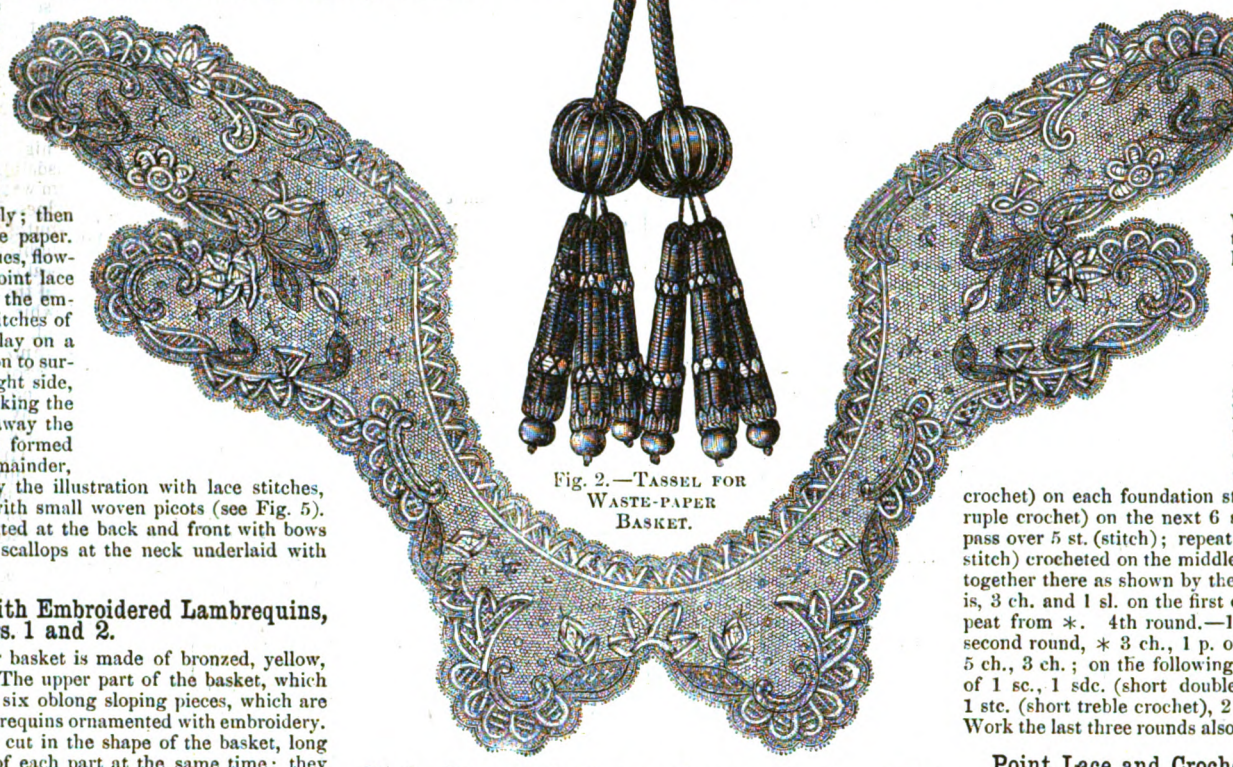

Fig. 1.—LACE AND POINT LACE COLLAR.—[See Page 597.]
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. IX., Fig. 34.

Waste-paper Basket with Embroidered Lambrequins, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS elegant waste-paper basket is made of bronzed, yellow, and black polished reeds. The upper part of the basket, which rests on a stand, consists of six oblong sloping pieces, which are trimmed with red cloth lambrequins ornamented with embroidery. These lambrequins must be cut in the shape of the basket, long enough to form the lining of each part at the same time; they are pinked all around, and trimmed on the edge with black velvet ribbon, which is edged on both sides with white silk soutache.

Fig. 1.—WASTE-PAPER BASKET WITH EMBROIDERED LAMBREQUINS.
For design see Supplement, No. XX., Figs. 61 and 62.

On the overlapping piece of the lambrequin work the arabesque figure given by the design of Fig. 61, Supplement, with velvet ribbon and soutache. Trim the point of each lambrequin with a piece of woolen cord laid in three loops, the ends of which are ornamented each with a button covered with colored silk, and with three oblong grelots covered with the same material. A button made in a similar manner is fastened on the loops (see full-sized illustration, Fig. 2). For the form of the larger and smaller round buttons use turned wooden moulds; but for the oblong grelots use paper tubes, which are rolled together of a strip of paper an inch and three-quarters wide. The windings of the paper tube are pasted together with gum-arabic. The lambrequin at the under edge of the sloped part of the basket is also of red cloth; the points are edged with velvet ribbon and soutache, and the embroidery figure on each point is worked in chain stitch with black and white silk in the design given by Fig. 62, Supplement. The lambrequins may, of course, be set on a basket of a different shape by making them to suit the form of the basket.

Waste-paper Basket run with Colored Braid.

THIS waste-paper basket is made of polished black willow reeds, run with wide worsted braid of two bright contrasting colors, as shown by the illustration. It is to be observed that the pieces of braid are run alternately over and under the vertical bars of the basket. Knotted woolen fringe, which can be worked like either of the fringes shown by Figs. 1 and 2, page 424, Harper's Bazar, No. 27, Vol. IV., and two tassels of cut worsted balls, complete the trimming of the basket. We would remark that this trimming can be used for baskets of any shape desired, and is especially adapted to renovating worn-out baskets.

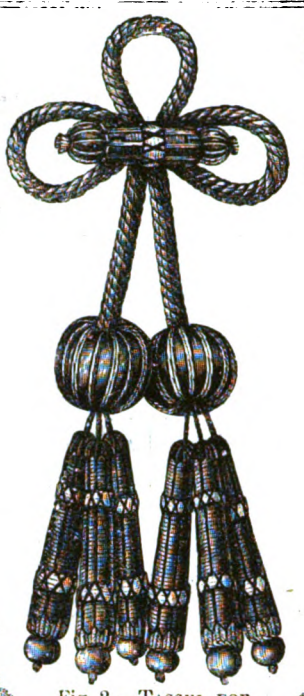

Fig. 2.—TASSEL FOR WASTE-PAPER BASKET.

Point Lace Tidy, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS pretty little tidy is worked in point lace embroidery. Transfer the design on linen, as shown by Fig. 2, which gives a full-sized quarter section of the tidy, and sew on, first, the Swiss muslin pieces, as shown by Fig. 2, and afterward run on the point lace braid. Fasten the intersecting points of the braid together without passing the needle through the linen, and work in lace stitch with fine thread, as shown by the full-sized illustration. The point lace braid may also be sewed on a lace foundation, and the lace stitches worked on the lace, to save time and labor. On the point lace braid, which forms the outer edge of the tidy, work large and small button-hole stitched scallops.

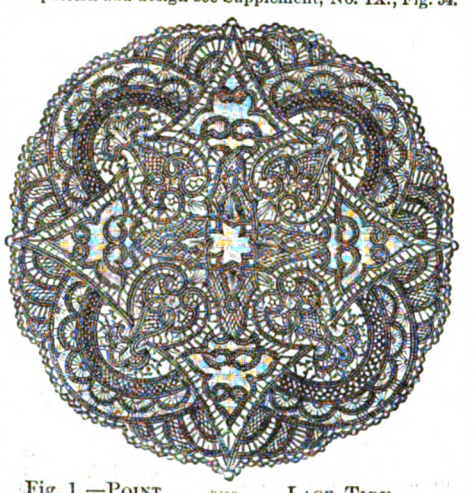

Fig. 1.—POINT LACE TIDY. REDUCED SIZE.

Crochet Insertion for Lingerie.

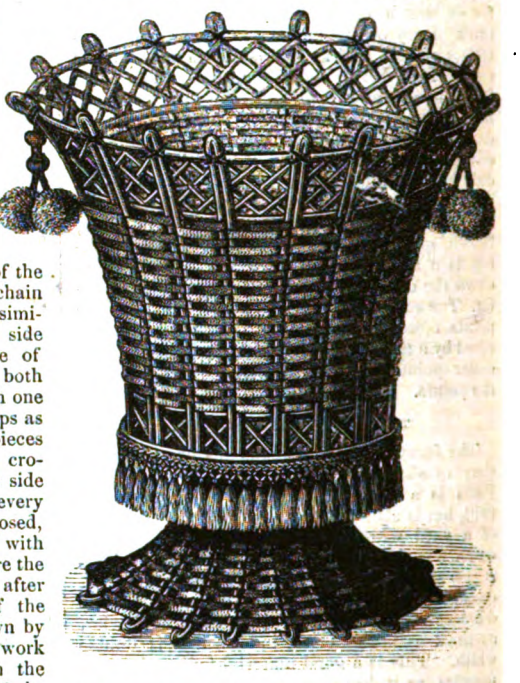
See illustration on page 597.

THE manner of working this insertion is very simple; it is worked lengthwise in two equal parts with twisted crochet cotton. On a foundation of the requisite length work for the 1st round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on each foundation stitch. 2d round.—* 6 qc. (quadruple crochet) on the next 6 st., 6 ch. (chain stitch), with these pass over 5 st. (stitch); repeat from . 3d round.— 1 sl. (slip stitch) crocheted on the middle of the 6 qc., so that these are held together there as shown by the illustration, 2 ch., 1 p. (picot; that is, 3 ch. and 1 sl. on the first of the 3 ch.), 3 ch., 1 p., 2 ch.; repeat from *. 4th round.—1 sc. on the first of the 6 qc. of the second round, * 3 ch., 1 p. of 5 ch. and 1 sl. on the first of the 5 ch., 3 ch.; on the following 6 ch. of the second round one dot of 1 sc., 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 2 dc. (double crochet), 1 stc. (short treble crochet), 2 dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc.; repeat from *. Work the last three rounds also on the other side of the foundation.

Point Lace and Crochet Insertion for Lingerie.

See illustrations on page 597.

POINT lace braid with holes woven in is required for making this insertion. Take two equal pieces of the length needed for the border, and with twisted crochet cotton, No. 80, work, first, on one side of one piece of braid always alternately 5 dc. (double crochet) on the first hole of the braid, 7 ch. (chain stitch). Work a similar round on one side of the other piece of braid, and join both pieces of braid with one round of ch. scallops as follows: Lay the pieces of braid with the crocheted rounds flat side by side, so that every 5 dc. are transposed, then crochet 1 sl. (slip stitch), with which surround the ch. before the 5 dc. of one and the ch. after the opposite 5 dc. of the other round, as shown by the illustration; * work 18 ch., 1 sl. on the fourth of the 18 ch., so that a loop is formed, then 3 ch., 1 sl., with which surround the ch. next to every 5 and 5 dc., as shown by the illustration; repeat from *. The loops formed of every 18 ch. must always lie in opposite directions. The pieces of point lace braid thus joined are next edged on both free sides with one round of tc. (treble crochet) and ch. each, as follows: * 1 sc. (single crochet) on the next loop of the joining round, and at the same time on the outer edge of the point lace braid (see illustration), 2 ch., twice alternately 3 tc. worked off together in one stitch on the next hole of the braid, 5 ch., then again 3 tc. worked off in one stitch on the same hole, 2 ch., and repeat from *.



WASTE-PAPER BASKET RUN WITH COLORED BRAID.

Tatted Edging.

See illustration on page 597.

THIS edging, if worked with very fine cotton, may be used for trimming lingerie; when worked with coarse cotton or knitting cotton, it is suitable for covers, window shades, etc. The edging is worked partly with one and partly with two threads (shuttles). Begin with the round forming the three-leaved figures and the first row of the small scallops, and work as follows: With one thread work a small ring of 4 ds. (double stitches), 1 p. (picot), 4 ds.; then fasten the second thread, which we will call the working thread, to the end of the first thread, which now serves for a foundation thread, turn the ring downward, and * on the foundation thread work 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds.; for the scallop nearest the small ring work 1 p., 6 ds., which form half the stem of the three-leaved figure. Turn the work so that the ring is again turned upward, and work with the foundation thread only, paying no attention to the other thread, first the inner ring of the first leaflet of 8 ds., 1 short p., 8 ds.; on this ring work a second ring of 6 ds., fasten to the p. of the small ring worked in the beginning, 6 ds., fasten to the short p. of the preceding ring, 1 p., 9 ds., 1 p., 3 ds., fasten to the thread interval at the joining point of the inner ring; this closes the first leaflet of the three-leaved figure. Now work two more such leaflets with the same thread in a similar manner, as shown by the illustration, then turn the three-leaved figure downward, and again work with both threads, taking the thread just used for a foundation, 6 ds., which form the second half of the stem, fasten to the p. before the 6 opposite ds. of the stem, then 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds.; turn this row of stitches, forming a small scallop, downward, and with the foundation thread only work a small ring of 4 ds., fasten to the last p. of the third leaflet of the figure, and 4 ds.; turn the figure downward, work with both threads one scallop of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., turn this scallop downward, work with the foundation thread only one ring of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., and repeat from * in the requisite length, fastening the side leaflets of the three-leaved figures together, observing the illustration. Next work for the upper edge of the lace three rounds of scallops, each with two threads; in the first and second of these three rounds each scallop counts 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., after each scallop fasten to the nearest p. at the middle of a scallop of the preceding round. The scallops of the third round consist each of 10 ds.; after each scallop fasten to the next p. of the preceding round. Finally, work the scallop round at the outer edge of the lace, which is also worked with 2 threads: * fasten these threads to the joining picot of two leaf figures, and on the foundation thread work nine times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 1 ds., fasten to the p. of the middle leaflet, and work 1 ds. and nine times alternately 1 p., 2 ds. Repeat from *.

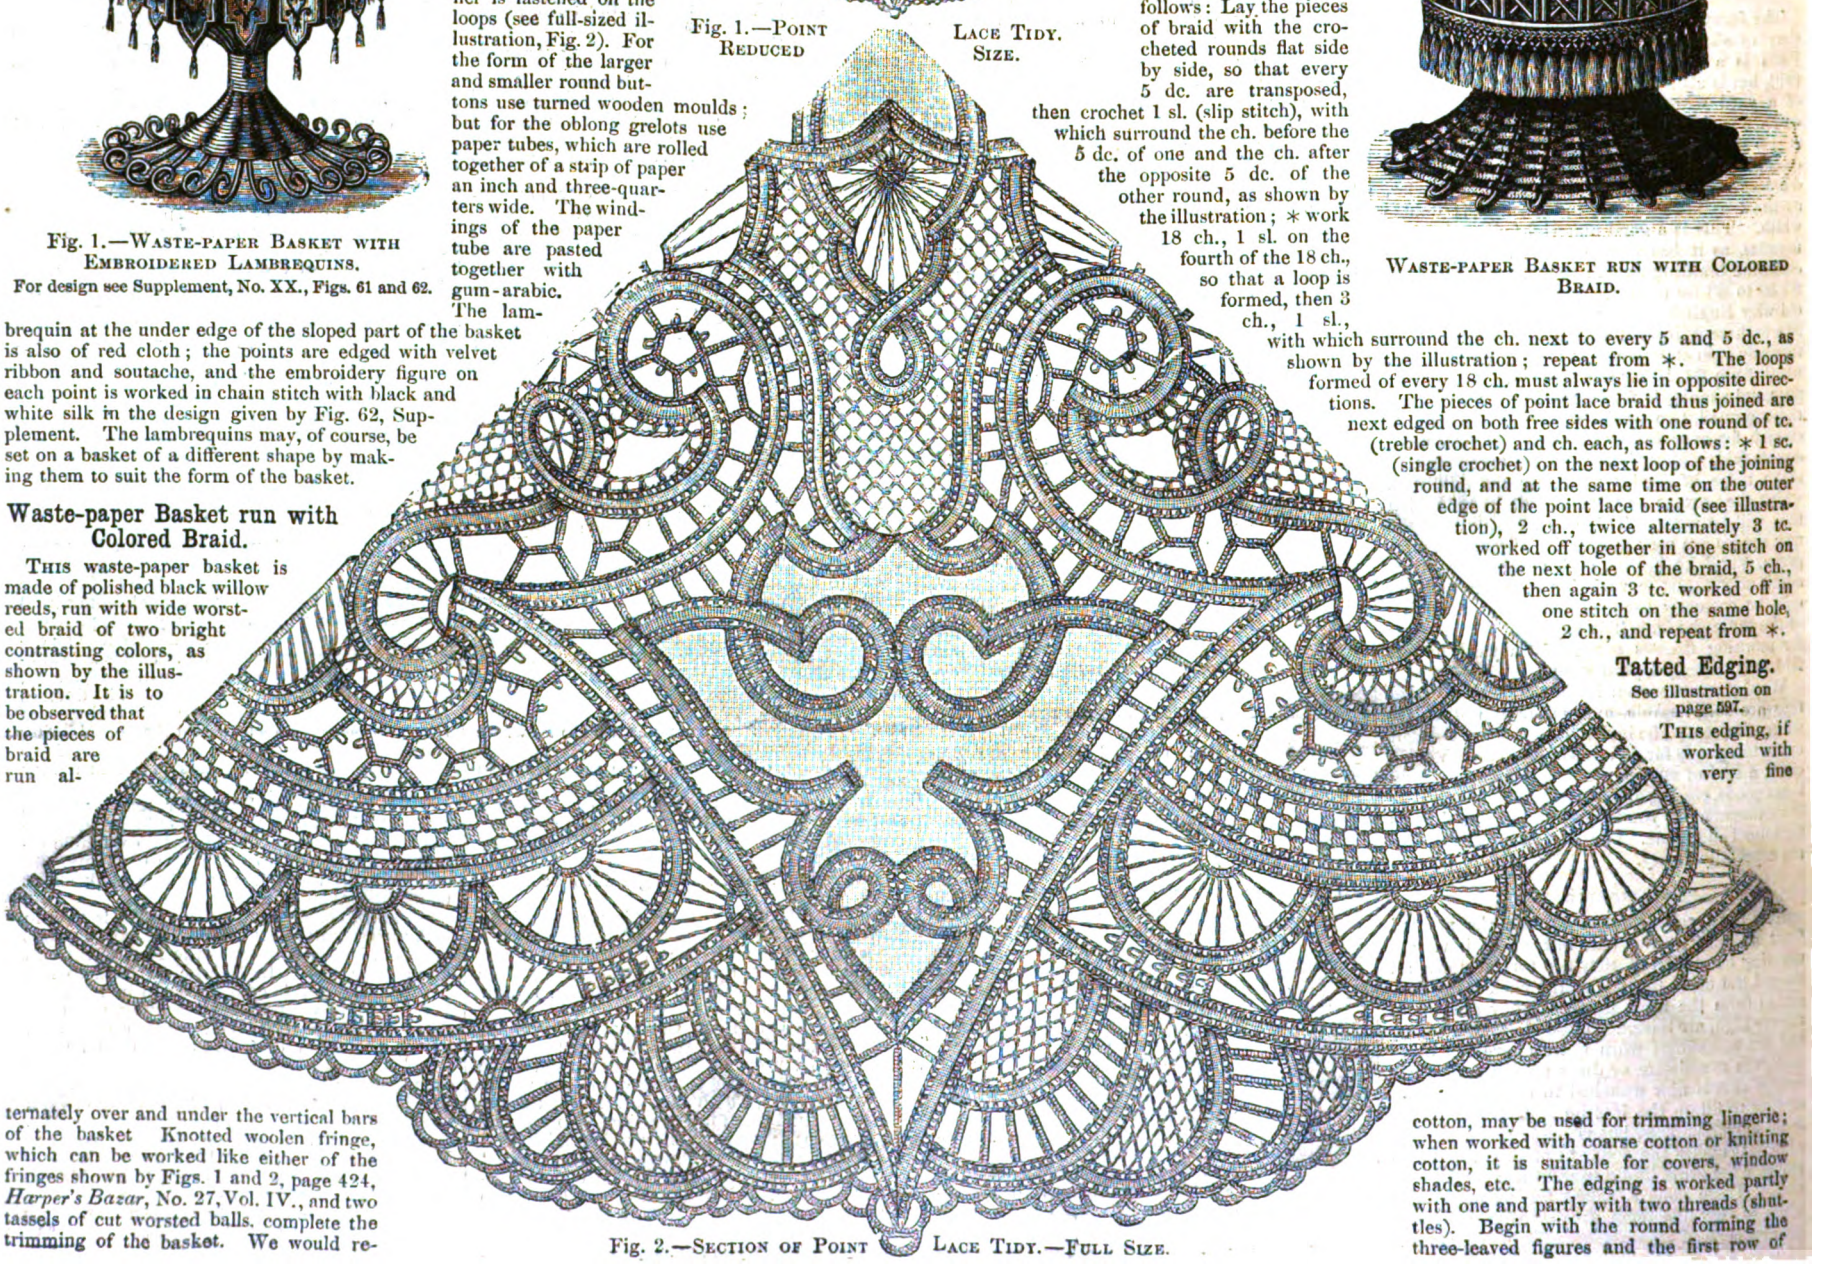


Fig. 2.—SECTION OF POINT LACE TIDY.—FULL SIZE.

Digitized by Google

CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE.

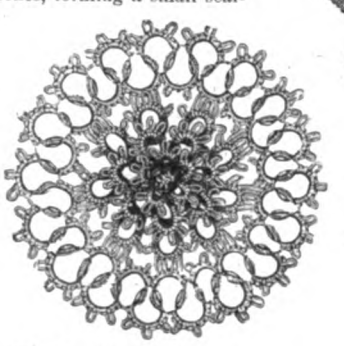

Fig. 1.—TATTED ROSETTE FOR LINGERIE.

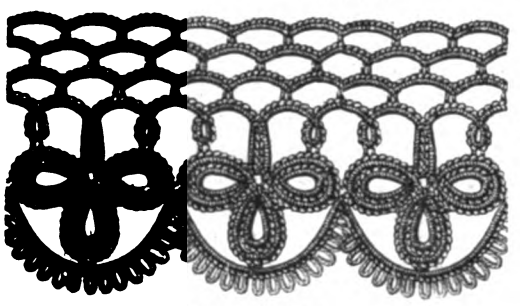

TATTED EDGING.

Tatted Rosettes for Lingerie, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—This rosette is worked of fine tatting cotton. For the centre work separate circles of connected rings, and sew these on each other in raised work. The first of these circles consists of three raised small rings; for each of the latter work 5 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), 5 ds.; in working the third ring, instead of forming the p., fasten to the picots of the two rings previously worked, holding them together. Then tie the working thread to the projecting end of thread at the beginning of the work. In connection with this circle work a second circle of five rings that come close together; each of these rings counts 5 ds., 1 p., twice alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 5 ds. After finishing the last ring, tie the beginning and end of the thread together and fasten it. The third circle, to be worked separately, consists of seven rings, each ring of 5 ds., 1 p., four times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 5 ds. The fourth circle counts nine rings of the size of the rings of the preceding circle; these rings are separated from each other by a space of an eighth of an inch each. The outer edge of the rosette, which consists of two rows of semicircular scallops joined by Josephine knots, is worked in one round, but with three threads, two of which form each the foundation thread for one row of scallops. Commence this round with the inner row of scallops, to be joined with the rings of the fourth circle, and work first with two threads, using one for a foundation, * one scallop as follows: twice alternately 3 ds., 1 p., then 3 ds., turn this scallop downward, and with the working thread only work one Josephine knot of eight right stitches; now lay on the third thread, and on it work one scallop of the outer row of three times alternately 3 ds., 1 p., then 3 ds. Turn this scallop downward, and work with the working thread only one Josephine knot of eight right stitches, then close beside the scallop previously worked of the inner row, again using the foundation thread for a foundation, work one scallop of 9 ds., and fasten to the second and fourth picot between each 3 and 3 ds. of one ring of the fourth circle; now with the working thread only work one Josephine knot of eight right stitches, turn the work so that the scallop last worked is turned downward. On the foundation thread of the scallop of the outer row, and close to the latter, work a similar scallop of three times alternately 3 ds., 1 p., then 3 ds.; turn this scallop downward, work with the working thread only one Josephine knot of eight right stitches, and repeat from *. Finally, sew the separately worked circles on each other from the under side in raised work.

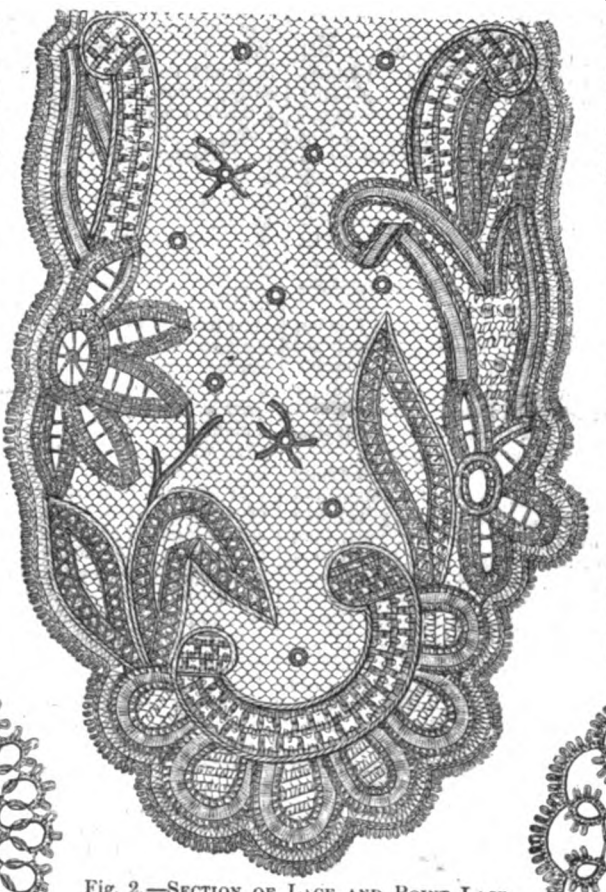

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF LACE AND POINT LACE COLLAR.—[See Page 596.]

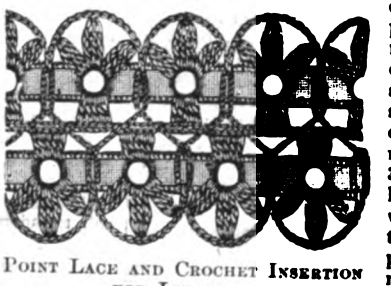

POINT LACE AND CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE.

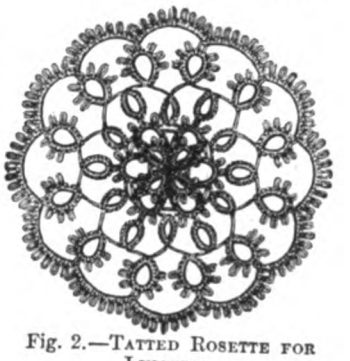

Fig. 2.—TATTED ROSETTE FOR LINGERIE.

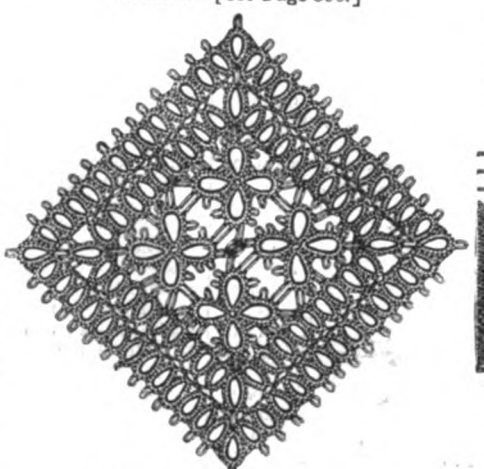

TATTED SQUARE FOR LINGERIE.

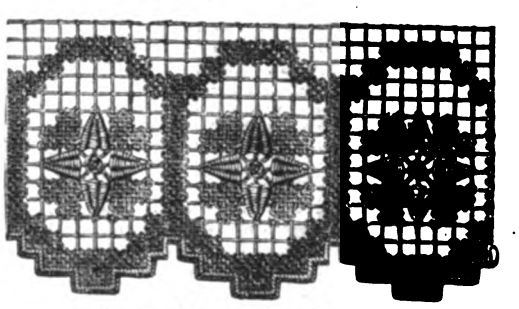

Fig. 2.—NETTED GUIPURE EDGING.

Fig. 2.—This rosette is worked with tatting cotton, No. 80. Work, first, for the four-leaved figure in the centre of the rosette, one ring of 8 ds. (double stitch; that is, one stitch right, one stitch left), six times alternately 1 p. (picot), 2 ds., then 1 more p., 3 ds. In connection with this ring work three more similar rings, but instead of forming the first p., always fasten each ring to the last p. of the preceding ring. Instead of forming the last p. in the last ring, fasten to the first p. of the first ring; then fasten the thread, turn the work, and work * 9 ds., four times alternately 1 p., 2 ds., then 1 more p., 9 ds. The picots at the sides, which serve for fastening, must be somewhat longer than the remaining picots. Close the row of stitches in a ring, then repeat five times from *. In working the following rings, fasten each, instead of forming the first p., to the last p. of the preceding ring. Besides this, fasten the ring on the four-leaved figure as shown by the illustration. After finishing the last ring, which, instead of forming the last p., is fastened to the first p. of the first ring, fasten the thread and cut it off. Now work * 9 ds., fasten to the six-leaved figure as shown by the illustration, 9 ds., close the row of stitches in a ring, then turn the work. After one-eighth of an inch space work a ring of 4 ds., six times alternately 1 p., 2 ds., then 1 more p., 4 ds.; turn the work, and, after one-eighth of an inch space, repeat from *, always going forward. After finishing the last ring, fasten the thread and cut it off. The last round is worked with two threads (shuttles). Tie both threads together, * fasten the working thread to the middle p. of the next ring, and on the foundation thread work one scallop of 2 ds., nine times alternately 1 p., 2 ds. Repeat from *, always going forward. After working the last scallop, fasten the threads and cut them off.

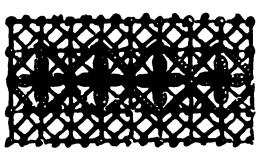

Fig. 1.—NETTED GUIPURE INSERTION.

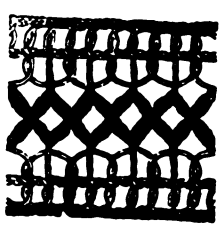

KNITTED AND CROCHET INSERTION.

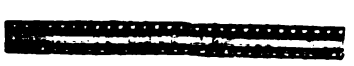

Fig. 4.

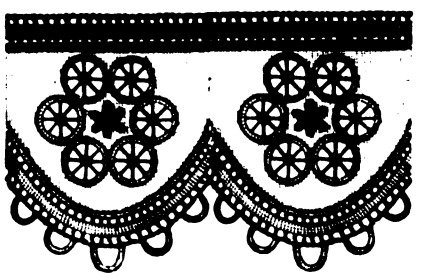
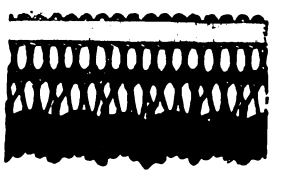
Fig. 5.



NEEDLE-WORK EDGING FOR LINGERIE.

Fig. 3.



POINT LACE AND CROCHET EDGING.

Fig. 6.

Fig. 7

Figs. 3–7.—VARIOUS STYLES OF POINT LACE BRAID FOR COLLAR.—[See Page 596.]

Tatted Square for Lingerie.

THESE squares are suitable for ornamenting cravat ends, collars, etc., and are

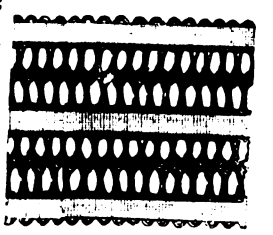


Fig. 2.—POINT LACE AND CROCHET GIMP FOUNDATION FOR CHEMISE YOKE.

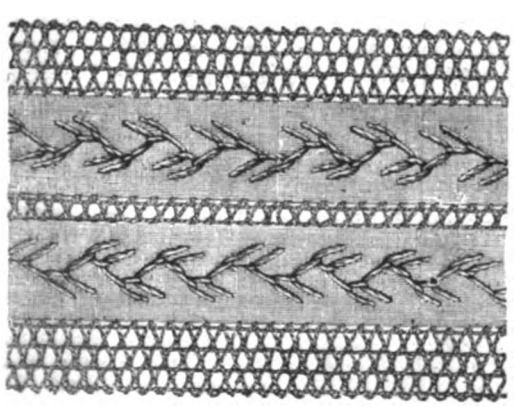

Fig. 3.—MUSLIN INSERTION AND HEM-STITCHED FOUNDATION FOR CHEMISE YOKE.

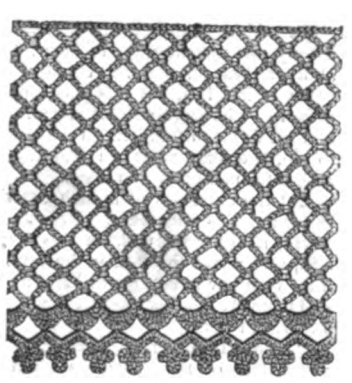
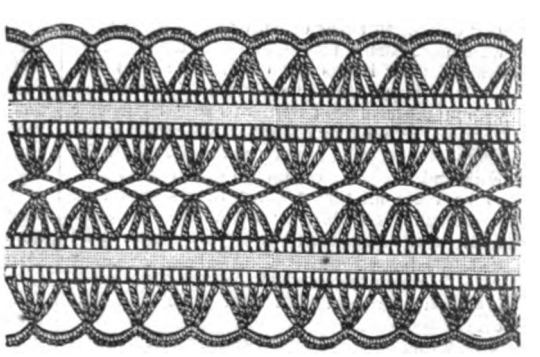


CROCHET EDGING WORKED CROSSWISE.

CROCHET INSERTION WORKED CROSSWISE.



POINT LACE AND CROCHET INSERTION.

Digitized by Google

worked with fine or coarse tatting cotton, according to the purposes for which they are designed. Begin the square at the middle with one of the four-leaved figures, which are worked as shown by the illustration; in working the three remaining figures fasten to the corresponding picots of the figures already finished, observing the illustration. Work first the inner row of rings, which are fastened to each other as well as to the picots of the leaf figures, in the manner plainly shown by the illustration; between the rings there remains a space of an eighth of an inch. In working the second outer row of rings fasten each space between the rings to the space of the preceding row, as shown by the illustration. Finally, form a wheel in the middle of the square, braiding a thread of the cotton through the four picots that meet there.

(Continued from No. 31, page 487.)

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER XIII.

LADY DUNSMORE was a shrewd and far-seeing woman. She responded with the utmost civility to all Miss Bertha Rivers's advances, and planned no end of gayeties for her and Hannah, from which the Rivers family might plainly see—and she meant them to see—that she desired her friend Miss Thelluson's visit to be made as pleasant as possible.

But fate and Hannah's own will stood in the way. Adeline declined more rapidly than any one expected; and it soon became evident that she was never likely to quit those dull lodgings in Harley Street, except to be taken back to Easterham in the one peaceful way—as, however far off they died, it had always been the custom to carry home all the Riverses. Even Adeline herself seemed to understand this.

"I don't want to stir from here; it is too much trouble," she said one day to Hannah, now daily beside her. "But, afterward, tell them they may take me home. Not to the Grange—that never was home—but to the Moat House. Let them have me one night in the drawing-room there before they put me under the daisies. And let Bernard read the service over me. And—you may tell him and them all that I was not sorry to die—I did not mind it—I felt so tired!"

Nevertheless

"On some fond breast the parting soul relies;"

and that breast was, for Adeline, not her husband's, but Hannah's. Of any one else's nursing she testified such impatience—perhaps feeling instinctively that it was given more out of duty than love—that gradually both Mr. Melville and Bertha let her have her own way. Things ended in Miss Thelluson's spending most of her time, not in the Dunsmores' lively mansion, but in that dull drawing-room, from whence, except to her bedroom, Adeline was never moved.

"Do stay with her as much as you can," entreated Bernard, who ran up for a day to London as often as he could, but who still saw no more than brothers usually see—the mere outside of his sister's life. He knew she was doomed; but then the doctors had said Adeline was consumptive, and not likely to live to be old. "And she has had a happy life, married to a good fellow whom she was always fond of. Poor Adeline! And she has grown so much attached to you, Hannah. She says you are such a comfort to her!"

"I think I have rather a faculty for comforting sick people: perhaps because doing so comforts me."

But Hannah did not say—where was the use of saying?—that this comfort was to her not unneeded. The uncertainty of her present position; the daily self-suppression it entailed; nay, the daily hypocrisy—or what to her honest nature felt like such—were so painful that sometimes when Bernard appeared she did not know whether she were glad or sorry to see him. But every body else—even to the Dunsmores—seemed heartily glad. And no one seemed to have the slightest suspicion of any bond between Rosie's aunt and Rosie's father except little Rosie. Sometimes this was to her a relief—sometimes an inexpressible pain.

"Good-by, and God bless you for all your goodness to my sister," said Bernard one Saturday as he was going back to Easterham. "They will bless you one of these days," added he, tenderly—all he could say, for he and she were not alone. They seldom were alone now. Opportunities were so difficult to make; and when made, the fear of being broken in upon in their tête-à-têtes caused them to feel awkward and uncomfortable—at least Hannah did.

"Good-by," she responded, with a sad, inward smile at the phrase "one of these days." Did it mean when they should be married? But that day might never come, or come when they were quite elderly people, and hope deferred had drained their hearts dry of all but the merest dregs of love. And the picture of the woman who might have been Bernard's wife, happy and honored, accepted by his family, welcomed by his neighbors, reigning joyfully at the House on the Hill, and finally succeeding to the Moat House, to be there all that a Lady Rivers should be—presented itself bitterly to Hannah's imagination. She had taken from him the chance of all this, and more, and given him in return—what? A poor, weary heart, which, though it was bursting with love, could not utter more than that cold "good-by."

But when she had said it and returned to Adeline's bedside Hannah forgot the troubles of life in the solemnity of fast-advancing death.

"It is hard Bernard is obliged to go," the sick girl said, pitifully. "He likes to sit with me a little, I can see that. They do not, and therefore I don't want to have them. Besides, I can't have one of them without having both; and I won't have both. Nobody could expect it."

"No," said Hannah, feeling sorrowfully that it was useless to argue against what had grown almost into a monomania, though the poor sick girl had still self-control enough not to betray herself, except in incidental, half-intelligible words like these. Better leave it thus, and let her sorrow die with her—one of the heart-wounds which nobody avenges; one of the thefts for which nobody is punished.

At length, just in the middle of the London season, when, one summer morning, Mayfair lay in the passing lull between the closing of operas and theatres, and the breaking up of late balls, a cab thundered up to the Earl of Dunsmore's door. It was Mr. Melville coming to fetch Miss Thelluson to his wife. She was dying.

And then Hannah found out that the young man had some feeling. Full of strength and health himself, he had never really believed in Adeline's illness, still less her approaching death, till now, and it came upon him with a shock indescribable. Overwhelmed with grief, and something not unlike remorse, during the twelve hours she still lingered he never quitted her side. Careless as he had been to his living wife, to a wife really dying he was the tenderest husband in the world. So much so that she once turned to Hannah with a piteous face:

"Oh, if this could only last! Couldn't you make me well again?"

But she could not be made well again; and it might not have lasted, this late happiness which gave her peace in dying. Poor Adeline! it was better to die! And when Hannah watched the big fellow, now utterly subdued by the emotion of the hour, insist upon feeding his wife with every mouthful of her last food as tenderly as if she were a baby—sit supporting her on the bed, motionless for hours, till his limbs were all cramped and stiff—sadder than ever seemed the blind folly, perhaps begun in a mistake on both sides, which had ended in letting a poor heart first starve for love, and then grow poisoned with a nameless jealousy, until between the hunger and the poison it died.

For Adeline did die; but her death was peaceful, and it was in her husband's arms.

"He is fond of me, after all, you see," she whispered to Hannah in one of Herbert's momentary absences. "It was very foolish of me to be so jealous of Bertha. Perhaps I should not had it been a thing I could have spoken about. And don't speak of it now, please. Only, if he ever wants to do as his father did, and the law will allow it, tell him he may as well marry Bertha as any body: I shall not mind."

But to Bertha herself, although she kissed her in token of amity and farewell, Adeline said not a word. The secret wound, vainly plastered over, seemed to bleed even though she was dying.

Her end had come so suddenly at last that no one from Easterham had been sent for; and when Bernard arrived next morning at his accustomed hour, it was to find a shut-up house, and his sister "away." Then, in the shock of his first grief, Hannah found out, as she had never done before, how close, even with all their faults, was the tie which bound him to his own people. It touched her deeply; it made her love him better, and honor him more; and yet it frightened her. For there might come a time when he had to choose, deliberately and decisively, between the love of kindred and the love of her; and she foresaw now more clearly than ever how hard the struggle would be.

In the absorption of her close attendance upon Adeline she had heard little of what was going on in the outside world. Even "the bill"—the constant subject of discussion at Dunsmore House—had faded out of her mind, till such phrases as "read the first time," "read the second time," "very satisfactory majority," and so on, met her ear. Once they would have been mere meaningless forms of speech; now she listened intently, and tried hard to understand. She did understand so far as to learn that there was every probability this session of the bill's passing the Commons, and being carried up to the House of Lords, where, upon a certain night, a certain number of noblemen, some biased one way or other by party motives, and a proportion voting quite carelessly, without any strong feeling at all in the matter, would decide her happiness and Bernard's for life.

It was a crisis so hard, a suspense so terrible, that perhaps it was as well this grief came to dull it a little. Not entirely. Even amidst his sorrow for his sister, Hannah could detect a nervous restlessness in Mr. Rivers's every movement; and every day, too, he sought eagerly for the newspaper, and often his hands actually trembled as he took it up, and turned at once to the parliamentary notices. But he never said one word to Hannah, nor she to him; indeed, this time they were never alone at all.

Adeline was to be buried at home, and Mr. Melville begged that Hannah would accompany Bertha, and take her place, with his wife's sisters and his own, at the funeral. Lady Rivers, in a note, asked the same, adding a cordial invitation that she should stay at the Moat House. Hannah looked at Bernard.

"Yes, go," he said; "I wish it. They are very grateful to you for your goodness to her. And I want you," he continued, in a low tone, "to try to be one of us—which you may be before very long."

This was all; but Hannah felt forced to obey, even though it cost her the first parting from her child. Only a three days' parting, however, and Bernard seemed so glad that she should go.

She, too, as she sat with the other three mourners—one in each corner of the silent railway carriage—and watched the soft rain falling on the fields and reddening hedges, under which, here and there, appeared a dot of yellow, an early primrose, she was conscious in her heart of a throb of hope responding to the pulses of the spring; and once, suddenly looking up at Bernard, she fancied he felt it too. It was nature, human nature; and human passion, suppressed but never crushed, waking out of its long sleep, and crying unto God to bless it with a little happiness, even as he blesses the reviving earth with the beauty of the spring.

Miss Thelluson's welcome at the Moat House, mournful as it was, was kind; for they had all been touched by her kindness to the dead, and sorrow strikes the tenderest chord in every heart. She had never liked Bernard's people so well, or been drawn to them so much, as during that quiet evening when poor Adeline's coffin rested a night under the Moat House roof, or the day after, when, with all the family, she followed it to its last resting-place.

It was a curious sensation. To stand as one of them—these Riverses, whom she loved not, at best merely liked—well aware how little they had ever liked her, and how ignorant they were of the tie which bound her to them. Guiltless as she knew herself to be, she was not without a painful feeling of deception, that jarred terribly upon her proud and candid spirit. She scarcely said a word to Bernard, until he whispered, "Do speak to me now and then, or they will think it so strange." But even then her words were formal and few.

She had meant to leave on the third day, for she yearned to be back with her darling; but fate came between. Sir Austin, long an invalid, and almost a nonentity in the family, passed, the night after his daughter's funeral, suddenly and unawares, into the silent dignity of death. When Hannah came down next morning it was to find the Moat House plunged once more into that decent, decorous affliction which was all that could be expected of them under the circumstances.

They begged her to stay a little longer, and she staid. There was a good deal to be done, and the ladies soon found out how well Miss Thelluson could do it. Also, not being a relative, she could see the visitors, and retail to the family the wide-spread sympathy expressed for it at Easterham, and for many miles round. "You are such a comfort to us," they said; and Bernard, whom his father's death seemed to affect more deeply than Hannah had expected, said, in his entreating eyes, "You are such a comfort to me." So what could she do but stay?

A few days more, and the Rivers vault was again opened; and Miss Thelluson stood beside it, with all the Rivers family except the new Sir Austin, of whom nobody spoke except the Easterham lawyer, who lamented confidentially to Hannah that Mr. Rivers should be kept out of his title, though it could not be for more than a few years. The hapless elder brother, whose mind grew weaker and weaker every day, though his body was strong enough, might at any time have some fit that would carry him off, and prevent his being an incumbrance longer.

"And then," whispered the lawyer, "Mr. Rivers will be Sir Bernard; and what a fine position he will hold!—one of the finest in the county. What a pity he has no heir!—only an heiress. But of course he will now marry immediately. Indeed, he owes it to his family."

Hannah listened, as she was now learning to listen—teaching her poor, mobile, conscious face the hardness of marble: her heart, too, if possible; for these torments, so far from lessening, would increase day by day. How should she ever bear them? She sometimes did not know.

The family had just come out of the study, where the will had been read, and were settling down to that strange quiet evening known in most households, when, the dead having been taken away and buried out of sight, the living, with an awful sense of relief as well as of loss, try to return to their old ways—eat, drink, and talk as usual. But it was in vain; and after a silent dinner Bernard went back to the examination of papers in the study. Thence he presently sent a message for help.

"I suppose that means Miss Thelluson," said Bertha, with a half laugh, which Lady Rivers gravely extinguished.

"Go, my dear. I dare say your brother-in-law finds you more useful to him than any one else." So Hannah went.

Bernard was sitting—his head in his hands. It was a white, woe-begone face that he lifted up to Hannah.

"Thank you for coming. I thought perhaps you might. I wanted comfort."

Hannah said a few commonplace but gentle words.

"Oh no, it is not that. I am not sorry my poor old father is away. It was his time to go. And for me, there will be one less to fight against, one less to wound."

He said the latter words half inaudibly—evidently not meaning her to hear; but she did, at least some of them. A wild, bitter answer came to her lips, but this was not the time to utter it. She merely replied by an offer of help, and sat down to fulfill it. He showed her what to do, and they went on working silently together for nearly half an hour.

But the extremes of human emotion are not so far apart as they seem. Keen and real as the young man's grief was, he was a young man still, and when the woman he loved sat beside him, with her sweet, grave look, and her calm, still manner, another passion than grief began to stir within him.

"Hannah," he cried, seizing her hand, "are you happy or miserable—as I am? or, which seems most likely, have you no feeling at all?"

She looked up. It was not a face of stone.

"Put your work away—what does it matter? Talk to me, Hannah. Think how long it is since you and I have had a quiet word together."

"Can I help that?"

"No—nor I. We are both of us victims—tied and bound victims in the hands of fate. Sometimes I think she will get the better of us, and we shall both perish miserably."

"That is a very melancholy view to take of things," said Hannah, half smiling. "Let us hope it is not quite true."

"My bright, brave-hearted woman! If I had you always beside me, I should not go down. It is being alone that sinks a man to despair. Still, suspense is very hard."

And then he told her what she had not been before aware of—that the bill had safely passed the House of Commons; that Lord Dunsmore and other peers, a rather strong party, hoped even in the House of Lords, which had hitherto always thrown it out, to get this year a sufficient majority to carry it through and make it the law of the land.

"And then, Hannah, we can be married—married immediately."

He gasped rather than uttered the words. Passion resisted had conquered him with double force.

"But—your own people?"

"They like you now—appreciate you, even as Lady Dunsmore does." (He did not see, and Hannah had not the heart to suggest, that perhaps it was in consequence of that appreciation.) "Besides, whether or not, they must consent. They can not go against me. My father has left every thing in my hands. I am, to all intents and purposes, the head of the family. It is that which makes me so anxious. Should the bill not pass— But it shall pass!" he cried, impetuously, "and then no power on earth shall prevent me from marrying the woman I choose—and that is you!"

"Strange, strange!" murmured Hannah, half to herself, and dropped her conscious face, and felt more like a girl than she had done for many years. For she had no duties to think of; her child was away, there was only her lover beside her. Her lover, wooing her with a reality of love, a persistent earnestness, that no woman could either question or mistake.

"You are not quite colorless, I see, my white lily. You will not always shrink back when I want to take you to my heart? You will creep in there some day, and make it feel warm again, instead of cold and empty and lonely, as it is now. Hannah, how soon, supposing the bill passes this month—how soon will you let me marry you?"

They were standing together by the fire, and Bernard had just put his arm round her. She turned toward him; she could not help it; it was so sweet to be thus loved. Hand in hand and eye to eye they stood for the moment, yielding to present joy and future hope, absorbed in one another, thinking of nothing beyond themselves, seeing and hearing nothing—when the door opened, and Lady Rivers stood right in front of them.

"Good Heavens!" she exclaimed, and started back as if she had trod on a snake.

They started back too—these guilty-innocent lovers. Instinctively they separated from one another; and then Bernard recovered himself.

Vexatious as the crisis was—though he looked as if he would have cut off his hand rather than have had it happened—still, now that it had happened, he was too much of a man not to meet it, too much of a gentleman not to know how to meet it decorously. He moved back again to Hannah's side and took her hand.

"Well, Lady Rivers, had you any thing to say to me?"

"Well, Bernard Rivers, and what have you to say for yourself? And what has this—this young woman—to say for herself, I should like to know?"

"If you mean Miss Thelluson, her answer is as brief as my own must be. It is now many months since she promised to be my wife as soon as our marriage can be lawfully carried out. In the mean time we are friends—close friends; and, as you may have observed, we also consider ourselves engaged lovers.—Hannah, do not distress yourself; there is no need."

And in the face of his step-mother he put his protecting arm round her—she was trembling violently—and drew her head on his shoulder.

There are some people whom to master you must take by storm. Hold your own, and they will let you have it; perhaps even respect you the more; but show the slightest symptom of weakness, and they will trample you into the dust. Bernard knew perfectly well with whom he had to deal, and took his measures accordingly.

Lady Rivers, utterly astounded, less perhaps by the fact itself than by the cool way in which Bernard had taken its discovery, simply stood and stared.

"I never knew any thing so dreadful; never in all my life. Excuse my intrusion. The only thing I can do is to leave you immediately."

She turned and quitted the room, shutting the door after her. Then, left alone with him, Hannah sobbed out her bitter humiliation upon Bernard's breast.

He comforted her as well as he could, saying that this must have happened some day; perhaps it was as well it should happen now; and that he did not much care. Still it was evident he did care; that he was considerably annoyed.

"Of course it increases our perplexities much; for our secret is no longer our own. In her wrath and indignation she will blab it out to the whole community, unless, indeed, family pride ties her tongue. But, anyhow, we can not help ourselves; we must brave it out. Come with me, Hannah."

"Where?"

Digitized by Google

"Into the next room, to face them all and tell the exact truth. Otherwise we may be overburdened with any quantity of lies. Come, my dear one. You are not afraid?"

"No." She had had all along a vague doubt that when it came to the point he would be ashamed of her and of his love for her. To find that he was not gave Hannah such comfort that she felt as if she could have walked barefoot over red-hot plowshares, like some slandered woman of the Middle Ages, if only she might find at the end of her terrible march Bernard's face looking at her as it looked now.

"Yes," she said, "I will come with you at once; for what is told must be told quickly. I can not stay another night in this house."

"You must, I fear," answered Bernard, gently, "Where would you go to? Not to mine?"

"Oh no, no; I can never go to your house any more."

And the cruel penalties of their position, the chains which bound them on all sides, began to be felt by both in a manner neither had ever felt before. To Hannah it seemed as if she were actually treading between those fiery plowshares, and she could not have steadied her steps but for Bernard's supporting hand.

She held to him, literally with the clinging grasp of a child, as they passed across the hall to where, in the fine old drawing-room, like a conclave of the Inquisition, the whole family were assembled.

Lady Rivers had evidently been explaining what she had just heard and seen. Astonishment was upon every face, and but for one accidental circumstance—the presence of Herbert Melville—there might have been a stronger feeling yet. But indecorum being the greatest dread, and prudence the principal characteristic, of the Riverses, they were obliged to restrain their wrath within the natural limits of an offended family which has just discovered that one of its members has made a matrimonial engagement without telling them any thing about it. Even Lady Rivers, with her widowed son-in-law standing by, was forced more than once to pause and alter her form of speech, dilating more on the wicked secrecy with which Bernard had planned his marriage than the sort of marriage he was about to make.

When the two culprits walked in, looking agitated enough, but still not exactly like culprits, she stopped.

"Let them speak for themselves, if they have the face to do it," cried she, dropping down in her chair, exhausted with vituperation. And then his sisters rushed to Bernard—some angry, some in tears—asking him how he could ever think of doing such a dreadful thing; with his father not yet cold in his grave—their poor, poor father, who would have shuddered at the thought of such a marriage.

It was a hard strait for a man to be in. That he felt it as acutely as so tender a heart could possibly feel was plain. He turned deadly pale; but still he never let go of Hannah's hand. She—for a moment she thought of breaking from him, and flying out of the house—any where—to the world's end—that she might save him from her and her fatal love. Then a wise resolution came—the determination, since he had chosen her, to stand by him to the last. By her child, too, for one implied both. Thinking of little Rosie, she was strong again, for no sense of guilt enfeebled her; all she was conscious of was misery—pure misery; and that was at least bearable. She sat down in the chair where Bernard had placed her, still holding him fast by the hand; the only being she had to hold to in the wide world now.

"Sisters," said he at last, speaking very quietly, but as firmly as he could, "what your mother has just found out I intended to have kept back from you till the law made my marriage possible. I knew how you would feel about it—as I felt myself once; but people's minds change."

"So it appears," said Lady Rivers, with a loud sneer. "Especially after living in the same house together—for months and months."

"Especially after living in the same house together, as you say," repeated Bernard, deliberately, though his cheek flamed furiously. "Living in a relation close enough to give us every opportunity of finding out one another's character, and of wishing the tie should be made closer still. I did not love her at first; not for a long time; but once loving her, I love her forever. What I do, I beg you all to understand, is done not hastily, but deliberately. Long before I ever said a word otherwise than brotherly to Miss Thelluson, or she had any suspicion of what my feelings were, my mind was made up. I shall marry her if I can, believing that, both for my own sake and my child's, it is the wisest second marriage I could make—and the most natural."

"Marry her! after living together as brother and sister—or whatever you choose to call it," cried Mrs. Morecamb. "Thomas dear, did you ever hear of any thing so shocking—so improper?"

"The law did not hold it improper," answered Bernard, in extreme irritation. "And, as I tell you, at first we had no idea of such a thing. It came upon me unawares. The law should not have placed me in such a position. But it will be broken soon, I trust. And until then you may all rest satisfied; Miss Thelluson will never again enter my house until she enters it as my wife. Then, sisters, whether you like her or not, you must pay her the respect due to a brother's wife, or else I am your brother no longer."

He had taken a high tone—it was wisest; but now he broke down a little. In that familiar home, with the familiar faces round him, two out of them just missing, and forever, it was hard to go against them all. And when—the gentlemen having prudently stepped out of the room—the women began sobbing and crying, lamenting over the terrible misfortune which had fallen on the family, things went very sore against Bernard.

"And supposing the bill you talk of does not pass, and you can not carry out this most unnatural, most indecent marriage," said Lady Rivers, "may I ask what you mean to do? To go abroad and get married there, as I hear some people do? though afterward, of course, they are never received in society again. Or, since ladies who can do such unlady-like things must have very easy consciences, perhaps Miss Thelluson will excuse your omitting the ceremony altogether."

Bernard sprang up furious. "If you had not been my father's wife, and my father only this day buried, you and I should never have exchanged another word as long as I lived. As it is, Lady Rivers, say one word more—one word against her—and you will find out how a man feels who sees the woman he loves insulted, even by his own relations. Sisters!"—he turned to them, almost entreatingly, as if in his natural flesh and blood he might hope to find some sympathy—"sisters, just hear me."

But they all turned away, including Bertha, whom poor Adeline had judged rightly as a mere coquette, and who evidently was not at all anxious that brothers-in-law, however convenient to flirt with, should be allowed to marry their deceased wives' sisters. She stood aloof, a pattern of propriety, beside the rest; and even made some sharp, ill-natured remark concerning Hannah, which Hannah heard, and lifted up reproachful eyes to the women whom she had been helping and comforting, and feeling affectionately to, all the week, but who now held themselves apart from her, as if she had been the wickedest creature living.

"You know that is untrue, Bertha. I was perfectly sincere in every word I uttered; but, as Mr. Rivers says, people's feelings change. I did not care for him in the least then—but I do now. And if he holds fast by me, I will hold fast by him in spite of you all."

Slowly, even mournfully, she said this; less like a confession of love than a confession of faith—the troth-plight which, being a righteous one, no human being has a right to break. They stood together—these two, terribly sad and painfully agitated, but still firm in their united strength—stood and faced their enemies.

For enemies, the bitterest any man can have—those of his own household—undoubtedly Bernard's sisters and their mother now were. It seemed hardly credible that this was the same family who, only a few hours ago, had wept together over the same open grave, and comforted one another in the same house of mourning. Now out of that house all solemnity, all tenderness had departed, and it became a house full of rancor, heart-burning, and strife.

Long the battle raged, and it was a very sore one. A family fight always must be. The combatants know so well each other's weak points. They can plant arrows between the joints of the armor, and inflict wounds from behind; wounds which take years to heal—if ever healed at all. Hannah could hardly have believed that any persons really attached to one another, as these were, could have said to one another so many bitter things within so short a time; such untrue things also, or such startling travesties of truth; such alterations of facts and misinterpretations of motives that she sometimes stood aghast and wondered if she had not altogether deceived herself as to right and wrong; and whether she were not the erring wretch they made her out to be. Only her—not him; they loved him; evidently they looked upon him as the innocent victim to her arts—the fly in the spider's web, glad of any generous kindred hand that would come and tear it down, and set him free. Unfortunate Bernard!

He bore it all for a good while—not, perhaps, seeing the whole drift of their arguments—till some chance speech opened his eyes. Then his man's pride rose up at once. He walked across the hearth, and once more took hold of Hannah's hand.

"You may say what you like about me; but if you say one word against her here, you shall repent it all your lives. Now this must end. I have heard all you have to say, and answered it. Sisters, look here. You may talk as much as you like, seeing you are my sisters, for ten minutes more"—and he laid his watch on the table, with that curious mixture of authority and good-humor which used to make them say Bernard could do any thing with any body. "After that you must stop. Every man's patience has its limits. I am the head of the house, and can marry whomsoever I choose; and I choose to marry Miss Thelluson, if I have to wait years and years. So, girls, you may as well make up your minds to it. Otherwise, when she is Lady Rivers—as one day she may be—you would find it a little awkward."

He half smiled as he spoke; perhaps he knew them well enough to feel sure that the practical rather than the sentimental side was the safest to take them on; perhaps, also, he felt that a smile was better than a furious word or a tear—and both were not far off, for his heart was tender as well as wroth; but the plan answered.

Lady Rivers gave the signal to retire. "For this night, Miss Thelluson, I suppose you will be glad to accept the shelter of our roof; but perhaps you may find it not inconvenient to leave us to-morrow. Until that desirable event, which Bernard seems so sure of, does take place, you will see at once that, with my unmarried daughters still under my charge—"

"It will be impossible for you to keep up any acquaintance with me," continued Hannah, calmly. "I quite understand. This good-night will be a permanent good-by to you all."

Lady Rivers bowed. But she was a prudent woman. It was a perfectly polite bow—as of a lady who was acting not so much of her own volition as from the painful pressure of circumstances.

Hannah rose, and tried to stand without shaking. Her heart was very full. The sense of shame or disgrace was not there—how could it be, with her conscience clear, and Bernard beside her?—but bitter regret was. She had been with his people so much of late that sorrow had drawn them closer to her than she had ever believed possible. Likewise they were his people, and she still tried to believe in the proverb that "blood is thicker than water."

"I have done you no harm—not one of you," she said, almost appealingly. "Nor your brother either. I only loved him. If we are ever married, I shall devote my life to him; if not, it is I that shall suffer. In any case, my life is sad enough. Do not be hard upon me, you that are all so happy."

And she half extended her hand.

But no one took it. Neither mother nor sisters gave one kind word to this motherless, sisterless woman, whom they knew perfectly well had done nothing wrong—only something foolish. But the foolishness of this world is sometimes higher than its wisdom.

"Good-night," said Bernard; "good-night, my dearest. You will find me waiting at the railway at eight o'clock to-morrow morning to take you direct to Lady Dunsmore's."

With a chivalric tenderness worthy of his old crusading ancestors—those good knights, pledged to Heaven to succor the distressed—he took Hannah by the rejected hand, kissed it before them all, led her to the door, and, closing it upon her, went back to his mother and sisters.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

COOKING and composing do not always harmonize. A genius for story-writing may not include a genius for dinner-getting. A very great musician was a most miserable housekeeper. Yet no one thinks it at all strange that Beethoven—in whose honor a grand musical festival was recently held at his birth-place on the Rhine—did not succeed as a cook. We laugh at his ludicrous failures, not because he failed, but because he attempted to do something "out of his sphere!" He was quite unfitted for the nice details of culinary matters, though the story is, that in a fit of angry dissatisfaction he discharged his housekeeper, and, declaring that cooking was not more difficult than composing, resolved to take care of his kitchen himself. Alas! he found that cooking, like other sublime arts, must be learned. Self-confident, he had invited guests to dinner. But at the appointed time nothing was ready, and Beethoven himself stood despairing in the midst of his kitchen pots and pans, fuming over his burned fingers and his far more seriously burned meat. The day following that remarkable dinner Beethoven, having concluded to devote his attention thereafter to music, recalled his cook. The moral is plain. All have not the same gifts. We do not expect a man to be excellent in a dozen different callings, but remember the adage, "A jack at all trades is good for none." But how with woman? If she sings charmingly, do we pardon her if she does not excel in plain sewing? If she knows how to express her thoughts in good language, is she not also expected to put her dinner upon the table in good style? If she keeps her house in order, does any body excuse her for not mending her boy's jacket? And if she is a first-class cook, a careful mother, and a neat housekeeper, does not some wise guest marvel that Mrs. B—— don't understand about the Corean expedition? Or, if she can talk and write intelligently upon the topics of the day, will not that same wise critic declare that wives and mothers should not delegate their duties to hired housekeepers?

An exchange states that Professor Hitchcock's geological surveying party have discovered one of the Twin Mountains, in New Hampshire, to be a solid mass of jasper.

That sudden going out of the gas one evening at Saratoga was an excellent idea. Sundry "sly flirtations" came to something definite in the confusion of darkness that followed. The exact number of engagements consequent has not yet been reported.

"A woman in love knows when her mind is made up; a man thinks he does"—so says—a man who knows, or "thinks he does."

"Explosions" are becoming amusements for the children. The latest invented toy is a small steamer, ingeniously constructed to explode by machinery, scattering the passengers in every direction.

Ice is more than abundant in New England. Ice-men on the Kennebec have only sold about one-third of their last winter's harvest.

Scott's manuscript was not in favor with the printers. He wrote in rapid, careless style, tossing it into the post without a second glance, and reserving all his corrections till he saw how it read in type. It is said that Dr. Lardner became half wild with the manuscript of his Scottish history. It was full of slips of the pen, of false grammar, of incomplete sentences, and of repetitions without end; and all these Scott corrected in his proofs, till the doctor, in sheer despair, had to set a clerk at work to copy out the manuscript and "make it read" before it was set.

We suppose it is almost a hopeless task to attempt to make adult persons more careful in the use of kerosene oil. Seldom, if ever, will an individual admit that he himself is careless. But perhaps the sad fate of poor little Matilda Rein may induce parents and others having the care of children to give them such instructions as will effectually prevent them from tampering with an article which is so often a dangerous explosive. Matilda was twelve years old, and was living in the family of a married sister in Port Jervis. One morning, about eleven o'clock, she kindled a fire in the kitchen preparatory to getting dinner. Her sister, who was in another part of the house, was startled, just before noon, by a tremendous report, which shook the entire house. Rushing into the kitchen, a horrible sight met her eyes. Her little sister was enveloped in a sheet of flame, uttering piercing and heart-rending screams, and running wildly about the room. She at once threw a piece of carpet about her, but before the fire was extinguished every vestige of clothing was burned off the unfortunate child, and her body from head to foot was one terrible blister. Her eyes were burned out, and the chords of her body contracted so that she was drawn up like a ball. A physician was summoned, but no human aid could benefit her. Notwithstanding her terrible condition, she lived in the most intense agony nearly three hours, when she died. No one saw what occasioned the explosion, but the ruptured kerosene can on the floor and the shattered stove showed plainly that she had attempted to hasten the progress of the fire by pouring the combustible stuff upon it.

A hotel in Cohoes has been christened the "Bret Harte House." We see it asserted that the decorations of the receiving-room of the House consist of a most charming and accurate delineation in fresco of that master-piece of Mr. Harte, the famed "Heathen Chinee."

Before the wedding, young ladies should introduce their pet dogs to their husbands that are to be. At a recent church wedding in London the bride's pet terrier obtained entrance in some way. When the groom administered the kiss the faithful animal seized him promptly.

According to one philosopher attached to the British Science Association, we are but improved monkeys; another traces man's pedigree back to the spawn of a fish; and a third is of the opinion that in some mysterious manner our ancestors were ejected from a wandering aerolite!

The "season" at sundry watering-places is over. Now comes a good time for those who have been staying at home to take a little trip. The rush being over, every thing will be more comfortable for all quiet-minded folks.

In Munich the government allows no couple to marry until it is assured that they possess the means of support. And it is not enough that the man is in good health, that he has a trade, and is a skillful workman; nor that the woman also is strong and willing to work. They must wait until they have actually earned enough to satisfy those in authority. The length to which this law, wise in its conception, is carried causes immense evil and sorrow.

A visitor to Peekskill a week or two ago saw, sitting on a window-sill of Henry Ward Beecher's country-seat, a Maltese cat, which he supposed to be the famous "Hoosier Cat," whose biography has been extensively read. Another chapter of that cat's biography would be appreciated. How does Tabby enjoy her Eastern life?

A touching occurrence has just taken place at the little village of Longburton, in Dorsetshire, England. The curate was engaged to marry the only child of the vicar. He was taken ill, and the marriage-service, at his earnest wish, was celebrated by special dispensation as he lay on his death-bed. The day after his burial was to have been that of his marriage. The wedding-cake, which had been provided, was cut at his funeral. The coffin, of polished oak, handsomely ornamented, was placed in the drawing-room, having upon it a purple and white pall, upon which was placed an exquisitely beautiful heart-shaped garland of lilies, orange blossoms, and other delicate flowers. In the centre was a small cross, similarly composed. The mourners wore white crape hat-bands, those who preceded the body white silk hat-bands, and all, including the bearers, white kid gloves. A hymn was sung in the church, and another in the church-yard after the coffin, with its floral ornaments, had been lowered into the grave.

Ireland seems in a fair way to educate her children. Last year there were in operation no less than 6806 public schools, with the names of 998,999 children on the lists, and an average daily attendance of 359,199 pupils.

At Hempstead Plains—Mr. A. T. Stewart's new city—there are fifty thousand trees growing finely on the various avenues and streets. A plot of ground containing about sixty acres is reserved near the great hotel for a park.

The exploration of ruins in the environs of Paris is fraught with sadness. The forests around Meudon are filled with articles of household furniture, thrown there by Prussians who occupied houses in the vicinity. Not long ago the following scene occurred in a ruined garden at Meudon. A group of ladies, armed with iron hooks like those used by the chiffonniers of Paris, were probing the rubbish left by the burning of the house which had stood there. Covered with dust and plaster, and stooping low beneath the scorching sun, they turned over each heap of débris with the utmost care. They had been searching thus for some time, when suddenly a loud cry proceeded from one of the ladies, who had drawn forth some object which must have been very precious in her eyes, for she sank upon a stone, overcome with emotion, and placing the treasure on her knees, rocked it to and fro, kissing it with fervor and sobbing aloud. The treasure thus brought to light was the charred and mutilated bust of a very little child. This being found, the ladies ceased their search, and walked in silence toward the road.

In Yeddo, the capital of Japan, it is estimated that there are over three thousand pupils who are receiving an English education.

The census of Japan shows a population of 34,785,951. The males exceed the females by about 400,000.

A mammoth whale recently [illegible] lation, and was strand[ed] near San Francisco.—FRONT. ing advant[ageously] sketched. See Supplement, No. XL., Figs. 39-41.

Digitized by Google

Insertion and Edging, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 596.

dging are suitable for trimming lingerie, wrap- ach a strip of straight netting of suitable width. the netted strip on both sides in point d'esprit, ved figures in twisted stitch (point de minute) insertion as shown by the illustration, and work which threads resting loosely on the netted foun- hed previously, in button-hole or twisted stitch. ne larger part of the foundation in point de toile, in point de reprise, and button-hole stitch the he netted foundation underneath the button-hole

Lace and Crochet Edging.

See illustration on page 597.

this lace is formed of a row of linen point lace

MISE WITH EMBROIDERED YOKE.
cription see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 27-30.

worked with twisted crochet cotton, No. 80. chet gimp like that shown by Fig. 8 on page No. 32, Vol. III., and sew it to the point lace illustration. Then crochet on the other side as follows: 1st round.—1 sl. (slip stitch) on 2 ch. (chain stitch), 1 sl. on the next eye, xt eye of the which is work- e loop on the the next eye; und.—8 7 sc. e next 7 st. g round, 3 sc. as widening by he next 3 st.; 2d and 4th only; on the sc. worked on and work 3 sc. r, work 1 sc. on * 2 sc., sepa-

NIGHT-GOWN.
tion see Supplement, gs. 13-17.

'1 st., on the next l 1 sc. on the first 2 st., 1 sc. on the , 1 sc. on the third ch must come ey- r of a point, and 1 p., 1 sc. on the p., pass over 2 st., Work on the wrong r to keep the pleats right position, one dy 1 sc. on the sc. he hollow between e and Crochet KE, Figs. 1-3.

on page 597.

ded in the e back; it chet gimp, point lace he manner et gimp is age 500 of 2, Vol. III. of linen one Supplement, e lace braid ...ertly round... and shown ...n sew the ...

LADY'S NIGHT-GOWN.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 8*, 9*-12.

LINEN NIGHT-CAP.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Fig. 52.

NIGHT-CAP WITH EMBROIDERED STRIPS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVIII., Figs. 57-59.

NIGHT-CAP WITH RUCHE TRIMMING.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 53 and 54.

CHEMISE WITH EMBROIDERY AND LACE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 31-33.

CAMBRIC DRESSING SACQUE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 6*, 6*, and 7.

MUSLIN DRESSING SACQUE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-5.

NIGHT-CAP WITH LACE TRIMMING.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 55 and 56.

DIMITY NIGHT-GOWN.
For pattern and description see Supplement No. V., Figs. 18-22.

Needle-work Edging for Lingerie.

See illustration on page 597.

THIS needle-work edging, which is especially adapted for trimming underwaists and morning dresses, consists of a scalloped strip of Swiss muslin, on both sides of which a piece of point lace braid is button-hole stitched. The point lace braid at the under scalloped edge is bordered with loops in close button-hole stitch. The eyelet-holes, which are also button-hole stitched, are filled with small wheels worked with fine twisted cotton.

Crochet Edging worked Cross-Wise.

See illustration on page 597.

THIS edging is worked crosswise with twisted crochet cotton, No. 100. Make a foundation of 56 st. (stitches), and on this crochet the 1st round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on the foundation st. before the last, then always alternately 8 ch. (chain stitch), with these pass over 4 foundation st., 1 sc. each on the following 2 foundation st., 12 ch. at the end of the round. Turn the work. 2d round.—2 sc. on the next ch. scallop of the preceding round, then always alternately 8 ch., 2 sc. on the next braid and gimp together without passing the needle through the linen. Join the yoke thus formed along the middle at the front, and fasten the edges on the under side. The straight trimming strip for the sleeves is made in a similar manner. The illustration of Point Lace and Crochet Edging, Fig. 3, described in the previous article, shows a full-sized section of the lace. The yoke can also be made of the foundation shown by Fig. 3.

Knitted and Crochet Insertion.

See illustration on page 597.

THIS insertion is knitted and crocheted with tatting cotton, No. 60, and crochet cotton, No. 80. First work the open-work strips at the outer edge of the insertion as follows: For each strip work with tatting cotton and medium-sized steel knitting-needles a foundation of 2 st. (stitch), and on this work the 1st round.—Lay the thread on the needle, sl. 1 st. (that is, slip one stitch), 1 k. (knit plain), and draw the slipped stitch over; turn the work. 2d round.—Lay the thread on the needle, sl. 1 st., knit 1 st. from the thread thrown over of the preceding round, draw the sl. over, and turn the work. Continue in this manner. After working two such strips, crochet on the loops at one side of each strip always alternately 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the next eye, 2 ch. (chain stitch). On the loops at the other side of one strip crochet one round of leaflets as follows: * 1 sc. on the next two loops of the strip (pass the needle through each of these loops from the front, so that they appear to be wound around each other, as shown by the illustration), then twice alternately 5 ch. and 1 short treble crochet on the first of the ch.; repeat from *. On the free loops of the second knitted strip work a similar round, in doing this, however, crochet between every two leaves 1 sl., so as to come between every two leaves of the other strip, as shown by the illustration. The insertion may be made of coarser cotton to be used for borders for coverlets, pillow-slips, etc.

LADY'S CHEMISE OPEN ON THE SHOULDER.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 25-26.

Digitized by Google

ch. scallop, 12 ch. at the end of the round. Then turn the work. Like this last round work as many rounds as are required for the length of the edging. On the under edge of the lace work 1 round of scallops, inserting a strand of cotton of eight threads at the same time. For each scallop crochet on the thread foundation and on the ch. scallop at the same time 1 sc., 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 7 dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc. 2d round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the 7th st. of the next scallop of the preceding round, 5 ch. 2d round.—On each scallop of the preceding round work 5 sc., 3 p. (picots) each of 4 ch. and 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the first of the 4 ch., then 5 sc. on the same scallop. On the upper edge of the lace work always alternately 1 sl. on the 5th st. of the next ch. scallop, 5 ch. This edging can, of course, be made in any width desired.

Crochet Insertion worked Crosswise.

See illustration on page 597.

This insertion is suitable for trimming lingerie, and is worked with fine or coarse twisted crochet cotton, according to the purpose for which it is designed. Make a foundation of 34 ch. (chain stitch), and, going backward on this, crochet the 1st round.—On the 8th and 9th stitches of the foundation (counting from the end) 1 dc. (double crochet) each, then * 1 leaflet as follows: 6 ch., 1 sc. (short treble crochet) on the second, 1 tc. (treble crochet) on the first of the 6 ch., and work these two stitches off together with a loop on the needle. With this leaflet pass over 4 foundation st. (stitch), 3 dc., separated each by 1 ch. and an interval of 1 st. on the next foundation st.; repeat once from *; 1 leaflet like the former, 2 dc. on the first two foundation st., 7 ch., and turn the work. 2d round.—2 dc. on the last two dc. of the preceding round, * 1 leaflet, 3 dc., separated each by 1 ch. on the ch. between and after the 3 dc. of the preceding round; repeat once from *; 1 leaflet, 2 dc. on the next 2 dc. of the preceding round, 7 ch., and turn the work. Work in this manner, constantly repeating the 2d round, until the insertion is of the length desired. Then finish it with two rounds worked lengthwise on each side; for the first of these rounds work always alternately 1 sc. on each ch. scallop, and 5 ch.; for the second round work dc., separated each by 1 ch. and an interval of one stitch.

Point Lace and Crochet Insertion.

See illustration on page 597.

For this insertion take two pieces of point lace braid of the requisite length. On one side of each piece of braid crochet one round of always alternately 4 tc. (treble crochet), which are all worked off together, drawing the thread through once, and 7 ch. (chain stitch). Then lay the pieces of braid side by side so that the free edges come together, and join them with two rounds worked in a similar manner. For the first of these rounds work * 4 tc. worked off in 1 st. on the edge of the first piece of braid, 7 ch., 4 similar tc. on the edge of the other piece (observing the illustration), 7 ch., and repeat from *. In working the second of these rounds each ch. scallop of the preceding round must be crossed by crocheting after each 4 tc. always 3 ch., 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop of the preceding round, and 3 ch.

ÉCRU CRÊPE DE CHINE OVER-SKIRT.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 46-47.

CASHMERE OVER-SKIRT.

ALGERIENNE OVER-SKIRT.

Cashmere Over-Skirt.

This over-skirt is of black cashmere, trimmed with black silk fringe and coarse black silk cord. To make the over-skirt slope off the front and both side breadths toward the top. For the back breadth cut a longer straight piece of the material. Both side edges of this piece are gathered and then joined with the side breadths. Gather the top of the over-skirt and set it into a binding of double material an inch wide. Trim the over-skirt as shown by the illustration, sew tabs trimmed in a similar manner to the sides of the over-skirt, and drape it with coarse silk cord.

Ecru Crêpe de Chine Over-Skirt.

This over-skirt is made of ecru crêpe de Chine, trimmed with a fold two inches wide, and lace of the same color two inches and a half and an inch wide. For the over-skirt cut from Figs. 44 and 47, Supplement, one piece each, and from Figs. 45 and 46 two pieces each. For the back under part cut two straight pieces, each twenty-six inches long and twenty-three inches wide, which are joined with each other at one side. Sew Figs. 44 and 45 together from 22 to 23, and Figs. 46 and 47 from 26 to 27, trim all the pieces as shown by the illustration, and arrange Figs. 45–47 in pleats, bringing each × on ●. Bind the side edge of Fig. 45 with a bias strip. Join Fig. 46 from 24 to 25 with the back under part of the over-skirt, gather the upper edge of the latter to suit the width of Figs. 46 and 47, and then sew the over-skirt into a binding of double material an inch wide, which is closed at the left side with hooks and eyes. In doing this the back of the over-skirt must overlap the side piece, Fig. 45, so that 24 comes on 24. Finally, fasten a string of the requisite length to each under corner of Fig. 45. In adjusting the over-skirt these strings are tied under the back breadth at the middle of the back.

Algerienne Over-Skirt.

OVER-SKIRT of black and white striped Algerienne. Black lace trimming. To make this over-skirt cut the back breadths straight, and arrange them in double box-pleats at the top. Slope off the front toward the top, pleat the sides of the front like the illustration, and join it with the back breadths. Basques, consisting of two bias pieces of material joined by lace insertion, are set on the back of the skirt. Trim the over-skirt as shown by the illustration, and sew the upper edge into a binding of double material an inch wide.

SILK OVER-SKIRT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 48-51.

HOW NATIONALITIES GROW OLD.

NATIONALITIES have a specialty as to how they grow old, and I believe in my heart Irishmen are not inferior in this respect to any. A Frenchman can not do it at all. In the first place, he will not accept the march of time, but resists it like an enemy he is determined to conquer; and by certain appliances of false whiskers and cosmetics, and a forced energy of spirit, and a supercharge of levity, he fancies that he has achieved the deception that has only succeeded with himself, and made others believe he is as young as he wishes to imagine himself. It is not easy to say how a German grows old, for he is never young. The beer-bemuddlement of centuries is in the blood of the race, and their very childhood is dreary, fog-surrounded, and misty. The gnarled complexity of their uncolloquial language impresses silence on a race who would need the impetuous ardor of the South to clear the barriers of their terrible compounds, and those rough gutturals that suffice to them for expressions of passion.

Italians grow old gracefully enough. They have less of the levity that offends us in the Frenchman, and though dignified, have none of that pomposity which an Englishman occasionally assumes, as though to make believe that it is a matter of choice and not of necessity that he is white-haired and large-waisted, solemn of gait and grave of utterance.

I am not sorry to be able to speak of the Irishman as of another nationality, and to say why I think he meets years in a better spirit than most men. First of all, that large stock of genuinity which supplied high spirits in youth subsides by time into a species of humoristic pleasantry, sufficiently dashed by fancy to be brilliant, and enough matured by experience to avoid the impertinence of levity. Few men go through life more enjoyably, and, in consequence, few men's experiences are less darkened by discouraging impressions of their neighbors, or by that distrust of humanity, in the man, which shows itself in great depression or melancholy.

Fig. 2.—TRICOT BEAVER SACQUE.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 38-41.

Fig. 1.—TRICOT BEAVER SACQUE.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 38-41.

Digitized by Google

THE LILY-BUD.

I HADN'T seen their baby yet,
And I didn't dare to go;
For Andrew and me were at daggers' p'ints—
We'd quarreled about a hoe.
It was the most ridic'lous thing,
And neither one wa'n't right;
But he was a perfect mule, and I
Jest wouldn't give in a mite.

And so it went on, from week to week,
Till bimeby 'twas a year;
And the way we'd twisted and turned to keep
From speakin' was ruther queer.
We used to go through each other's fields,
A-drawin' coal or lime;
And now 'twas kind o' tormentin' work
To go round every time.

I was determined to stick it out,
And gloried in my pluck;
But I didn't seem to have, that year,
My usual run of luck.
The cattle died with a new disease,
And the bugs got into the wheat:
I swear, it comes ruther tough on a man
When he can't raise enough to eat!

Andrew he had his losses too;
Of course it wa'n't my fault;
But we kind o' suspected each other, you know,
Of throwin' pisened salt.
And all 'bout what? Jest nothin' at all:
I could punch myself for a fool;
But they say when the devil gets into a man
You needn't send him to school.

Huldy was all the sister I had,
And I loved her hearty enough
(Some love, like gold, is refined away,
But the purest is in the rough),
And when I heard of her little one,
Though I acted the reg'lar bear,
I'll be hanged if my heart didn't give me the lie
When I said I didn't care.

I forbid my Sue to go, even then;
But 'twa'n't of no consequence,
For I ketched her time and time agen
A-climbin' their medder fence.
I don't know why I didn't storm,
But I wouldn't pertend to see,
Although I was riled in the inner man,
And she know'd it as well as me.

Time passed on, and I heard her say
The child was amazin' cute.
"Any smarter 'n others?" I thought;
But I kept confounded mute.
I wa'n't to be trapped in that sort o' way,
And I buckled my wrath up tight;
And, woman-like, she understood,
And kind o' sighed at the sight.

From that very time—I can't explain—
But a feelin' got hold o' me
(If I'd seen the same in a woman, I'd said
'Twas pure curiosity),
A desperate longin' to see that child.
It bothered me in my sleep;
And, at last, I'll be blamed if I didn't go there
On the sly, and risk takin' a peep.

Andrew had gone, and Huldy was out
At work in her dairy yet;
And I tiptoed in as mean as a dog,
And lifted the skeeter net.
It lay with its sweet hands on its breast—
My! I can't give you no idee;
But it seemed like an angel from heaven had dropped
A lily-bud down to me.

I trembled all over: you see I forgot
That a man must be strong and brave;
And I thought of the one that years ago
I had follered away to her grave;
And while I was thinkin' it opened its eyes,
And reached out its arms, and smiled;
And I hugged it close, for I verily b'lieved
'Twas my own little angel child.

All of a sudden—I never knew how—
There was Andy and Huldy and Sue,
And the women were cryin' and kissin' me so
I was puzzled to see my way through;
When Andy spoke up, with a shake in his voice,
"Come, give us your hand, old boy;"
And we clinched with a grip that we'll never regret,
And there wasn't no end to the joy.

MY PROPHET.

"STAY to tea; do," said Aunt Desire, with that ridiculous hospitality of hers that would fain share her salt with every creature that comes to the house. "It's Sadi's birthday, and we ought to celebrate it in some way."

"Do you still count birthdays, Sadi?" said Mrs. Obenreiser.

"Certainly. This is the twenty-sixth."

"Hush, my dear, speak low. You look very young still; you need not own to more than twenty-two for some years."

"Why should I hide it?"

"One would think you desired nothing better than to be an old maid, staying at home all the time, rocking your mother's babies, and tying yourself down as if you were already a married woman, or never meant to be one."

"Perhaps I don't."

"That ain't natural. Of course you want to get married, but you never will unless you go half-way. I've been married twice, and nothing to boast of in the way of looks. I didn't run after the men; but if they wanted to find me, I did not wear out their patience looking for me. If a girl is an old maid, it's her own fault: that's my doctrine."

"I have never seen any one in this place that I like better than my brothers and sisters."

"Make visits, then. Go out of this place."

"But if I have no invitations—"

"Well, at least you could go huckleberrying into the next town."

I laughed, and yielded that point willingly. Aunt Desire had knit into the middle of her seam-needle by this time, and now laid down the stocking. She then took off her glasses, wiped them, and smoothed down her apron. As she never did but one thing at a time, these were well-known signs that she was about to give us "a piece of her mind."

"I'm an old maid, as every body knows, and perhaps my doctrine would not have so much weight as a woman's that had been married twice; but seventy years will gather some wisdom, if only by rubbing against people so long. My doctrine is that it is no use running round after a beau. You may get one that way, but he won't stick, or won't be good for any thing if he does. If a girl has a husband waiting for her any where in the world, he'll most likely find her sooner or later. The men who are best worth having don't look for their wives in public places, when they have on their best bibs and tuckers. They like to surprise a girl with a duster in her hand or a baby brother in her lap. It has more effect on them than fluttering a fan and making eyes at them all day."

"Men were more sensible in your young days," said Mrs. Obenreiser.

"Not a bit. They are always sensible enough if women don't spoil them."

"Do you think every woman can marry if she chooses, Aunt Desire?"

"To be sure. I should have married years ago if I had had time; but I was always so deep in other folks' troubles that I could not give my mind to it."

"Tell us about it," said Mrs. Obenreiser.

"What?" said Aunt Desire, with a touch of that complacence which every woman shows when she counts her scalps.

"The last offer."

"Oh, that was this winter, when I went to New Bedford. (Susan's children had the measles, and she sent for me.) Her husband's father lived with them, a fine old gentleman, smart as a cricket (only Susan says he does have the rheumatism awfully); and maybe he liked the way I tended the children, for he asked me all of a sudden one day to marry him. I confess that I thought for just a minute how nice my tombstone would look with 'Mrs. Desire So-and-So, beloved wife of So-and-So' on it; but then I thought of that worthy woman who lived with him so many years here, and perhaps is waiting for him now in the other world."

"What did you tell him, aunt?"

"I told him I would have had him in a minute, if he had only thought of it fifty years sooner."

"But you didn't know him so long ago, did you?"

"Oh yes, I did, and I had no thought of tombstones then." A rosy flush spread over Aunt Desire's sunken cheeks, and took at least twenty years from her age for one instant.

"Now tell us about the first offer," said Mrs. Obenreiser.

"That was the first—and last," said Aunt Desire, laughing at Mrs. Obenreiser's expectant face till the tears ran down her cheeks.

"You have proved my doctrine, that a girl does wrong to tie herself down through all her best years."

"No, I have only proved that every woman has at least one chance to marry."

"If Sadi's chance does not come till she is seventy, it might as well not come at all."

"I don't think so," said Aunt Desire, with a faint, sweet smile, that reminded me of the perfume of flowers long pressed in a book. "Let Sadi sit in her chimney-corner, and make smooth the way for my old feet and the little ones to tread. She is fitting herself to be a good woman, which is a better thing (because less selfish) than a good wife. Her lover will come some time."

"I wonder how he will look?" said I.

"If he is the right man," said Aunt Desire, "he should have light hair and blue eyes, because yours are black. He must be of a hopeful and sanguine temper, because you are inclined to look on the dark side."

"If he comes with a glass slipper in his hand, you will be the fairy godmother," said I.

"The prince did not come," said Mrs. Obenreiser, "till the godmother had taken Cinderella to the ball. He didn't see her first in her chimney-corner."

"O thou of little faith!" said Aunt Desire. "Sadi's lover is to be thrown from his horse, or more likely his carriage, in front of this house, and brought in on a board and laid at her feet. When he opens his eyes and looks into hers, full of sublime pity and sympathy—"

"The rest of this story is to be found in the next number," said I, suddenly, putting out Aunt Desire's prophetic fire. "Matrimony is the one god of women, and you are its prophet."

When Mrs. Obenreiser was gone, Aunt Desire sat a long time smiling over her knitting.

"Fifty years was a long time to wait," I said, after a while.

"I was not waiting at all. I was hard at work all the time. I had my little disappointment, and buried it decently, and from that time I took more interest in men's wives than in themselves. Those few pleasant weeks, when the sight of my wrinkled face began to stir up the embers of his old regard for me, were a sort of reward of merit—something to make a little glow in my heart when I thought of it, but it was a free gift from above, not asked for nor expected."

"Have you had a happy life, Aunt Desire?"

"Yes, Sadi. If I had it to do over again, I don't know that I would alter a single thread; but I suffered a good deal because of people like Mrs. Obenreiser—as you do, Sadi."

"I'm glad of it. I thought myself the only girl that ever was silly enough to mind it."

"All women mind it. It is a vulgar cruelty, that has driven many a girl into an unhappy marriage; but don't think of it. Go and cut the birthday cake, and, above all things, don't pity yourself. Remember what you read to me about Catherine II.—she was too proud to be unhappy."

"I am not unhappy!" I said, with some scorn.

"I know you are not now, but it is a very fascinating habit to fall into."

After the cake had been cut and eaten, and all the children laid away for the night, some thoughts came back to me that always made me blush. I did not need Mrs. Obenreiser to suggest that it was time for me to marry, if I meant to do so at all, only my own thought had not taken precisely that form. I hungered and thirsted for a love that should be wholly mine—not shared with a dozen others. I had enough to do in my orphaned family to occupy all my best years, but the sore spot, which Mrs. Obenreiser was always probing, was the fact that no one had ever shown the least sign of love to me out of my own kindred.

Aunt Desire's confession was my first intimation that other girls suffered in the same way. I had been so thoroughly ashamed of the feeling that I thought it must be something new under the sun. Continually I said to myself, at such times, "I don't want to marry; that isn't it at all; I only want somebody to say 'I love you' as if he meant it."

Even our little baby, four years old, had her little nettle ready to sting me.

"What is an old maid?" she asked one day.

"A happy woman," said Aunt Desire.

"Why?" asked I.

"'Cause I heard Tom tell Mr. Justin that Aunt Desire was an old maid, and you were going to be. I guess it's nice. I will be one too."

"How long do people keep up that sort of talk about a girl?" I said to Aunt Desire.

"They kept it up with me till I was about forty?"

"And I am twenty-six—only fourteen years!"

"Just the time that Jacob courted Rachel, and it seemed to him but one day, for the love that he bore her. I wonder how long it seemed to her? But you are prettier than I ever was. You may count on at least five years more."

We had a busy spring that year; the children seemed to have outgrown all their clothes in a body. They could not spare me five minutes in the day wherein to be disconsolate if my heart had been set upon it never so much. I went out for a walk the first warm day, and as I entered the gate on my return I saw an unusual commotion about the house. The front-door stood open, and the doctor was just going in, while the faces of neighbors appeared at different windows.

"Oh! what is it?" I asked, breathlessly.

"He has had his hand torn on the wheel, but it won't be fatal!"

"Who? Who?"

"Your brother Tom. He went into the factory, and was careless; that's all."

It was enough, I thought, as I rushed up stairs, and saw Aunt Desire with Tom's head in her lap, and the crushed hand held upright to stop the bleeding. The doctor was watching for the faintness to go off before beginning his work.

"I shall need two to help me," he said, "and the rest of you must go down stairs, and keep the house perfectly quiet."

"I was with him when it happened," said Mr. Justin. "Will you take me?"

"You'll do," said the doctor. "Now another." But the people had scattered at the first word, leaving Aunt Desire and me standing together.

"I want Sadi," said Tom, faintly.

"You look delicate," said the doctor. "It will need steady nerves."

"She ain't delicate," retorted Tom. "She's strong as a horse. I won't have any body else. You can stand it, can't you, Sadi?"

"Yes, Tom."

"Stand here, then, and hold the elbow still as death. If the boy keeps up that spirit, he'll live through this and a great deal more."

The first five minutes were easy enough; but when the red stream poured out in great gushes my own blood seemed to gather about my heart, and for half an instant my head swam.

"Steady!" said the doctor, in a warning tone.

"Look straight at me," said Mr. Justin; "don't look down at all."

We were both bending forward over the hand. I met his eyes as they were within a few inches of mine, and clutched them, so to speak, as if they were the anchor that held me to consciousness. It may have been hours, or only minutes, that I stood rigid in this way.

"Well done, Sadi," said the doctor at last; and I saw only a neat bundle of bandages at the end of Tom's arm, lying on a cushion.

While Mr. Justin was bathing Tom's head I went into the next room and leaned my face against the cool wall. A sudden rain of tears blinded me, and had the same effect as a shower upon overcharged air. In another minute I should have been ready to go through the same strain over again.

"You need not cry; he will do well," said Mr. Justin, speaking very gently beside me; "and you were braver than I thought a woman could be."

"I was not brave at all; I only strained my will; and this is the way I get over it. Women cry for a great many reasons besides grief."

"Do they? I know very little of their ways."

"I could not have gone through it but for your help. I thank you very much."

He smiled and held out his hand, giving mine a cordial shake, as if I were a man, somehow, to whom he had taken a fancy.

"I will come back in the evening, and watch with Tom." Then he went away, and I am afraid I thought far oftener in the next hour of the way that rare smile lighted up Mr. Justin's plain face than of poor Tom's trouble. For Mr. Justin's face was exceedingly plain: at first sight it seemed all of one color—hair, skin, eyes, and eyebrows of a uniform yellowish-gray, a second look detected the line between hair and forehead. A peculiarly well-shaped mouth and exquisite teeth were the only redeeming traits about it.

The rarity of his smile proved that he had no vanity.

Tom's hand had to be examined and rebandaged every day for many weeks. Mr. Justin assisted when he was in the house, which was very often, but sometimes Tom would have no one but myself. He exacted more attention than a baby.

One day we were both busy with him, when Mrs. Obenreiser was allowed to make her first call on our patient. After the first inquiries I saw the arch look that was so disagreeable to me gathering in her face, and tried to make my escape, but Tom held my hand, and would not let it go.

"Aunt Desire's prophecy almost came true; did it not, Sadi? only it was a brother instead of a lover that was brought in on a board and laid at your feet. What a pity!" said Mrs. Obenreiser.

"What's all that about?" said Tom, while Mr. Justin lifted his eyebrows.

"Some of Aunt Desire's nonsense; that's all," said I.

"But I want to know. Sadi needn't be having any lovers. I want her myself. Have you got a lover, Sadi?"

"No, no, Tom; don't be silly."

"Well, I knew nobody but women ever came to see you."

I felt rather than saw Mr. Justin's amusement at this home truth.

"Your aunt thinks that Sadi will get a husband just as quickly if she sits in the chimney-corner tending the baby and mending your stockings all the time as she would if she went about and enjoyed herself like other girls."

"I agree with Aunt Desire," said Mr. Justin.

"Oh, indeed! Perhaps you are like those very sensible men that she knew in her youth, who looked for nothing but solid qualities in their wives?"

"I hope so," said Mr. Justin, looking straight and serious into Mrs. Obenreiser's mocking face. I looked up at him gratefully, and his face grew suddenly bright with that rare smile. It was as if the sun had all at once flashed through red curtains into a dull, empty room. He looked absolutely handsome for the first time.

"Then Sadi would do for you excellently," said Mrs. Obenreiser.

"Come, now," said Tom, "that's going it a little too steep. Sadi hasn't been married twice, if you have, and she has some delicate feelings left."

Mrs. Obenreiser was going to be very angry, but Mr. Justin said, gently, "A sick boy has privileges," and the storm blew over.

I had become accustomed by this time to Mr. Justin's quiet way of always stepping into the breach at the critical moment. He spoke very little at any time, and usually to break some awkward pause in the conversation; but his mere presence in a room gave me a restful sense of security.

In spite of his own perfect self-possession, I could not meet him with quite the same freedom after Mrs. Obenreiser's call as I did before. Tom grew better, and Mr. Justin's visits became less frequent—the idea which had begun to suggest itself to my mind that part of them was meant for me was nipped in the bud. I blushed more than ever over my innermost thoughts. Two years before we had placed Tom in the counting-room of a factory in which Mr. Justin was book-keeper.

Tom had immediately conceived a boyish passion for him, and of course I had heard his praises every day. I had never met him, except for a brief introduction in the street, until Tom's accident made us intimate friends.

It seemed to me we must always be that, we had so many thoughts in common. I was not in love yet, or at least if I were, the feeling wore a different face from that which I had looked for.

"I haven't seen you for three days," said Tom to him, fretfully. "By-and-by you won't come at all. I have tired you out."

"No, my boy, you are better now, and I find I can not quite stand the night-work."

"Night-work! What do you mean?"

"Of course, if I spend so many hours here, I have to make it up some time."

"Oh, forgive me," said Tom; "I will never ask you to come again. Will you, Sadi?"

"Not unless he likes it," I stammered.

"I like it too well," said Mr. Justin, in a very low voice.

"What's that you said?" said Tom.

"Nothing worth repeating, Tom. I will come again soon," said Mr. Justin, and he went away at once.

A few minutes after I went into Aunt Desire's sitting-room, and found Mr. Justin standing on the hearth-rug before her in a very dejected attitude. For once his upright, cheerful mask (if it were one) seemed to have fallen away from him.

"I thought you were gone," said I, in some confusion.

"I thought so myself; but I needed some advice on a very knotty point, and as I passed your aunt's door she looked as if she could give it."

"Did you leave Tom alone? I will go to him," said Aunt Desire, leaving us alone in a barefaced way altogether unworthy of her principles.

"Oh dear!" I thought; "you are worse than Mrs. Obenreiser;" and it must have been five long minutes before Mr. Justin seemed to see the necessity of saying something. I made two or three careful speeches in the time, to which he paid no sort of attention.

"You are quite certain that you would not want me to come here unless it is my own wish to do so?" he said at last, in a very slow, formal way.

"Yes," I said, with a little trembling.

Digitized by Google

"You have made up your mind to wait for that lover who is to be brought in on a board and laid at your feet?"

"That does not follow at all."

"Does it not?"

His eyes seemed to take a distinct color for once as I met them then, and he made a step forward.

"Oh, Sadi, you must come quick. Tom has been flouncing about, and the bandage is loose," said Nettie, the baby, rushing in between us, with mouth and eyes wide open.

I went at once to Tom, and heard Mr. Justin's step on the gravel-walk, and a click of the gate a moment after.

Well, at least, if he never came back again, I could live a long time on that strange look in his eyes, and the sudden movement, as if he had been tempted to take me in his arms.

I had not to wait long. He came again in the evening, and we sat with Tom as we had so often done before. With half a glance at me, he said he had found a letter at his office that afternoon which would call him out of town for a week, and perhaps a fortnight. After that Tom would not part with him till the last moment.

At ten o'clock I went down to the door with him, and he drew me out on the piazza. The still starlight somehow convinced me, as I felt the touch of Mr. Justin's arm, that I truly loved this plain man, and, if need be, I could wait fifty years for him to tell me of it.

"Sadi, I must ask you before I go away for an uncertain time."

"Oh, Mr. Justin, where are you going?" called out a little white figure that rose up suddenly from the end of the piazza. It was Nettie, in a single garment. "Don't let her scold me, Mr. Justin. It was so hot in bed I came out to cool myself, and when you opened the door I hid."

"I forgive you, if you go in now," I said.

"In a minute. Dick and Lucy are coming home from the party at ten, and mean to bring me some of the supper. There they are now."

"It is too true," said Mr. Justin, as the children approached the gate. "I may as well recognize the hand of fate, and say good-by, Sadi."

"Good-by," I said, putting a cold hand into his.

"Till I come back," and he went away, laughing. My pillow was just a little wet with disappointed tears that night, though both Nettie's arms were round my neck.

Before Mr. Justin came home Tom was certain that he was well enough to go to the factory; and after arguing with him two days I walked down with him, to keep him out of temptation by the way. I had my reward, for Tom's first question had elicited the fact of Mr. Justin's return. As I turned homeward I saw him afar off coming to meet me, and a few rods behind him walked Mrs. Obenreiser.

We did not speak at first; the gladness in his face was enough for me. He tried to take both my hands, but I whispered, "Mrs. Obenreiser is just behind you."

"Fate again! I have not a moment to lose. Sadi, will you marry me?"

"Yes."

"All right.—How do you do, Mrs. Obenreiser? I am charmed to see you."

"Are you, indeed? The symptoms looked as if you would not be charmed to see any one but Sadi just now."

"The symptoms have become certainties, Mrs. Obenreiser." And she was so much surprised that she went on her way, forgetting to congratulate us.

"I was a true prophet, after all," said Aunt Desire, as we walked into her sitting-room with conscious faces. "Sadi's lover came to her chimney-corner at last."

"But she had to leave it," said Mr. Justin, "or that lover could not have proposed to her without Nettie for a witness."

"That's no news," said Tom, when I delicately broached the subject of my engagement to him. "You began your courting the very day my hand was hurt."

And I believe Tom is right.

THE LUNCH-TABLE—COFFEE.

"WILL you take coffee?" says Mrs. Bloomendor, her white hand and hyacinth ring resting, like some rare embossing by Tiffany's bold designer, on the handle of the cafetière. We will go no farther to-day than to answer her question, though a poet passed the cup to a painter after her words.

Whether we will take coffee or not depends, first, on its native quality. You remember the little packets of ground coffee done up in tin-foil which shed such inspiring fragrance through the room when you were housekeeping in Paris. Subtler than Rimmel's extract of coffee for aristocratic handkerchiefs, sweeter than the breath of orange flowers, yet with an almond flavor, and a pungency that restored languid brains by its very aroma, this coffee left its traces on the air long afterward in a glorious vague reviving essence that not all the alyssum and jasmine in the window-boxes could conceal or overlay. But that was in Paris, and that fragrant coffee is no longer even a name to you, for you forgot to inquire its variety, and you can only surmise that it came from Nubian valleys and islands girt with sunshine in the same zone as Mocha, though not sharing its celebrity. You must make treaty with the Syrian monks if you want to lay hands on a small portion of the genuine Mocha, though novelists of the period seem to have customers for larger crops of this coffee than Mocha could grow in five years.

The finest coffee procured in this country is from the Dutch East Indies, and this is a small portion of the good coffee furnished. Cubans, who are known to be critical in matters of the table, prefer the best growth of Porto Rico for their cups, esteeming it for its fragrance and stimulating properties. We will not go far wrong in taking their judgment on this point, for they have palates dainty as humming-birds. Taking the verdict of national tastes, the Turkish coffee is the finest in the world, for the reason that the climate allows the bean to ripen on its stalk for years, and coffee always improves with age. Then comes Java, when well ripened; but that known as Old Government Java is a damaged article. The select coffee of Porto Rico may rank next; then Maracaybo and the Brazilian exports, always remembering that more in this country depends on the grade and condition of coffee than its variety. It deteriorates in carriage, because it absorbs readily any foreign odors, such as spice or spirits, which come near it. On shipboard or in warehouses coffee is thus affected, and the deterioration is most rapid if it has been browned. Fine qualities of the browned article should be put up in cases lined with tin-foil or oiled silk bags, the upper surface of the contents covered with a layer of coarse white sugar to keep the aroma from escaping when opened.

Many substances are mixed with coffee to cheapen, and occasionally, by persons of weak health, to weaken it. Roast carrots, pease, and rye are used for this purpose, and, as diluents, furnish the same color as coffee, and a taste which blends with it, but can never be used as substitutes, because they lack entirely its principle, caffeine. This gives to coffee its invigorating and aromatic qualities, the escape of which renders it worthless. But a substitute has been lately found in asparagus seeds, which contain a large amount of caffeine, and have an odor like that of the finest coffee. The pulp is washed from the seeds, which are roasted and prepared just like coffee. Doubtless it will not be long before asparagus beans are an article of commerce, but farmers and gardeners can furnish themselves with this desirable substitute the coming season.

Common coffee should always be washed when green to remove the copperas, in a solution of which it is often soaked by dealers to give it a fresh appearance. Three or four waters are sometimes found tinged with the yellow copperas stain, which is rank poison to human stomachs. Brown it as quickly as possible to a dark color, but stop short of burning. Light brown coffee gives a raw flavor to the drink, and burning makes it bitter. In the last minutes of browning add a few spoonfuls of powdered white sugar, which will melt, and coat each berry with a varnish which excludes the air and preserves all the aroma. Keep in bottles or small cans tightly corked to prevent its heating. Even in large quantities the dealer may secure his coffee from evaporation by the addition of sugar while browning. Grind your coffee as wanted, if you care to have every particle of its strength, and grind as fine as possible. In finely ground coffee you get all the strength, and get it at once, as you can not do even by long boiling. Coarsely ground coffee may be dried after using once and ground again; in making over one-third the strength will be found remaining.

There are two ways of making coffee—one of which depends simply on the vessel in which it is made for success; the other is the old-fashioned arrangement, which demands a little skill. For the latter the coffee must be prepared by mixing with cold water and the white of one egg till all is moistened—not wet, but merely damp; use as little egg as possible (it holds the strength of the grounds in it), but every particle must be moistened, or it will float in the coffee; pour on boiling water, and boil for three minutes; set it back where it will keep hot, but not boil, for five minutes, stirring the floating grounds in two or three times; pour out a cupful to rinse all the grains from the spout of the coffee-pot, and put it back again; add a cupful of cold water, which will precipitate the grounds at once; and serve.

The modern method of clearing coffee is by filtering the boiling water through the grounds, which are suspended in the pot in a wire or perforated cup. Half a dozen models of cafetières are seen in the shops, any one of which is inferior to the simple contrivance I will describe. This is a flannel bag with a wire run in the top to hold it open; the coffee fills this, and boiling water is poured through it—the beverage taken to the table when filtered. But this is awkward and slow compared to the homely fashion I have experimented on with the most satisfactory results. A strip of fine white Shaker flannel, quite full and thick, was torn into pieces a quarter of a yard square, and kept out of the dust, in the pantry, for use. One was scalded the first time of using, to take away the taste of wool, and the dry ground coffee tied up in it, and thrown into a pot of nearly boiling water and boiled for two minutes, the aroma kept in by a tin thimble fitted over the spout. This gave coffee that was a thing of beauty in its rich color and jewel clearness, and of a flavor to appease the exigent Parisian who handed his cup at the right of the table. Every day the sight of that coffee seemed to say that I had not lived in vain—that I had done something well. Observe, the water must not be boiling when poured on the coffee, or it will take a long time to extract the strength. Coffee made in this way will bear heating over, with a little fresh to add aroma, if a strong cup is desired in preference to nice flavor. And it is both economy and taste to boil the sugar in the pot, as it blends perfectly, giving all its sweetness when the cup is poured out. Two-thirds of a cup of coffee sugar boiled in, made two quarts of coffee sweet enough for people who usually added three spoonfuls of sugar to each cup, and the flavor was richer than when the sweetening was dissolved. Fresh cream, not more than eighteen hours old, should be used, as old cream gives its flavor to the coffee. The coffee should be kept just below the boiling-point on the table, and poured on the cream, which will be diffused through the cup by the time the cup is cooled enough to drink.

A delicate way of making a small quantity is to pour cold water on the pulp of egg and ground coffee, and let it stand five minutes just at the boiling-point, known by the slight simmer at the sides of the pot. This may be regulated by setting the pot in a vessel of boiling water and heating it there. Do not let coffee stand in a tin pot, as it extracts the taste of the metal.

CHINESE BARBERS.

THE Chinese from time immemorial have been accustomed to speak of all foreigners as "barbarians," while foreigners have retorted in the same uncomplimentary terms. As we have failed to discover any standard of civilization which shall apply with equal justice to both, it is quite impossible to decide on which side the point of accusation lies; but certainly if the barber be accepted as a model, and his operations as a specimen of the prevailing habits of the people, the Chinese may justly be styled the most barberous nation on earth.

They swarm over the land like the frogs of Egypt: north, south, east, and west throughout the immense empire they are every where met with. No Chinaman is his own barber; indeed, as the top of his head is usually the only part which requires his attention (for the beard of the Chinese does not give him much trouble) it would be a task fraught with too much danger to hazard the attempt of shaving himself. This, of course, gives employment to a vast number of persons. In Canton alone the number of barbers is computed at between seven and eight thousand, or an average of one to every forty inhabitants.

Both the practice of shaving and the style of "shop" in which the operation is performed vary in different sections of the country.

In all parts of the south of China the barbers are "ambulatory," each carrying his shop on his back, and performing his tonsorial art in the open street. In Peking and throughout the north, on the other hand, the barbers have shops which, as in the case with most other Chinese shops, are open to the street, but without counters, and ordinarily of very rude construction. The only ornamentation which they can be said to possess is a very questionable one in the eyes of foreigners, consisting generally of gross caricatures of foreigners and their habits. They are, however, furnished with chairs and small basin-stands. If the weather be hot, the chair or stool is placed just outside the threshold, and the operation of shaving is conducted in the open street.

"Shampooing" not unfrequently accompanies shaving, but in this, as in almost every thing else Chinese, the European practice is reversed, the "shampoo" preceding instead of following the application of the razor.

I submitted to the operation in Peking as an experiment, and have to this day a lively recollection of the performance. Stretched at full length on a bamboo seat or easy-chair, I was pummeled all over the body, but more particularly on the chest, legs, and arms, by a stout, brawny attendant with his partially closed fists, after the style once so popular at the "Hammam," till I was fain to cry peccavi. Sometimes the "douche" is administered, but only rarely.

The barber's outfit is simple, consisting of a good razor, which costs about threepence, a strop, which usually is nothing more than a strip of stontish calico cloth, costing a penny more.

The chief items of expense in this elaborate "kit" are the accessories. The metal basin and the bamboo pail underneath, and the pole surmounting all, which serves as the emblem of his craft, are, however, scarcely more expensive than the razor and strop; so that, on the whole, it does not cost very much to furnish a barber's shop in China. The tariff of charges of those engaged in this branch of industry is correspondingly low. Three "cash," equal to about half a farthing of British money, is the sum ordinarily asked for simply shaving the head. If the queue is plaited and interwoven with fresh silk, the scale of charge correspondingly rises. Shaving and braiding the queue, re-tailing a worn-out stump, and shampooing, constitute all the arts required of the barber. False mustaches and beards of a rude kind, such as are worn by actors in the public shows, are not made by his hands; and of making perukes and wigs, so much in vogue among the civilized nations of Europe, he is altogether ignorant. In fact, the Chinese gentleman is far from being so particular about his head as the English gentleman is about his beard: where the latter shaves at all, he usually shaves daily; if he dines out, he will often repeat the operation during the twenty-four hours. On the other hand, the majority of even the better classes in China shave but twice a week, and the laboring classes but once.

In the case of mourning, the law—or, rather, recognized custom, more powerful than law—is to permit the head to go unshaven for months, the precise time being regulated by the measure of relationship to the deceased. But as the thirteen months' exemption from shaving prescribed for the loss of either of one's parents, if rigidly enforced, would produce a crop of hair too exuberant for even Chinese society to endure, where strict regard for etiquette forbids the clean polish of the razor-blade, other expedients are brought into requisition to keep the stumps of the hair within due bounds.

Since the incoming of the Mantchou power, barbers' shops, primitive and simple as they are now, must have undergone a more marked change than those we are accustomed to see nearer home, for the native Chinese, till they received this badge of a foreign yoke, did not allow either knife or scissors to pass upon their head, but were the "long-haired race" which the Taeping insurgents are wishing to become. Previous to their subjection by the Tartars the fashion was to bind the long hair in a knot on the top of the head, and there to fasten it with a wooden or metal pin, as is often represented in the old pictures of the Ming dynasty. The art of hair-cutting as practiced in the West is as yet unknown to the Chinese barber. It is but rarely, therefore, that a foreigner calls in the aid of native skill. Only, indeed, when he assumes the garb of the country, and goes into the interior, does he find it necessary. This, indeed, forms the coup de grace to the foreigner's metamorphosis. The "tail" fastened on to the back hair deceives even the practiced eye of the native, and, as Mr. Fortune has dryly observed, "even the dogs cease to notice him."

In China no tonsorial art is required for the women's hair. They are invariably their own hair-dressers, and with their own nimble fingers give shape and substance to the "butterfly wings" and "tea-pot" embellishments which form to European eyes so striking a feature of the female coiffure in China.

My sketch of the barber and the peculiarities of his professional career would hardly be complete without some mention of his humble coworker, "the collector of refuse hair," who represents a very numerous class in China, who occupy about the same round of the social ladder as the chiffonniers of Paris and the rag and bone pickers of Paddington, only much more numerous, and, if the truth could be ascertained, much more miserable than they. Yet even the poor, abject picker up of refuse hair is not without interest to his fellow-mortals. Indeed, to many he is possessed of a very considerable interest. He, too, "has his friend at court," though dressed in uncouth garb, as befits his rank and station as court head-dresser. Even he may aspire to the dignity of hair-collector to the chief barber and tail-maker extraordinary to his Effulgent Majesty Ho-Ki-Po-Ki-Win-Ki-Wum, Emperor of all the Chinas. Through the instrumentality of the hair-worker and the maker of mustaches the contents of the ample wicker basket which he carries so gracefully at his back—the product of many a weary round and of many a long and painful search in remote and unsavory corners—have been introduced to better society, and after undergoing the combings, pickings and sortings, and various manipulations only possible at the hands of the painstaking and plodding Chinese, and after being exhibited in various shop windows for the admiration of the whole populace, will doubtless at last hang picturesquely from some Celestial's head.

USEFUL RECIPES.

CABBAGE.—Cabbages, to boil, should be cut into pieces about as large as a very small tea-cup (the flavor is much finer than when boiled whole, and they do not take so long to cook when cut up); cut again before dishing, and add a small piece of butter and salt.

Poultry that has been kept too long, and has an unpleasant smell, can be made fresh and good by putting powdered charcoal in a cloth, tying it up, and placing it inside the fowl for about two hours before cooking. If the cloth absorbs it readily, remove it, and put a fresh piece, with more charcoal in it, in the fowl. When the weather is warm, and poultry likely to spoil, as soon as the animal heat has left the fowl sprinkle powdered charcoal over it, to prevent its becoming tainted.

Cucumbers make a nice relish if sliced the long way, and fried as you do squash or egg-plant.

Limes are a most delicious preserve. They can be found at the confectioner's. They are generally in market during the summer. Lay them in salt and water strong enough to bear an egg, closely covering them until the warm weather is over. Cut them enough to get out all the seeds, and place in cold water for one day, changing the water often so as to remove all the salt. Boil in water (in which soda has been added in the proportion of one tea-spoonful to six quarts of water) till tender enough to put a straw through; then soak again in cold water one day, changing the water often. To each pound of fruit allow two and a half pounds of white sugar and three pints of water. Boil the sirup fifteen minutes, put the fruit in, cook five minutes, remove, put in jars; let the sirup cook fifteen minutes longer. They will keep any number of years. They may be purchased by the hundred. Four pounds in weight is about equal to two hundred limes.

MIXED PRESERVES.—Take equal quantities of peaches, apples, pears, and quinces, that have been pared, cored, and quartered, or, what is better, cut fine. To every six pounds of fruit allow one pint of water. Let them cook thoroughly, but not burn. Take out and mash well together. Clean the kettle, and put them back with half or three-quarters their weight in sugar, and let them cook very slowly two hours.

A GOOD RECIPE FOR YEAST.—For a small family take one ounce of dried hops and two quarts of water. Boil them fifteen minutes; add one quart of cold water, and let it boil for a few minutes; strain, and add half a pound of flour—putting the latter into a basin, and pouring on the water slowly to prevent its getting lumpy—one-quarter pound of brown sugar, one handful of fine salt. Let it stand three days, stirring it occasionally. Little bubbles will soon rise in it. When it ferments well, add six potatoes, which have been boiled, mashed, and run through a colander, making them as smooth as possible. This yeast will keep a long while, and has the advantage of not taking any yeast to start it with. It rises so quickly that a less quantity of it must be put in than of ordinary yeast.

BROWN SOAP.—The common brown soap is the very best thing with which to stop a mouse or rat hole. If you put a piece of wood in, or fill up with plaster, in a short time it is all out again. But soap they abhor, and if a piece is wedged in they will never trouble that place again.

GRAFTON CAKE (cheap and good).—One pint of flour, one-half pint of sugar, one table-spoonful of butter, one egg, two table-spoonfuls of cream of tartar, one of soda. Make a batter with the milk, having it quite thin. Bake at once.

Digitized by Google

A RAID ON THE PANTRY.

THIS small foraging party is likely to make a successful raid, and secure a fair share of plunder. The little fellow, propped up by his elder sister's hands, has just come in sight of the promised land where the jam-pots lie, and the jubilant gleam of his face announces his delight as he telegraphs the discovery to his sister. The bold raiders seem as fearless of interruption and its consequences as does the white cat that is dozing in the corner. Indeed, such an interruption at the critical moment which the artist has depicted would probably result in bringing down both children and shelves, and would cause more damage among both sweetmeats and crockery than is likely to follow in the train of the juvenile pilferers. And as all faults carry at least part of their punishment within themselves, we may be sure that our young friends will not, in any case, escape scot-free, but will be pursued by an uneasy conscience, if not by indigestion, which will make them rue their raid on the pantry.

OPAL, TURQUOISE, AMBER, AND JET.

AMONG the substances belonging to the mineral kingdom known as precious stones, few have been held in greater estimation than the Opal. So much has this been the case that the epithet "precious" is used to designate the rarer kinds of this stone, there being several varieties. The opal is hydrated silica, and less hard even than the amethyst.

It is termed "pœderos" by the Greeks, and in Orphic poems is said to imitate the complexion of a lovely youth. Pliny says, "Of all precious stones it is opal that presents the greatest difficulties of description, it displaying at once the piercing fire of carbunculus, the purple brilliancy of amethystos, and the sea green of smaragdus, the whole blended together and refulgent with a brightness that is quite incredible."

This display of tints is owing to numerous minute and irregular fissures that traverse the stone in a certain direction, containing laminæ of air, that reflect rays of different intensity and various colors. But its structure causes it to be so fragile that an opal set in a ring has been known to split by holding the hand too close to the fire on a frosty day. It is also subject to deterioration; for if the fissures upon which its iridescence depends become choked up by dust or grease, its value is gone. The only way of restoring its beauty is by subjecting it to a certain amount of heat—a hazardous experiment with so brittle a stone.

Like most other gems known to the ancients, opals were originally imported from India; but they are now found extensively in Hungary, Mexico, Honduras, and other places. The finest and largest are discovered imbedded in porphyry, in the mines of Czernovitza, in Hungary. The largest opal known to the ancients was in the ring of Nonius, on account of which its possessor was proscribed by Marc Antony. It was of the size of a hazel-nut, and was valued at a sum equal to $100,000 of our money. When Nonius took to flight he carried nothing with him but this ring. "How marvelous," adds Pliny, "must have been the cruelty, how marvelous the luxurious passion of Antonius, thus to proscribe a man for the possession of a jewel! and no less marvelous must have been the obstinacy of Nonius, who could thus dote upon what had been the cause of his proscription." The largest opal known is in the imperial cabinet at Vienna; for this gem $250,000 have been offered and refused. The most beautiful was in possession of the Empress Josephine. It was named the "Burning of Troy," from the numerous red flames playing over its surface.

A belief in the talismanic properties of the opal was prevalent. The Turks are fully convinced that it comes from no earthly mine, but falls direct from heaven in the lightning. Marbodius relates that it confers the gift of invisibility upon the possessor, so that a thief wearing this gem might carry off his plunder in open day. The opal is incapable of being engraved as a signet; but cabalistic rings have been preserved where certain signs have been marked upon the opal; and one is mentioned as also having astrological figures carved upon the circle of gold.

The opal is never cut in facets, but always en cabochon. The polishing is a work of time and care, on account of the soft nature of the stone. So delicately has it to be handled that even the emery powder employed must be adoucie—namely, the emery which has been already used in polishing other gems, and thus deprived of its asperities.

Another opaque precious stone, also only used cut spherically, is the Turquoise. The real turquoise, called de la vieille roche, was originally found almost exclusively in Persia, and the Greeks only became acquainted with it through the spoils brought home after the Macedonian campaign, when goblets and dishes were exhibited, as well as armor, profusely decorated with this gem. The finest specimens were found in a mountain called Firuz-cos, about three days' journey from the Caspian Sea. The produce of this mine was claimed exclusively by the Shah; and though many of these turquoises found their way into the market, it was only through the embezzlement of the miners and directors. Chardin mentions that when he visited the royal treasury at Ispahan he saw stones in the rough piled high, like heaps of grain, in the chambers, while leather bags were filled with those already polished, to the weight of forty or fifty pounds each.

It is an interesting fact that, on the conquest of Mexico by the Spaniards, images were found among the Aztecs inlaid with turquoises in a manner precisely similar to that practiced by the Persians. Longolius mentions an Aztec mask shown to him by Grimvaldus, the envoy of Charles the Fifth to the Pope, the features of which were represented by turquoise, emerald, and green and red jasper, upon a ground of wood; the eyes were of red amber. The most singular thing is, that the mine from which these stones were taken was never discovered by the Spaniards, nor has the locality even yet been ascertained. The finest turquoises are still obtained from Nishapur; they are carried by Tartar and Persian merchants to the great fair of Nishni-Novgorod. They are also procured from Wady Maghara, in Arabia Petræa. Others have lately been obtained from a stratum of sandstone rock at the foot of Mount Sinai; but these, though at first of a remarkably rich azure, are liable to change and fade.

The Oriental turquoise (de la vieille roche) is a phosphate and a hydrate of alumina colored by copper. But there is a substance termed the Occidental turquoise, that is only petrified bone, colored by copper oxide or phosphate of iron. This, when first found, generally presents a mottled appearance; but by the application of heat the color is diffused evenly throughout the surface. It is this Occidental turquoise that is most frequently used for carving in cameo, or cavo, on account of its greater softness.

The turquoise in medieval times was supposed to be endowed with many wonderful properties. Boetius de Boot relates a number of sufficiently marvelous stories respecting this stone as coming within his own experience. "The turquoise is believed to strengthen the sight and spirits of the wearer," he says; "but its chief commendation is its protective influence against falls, which, as every body is assured, it takes upon itself, so that the wearer escapes all hurt—a property beyond the scope of reason. I can solemnly affirm that I always wear one in a ring, the nature of which I can never sufficiently admire."

He then proceeds to relate the manner in which he became possessed of this ring. A neighbor, who had been in the habit of wearing a turquoise ring of great beauty, died. His property was put up for sale, and the elder De Boot purchased this ring and presented it to his son. To the great disappointment of the latter, however, the gem had become pale and faded; so much so that, as he expresses it, he thought it scorn to wear so unsightly a gem, and took it to an engraver to have his coat of arms cut upon it. This done, he wore the turquoise ring as a signet. What was his surprise to find the stone gradually recovering its color, and that at the end of the month its azure hue was restored. But the wonder did not cease here: De Boot was traveling home to Bohemia from Padua, where he had been to take his doctor's degree, when, in the dark, his horse stumbled, and fell with his rider from a bank on to a road ten feet below. Neither horse nor rider was the worse, but when De Boot washed his hands the following morning he perceived that the turquoise was split in two. He had the larger half reset, and continued to wear it; when again he met with an accident which was like to have caused him a broken bone, and again the turquoise took the fracture upon itself, and had to be reset once more. After such proof who could doubt?

The turquoise has always been a favorite gem for the betrothal ring, the fashion having had its origin in the belief that the permanence of its hue would depend upon the constancy of the donor.

Of all the gem-like substances used for personal adornment, Amber is of the highest antiquity. It is mentioned by Homer, and is found introduced in the most ancient specimens of Etruscan jewelry. In the collection of the Prince of Canino was a necklace of choice Etruscan workmanship, having pendants in the form of scarabei of alternate sardonyx and amber. The Greeks termed amber electron, from Elector, one of the names of the sun-god. Among the Romans also this substance was greatly prized. Pliny tells us that a small figure carved in amber had been known to sell at a higher price than a living slave in vigorous health. In the time of Nero one of the equestrian order was sent to Germany by Julianus, the manager of the gladiatorial exhibitions, in order to procure a supply of this gem. He succeeded so well, and brought back such vast quantities, that the very nets that protected the podium against the wild beasts, the litters upon which the slain gladiators were carried away, and all the other articles used were studded with amber. Sir Thomas Browne also, in his "Urn Burial," mentions, among the contents of a Roman urn in the possession of Cardinal Farnese, not only jewels, but an ape in agate, and a grasshopper and an elephant carved in amber.

Great uncertainty prevailed among the ancients as to the nature of amber, and many were the legends to which this uncertainty gave rise. After Phaeton had been struck by lightning, his sisters, we are told, were changed to poplars, which every day shed their tears upon the banks of the Eridanus, and to these tears was given the name electron. Nicias says that it is a liquid produced by the rays of the sun; that these rays, at the moment of the sun's setting, striking with the greatest force upon the surface of the soil, leave upon it an unctuous sweat, which is carried off by the tides of the ocean, and thrown up on the shore of Germany. According to another author, there is a river "beyond India," the banks of which are frequented by birds called meleagrides; these, weeping the death of Meleager, allow their tears to drop into the stream, whereupon they are transformed to amber. A similar belief—that amber was produced by the tears of birds—prevailed among the Orientals. This is alluded to by Moore in "Lalla Rookh:"

> "Around thee shall glisten the loveliest amber
> That ever the sorrowing sea-birds have wept."

It was gradually, however, made manifest that amber was neither more nor less than a vegetable product—a kind of gum; hence it acquired the name succinum, by which it is now known in natural history. It was found that by boiling in turpentine it could be rendered plastic; and pieces were discovered in which insects, leaves of plants, and other foreign matter had become imbedded; proving that the amber must at one time have been in a liquid or semi-liquid state.

Wherever beds of lignite occur, amber is found; so that it is very generally diffused over the world. But the shores of the Baltic, between Memel and Königsberg, is the only district that supplies it in quantities. As much as four thousand pounds weight of amber yearly is said to be the average produce of that country. It is mostly found on the sea-shore, but in Prussia there are also mines. They are thus described: "First, at the surface of the earth, is formed a stratum of sand. Immediately under this sand is a bed of clay, filled with small flints. Under this clay is a stratum of black earth or turf filled with fossil wood, half decomposed and bituminous; this stratum is extended upon minerals, containing little metal except iron, which are consequently pyrites. Lastly, under this bed the amber is found scattered about in pieces, and sometimes accumulated in heaps." It is accounted for in the following manner: "The oils in the woody stratum have been impregnated by the acid contained in the clay of the upper stratum, which has descended by the filtration of water. This mixture of oil and acid has become bituminous; the most pure and liquid parts of this bitumen have descended on the mineral stratum, and in traversing it have become charged with particles of iron; and the result of this last combination is the formation of the amber which is found below."

In Shakspeare's time amber would seem to have been fashionable as an ornament, as he more than once alludes to it. When Petruchio promises to take Katherine on a visit to her father, he mentions "amber bracelets" among the "bravery" with which she is to be adorned. Among the artists of the Renaissance period it was chiefly used in the formation of jewel caskets, and such like elegant objects. It is still much valued in the East; but the chief market at present is China, where it is crushed into powder, and burned as incense. Mouth-pieces for cigars, beads, and other ornaments in this material are, however, extensively manufactured in the workshops of Dantzic, Hamburg, and elsewhere.

The electric properties of amber early attracted attention: it was also believed to be highly medicinal, and was said to have the power of detecting the presence of poison; "for then an appearance like the rainbow flies to and fro in the vessel, attended by the crackling of flame, and gives warning by this double indication." It is still supposed to possess certain virtues. The wearing an amber necklace, it is said, will keep off attacks of erysipelas; and it is also a preservative against sore throat, on account of the circle of electricity maintained, as well as from the warmth of the amber.

Jet (gagates) is of the same nature as amber, and is indeed frequently found in the same beds of lignite. It was valued by the ancients chiefly for its supposed virtues: mixed with wine it was thought a sovereign cure for toothache. It was also employed in divination. If it remained unconsumed in the fire, the desire of the interrogator would be accomplished.

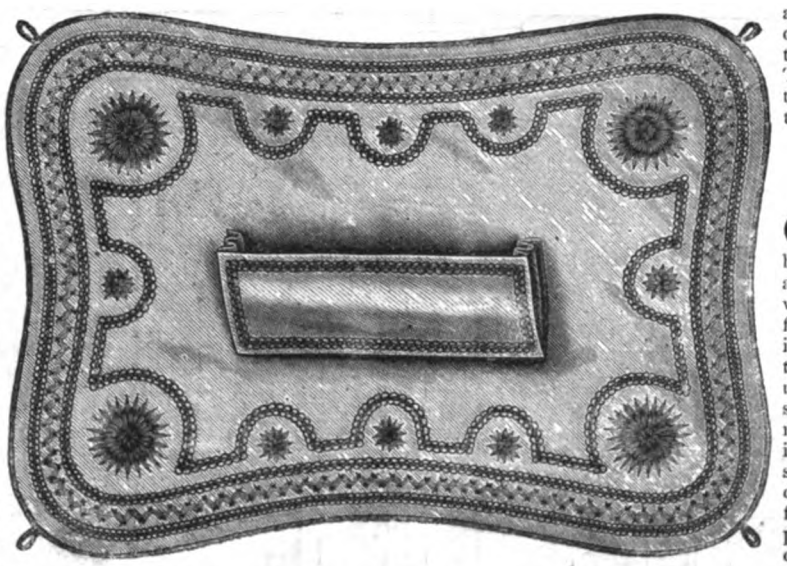
Jet was used for ornamental purposes in Britain even before the Roman conquest; large rings of this material, that had served for bracelets and anklets, being frequently met with among ancient British remains. The Romans, however, soon learned to appreciate its sombre beauties. When the repairs of the Church of St. Gereon, at Cologne, were going on in 1846, two stone coffins were disinterred, in one of which a complete set of jet ornaments, supposed to have belonged to a priestess of Cybele, was discovered.

A RAID ON THE PANTRY.

Digitized by Google

Carriage Leather Wall Tidy to hang over Wash-Stand.

THIS tidy is of brown carriage leather, embroidered in point Russe with brown worsted, and trimmed with crochet gimp of gray twisted cotton, No. 20. The pocket of the tidy serves to hold the soap, sponge, etc. To make the tidy, first transfer the design to a piece of carriage leather cut from Fig. 63, Supplement. The large rosettes are worked in the shape of a circle with brown worsted in three shades; for the smaller rosettes use two shades only. For the trimming simulating a cross seam, work, first, a row of long slanting chain stitches, and at the ends of each stitch work one cross stitch with the darker shade of worsted.—Between the double lines of the design sew on the gimp, which is worked like that shown by Fig. 8 on page 500, Harper's Bazar, No. 32, Vol. III. After finishing the embroidery make the pocket, which consists of a piece of carriage leather eleven inches and a quarter wide and five inches and three-quarters deep. Trim this piece at a distance of three-quarters of an inch from the outer edge with a row of similar gimp, line it with carriage leather, and sew a row of woolen cord to the outer edge, by means of which the joining seam of the soufflets with the pocket is covered at the same time. The soufflets consist of a double strip of carriage leather two inches wide and of a corresponding depth. Lay the pocket piece exactly on the middle of the tidy, and sew it on at the under edge. Lay the soufflets in one pleat each, so that the free edge projects an inch and a quarter over the pocket piece; pass this edge through a slit cut of the corresponding length in the tidy, and fasten it on the under side of the latter. Finally, line the tidy with carriage leather, and edge it with a row of coarse woolen cord, of which form one loop each at the four corners of the tidy to hang it up. This tidy will be found an excellent protection for the wall above the wash-stand, which it preserves from splashing.



CARRIAGE LEATHER WALL TIDY TO HANG OVER THE WASH-STAND.
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. XXI., Fig. 63.

MUSLIN AND CRINOLINE SKIRT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 42 and 43.

as shown by the illustration. After the embroidery is completed, cut away the Swiss muslin, following the contour of the design figures according to the illustration. The design given by Fig. 4 is partly worked in application, and partly in soutache embroidery. Instead of soutache, cord may also be used.

BLOOD-SUCKING BATS.

OLD authors relate terrible tales of the blood-sucking bats, telling us how Paraguayan plains are haunted by enormous creatures that attack poultry, cattle, mules, and horses—sitting upon the backs of their victims, and with their wings fanning them into insensibility, so that, all unchecked, they slake their horrid thirst, leaving holes in the skins of their dupes which afford convenient places for the deposit of insects' eggs. In this way the cattle introduced by the first European settlers were entirely destroyed. Ulloa describes Carthagena as having its streets after sunset covered with clouds of these dextrous bleeders of cattle. Azzara gives them credit for preferring insect food when it is to be got, but confesses they exercise what old Weller called "a strong power of suction" upon the necks, shoulders, and buttocks of domestic animals; while he had personal proof that they, sometimes at least, attacked man, four several times finding the ends of his toes bearing witness, in the shape of sundry small circular wounds, that the bats had visited his couch and drawn upon him for sustenance while he lay in blissful unconsciousness. Captain Stedman gives a more circumstantial account of his experience in the same way. Knowing by instinct, he says, that the person he intends to attack is in a sound slumber, the bat generally alights near the feet, where, while he keeps fanning with his enormous wings, which keeps one cool, he bites a piece out of the tip of the great toe, so very small, indeed, that the head of a pin could scarcely be received into the wound, which is consequently not painful. Yet through this orifice he contrives to suck the blood until he is obliged to disgorge; he then begins again, and thus continues sucking and disgorging till he is scarcely able to fly; and the sufferer has been known to sleep from time to eternity. The captain found tobacco ashes the best remedy in his own case; and after washing the blood from his person and hammock, found small heaps of congealed blood all round the place where he had lain, on examining which the surgeon calculated he had lost twelve or fourteen ounces of blood during the night. A party of Americans going up the Amazon found one night's experience of the bat's blood-sucking capabilities quite as much as they cared to know. One of them awoke with a face like

CRINOLINE SKIRT.
For description see Supplement.

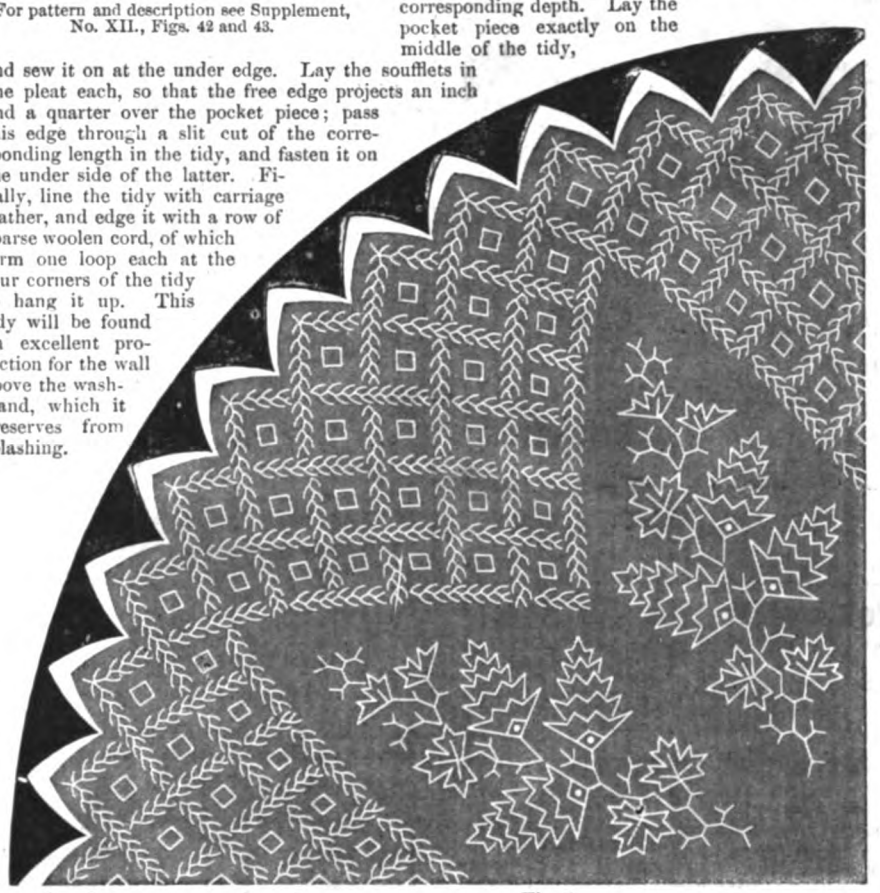


Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

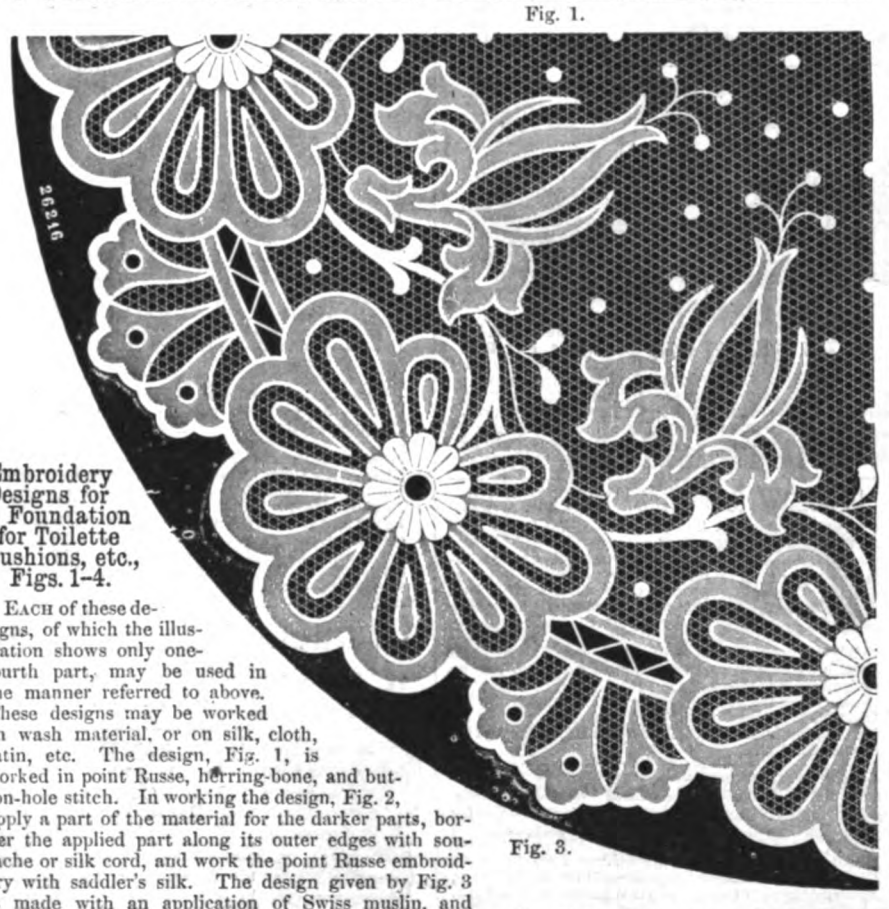

Fig. 3.

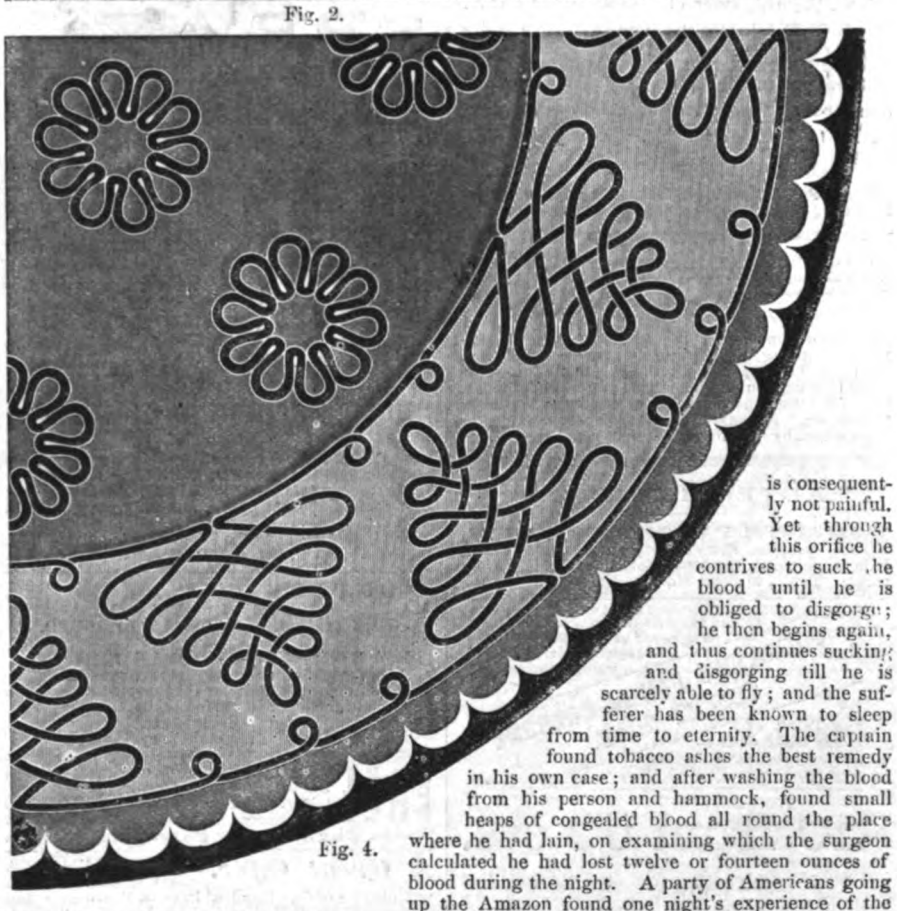

Fig. 4.

Figs. 1–4.—EMBROIDERY PATTERNS FOR MATS, TIDIES, TOILETTE CUSHIONS, ETC. POINT RUSSE, APPLICATION, CHAIN STITCH, AND SATIN STITCH.

Embroidery Designs for a Foundation for Toilette Cushions, etc., Figs. 1–4.

EACH of these designs, of which the illustration shows only one-fourth part, may be used in the manner referred to above. These designs may be worked on wash material, or on silk, cloth, satin, etc. The design, Fig. 1, is worked in point Russe, herring-bone, and button-hole stitch. In working the design, Fig. 2, apply a part of the material for the darker parts, border the applied part along its outer edges with soutache or silk cord, and work the point Russe embroidery with saddler's silk. The design given by Fig. 3 is made with an application of Swiss muslin, and worked in satin and ladder stitch on lace. Work eyelet-holes also between separate figures of the design, a corpse, his hammock and the floor beneath being saturated with blood, the flow of which was checked with great difficulty.

Digitized by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

PIMS.—We fear there is not a tailor in New York who would be willing to send you the pattern of a gentleman's suit.—Thanks for your pleasant letter.

WOULD-BE FASHIONABLE.—Make your grenadine by polonaise pattern sent you, or else with box-pleated blouse, long over-skirt, and demi-train.

TATTING.—We know of no other instructions in tatting than are contained in the Bazar, and which you must see if you are a constant reader.

MYRRA.—Anteros was originally supposed by the ancients to be the deity who avenged slighted love. At a later date he was represented as the brother of Cupid, and constantly at war with him.

MRS. GENERAL A. G.—The butternut jewelry illustrated in our columns is not sold by any house, to our knowledge, but is manufactured by ingenious persons for their own use.—We never purchase goods on commission.

T. O. H.—We can not undertake to recommend any oculist or physician. Your family physician will give you the names of reliable persons in the profession; and all that we can advise you is to avoid quacks.

CONSTANCE.—We do not think that your friends need despise you for earning your livelihood in any honorable vocation, but are sorry that we can not assist you in this laudable effort. There are two or three good medical colleges for women in New York. The length of time required for graduation therein is from two to three years, according to the attainments possessed on entering. A good preliminary education is necessary. We do not think you would earn much money by the means you suggest. Why not fit yourself for a sick-nurse?

MRS. S. M. B.—For information about infant's clothing read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 35, Vol. IV.

CONSTANOR.—The apron-polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., is not open in front of skirt. You can order a cut paper pattern of this.

J. S.—Make your gray alpaca with an apron-polonaise like that illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., and a single skirt. Trim with folds of the same. Your green poplin should have a basque and demi-train, with a deep flounce on the skirt, headed by bias velvet. Fringe edges the basque.

MRS. E. P. L.—Your sample of alpaca is a good black and of fair quality. We think the Buffalo brand one of the very best for service.

E. M.—You need not send for cut paper patterns that are not advertised in our list. We sent you a close-fitting postilion-basque. Your percale over-skirt will look well made by the same pattern, and should be trimmed with pleatings of the same.

DORA.—Make a polonaise of your new silk by pattern sent you, and put folds of the same shade on your skirt. The folds may be of velvet to make it richer.

MRS. M. SMITH.—We can not send you samples of our cut paper patterns. If you will buy Bazar No. 23, Vol. IV., you will find a picture of our suit for a girl of eight years; No. 27, Vol. IV., will show an illustration of cloak and dress for a boy of three years; and No. 29, Vol. IV., a suit for a boy of six.

KATE P.—No. 17, Vol. III., contains a pattern for gentleman's slipper, to be worked on canvas.

WOLVERINE.—Flat buttons of Roman gold are most worn as shirt studs by gentlemen. We do not believe there will be a change soon.

KATIE.—Point appliqué is pronounced as if the last word were written appli-kay, with an accent on the last syllable.

MRS. A. C. H.—Your sample is very fair silk for $2 a yard.

YE pimpled, blotched, and ulcerated victims of scrofulous diseases, who drag your unclean persons into the company of better men, take AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, and purge out the foul corruption from your blood. Restore your health, and you will not only enjoy life better, but make your company more tolerable to those who must keep it.—[Com.]

THE State Assayer of Massachusetts (A. A. Hayes, M.D.), having made an analysis of Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer, reports it the best preparation for promoting healthy excretions of the scalp, increasing the growth and restoring the color of the hair.—[Com.]

AFTER SEA BATHING use Burnett's Kalliston to relieve the disagreeable action of salt water.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES, and Tan, use Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists every where. Depot, 49 Bond St., New York.

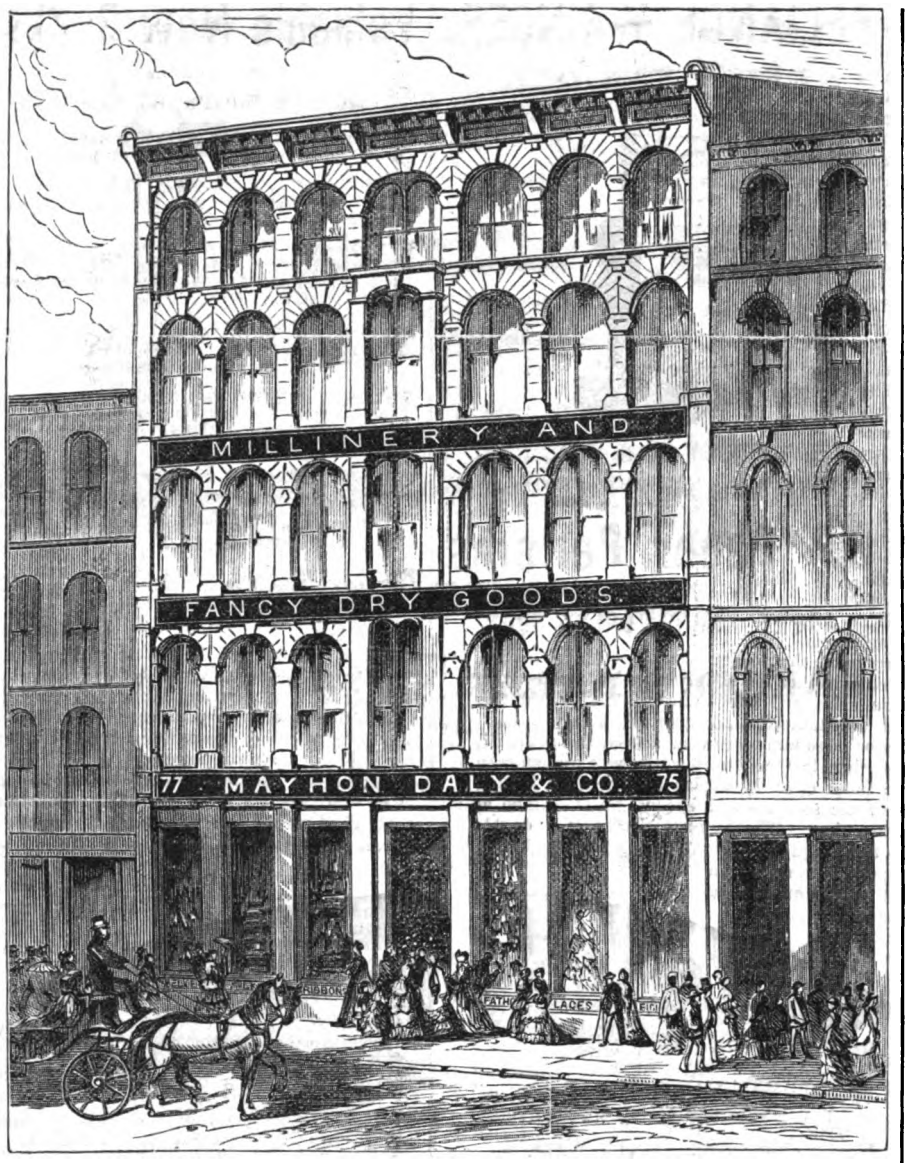
It has the delicate and refreshing fragrance of genuine Farina Cologne Water, and is indispensable to the Toilet of every Lady or Gentleman. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in PERFUMERY.

COLGATE'S EAU-DE-COLOGNE TOILET SOAP.

$10 from 50 cts.

12 Samples sent (postage free) for Fifty Cents that retail readily for Ten Dollars.
R. L. WOLCOTT, 181 Chatham Square, N. Y.

KEMLO'S Modern Watch Repairer's Guide. Price $1 25. A. WILLIAMS & Co., Publishers, Boston.



MAYHON, DALY, & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND DEALERS IN
SILKS, RIBBONS, LACES, STRAW GOODS,
MILLINERY ARTICLES, WHITE GOODS, EMBROIDERIES, GLOVES, & FANCY DRY GOODS,
75 & 77 WABASH AVE., CHICAGO.
☞ ALL ORDERS entrusted to our care will be promptly filled and shipped the day they are received.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

Don't Follow Blind Guides.

The sick never lack advisers. Every friend has some new remedy to propose. The result is that the stomach of many an invalid is converted into a sort of medicinal cess-pool, in which powerful drugs are continually seething and fermenting. The effect of this experimental treatment in dyspepsia and bilious complaints is frightful. The simpler the medicine, the more readily it assimilates with the animal fluids; and of all preparations in use for indigestion and biliousness,
TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT,
prepared after Nature's formula, and absolutely identical with the waters of the famous German Spa, is indisputably the best.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

PERSIAN SPRAY
The bloom of early womanhood is preserved, and its attractive beauty heightened, by using DEVERNA'S PERSIAN SPRAY. It is the product of Prof. DEVERNA'S laboratory after lengthened and costly experiments, and it is confidently offered as incomparably the best face preparation. Freckles, Moth, Patches, Tan, and all impurities of the skin are at once removed by its application. Sold by all Drug and Fancy Stores.

TRADE-MARK.
"RUSSIAN GORED KNIT UNDERSKIRT,"
A NEW ARTICLE,

Invented and manufactured exclusively by the NORFOLK & NEW BRUNSWICK HOSIERY CO., upon their Patented Knitting Looms, being superior to flannel, much lighter, perfect in shape, and will not shrink nor change in color from washing.
ALSO,
FULL-FASHIONED HOSIERY,
consisting of
Ladies', Gents', Misses', and Boys' Underwear, of every description, superior in quality and style to any goods made in this country, and fully equal to the best hand-loom imported goods, and at greatly reduced prices.
Full lines for sale, to the jobbing trade only, at H. J. LIBBY & CO.'S, 47 & 49 White St., N. Y.

COMPLEXIONS
Cleansed and purified, and FRECKLES PERMANENTLY REMOVED,
by using
DE VERNA'S PERSIAN SPRAY,
A purely innocent vegetable compound.
Every bottle prepared under the personal supervision of the eminent Perfumer, De Verna.
Depot, 37 John St., N.Y.
Sold by all Drug and Fancy Stores.

FREE Try samples of our great 8-page, $1 00, illustrated weekly—30 years established. Fine steel engravings free to subscribers. Agents make $5 a day. Send for The Saturday Gazette, Hallowell, Me.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

The New Wilson Under-Feed.
THE BEST & CHEAPEST FIRST CLASS SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE IN THE WORLD.
PRICE 45 DOLLARS.
Warranted for five years, and the warranty indemnified by a capital of half a million of dollars.
AGENTS WANTED in unoccupied territory. For particulars address the Wilson Sewing Machine Co.
Cleveland, O.; St. Louis, Mo.; Providence, R. I.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Boston, Mass.; Pittsburg, Pa. Louisville, Ky.; Cincinnati, O.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Memphis, Tenn.; Chicago, Ill.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Toledo, O.; Albany, N.Y.; St. Paul, Minn.; Richmond, Va.; Montgomery, Ala.; New Orleans, La.; Galveston & Houston, Tex.; San Francisco, Cal.; or
No. 707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

DENSLOW & BUSH'S "SAFETY" OIL
Will not explode! Safest and purest oil ever produced! Stands over 150° fire test! We take regular Kerosene oil and by our new process expel all impurities and explosive elements. The Fire Underwriters of N. Y. urgently recommend our oil as a protection to life and property. A lighted lamp may be upset and broken without fear of explosion or fire. For sale by all grocers, druggists, &c., in the U. S. Extra inducements to dealers. Address DENSLOW & BUSH, 130 Maiden Lane, N. Y.; 8 Custom H. St., Boston, Mass.; 34 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.; 51 S. Water St., Chicago, Ill.; or Cleveland, O.

GLYCERINE CAKE.
RAWOLLE'S TOILET GLYCERINE CAKE is unequaled for Washing, Shaving, Shampooing, Tooth Soap, and Baby Wash; produces a clear, soft, white skin, and prevents pimples and chapping. Warranted over one-half pure Glycerine. For sale by druggists. MARX & RAWOLLE, Manufacturers of Glycerine, 179 William St., New York.

$250 A Month easily made with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Secure Circular and Samples, free. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

RIMMEL'S PERFUMERY,
PARIS, LONDON, BRUSSELS,
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

THE NEW
ORIENTAL ASPERSOR,
For sprinkling Perfumes on the handkerchief, in apartments, sick-rooms, &c., &c.
Special Representatives for the United States,
EDWARDES & RUSSELL,
38 Vesey St., N. Y.

STRASBURGER & PFEIFFER,
(Successors to Strasburger, Fritz, & Pfeiffer),
IMPORTERS OF GERMAN, FRENCH, AND ENGLISH
TOYS,
China & Fancy Goods,
BOHEMIAN GLASS and LAVA WARES,
MUSIC BOXES, ACCORDEONS, HARMONICAS, CONCERTINAS, &c., &c.,
394 Broadway, near Canal St., N.Y.
Parlor Ornaments, latest novelties in Toys, Fancy and Ornamental Goods constantly arriving to supply the general demand.

HARPER & BROTHERS'
SPECIAL TRADE SALE,
1871.
FROM AUG. 21 TO SEPT. 30.
FRANKLIN SQUARE,
NEW YORK, August, 1871.
We invite the attention of Booksellers to our Special List of Books, which we will sell on the following terms, for Cash, from the 21st of August to the 30th of September, after which our terms will positively be as heretofore.
On Orders of $ 100 at one time, 25 per cent. discount;
" $ 500 " 30 " "
" $1000 " 33⅓ " "
" $2000 " 35 " "
And an additional deduction of Five per cent. for Cash.
The Special List will be furnished to Booksellers on application to the Publishers.
HARPER & BROTHERS.

FOR
Hand and Machine Sewing.
J. & P. COATS'
BEST
SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,
From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.
FOR SALE BY
All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

AMERICAN GUIDE TO EUROPE.
Harper's Hand-Book for Travelers in Europe and the East: being a Guide through Great Britain and Ireland, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Spain, Russia, Denmark, and Sweden. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. With numerous Maps and Plans of Cities. Tenth Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Tucks, $5 00.
This new, revised, and enlarged edition of Harper's Hand-Book contains the following Maps and Plans:
Railroad Map of Europe, 25 by 22 inches (in cover-pocket).—London, 35 by 27 inches (in cover-pocket).—Atlantic Routes.—Ireland.—Lakes of Killarney.—Dublin.—Belfast.—Great Britain, North.—Edinburgh.—Glasgow.—Environs of London.—Great Britain, South.—The Lake District.—Wales.—Paris.—Versailles.—Marseilles.—Nice.—Metz.—Strasbourg.—Antwerp.—Berlin.—Kings Garden, near Potsdam.—Hamburg.—Dresden.—Prague.—Vienna.—Pesth and Ofen.—Trieste.—Venice.—Verona.—Milan.—Bologna.—Turin.—Genoa.—Florence.—Plan of the Uffizi Gallery.—Pisa.—Rome.—Roman Forum.—Ancient Rome.—Palace of the Vatican.—Naples.—Museo Nationale.—Pompeii.—Palermo.—Egypt and Northern Nubia.—Cairo.—Thebes.—Palestine.—Jerusalem.—Church of the Holy Sepulchre.—Turkey in Asia.—Greece and the Ionian Islands.—Switzerland.—Munich.—Augsburg.—Nuremburg.—Carlsruhe.—Frankfort.—Cologne.—St. Petersburg.—Stockholm.—The Alhambra.
PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.
☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $5 00.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA,
with the Green-Tea Flavor. Warranted to suit all tastes. For sale every where. And for sale wholesale only by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 8 Church St., N.Y. P.O. Box 5506.
Send for Thea-Nectar Circular.

$10 A DAY with Stencil Tools. Samples free. Address A. E. GRAHAM, Springfield, Vt.

Digitized by Google

VELVET DEPARTMENT.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

will, on Monday, September 4,

Open on BROADWAY and TENTH ST. SECTION

an IMMENSE STOCK of

BLACK AND COLORED VELVETS AND VELVETEENS,

PURCHASED IN EUROPE

under most

FAVORABLE CIRCUMSTANCES, to which they request special attention.

Also,

A FULL ASSORTMENT

of

RICH COLORED GENOA VELVETS, ordered specially for

Jewel Cases and Photograph Frames, offering an

UNUSUAL DISPLAY

of the

NEWEST AND CHOICEST SHADES OF COLOR, to which the attention of MILLINERS and DRESSMAKERS is requested.

PRICES EXTREMELY LOW.

Orders by Mail promptly executed.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH & 10TH STS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street, New York, have made their first
FALL RETAIL OPENING
of
RICH PLAIN COLORED, FANCY, AND BLACK SILKS;
BLACK AND COLORED SATINS;
IRISH POPLINS;
"CACHIMIR SICILIENNE,"
The latest Novelty for Over-Dresses;
TRIMMING AND CLOAKING VELVETS, RIBBON VELVETS, VELVETEENS, ENGLISH AND FRENCH DRESS GOODS;
"ROBES DE CHAMBRE;"
FRENCH, ENGLISH, AND DOMESTIC PRINTS;
RICH LACES;
COLORED SILK GUIPURE TRIMMINGS;
PARIS AND HAMBURG EMBROIDERIES;
MOURNING GOODS,
A full and complete stock;
15 CASES of new and desirable patterns in INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS,
FRENCH CASHMERE SHAWLS,
LONG AND SQUARE WOOL SHAWLS, of every description.
FURNISHING GOODS
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Children.
Fall and Winter Hosiery, Gloves, Family and Household Linens, Cloths, Cassimeres, and Cloakings.
WHITE GOODS,
BLANKETS, FLANNELS, &c., &c.

The above forming the finest collection of RICH GOODS, containing all the LATEST NOVELTIES introduced in the European Markets this season, and selected with great care for FIRST-CLASS RETAIL SALES.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER

Is now regarded as the STANDARD BAKING POWDER, and the best article prepared for making light, wholesome and delicious BISCUITS, ROLLS, BREAD, GRIDDLE and other CAKES, &c., &c.

It is infallible, and always ready for immediate use. The best YEAST POWDER for use on long SEA VOYAGES to ANY PART OF THE GLOBE.

It is convenient and economical. NO WASTE OF FOOD PREPARED WITH IT. Sold everywhere by GROCERS, SHIP-CHANDLERS and DEALERS.

DOOLEY & BROTHER, Manufacturers,
WHOLESALE DEPOT,
69 NEW STREET, NEW YORK.

H. HENDERSON'S
FAMILY LIQUOR CASES.
Each Case containing One Bottle of

OLD PALE BRANDY,	HOLLAND GIN,
OLD RYE WHISKY,	OLD PALE SHERRY,
FINE OLD PORT,	OLD BOURBON.

Guaranteed Pure and of the very Best Quality.
PRICE SEVEN DOLLARS.
Sent by Express C. O. D., or Post-Office order.
H. HENDERSON, 15 Broad St., New York.

GETTING UP CLUBS.
Great Saving to Consumers.

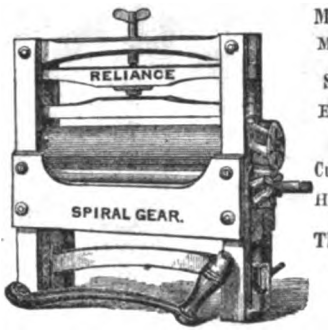
Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

WICKES'
ECLECTIC OIL
Is Pure, Safe, Sweet, and Economical.
J. H. WICKES,
120 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

$290 For first-class Pianos—Sent on trial—No Ag'ts. Address U. S. PIANO CO., 865 B'dway, N. Y.

RELIANCE WRINGER,
PERFECTED 1871.



Moulton Rolls, Most Durable;
Spiral Cogs, Easiest Working;
Curved Clamp, Holds Firmest;
The Cheapest,
The Best,
TRY IT.

PROVIDENCE TOOL COMPANY,
11 Warren St., N. Y., and PROV., R. I.

Cut Paper Patterns
OF
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS
IN
HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	No.	26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	"	30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	"	38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	"	40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	"	46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	"	48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	"	1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	"	5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	"	11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	13
POSTILION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	15
SHORT-SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	17
LADY'S TRAVELING SUIT	"	21
MISS'S POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 7 to 15 years old)	"	23
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)	"	25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)	"	27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)	"	29
BOY'S BLOUSE, SHIRT-WAIST, and KNICKERBOCKERS (for Boy from 4 to 9 years old)	"	31
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)	"	33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt)	"	35
MARGUERITE WALKING SUIT	"	37

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

BLEES
NOISELESS,
LOCK-STITCH
SEWING MACHINE
Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion. Call and examine. Send for circular. Agents wanted.
MANUFACTURED BY
BLEES
Sewing Machine Co.,
623 Broadway, N. Y.

ANGLING and FISH-CULTURE.

SCOTT'S book on "FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS," with 174 Illustrations, teaches the how and where to fish and propagate fishes. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 50. Mailed, prepaid, on receipt of price, by

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

CURLS. One package of Prof. Leos' MAGIC COMPOUND will instantly curl the straightest hair of either sex (without injury) into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls, in every case, or money refunded. Price 25 cents a package, postpaid, or three for 50 cents. Address E. HOLBROOK, Uxbridge, Mass.

BUILDERS and all who contemplate building, supplied with descriptive circular of "Village Builder." Address A. J. BICKNELL & CO., Publishers, 27 Warren St., N. Y.

UNPRECEDENTED SALES! — Wanted Agents to sell Pictures every where. One Agent has retailed over 9600 at 75 cents. Address, with stamp, WHITNEY & CO., Norwich, Conn.

RIFLES, Shot-Guns, Revolvers, Gun Material. Write for Price-List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents wanted.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

For particulars, address AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers, 331 Pearl St., New York.

Valuable New Books,
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

BULWER'S KING ARTHUR. King Arthur. A Poem. By EARL LYTTON. 12mo, Cloth, Illuminated, $1 50.

BROUGHAM'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY. The Life and Times of HENRY, LORD BROUGHAM. Written by Himself. Vols. I. and II. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per vol. (To be completed in Three Volumes.)

THE COUSIN FROM INDIA. A Book for Girls. By GEORGIANA M. CRAIK, Author of "Mildred," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

LITTLE SUNSHINE'S HOLIDAY: a Picture from Life. A Book for Girls. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." With Illustrations by Frölich. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

COMFORT'S GERMAN CONVERSATION. A Manual of German Conversation: to succeed "The German Course." By GEO. F. COMFORT, A.M., Author of "A German Course," "A German Reader," &c. 12mo, Half Leather, $1 50.

POTTER'S MANUAL OF READING. A Manual of Reading, in Four Parts: Orthophony, Class Methods, Gesture, and Elocution. Designed for Teachers and Students. By H. L. D. POTTER. 12mo, Cloth, $1 40.

ABBOTT'S FREDERICK THE GREAT. The History of Frederick the Second, called Frederick the Great. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. Elegantly Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

JEFFERSON'S DOMESTIC LIFE. The Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson: compiled from Family Letters and Reminiscences by his Great-Granddaughter, SARAH N. RANDOLPH. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Illuminated Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

AMERICAN GUIDE TO EUROPE. Harper's Hand-Book for Travelers in Europe and the East: being a Guide through Great Britain and Ireland, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Spain, Russia, Denmark, and Sweden. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. With numerous Maps and Plans of Cities. Tenth Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Tucks, $5 00.

LYELL'S STUDENT'S GEOLOGY. The Student's Elements of Geology. By Sir CHARLES LYELL, Bart., F.R.S., Author of "The Principles of Geology," "The Antiquity of Man," &c. With more than 600 Illustrations on Wood. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

REINDEER, DOGS, AND SNOW-SHOES. A Journal of Siberian Travel and Explorations made in the Years 1865-'67. By RICHARD J. BUSH, late of the Russo-American Telegraph Expedition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

SCIENCE FOR THE YOUNG. By JACOB ABBOTT, Copiously Illustrated.
HEAT. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.
LIGHT. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

Fresh Novels,
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

A DAUGHTER OF HETH. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "Kilmeny," "In Silk Attire," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

NEW LIBRARY EDITIONS by the Author of "John Halifax:"
OLIVE.—OGILVIES.—THE HEAD OF THE FAMILY.—JOHN HALIFAX.—AGATHA'S HUSBAND. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per volume.

A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Put Yourself in His Place," "Griffith Gaunt," "Hard Cash," "White Lies," "Foul Play," &c. With many Original Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 30 cents; 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

FOR LACK OF GOLD. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "Robin Gray." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE ISLAND NEIGHBORS. A Novel of American Life. By Mrs. A. B. BLACKWELL. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

WON—NOT WOOED. By the Author of "Bred in the Bone," "A Beggar on Horseback," "One of the Family," "Gwendoline's Harvest," "Carlyon's Year," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

NEW EDITIONS
OF BOOKS
PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

MUHLBACH'S BERNTHAL. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

BRAKESPEARE. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CHESTERFIELD'S WORKS. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

ROBINSON'S GREEK LEXICON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

BULWER'S RIENZI. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

MACAULAY'S ENGLAND, Vol. IV. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

BEECHER'S DOMESTIC RECEIPT-BOOK. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

BEECHER'S PHYSIOLOGY AND CALISTHENICS. 16mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

ARTHUR'S TONGUE OF FIRE. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

HER LORD AND MASTER. By FLORENCE MARYAT. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

READE'S NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 85 cents.

MONARCH OF MINCING-LANE. By W. BLACK. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines. * * * All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Harper's Bazar at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

HARPER'S WEEKLY
FOUR MONTHS FOR ONE DOLLAR.

"Poor Miss Finch,"

A new and beautifully illustrated serial story, by

WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "The Moonstone," &c., has just commenced in Harper's Weekly.

New Subscribers will be supplied with the WEEKLY from No. 766 [for September 2], in which Number this story began, to the close of the year, four months, for ONE DOLLAR.

HARPER'S WEEKLY contains ONE-THIRD more reading-matter, a larger number of Illustrations, and is conspicuously better Edited and Printed than any other Illustrated Newspaper. Its circulation is four times that of any similar publication.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Digitized by Google

FACETIÆ.

A NEWLY married man complains of the high price of "ducks." He says his wife recently paid for three of them—a duck of a bonnet, a duck of a dress, and a duck of a parasol.

NAUTICAL.—It is only a dishonest tar who would take a messmate's watch.

An amateur put the following question to a scholar in a country school: "How do you parse 'Mary milks the cow?'"

The last word was disposed of as follows, 'Cow is a noun, feminine gender, singular number, third person, and stands for Mary."

"Stands for Mary! How do you make that out?"

"Because," added the intelligent pupil, "if the cow didn't stand for Mary, how could Mary milk her?"

NEW SAINT.—Mrs. Partington declares that if she lives to be a hundred—and all her family detain a venerated age—she will certainly have a Saint 'Enery.

It has just been discovered that the story of William Tell and the apple was circumstantially told in an ancient Persian manuscript lately discovered in the library at Breslau. The authenticity of the Swiss Tell has been doubted. It is clear that he is a "story-Tell-er."

A fond parent often presents young hopeful with a watch at a time when he stands in far greater need of—a chain!

THE FATE OF FLOWERS—To be blowed.

Recently two persons traveling on the road to Gotham in a light wagon were smoking cigars, from the fire of which some straw at the bottom ignited. The flames soon drove them from their seats; and while they were busy in extinguishing the fire a countryman, who had been for some time following them on horseback, alighted to assist them.

"I have been watching the smoke for some time," said he.

"Why, then, did you not give us notice?" asked the travelers.

"Well," responded the rustic, "there are so many new-fangled notions nowadays, I thought you was going by steam."

A BAD THING FOR SMALL TRADESMEN TO BE OUT OF—Temper.

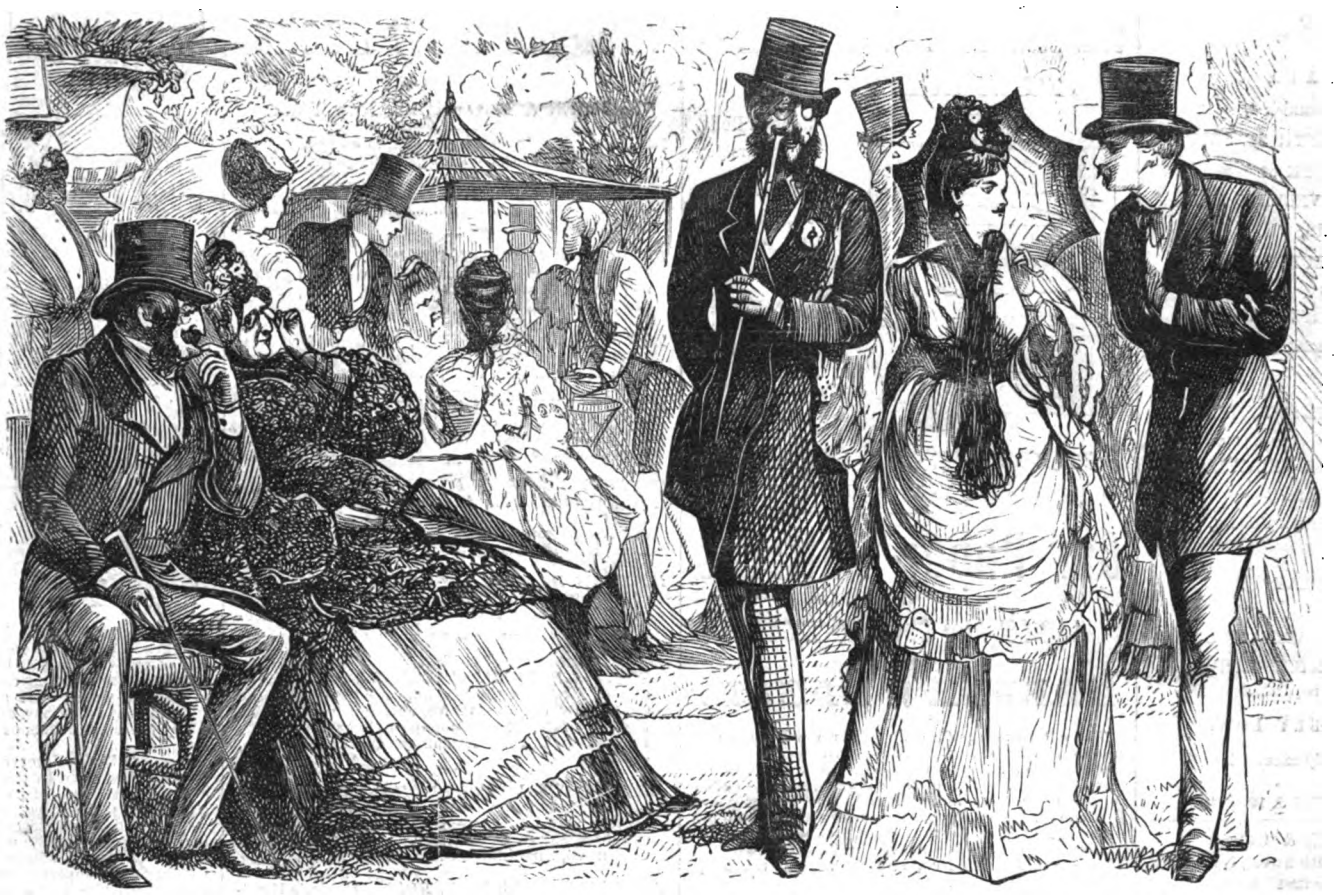
THE HEAT.

The pavements are all hissing hot, the sky above is brazen,
And every head's as good as dead the sun can set its rays on.
The lean, lank-looking skeletons go stalking pale and gloomy;
The fat, like red-hot frying-pans, send hotter fancies through me.
I wake from dreams of polar ice on which I've been a slider,
Like fishes dreaming of the sea and waking in the spider.

An editor who doesn't know much about farming suggests that for garden-making a cast iron back with a hinge in it would be an improvement on the spinal column now in use.

Why is it vulgar to use a wooden platter for the loaf?—Why, of course, because it is so under-bred.

The following is the conclusion of an epitaph on a tombstone: "She lived a life of virtue and died of the cholera morbus, caused by eating green fruit in the full hope of a blessed immortality, at the early age of twenty-one years, seven months, and sixteen days. Reader, go thou and do likewise."



HIGHLY INTERESTING!

ELDERLY BELLE. "Oh, that's Mrs. Wellesley de Crespigny Brown, is it? Er—who was she?"
OLD BEAU. "She was a Miss Chichester de Ponsonby Jones."
ELDERLY BELLE. "Ah!—one of the Berkshire Willoughby Digby Rigby de Ponsonby Joneses, I suppose?"
OLD BEAU. "No, no, my dear Lady! One of the Cholmondeley Chorley Hawley Crawley de Ponsonby Joneses, you know."
ELDERLY BELLE. "You don't say so, Major!"

COMING CENTENARIES.

Arrangements are in progress for celebrating with becoming splendor, within the next few years or so, the following important centenaries:

The centenary of the benefactor to his race who first compounded claret-cup.

The centenary of the friend to humanity who invented the game of croquet.

The bicentenary of the eminent philanthropist who introduced the umbrella into this damp country.

The tercentenary of the distinguished poet to whom a long posterity is indebted for most of its nursery rhymes. The arrangements for this commemoration are in the hands of a children's committee, aided by a "mothers' meeting."

The centenary of the great confectioner who made the first ice.

The centenary of the mechanician, of world-wide fame, who invented perambulators. The Associated Nurse-maids of the United States have already formed an influential committee.

The bicentenary of Robinson Crusoe.

The centenary of that brave woman who had the courage to defy custom, prejudice, the usages of society, the reproaches of her sex, and the opposition of monthly nurses, and exhibit her baby without a cap.

(N.B.—Many years' notice will be given of the celebration of our own centenary.)

EARLY PEARL—A baby's tooth.

A country paper tells this story of a new boy in one of the Sunday-schools: "The precocious youth was asked who made the beautiful hills about them, and replied that he did not know, as his parents only moved into town the day before."

A PRETTY HOOD—Childhood.

A MORE EXPENSIVE HOOD—Womanhood.

The "Origin of Speeches" may often be traced to the "Veuve Clicquôt."

A FEW PLAIN FACTS.

Man's a fool!
When it's hot he wants it cool;
When it's cold he wants it hot:
Ne'er contented with his lot.

When it's dry,
He for showers is sure to sigh;
When—to meet his wish—it rains,
Of the wet the fool complains.

Hot or cold, or dry or wet,
Nothing suits that he can get:
I consider, as a rule,
Man's a fool!

A CURE FOR DISSIPATION—Stay-at-homeopathy.

At a certain hotel in Ohio a large mirror is placed at the entrance of the dining-hall, which is so constructed that you see yourself a thin, cadaverous, hungry person; but when you come out from the table and look again in the glass, your body is distended in the extremity of corpulency.

HOW TO GET A ROARING TRADE—Buy a menagerie.

Of eighty-three ladies who left a popular place of amusement one day lately only nine came out of the door looking in the direction they meant to pursue; the rest took half a dozen paces while they were looking the contrary way. A person paid to take notes so reported, and a heavy wager was won on it.

WALKING-STICKS—Promenading swells.

TRYING.

A gentleman having sent his man-servant to buy some lucifer-matches, said to him when he came back, "I hope, John, they are better than the last, which were good for nothing."

"Oh, these are excellent," replied John; "I have tried every one of them!"

SOCIAL SCIENCE.

Ladies have lately been flooding us with small-talk upon this great matter. But we have looked in vain for a practical discussion of some branches of the subject wherewith ladies are especially well qualified to deal. For instance, we may specify such science as the following as being strictly social and eminently suitable for feminine harangues:

The science of obtaining a whole season's dinner invitations, and giving only cheap and early "evenings" in exchange.

The science of remaining in town half through the summer without ever losing caste among your fashionable friends through not being seen at fashionable watering-places.

The science of so hedging your bets at the races that you stand to win sufficient gloves to last you the whole season, and perhaps even to serve you for your next winter's campaign.

The science of inviting your second-best acquaintances to your second dance or dinner in such a way that they are not at all offended with you for omitting to include them with your first-rate friends.

The science of getting credit with your tradesmen for being far more worthy of it than you really are.

The science of so cleverly timing the arrival of your hack at a "swell" party that you appear to have come thither in the simultaneously arriving private brougham.

The science of procuring from mysteriously gifted people all kinds of concert, opera, and picture-show admissions as often as you want them.

The science of furbishing and befrilling your girls' last season's ball dresses so that the sharpest eyed and tongued of your feminine acquaintances fail to notice the economy, and publish their diverting comments on the fact.

The science of persuading a cross husband to dine upon cold mutton, and confess that he enjoys it.

The science of exalting yourself in fashionable esteem by somehow getting on such footing with some tremendous swell as enables you to greet him with a "How d' ye do?" whenever you may meet him.

The science of re-serving half the made dishes and sweets of your Wednesday's grand dinner in order to do duty at your Friday's family feed.

The science of procuring opera "stars" of the first magnitude to shine upon the company at your soirées musicales without having to pay them any thing more than a few compliments for their valuable aid.

The science, without seeming to sponge upon your friends, of getting carriages and footmen placed at your command whenever you require them.

The science of entrapping all the "lions" of the season to come and roar their loudest at your small and early evenings without your having the expense of entertaining them at feeding-time.

HOW TO OVERCOME YOUR SORROWS—Strike one of your own sighs.

A paper says that a team of horses, becoming frightened at the elevated railroad, ran away, and a policeman endeavored to stop them. The coach was broken, one horse nearly killed, and the officer badly hurt, "but the elevated railroad was uninjured."

Henry IV. of France being told by his gardener that there were several spots at Fontainebleau in which no vegetable would grow, requested him to transplant a bed of attorneys, for they would flourish any where.

PROVERBIAL PHOOLOSOPHY.

"A rolling stone gathers no moss," but Caleb was a still Balderstone.

"It's a poor heart that never rejoices," but there's a rich Heart Amid Loathin'.

"Mind your P's and Q's," but remember I've an O.

WHISKERANDOS AND TILBURINA.

COUSIN GUY AND MARY ARE LOOKING VERY INNOCENT, AND SITTING VERY FAR APART, WHEN EMILY COMES INTO THE ROOM. BUT NOW COMES GUY TO HAVE AN EAR-RING HANGING TO HIS WHISKER?

THE FAG-END OF A QUARREL.

STERN PARIENT. "Leave off that Noise Directly, Jack, you Naughty Boy! It's all over now, and Bertha's left off Crying these Ten Minutes."
JACK. "B-B-Bertha began Crying before I did! Boo hoo!"

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 39.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

LADIES' WALKING AND DINNER DRESSES.

Fig. 1.—LOUIS XIV. POLONAISE WALKING SUIT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). Fig. 2.—BROWN POPLIN WALKING SUIT. Fig. 3.—DINNER DRESS.

[Cut Paper Patterns of Louis XIV. Polonaise Walking Suit, graded to fit any Figure, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches, Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Digitized by Google

perfect, and herself an attractive object; in fact, she has only just become capable of enjoying and giving enjoyment in society; and so far from the young idiots who call her passée having any right to slurs in her regard, it is she who should be herself an arbiter of society, and have authority to pronounce whether or not they are in any sense fit to enter its charmed circles.

Indeed, it may well excite all the wonder that it does among Europeans that the young are here allowed to absorb all the enjoyments of our social life—the young, who have nothing but their youth or their beauty to give; whose minds and manners are almost totally untrained and insufficient; who are, indeed, objects of pleasure to the eye, and wherein they yield other pleasure or profit do so rather in a subsidiary way than in the main.

We do not wish to undervalue the element of innocence and freshness which the young bring, or are supposed to bring, with them; but we maintain that the virtue of years, with their knowledge of the world we live in, and their preparation for the world we hope to live in—their wisdom, their grace, and their charity—are of at least equal value, and deserve equal recognition in the places where men and women meet together; and we protest against the curving of the "contumelious lip" over the claims to courtesy and consideration of the woman beyond her girlhood; and we would beg to remind those who so flippantly deal her doom that the chosen companion of the great men of history, the friend, the lover, the one whom they have sought to enliven their hours and give rest to energies wearied with work, has not been the buxom belle with "all her blushing honors thick upon her," but, on the contrary, the object of their dread and their contempt, the passée girl.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Golden-Rods and Asters.

MY DEAR GRACE,—The summer is very beautiful; but are we not always pleased when the bright early September days come, with their cool air and their clear distances, and the landscape, lately the victim of passionate heats, is steadied with the tonic of autumn, the vital elixir? And how early the autumn shows itself! How soon the year begins to fall! Sometimes in July, even while we are panting in the sultriness, we see a yellow leaf, and know that the invisible autumn is already impatiently fingering the leaves, that October is eager to be in possession. By mid-August the golden-rods are flaming every where, and every kind of aster is dotting the dusk of the undergrowth with crisp stars of color. How affluent the season is! How profuse its supply of flowers! I walked the other day with Conrad, from whom nature seems to withhold no secret, and he told me the story of every tree and flower we saw, and of every bird we heard. The observations of science are as poetic as the speculations of the imagination. To walk and talk with a thoroughly informed man in the fields and woods is as inspiring as to read Shakespeare and Homer. The forms which have been merely a various mass, like printed letters to one who can not read, become instinct with the most delicate beauty, the most subtile suggestion.

To a man who has studied closely and observed faithfully the wild flowers are a calendar. He tells the time by blossoms. He begins with the trailing arbutus or trillium or houstonia, and ends only with the latest aster. Or he does not end at all, but hangs smilax and everlasting over his winter windows. The autumn flowers are trebly remarkable: they are very profuse, and brilliant, and scentless. They assert themselves to the eye more than those of the earlier season. Threading the shallow and shaded streams for trout you may find the splendid cardinal-flower, one of the richest of the wild blossoms; but it is choice, infrequent. Or in the moist meadow you may espy the coy arethusa, as gloomy Dis beheld Proserpina in the Sicilian vale. Or, if you know a spot that I know, you may even see a plantation of orchids (Orchis grandiflora), and raise your hat as to a congress of kings. But these are exceptional. You will not find a stream fringed for miles with cardinals, nor whole meadows purple with the arethusa, nor are there kings enough for many congresses. These are the jewels of the summer, worn now and then, here and there. But the lavish autumn gilds miles and miles of common highway with the gold and blue and white and purple of asters and solidago, and, a little later, with the fringed gentian, outpurpling the Tyrian dye.

Yet, if the plume of the golden-rod were as infrequent as the spike of the orchis, would it be more superb? If the delicate asters were as shy as the arethusa, would they be more prized in the finding? Perhaps so: but Conrad told me so much of these most common flowers that I was as interested as if they had all been choice exotics; and when he detailed the methods by which flowers that seemed hermetically sealed were multiplied—how an eager bee, seeking but a drop of honey, in getting it left an endless wealth of future flowers and honey behind—it seemed as if no study were so enticing and no knowledge so beautiful as that of flowers.

Yet the flowers themselves, with all their lovely history, are but symbols. As I take a country walk, meeting only some grave farmer, who nods to me as far away as if we were in different planets, or a gray rabbit, which peers at me and scuds to cover, I seem to myself to be again promenading the city street. That very rabbit I recognize as a friend in masquerade: the queer, shy, evasive Leander, who is as timorous and retiring as any hare. And if, climbing over the wall, I loiter down toward the brook, and observe the delicate and hardy lady's-traces, or the nodding and airy noli-me-tangere, I smile to recognize my familiar fellow-passengers of the city. There on the pond is the white water-lily. I like its learned name, Nymphæa odorata, but that also is no stranger. It is only the magnificent Aurelia whom I see daily driving in her chariot in the Park, ample, queenly, expanded, in luxurious repose. And, again plodding along the road, "who are these in bright array," this long, bright procession winding out of sight, these common golden-rods, these innumerable asters, but the infinite company of my fellow-travelers, who are sturdy, healthy, contented, and cheerfully commonplace?

This is all natural. Last June a friend in Oregon sent me some stones that had been taken out of the earth deep down in some mineral explorations, and upon those long-buried stones were landscape forms as plainly imprinted as if they had been indelibly painted or etched. Were they hints or studies or reminiscences of that vanished scenery? Surely it is no stranger that the familiar friends of to-day should be suggested to us by the flowers in solitary pastures than that the dim primordial landscape should be pictured on those long-hidden stones. And shall we be surprised if those friends, in turn, suggest the flowers? It is already autumn as I write to you, dear Grace, and our journey lies through the yellowing harvest fields. "The measured beat of the thresher's flail"—do you remember the noble thought of Goethe?—is heard on every side, and already the dahlias in the garden seem to fear the frost. I rise in the morning, if I am happily in the country, and before my bath I am baptized with the brilliant coolness of the air. There is a rose-diamond light; an exquisite transparency which invigorates and exhilarates, and before I come down to breakfast I seem to have shaken hands with Reginald, and to have heard his hearty, cheerful laugh, and to have been braced by that magnetic temperament—and yet the leaves of twenty autumns have fallen upon Reginald's grave.

I go to the door and step out, and the sweet September warmth, which is not withering, but inspiring, gathers me in an ample embrace, and seems to lay actual hands of benediction upon my head. It is a parent's blessing, which I shall never otherwise receive, but which is as familiar to me as if I felt it yesterday. And when after a morning of self-denial, doing my work, if I happen to have any, and wistfully turning my eyes to the great beneficent sunshine out-of-doors, which looks at me wonderingly through the windows, as if I were squandering a fortune in losing the day by staying in the house—when, after this morning, I go out for a walk, the maple-trees twinkle at me and the old locusts rustle, as if huge house-dogs wagged their welcoming tails, and I go bounding, my blood and my feet, until I find Placido, my contemporary and comrade.

He and Reginald and I were friends for many a year, and are no less so because Reginald is with us no longer. And as I walk by Placido's side, and hear his cheerful words, and feel the comfortable influence of his temperament—that steady, hearty, affectionate nature which is the happiest for itself and others—I seem to see what the profuse and sturdy golden-rods and asters around us remotely typify and suggest. When he comes to town they all come with him; and I am apt to think that those are very dull who, when Placido is by, do not hear the brook murmuring in the pasture, or see the bright and kindly autumnal flowers. Or, my dear Grace, have you never watched your grandmother, and remarked that that unostentatious and incessant self-sacrifice, that tireless patience, that noiseless care, that tender equanimity, are the bright flowers of her autumn, the golden-rods and asters that make her October so beautiful? In her younger years I could always see traces of these traits, but they were like those orchids and arethusas, only sometimes found. But now the kindness and the cheer are perpetual; they are not the shy and hidden treasures of a meadow, but the continuous beauty and charm of the highway.

I think, dear Grace, if it is not following a fancy too finely, that we can sometimes see the same flowering in genius. In later works of the same hand there is a certain uniform tranquillity of tone—a more pervasive gentleness and kindness and charity. Indeed, in these early autumnal days, in the wide-lying wealth of golden-rod and aster, old age seems itself a kind of benediction. How many of us secretly deplore the inevitable necessity! How many grudge to count the lapsing years, and reluctantly and sadly own to themselves that they are young no longer! With age come pains and sorrows, they think, disillusions and bereavements of every kind. The children grow up; their merry voices are heard no more; they marry and depart, and the home resumes the silence of the honey-moon—a silence, alas! without hope of being broken. With youth go love and ecstasy: the purple light, the bloom of dawn, the dream of the unimaginable future! But it is only youth that thinks so, dear Grace; for who have been the happiest human beings you have known?

Is the coy purple of the arethusa in the meadow more beautiful than that of the fringed gentian by the way? Is the gold of the dog-tooth violet in May more splendid than that of this universal golden-rod? That fiery passion, that proud disdain, that eager grasp of youth, are they more satisfactory than the contemplative repose, the charity, the sweet humor of a later day? Who, indeed, would have it always June, or always Indian summer? And who would supplant the flowers of May by those of September? Not you and I, dear Grace—you, who are wreathed with roses; I, who hold an aster. These autumn days, these tranquil splendors, these abundant flowers, plead for themselves. In September how perfect September seems! You, too, will discover it when you have left June behind. You pass the Cape of Good Hope, and all the way seems doubtful. But yet you are sailing straight to the Spice Islands. You glide under new constellations, as in traversing the year you pass among constantly changing flowers.

"There is no great and no small
To the God who loveth all;"

and the season of golden-rods and asters is as beautiful as that of lilies and roses.

Your affectionate friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

LADIES' WALKING AND DINNER DRESSES.

See illustration on first page.

Fig. 1.—LOUIS XIV. POLONAISE WALKING SUIT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). This new and stylish polonaise, with a Louis XIV. vest, is copied from a model recently imported from the celebrated Parisian dress-maker, Worth. The original is of heavy black gros grain, trimmed with two rows of double folds of the same, separated by passementerie gimp and deep black silk fringe. It is made with a vest, and with a Watteau fold in the back, in the manner more fully described in the description of the cut paper pattern and the article on New York Fashions. The skirt of the suit is of the same material as the polonaise, and is trimmed with flounces and folds. The polonaise may be made in suits, or of a different material from the skirt, such as velvet, cloth, or cashmere. The size is taken, as usual, by passing a tape measure entirely around the body, across the largest part of the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the bust. Nine sizes are furnished, in the even numbers, from 30 to 46 inches, bust measure.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises two articles—Louis XIV. polonaise, and walking skirt.

LOUIS XIV. POLONAISE.—This pattern is in six pieces—front, side piece, Watteau back, vest, sleeve, and pocket. Only half the pattern is given. The vest is sewed, with the front of the polonaise, into the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and is closely fitted with two darts, descending to the bottom at each side of the middle of the front and cross basque seams. The back is in three pieces, the middle forming a deep box-pleat or Watteau fold, which is confined at the waist line by a belt sewed under the fold, and fastened in front under the vest. The Watteau fold is formed by bringing the five lines of perforations evenly one on the other, from the neck to the waist line. The vest is closed with six buttons from the neck to the waist; below the waist it springs open as is seen in the illustration. Cut the middle of the back with the longest straight edge of the pattern laid on the fold of the cloth, to avoid making a seam, and join the pattern together by the notches, bringing the seams of the side piece in the back under the fold. Sew the flowing sleeve plain into the armhole. Trim the bottom of the sleeves and polonaise with two double bias folds and fringe. The perforations show where to baste the seams, to take up the darts and cross basque seams, to fold for the pleats, and to sew on the pockets.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 9 yards.
Quantity of fringe, 5½ yards.
Quantity of silk for folds, 1½ yards.
Buttons, 9.

WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is cut with a

Digitized by Google

front gore, side gore, and three straight breadths for the back. Only half the pattern is given. The front and side gores are sewed plain on the belt. The back breadths are laid in box-pleats, and sewed to the belt in this wise. The front gore is trimmed the whole length with six flounces, laid in small kilt pleats, with a bias fold stitched about an inch from the top of each flounce to form a heading. The three lower flounces extend around the bottom of the skirt. Put the seams together by the notches. The front gore and middle of the back breadth are to be laid on the fold of the cloth to avoid making a seam.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8 yards.

Extra for trimming, 4 yards.

Silk for folds, cut on the bias, ½ yard.

Fig. 2.—BROWN POPLIN WALKING SUIT. The skirt of this suit is trimmed with six bias folds. Over-skirt open in front, puffed at the back, and trimmed with two bias folds and fringe. Short single-breasted sacque, with flowing sleeves, trimmed with folds and fringe, and worn over a plain waist with close sleeves. Leghorn hat trimmed with brown ribbon and feathers.

Fig. 3.—PEARL GRAY SILK DINNER DRESS, trimmed with side-pleated flounces and bows of blue silk ribbon. Over-skirt draped at the side with ribbon bows. Basque-waist, heart-shaped in front, with flowing sleeves.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

LOUIS XIV. VEST-POLONAISE.

THE Louis XIV. Vest-Polonaise illustrated on our first page is one of the handsomest garments found among the importations. It is used as an over dress for suits, and is also brought out in velvet cloaks. It embraces some of the most important features of the new costumes—viz., the broad square vest, the straight skirt, and the flowing sleeve. The waist and skirt are cut together. The vest is joined to the waist at the shoulder seams, and darts in the front fit the garment closely to the figure. The vest falls six or eight inches below the waist, and is usually left open that length, though there are buttons and button-holes its entire length. At the back there is a double box-pleat, which differs from the Watteau fold in being sewed flatly from the neck to the waist, thence falling in a wide pleat below. The skirt is not draped or looped, but hangs straight and nearly plain all around—a plan to be commended for velvet, as the pleats and gathers of drapery deface its rich pile. Flowing or half-open sleeves are on all outside garments. Fringe or lace, with folds or passementerie, trim the lower edge of the polonaise and the sleeves; the folds only extend up the front. The pockets are nearly square—a trifle broader than their length—and are set on the outside. When this garment is made of cashmere or other woolen fabric the vest and trimming folds are usually of silk; when the polonaise is silk the vest is velvet; in velvet polonaises the vest is velvet also. Suits for winter made after this fashion will have an extra pair of coat sleeves, or will dispense altogether with the flowing sleeve. The dress skirt is usually trimmed with flat trimming, pleatings, or merely folds, and these extend across the front width that is disclosed by the open polonaise.

IMPORTED SUITS.

Fall suits have arrived from Paris and Berlin. Poplin de laine (a thick all-wool delaine), cashmere, poplin, and serge are the woolen fabrics. Walnut brown, plum-color, and deepest cypress green are the colors most seen.

There is no marked change in style; hence garments left from last season can be easily modernized. The polonaise, more or less ample, with or without drapery, prevails. The pretty Russian cape that accompanies it is its newest and most pleasing attribute. This cape falls just below the elbow, has shoulder seams, instead of being all in one piece, as the talma is, and has an upper cape half its size, which may be merely simulated by trimming, and is always open up the back. This wrap gives an appearance of breadth to narrow shoulders, and when flannel-lined will be a comfortable addition to winter suits. Another novel feature is a polonaise with basque back, not in postilion pleats, but plain, the back comprising but two pieces joined by a seam down the centre, and without side forms. This garment is only half long, and, like many other new polonaises, hangs straight around, without being shortened by pleats on the sides or in front. Still another fancy is polonaises of satin-striped woolen goods, worn over plain skirts of the same color, trimmed with narrow straight ruffles of the striped fabric. These are especially admired in Russian gray and dark Vandyck brown poplins.

The short convenient paletots with upper skirts are not yet relinquished. The newest paletots, instead of being slashed open in each seam, are cut in deep Gothic points, each form at the side and back making a single point. When closely fitted in the back a cape is also added for greater warmth. Some new upper skirts are buttoned down the back. They have an apron front, a side gore, and two back breadths that are pleated to lengthwise bands down the centre, whereon the buttons and holes appear.

An ornamental way of draping upper skirts is to place five or six buttons two inches apart halfway down the side and back seams, with loops under all but the top button, each loop passing over the button above it.

Flat bands, folds, and pleatings will be the trimmings most used; braiding and embroidery abound, and fur borders will be used in midwinter. For braiding the best plan is to cut a bias band of the fabric about two inches wide, line with stiff muslin, and braid it before sewing on the dress skirt. Three such bands are placed straight around the skirt, with a narrow pleating on the edge, or else they are used as headings to pleatings. A simple and effective design is three straight rows of braid, with a curled row on each side. Velvet and velveteen will also be much used for trimming during the coming season.

A graceful French suit is of dove gray poplin de laine, as soft as cashmere, but with thick lengthwise threads. On the skirt is a deep kilt pleating, straight, in inch-wide pleats, the edges hemmed and tacked on the under side to hold the pleats securely. An inch below the top is a bias band braided with narrow soutache (silk braid) of the same shade. The polonaise shows only a pointed basque in front, disclosing the entire front width of the skirt, which is elaborately braided. The basque back, with centre seam and no side form, is cut in Gothic points, from beneath which fall the two slightly looped widths that make the polonaise skirt. A walnut brown suit of the same style and fabric has no braiding, but plain bias bands, piped with narrower bands, heading three rows of side pleating, each a finger deep. Coat sleeves, with the trimming around the wrist and up the outer seam to the elbow. A pretty gray poplin has two straight gathered ruffles, widely faced with poplin of a lighter shade. The polonaise has a light bias band and fringe on the edge. A Russian cape finishes the suit. A bias fold and fringe trim the lower cape, the upper has only a fold.

The handsomest black silk suits seen are those made with the Marguerite polonaise. The edge of the polonaise is cut in deep Gothic points, three or four inches deep; the entire point is covered with black velvet, and a tassel droops in the space between the points. The skirt has two gathered flounces trimmed with velvet points and tassels. Suits made in the same way of plum-colored silk and of dove gray are being prepared for wedding trousseaux.

FLANNEL POLONAISES.

A new feature in fall costumes is a polonaise of flannel, to be worn over a black or brown silk skirt. The fine French flannel imported for these garments is printed in gay chintz figures, like the cretonnes of summer; the polonaise is in Marguerite shape; and the trimming is black velvet ribbon around the garment, with velvet bows up the front and on the back. For ladies of quiet tastes black and white striped flannel is used. The broad Marie Antoinette collar, large square cuff, and pocket flaps are of black velvet. Immense button-moulds, covered with velvet, fasten the front, and take the place of the bows behind.

Modistes are arranging the drapery of the Marguerite polonaise in a new way that dispenses with the bows. They cut off the skirt of the two breadths in the centre of the back just below the plain part, and sew it on in box-pleats, leaving an inch-wide frill at the top. This frill should first be lined with silk or velvet like the trimming, and should fall over slightly to show the facing.

VELVETS AND VELVETEENS.

Indications are that velvet suits will be the ultimatum of richness in winter costumes, and that there will be a return to the velveteens that lost favor last year because they were not imported in choice colors and quality. For handsome costumes there is a new velvet, with Lisle-thread back, that has a rich, lustrous pile, difficult to distinguish from the real silk velvets. It is in all the dark, invisible colors, Vandyck, and scabieuse, for $7 a yard. Rich Lyons velvets, for cloaks and costumes, are shown in dark shades and black for $16 a yard, measuring twenty-eight inches in width. The German velvets, all silk, but of light quality and narrow trimming width, ranging from sixteen to twenty inches, cost from $5 to $10 a yard. These are used for jackets and basques also. The German trimming velvet for which there is most demand is silk pile on cotton back. This costs from $2 to $6. Royale, or uncut velvet, is $4 50. Striped velvet and satin alternately is shown for petticoats beneath velvet over dresses. Velveteens in the dark, stylish colors, for costumes and for trimming, cost $2 and $2 50 a yard.

BLACK ALPACAS AND MOHAIRS.

Black alpaca, like black silk, is a standard fabric, suitable for all seasons, and is found in all qualities and at all prices, from 40 or 50 cents to $1 50 a yard. The buffalo alpaca, made of fine wool, and of a lustrous black, is worthy of special commendation. Still finer and more glossy are the pretty beaver mohair and sable brilliantine, fancifully named from the animals with which they are ticketed, and rivaling silk in appearance. The otter alpaca is a cheaper but substantial variety of the same kind of goods.

INDIA SHAWLS.

A reversible India shawl is seen this season. Ladies complain that thin cashmere centres of shawls are not warm enough across their shoulders, or strong enough to support heavily wrought borders. To obviate this the square centre is now made double, black cashmere on one side, scarlet on the other, giving variety as well as warmth. The handsomest reversible shawl shown is $400. Very little Magenta red appears in the new shawls, the preference being for quaint undecided colors that look faded by time. Scarlet centres are most often bought in bordered shawls, as they can be dyed black when the wearer tires of them. The striped India shawl, square or double, costing from $40 to $175, is an economical outlay of money, as it gives great warmth and never wears out. This is worn as a carriage and traveling wrap in New York, but Boston ladies are so fond of it that they wear it on more dressy occasions. Dealers call it the Boston shawl, as nine out of ten sold here are said to be for Boston people. The India scarfs worn so much last year instead of furs cost from $15 to $50.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; THOMSON, LANGDON, & Co.; WILSON & GREIGG; and PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & Co.

PERSONAL.

MRS. ISAAC W. ENGLAND, wife of the publisher of the Sun, whose death took place in Norwalk, Connecticut, a few days since, is made the subject of a feeling obituary notice in the Norwalk Gazette, from which we quote the following: "Mrs. ENGLAND was a woman rarely endowed with all the home virtues, peculiarly unobtrusive and retiring, with heart and soul devoted to the welfare of her family; yet such was her amiability and sweetness of disposition that all who ever knew her were irresistibly charmed and attached to her by a sincere and lasting affection; so that to-day the family with whom she has made her home feel as sorely bereaved as if she were their kin and sister. Her beautiful life, and calm, patient facing of the king of terrors in firm Christian faith, must prove a source of sweetest consolation to husband and children, now so terribly stricken and bereaved."

—Alluding to the Russian minister, and to the rumor of his recall at the request of this government, the Washington Republican states, on the contrary, that M. CATACAZY will not be recalled, but will probably receive some mark of high approval from his government.

—Rev. Dr. MASON, of Newburyport, recently killed by the railway accident at Revere, was thoughtful enough some time since to have effected a $5000 insurance on his life.

—Mrs. LIZZIE STARK NEWELL, granddaughter of the hero of the battle of Bennington, has been spending a few days with some old friends. The old original "Green Mountaineer"—the STARK of Bennington—just before going into battle made a little stump-speech to his boys, which is thus paraphrased by HALLECK, in his poem entitled "Connecticut:"

When on that field his band the Hessians fought,
Briefly he spoke before the fight began:
"Soldiers! those German gentlemen are bought
For four pound eight and sevenpence per man
By England's king: a bargain, as is thought.
Are we worth more? Let's prove it now we can;
For we must beat them, boys, ere set of sun,
Or Mary Stark's a widow." It was done.

—Mr. SAMPSON, of North Adams, Massachusetts, says that the "Heathen Chinee" shoemakers he took there a year ago have already saved him $40,000. They produce ten per cent. more work in a day than the trades' union men who proposed to take charge of his business.

—Mr. JOAQUIN MILLER, who has been spending a few days in this city, and enjoying himself at the clubs and with literary folk, proposes soon to visit California, thence to South America for the winter, and return to New York in the spring. In person Mr. MILLER is above the medium height, of fair complexion, with much brown hair, and full beard. His manner is extremely modest. Society he rather shuns than seeks, though he is by no means awkward, and his conversation is particularly bright and agreeable.

—Professor HITCHCOCK, who is making a tour of the agricultural colleges, and poking about into all sorts of things by direction of the Secretary of the Interior, has found some fine amethysts near the Passaconnaway slide. He considers Waterville the richest place in geology he has ever struck.

—LOUIS BLANC is thus described by a gentleman who recently had a private interview with him:...."So spoke le petit bon homme—something like a little monk: two small, piercing brown eyes; long black hair, combed back over his head; good, classical nose, thin lips, and a tout ensemble of a 'do and dare' character, which would ascend the tribune or—the guillotine."

—Mr. JOHN BIGELOW, formerly United States minister to France, and now residing with his family in Berlin, has published in London a pamphlet aiming to show that the French have nothing to hope from a monarchical form of government.

—Dr. DÖLLINGER is going to England for repose. The attentions paid to him at home are so troublesome that he can not stand them.

—JULIAN HAWTHORNE, only son of the novelist, is a civil engineer, but writes stories, and is so fond of it that he will probably make literature his profession. One of his recent tales shows the same tendency toward the mysterious and strange workings of the human mind that HAWTHORNE himself had so much of.

—The Rev. Dr. THRALL, rector of Emanuel Church, in this city, has deemed it the path of duty to dissociate himself from the Episcopal Church, and has requested Bishop POTTER to erase his name from the list of clergy. Dr. T. finds so many things in the Book of Common Prayer that he thinks not exactly the thing that he has determined to secede. His congregation go with him in the "new departure."

—The Rev. R. W. CHURCH, who has been appointed to the vacant Deanery of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, is a gentleman of fine abilities and culture, having taken first-class honors at Oxford in 1836, and since then written various essays, etc. He is regarded as one of the best scholars in England.

—Princess ALICE, of Hesse-Darmstadt, a daughter of Queen VICTORIA, publishes a novel in a Hessian periodical. It is written in German, and entitled "Ways of Life." It describes social life in the higher classes of Southern Germany.

—It is said that Mrs. LINCOLN, since the death of her son "Tad," has been in failing health.

—Speaking of the Rev. Dr. GANNETT, killed in the late railway accident near Boston, the Boston Transcript says: "If ever a man lived who, in the rule of his own spirit, the sometimes hard task of self-discipline, the seeking for light, the asking for direction and help in devotion to the behests of duty, and duty alone—if ever a man lived whose endeavor was to hear his Master's voice and obey it as it fell on his own listening ear—such a man was this life-long, sincere, earnest, impassioned minister of the Gospel. Apart from all his many gifts and graces of intellect and heart—those that were of his nature and those that were of his ceaseless diligence—his conscientiousness will be ever remembered and emphasized as the central trait of his character—a trait so decided, so constantly on the alert, so keen and sensitive, that nothing hindered its manifestation, or could bend or bias it."

—Mr. DANIEL DREW, in company with other moneyed folk, proposes to build, and have in running order on the Hudson next summer, a steamer hotel, five hundred feet long, so buoyant, and with engines of such power, that she will be able to make twenty-eight miles an hour—leaving Albany for New York in the morning, and returning by 10 P.M., and furnishing to the weary traveler all the comforts of a happy home. With $600,000 they propose to do it.

—It is Miss PETTIBONE, of Maryland, who has bought a church for the Methodists, which she proposes to pay for by her needle. She has made the first payment, and has on hand four-and-twenty dresses, all in a row, made by her own hand without the aid of a machine, from the profits of which she expects to pay the second installment.

—The Rev. EDWARD PULLEN, an Oxford professor, author of "Dame Europa's School," has the additional happiness of having married Miss BRETA WATSON, of Burlington, New Jersey.

—Lieutenant FRED GRANT has made his first exploit as a civil engineer. BERHAND, a famous mountaineer and surveyor, led the young warrior out on the Colorado road from Clear Creek Cañon. The road is frightful; a misstep would be instant death. Lieutenant G. did the work admirably, and received the approving nod of the famous mountaineer.

—Mrs. CONWAY, who enjoys the unique distinction of being the only railroad contractress on the planet, is busily at work, with many laborers, upon her section of the Western Maryland Railroad. She is active and energetic at that sort of thing.

—King AMADEUS is on a sporting tour in the mountains of Aosta, where he has already killed a number of wild boars. The tame bores that hover about the court are permitted to survive.

—The Prince of the Asturias, son of Queen ISABELLA, was lately betrothed to MERCEDES, daughter of the Duke de Montpensier, in France, in presence of Queen ISABELLA and Queen CHRISTINA of Spain.

—Sir DUNCAN GIBB, at the recent meeting of the British Association at Edinburgh, read a paper on "Centenarian Longevity," the result of observation on the cases of four centenarians known to himself. Of the four two were males, each 103 years of age; and two females, aged 101 and 102. Sir DUNCAN detailed the completeness of the breathing apparatus in all four, the good size of the chest, and the healthy condition of the heart, which was particularly free from fat and its compounds, so often the source of trouble to old persons. There was one appearance of the countenance in all, that imparted a sort of silvery expression, with apparently great toughness of the skin, which the author deemed an essential peculiarity in persons over ninety. The senses were in good order, except that of hearing in the case of one. None used tobacco in any form, and all had good teeth. The author, therefore, came to the conclusion that, in order to reach the age of one hundred years, not only must the constitution be a naturally good and healthy one, but all the great functions of life must be performed without any impediment. The author's final remark, however, ought not to be overlooked—namely, that he believed all centenarians were tired of life, however extraordinary it might appear, and were thankful when it pleased God to remove them from this world.

—Mrs. NATHAN BAKER, of Nodaway County, Missouri, has four pairs of twins. She is thirty-seven years old, and the mother of nineteen children—almost two "Baker's dozen."

—Mr. JAMES BROOKS writes to the Express of the cost of opera-going in Yeddo: "All now that can interest you of this hard day's work is the opera bill, thus made out on Japanese teapaper two feet long, which, being translated, reads thus:

TOKEI, 5 month, 13 day (June 29), 1871.

Six gin-rick-a shas (carriage riding for six	6 boos	$1 50
Singing-girls	1 rio and 3 boos	1 75
Dancing-girls	3 rio and 1 boos	3 25
Beer	1 boos	25
Fish (for coolies) and saki	2 rio and 1 boos	2 25
		$9 00

All the cost for six U. S. Yankees, six Yakonins (guards), and six coolies, including the horses and carriage riding."

—For more than forty years the Hon. JONAS C. HEARTT, of Troy, New York, has camped on Fire Island beach during the summer. He is one of the oldest and most estimable of Trojans, and has been its chief magistrate.

—We take it that the Rev. JOHN TODD, of Pittsfield, has attained to as much of philosophic cheerfulness and happiness as it is possible to attain in the State of Massachusetts, which is not saying much. An enterprising traveler in that State, having "marched into the bowels of the land" as far as P. "without impediment," thus describes the home of that divine: In one room is a well-stocked library with rare books, ancient and modern, in different languages. In the centre of the room is a rippling fountain, and articles of beauty from kindly donors, with relics of the war. In this study the hand of the owner is seen in elegant book-cases made by himself, beautiful picture-frames from his own workshop, and little adornments turned from his own lathe to adorn a room where so many hours of brain-work are expended. Directly opposite is another room of entirely different character. Here is the veritable "Congregationalist Lathe" procured from the proceeds of his contributions to that paper, and so most aptly named; while another lathe of great value, elegant, and beautiful, is greatly prized by the owner, who points out its various graces with the enthusiasm of a collector of gems. Here is a collection of saws and screws, and clamps and planes, and vises and gouges, and mandrels and other tools, that would confuse any but a born mechanician, while shelves of acids and chemicals for polishing, with delicate anvils and tools of great variety, are kept in perfect order. One of the lathes' appliances performs two thousand revolutions in a minute, and is as delicate and graceful in its movements as the sweep of a bird through the air. If a tool is wanted for special use, the fertile brain of the doctor invents it, and his skilled hand brings it out of the rudest elements. He has a great variety of beautiful woods from different parts of the world, and a steam-engine so petite and fairy-like as to call forth commendations from the dullest looker-on. Every thing is arranged so systematically that the owner could put his hand on any one of over a thousand tools in the dark.

Digitized by Google

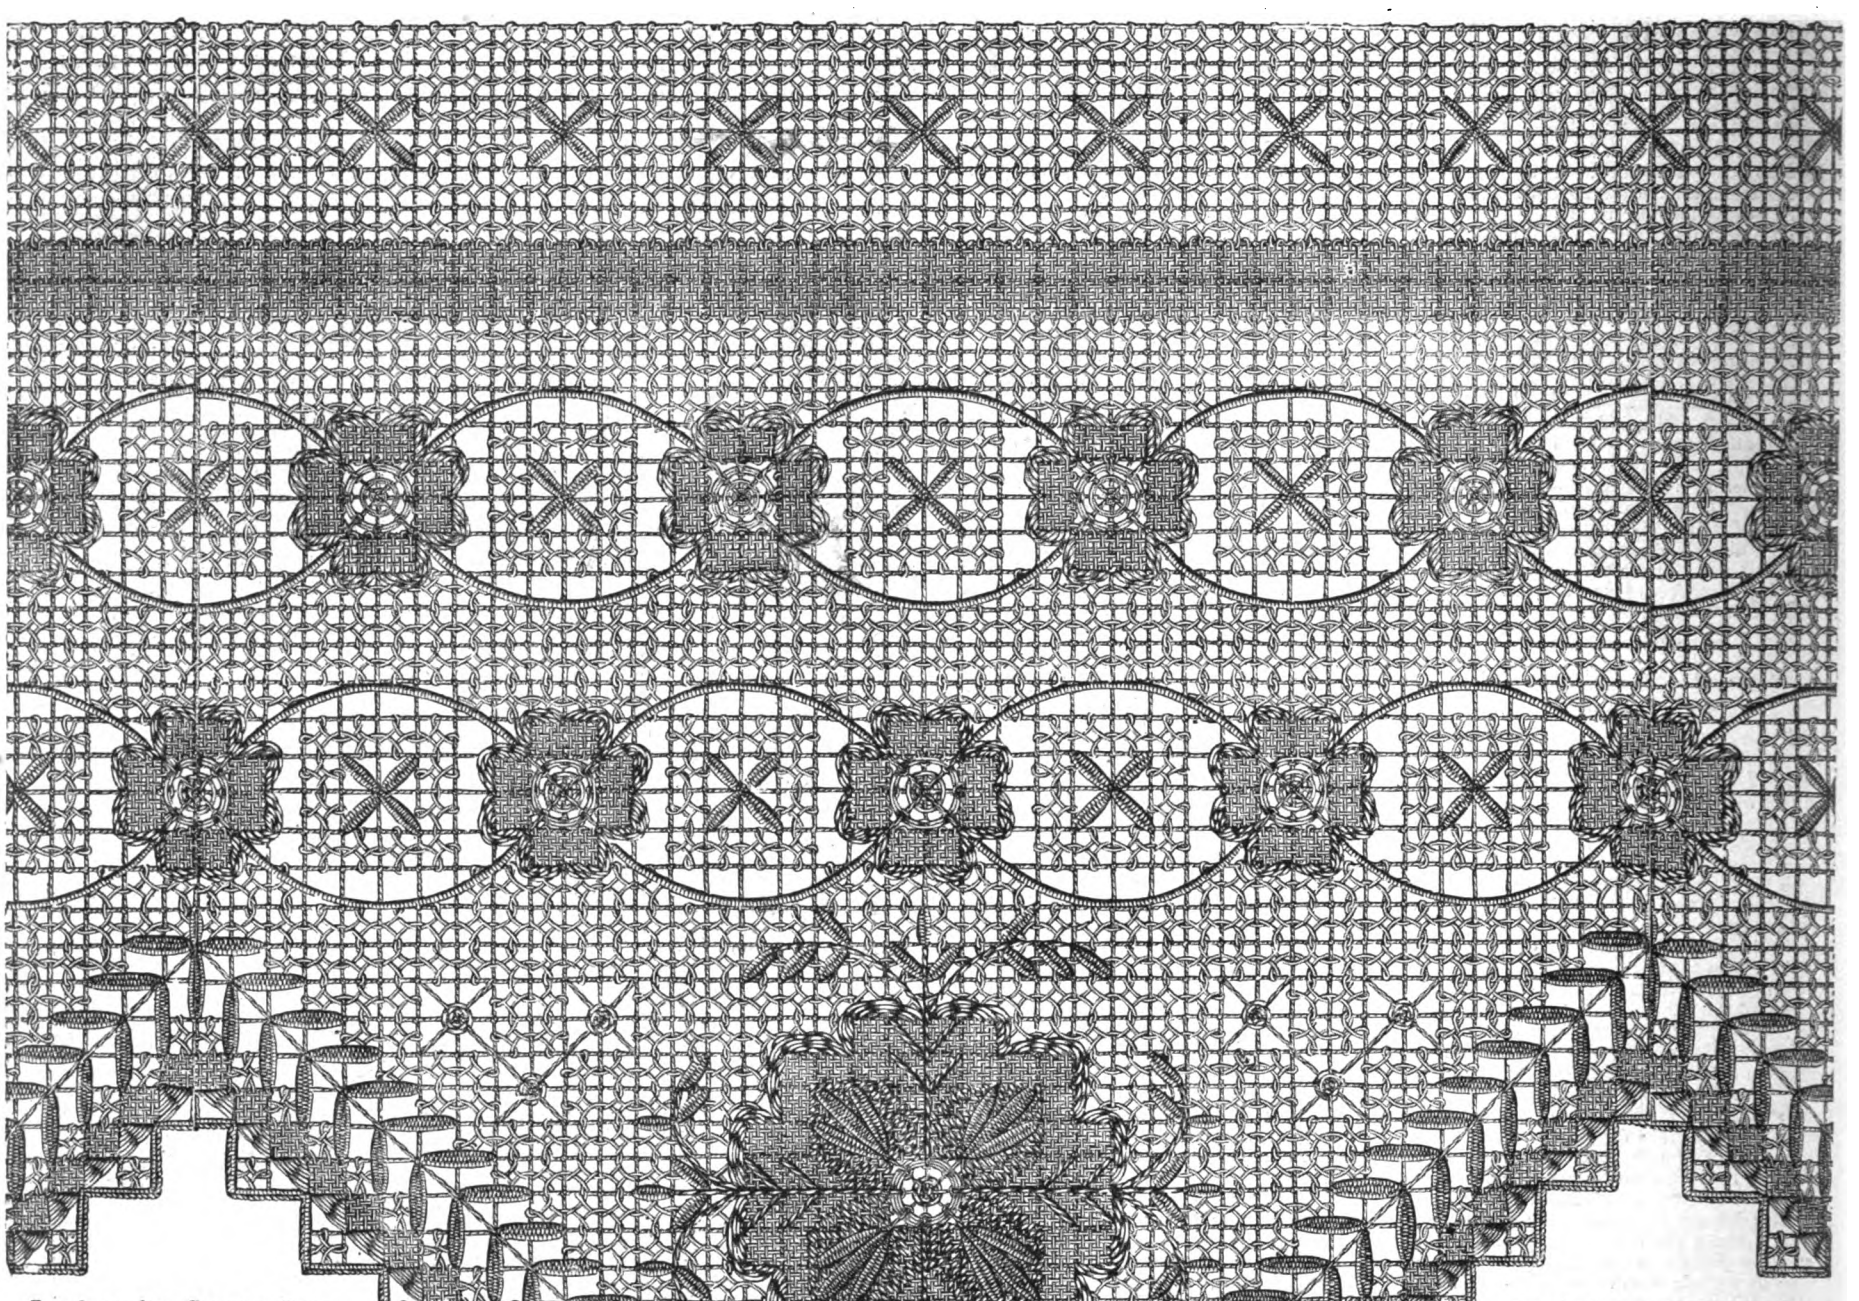

Fig. 1.—NETTED GUIPURE LAMBREQUIN FOR CURTAINS, ETC.

Lambrequins, Corners, Insertions, Edgings, Squares, Rosettes, etc., in Netted Guipure, Point Lace, Venetian, and Guipure Embroidery, Figs. 1–15.

THE designs given herewith are executed in netted guipure, point lace, Venetian embroidery, and guipure embroidery, and may be used for a great variety of purposes.

Fig. 1.—NETTED GUIPURE LAMBREQUIN. This lambrequin is especially suitable for window curtains, portières, brackets, shades, etc. For the foundation work with coarse linen thread, over a mesh three-fifths of an inch in circumference, a strip of the requisite length in straight netting, in the design shown by the illustration, in point de toile, point de reprise, and point d'esprit. Work also large and small wheels in the foundation. For each two rows of scallops in the middle of the foundation run a coarse thread, and cover this with close half-polka stitches. For the large flower in the point of the lambrequin work the foundation first in point de toile, and surround the outer edges of the figure with running stitches, as shown by the illustration. Work the part already embroidered in point de toile diagonally (see illustration), where the three-leaved figures shown by the illustration are afterward worked; then work the wheel, the three-leaved figures in point de reprise, and the stems in diagonal half-polka stitch. Work the outer edge of the foundation in points in button-hole stitch, and cut away the surplus material.

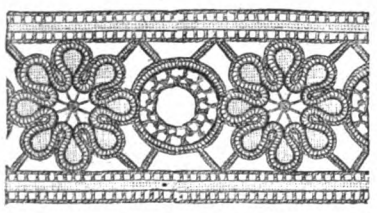

Fig. 2.—POINT LACE AND VENETIAN EMBROIDERY INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Fig. 2.—POINT LACE AND VENETIAN EMBROIDERY INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC. To work this insertion, transfer the design to a strip of linen of the requisite width, work, first, the flowers and the wheels in button-hole and lace stitch, baste a piece of point lace braid on each side of the embroidery, as shown by the illustration, and join this braid with the embroidery by means of short button-hole stitch bars (see illustration); where the braid intersects the embroidery join it with the latter, letting the stitches show as little as possible. Finally, cut away the linen foundation between the design figures and underneath the point lace braid as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 3.—NETTED GUIPURE INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC. For this insertion work in straight netting a foundation counting six squares in width over a mesh two-fifths of an inch in circumference. Work this foundation in point de toile, point de reprise, and point d'esprit in the manner shown by the illustration.

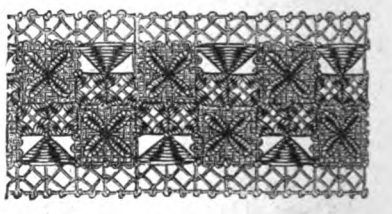

Fig. 3.—NETTED GUIPURE INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Fig. 4.—VENETIAN EMBROIDERY ROSETTE FOR LINGERIE, ETC. For the foundation of this rosette take very fine linen, cambric, or nansook, and embroider it in button-hole stitch in the design shown by the illustration. Underneath the button-hole stitch bars cut away the material.

Fig. 5.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR TIDIES, ETC.—VENETIAN EMBROIDERY. This border is worked in Venetian embroidery on a foundation of fine linen. The various lace stitches are worked with linen thread in the manner shown by the illustration.

Fig. 6.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR TIDIES, ETC.—LACE RUN WITH LINEN FLOSS. The foundation of this border is white lace, which is worked with white linen floss in the design shown by the illustration. Work the outer edge of the border in button-hole stitch.

Figs. 7 and 8.—NETTED GUIPURE BORDERS FOR PILLOW-SLIPS, COVERLETS, ETC. Both borders are worked in straight netting, and afterward embroidered in point

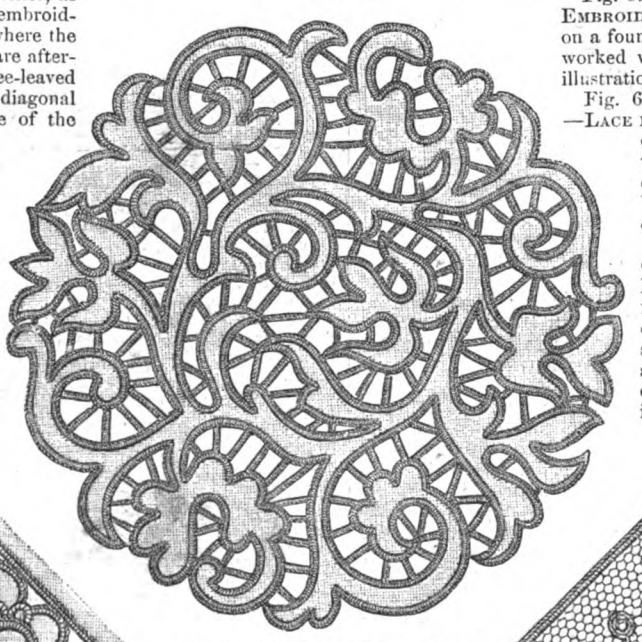

Fig. 4.—VENETIAN EMBROIDERY ROSETTE FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

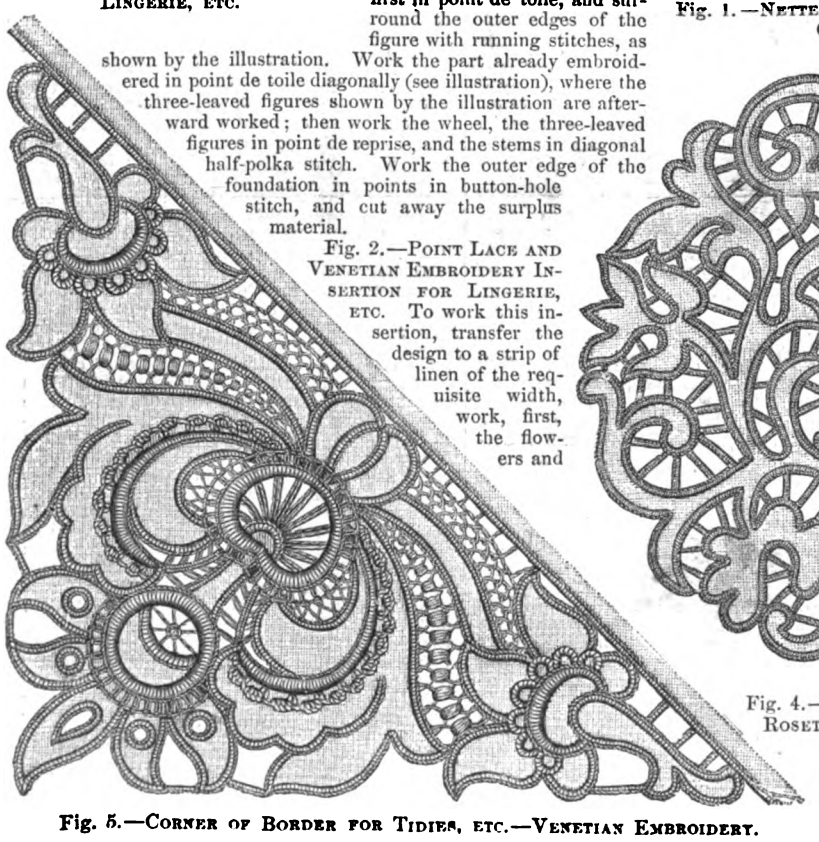

Fig. 5.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR TIDIES, ETC.—VENETIAN EMBROIDERY.

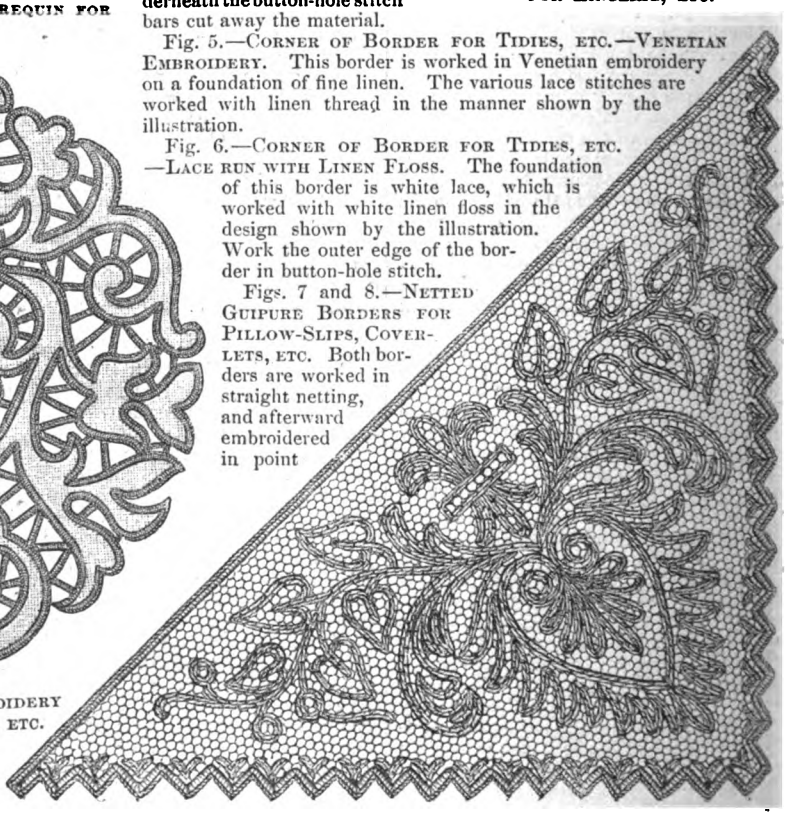

Fig. 6.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR TIDIES, ETC.—LACE RUN WITH LINEN FLOSS.

Digitized by Google

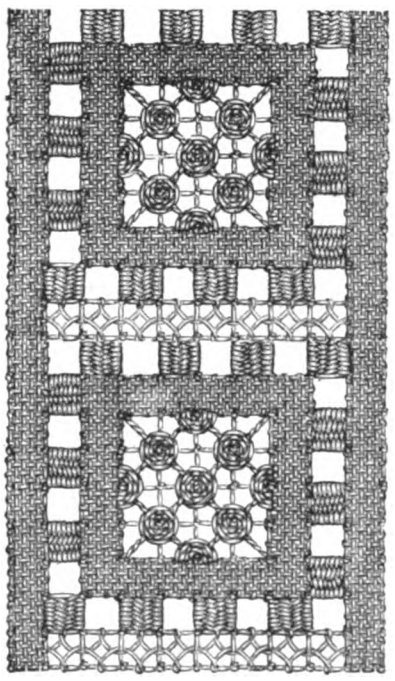

Fig. 7.—NETTED GUIPURE BORDER FOR PILLOW-SLIPS, COVERLETS, ETC.

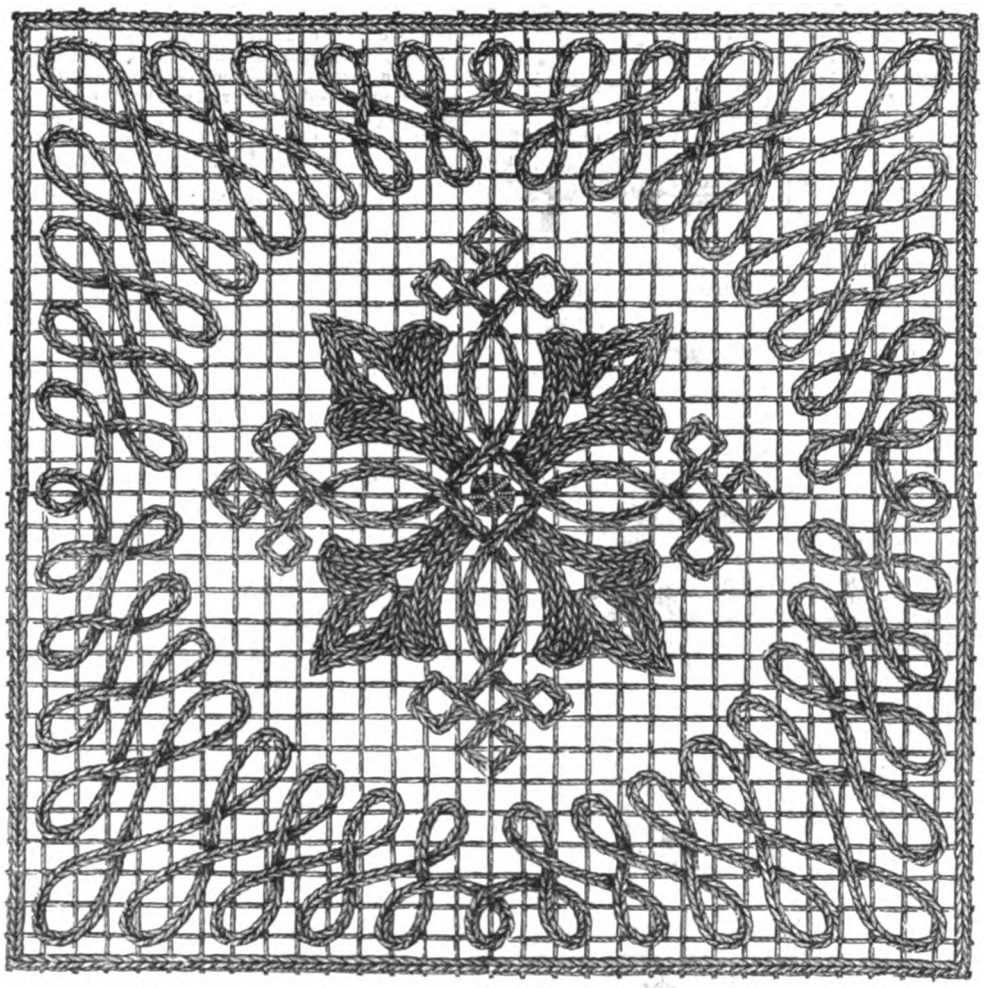

Fig. 9.—NETTED SQUARE WITH CHAIN STITCH FOR TOILETTE CUSHIONS, ETC.

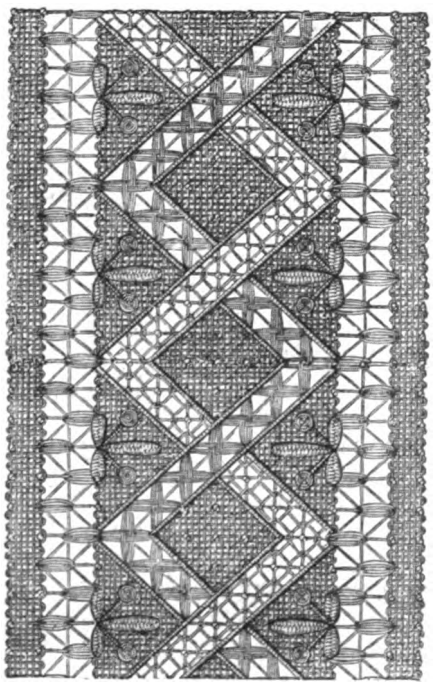

Fig. 8.—NETTED GUIPURE BORDER FOR PILLOW-SLIPS, COVERLETS, ETC.

d'esprit, point de toile, and point de reprise, and ornamented with wheels. For the straight lines and the stems run a coarse thread, and cover it with half-polka stitches, in doing which catch the threads of the foundation.

Fig. 9.—NETTED SQUARE ORNAMENTED WITH CHAIN STITCH EMBROIDERY. This square may be used as a cover for a toilette cushion, sewing-weight, etc., or several of them may be joined together to form a large cover. Work with coarse thread, over a mesh two-fifths of an inch in diameter, a square counting thirty squares (holes) each way. Stretch this foundation on cardboard, and ornament with chain stitch embroidery worked with coarse tatting cotton in the design shown by the illustration. The design must previously have been transferred to the cardboard.

Figs. 10 and 11.—NETTED GUIPURE EDGINGS FOR LINGERIE, ETC. For each of these edgings work a foundation of the requisite width in straight netting, and embroider them, in the designs shown by the illustration, in point de toile, point de reprise, and point d'esprit. Ornament with wheels. Button-hole stitch the outer edges in points, and cut away the surplus material. Work the pointed triangular figures shown by Fig. 11 in button-hole stitch.

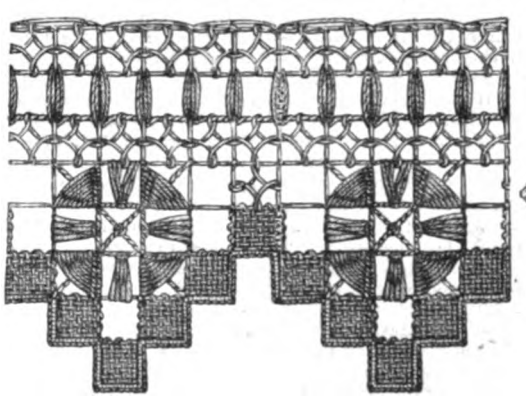

Fig. 10.—NETTED GUIPURE EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

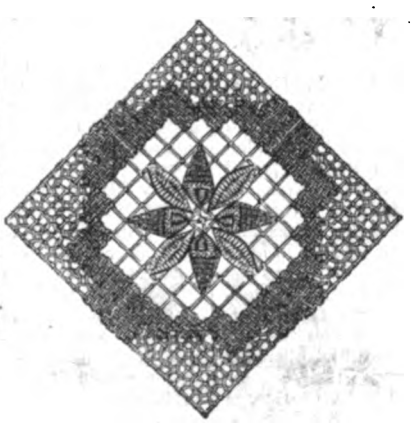

Fig. 12.—NETTED GUIPURE SQUARE FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

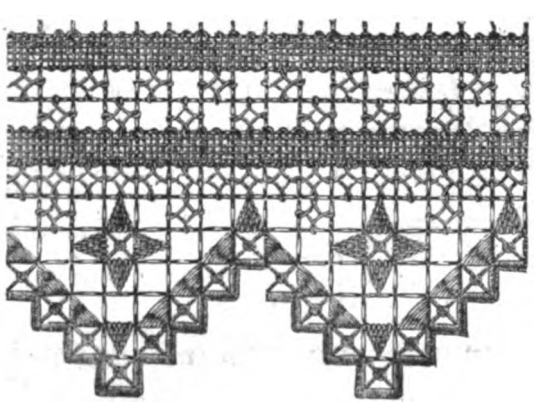

Fig. 11.—NETTED GUIPURE EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Fig. 12.—NETTED GUIPURE SQUARE FOR LINGERIE, ETC. The foundation of the square is made of straight netting, and it is afterward worked in point de toile, point d'esprit, and point de reprise. One-half of the pointed leaves are worked in button-hole stitch.

Figs. 13 and 14.—CORNERS OF BORDERS FOR HANDKERCHIEFS, ETC., IN GUIPURE EMBROIDERY. For the foundation of these borders take Swiss muslin, cambric, or any similar material, and on it work the embroidery with white embroidery cotton in satin and button-hole stitch, in doing which fasten at the same time the thread bars, which are stretched with tatting cotton in the manner shown by the illustration. In working Fig. 14, make small wheels. Cut away the material under the bars and wheels.

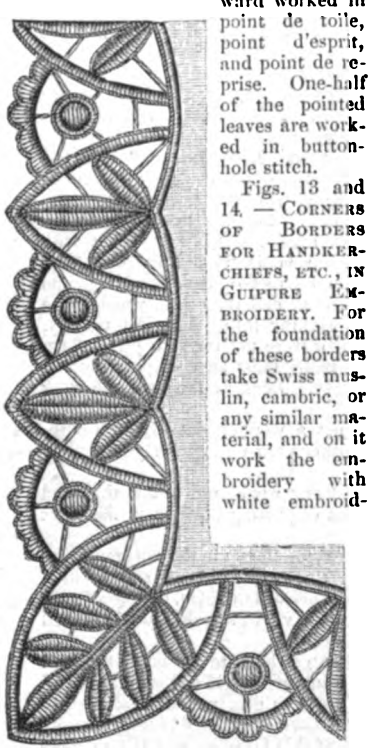

Fig. 13.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR HANDKERCHIEFS, ETC.—GUIPURE EMBROIDERY.

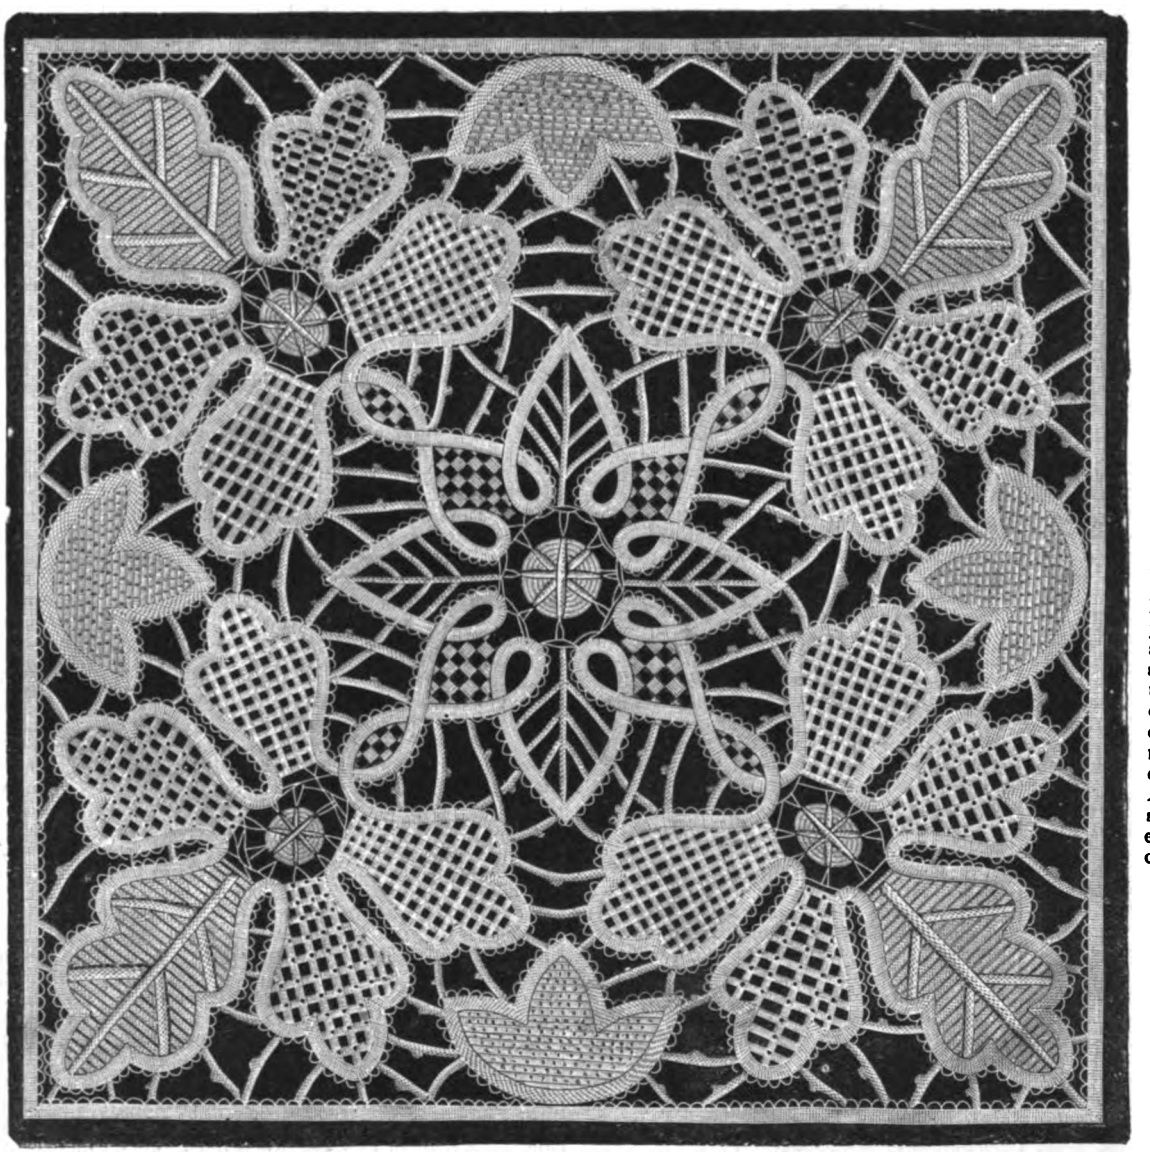

Fig. 15.—POINT LACE SQUARE FOR TOILETTE CUSHION COVER.

Fig. 15.—POINT LACE SQUARE FOR TOILETTE CUSHION COVER. For the edges of the figures baste on narrow point lace braid, and for the bars stretch fine guipure cord, which is ornamented with knots. Finally, fill out the design figures with various lace stitches worked with fine linen thread.

STANDING TREAT.

NO American custom occasions more genuine surprise and amusement among traveling foreigners than that which is known in our saloons as "treating," consisting in the entertainment of two or more with refreshments for which one volunteers to pay. It is a pure Americanism; all over the republic it is as common as in Europe it is unknown. The casual meeting of two men who have never before exchanged a word together is a signal for both to exclaim, "Come, let's have something!" and for both to go down in the nearest subterranean cavity below the sidewalk. The one who spoke first usually insists upon "paying the shot"—the word "shot" being a metaphorical reference to the deadly character of the substance usually taken into the stomach. If there is any thing more absurd than this habit, we are unable to put our finger upon it. Men do not always "treat" one another to car tickets because they happen to meet on the same seat. We never saw a man take out his pocket-book on encountering an acquaintance and say, "Ah, George! Delighted to see you! Do take a few postage stamps! It's my treat." A traveler may go all over the continent of Europe, of Asia, and of Africa without seeing any man except a Yankee offer to "treat;"

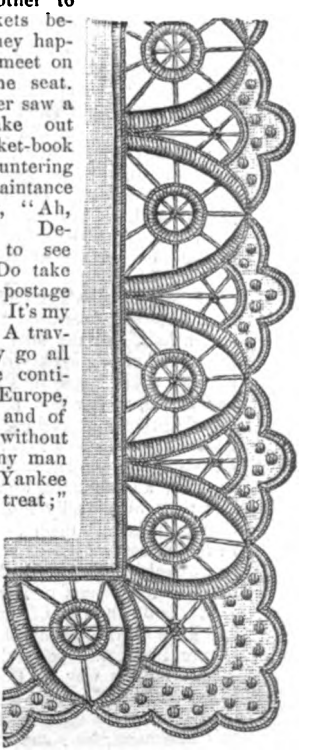

Fig. 14.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR HANDKERCHIEFS, ETC.—GUIPURE EMBROIDERY.

Digitized by Google

and the Frenchmen are quite social enough, but when they turn into a café to sip their wine or brandied coffee together, each man pays for his own. They never go into each other's pocket-book in the sacred name of friendship. They would as soon think of transferring to each other their washer-woman's bill. The preposterous fashion of "treating" is responsible for the terrible drunkenness in America. It is, take it all in all, the most ridiculous, the most unreasonable, and the most pestilent custom that ever laid its tyrannical hand on civilized human beings.

AGNES.

I OPEN again the garden door,
When the flowers live their little time,
And I stand, as you used to stand before,
By the rose-bush in its prime;

And I pluck one bud from the laden stem;
"This is for you," I say;
Then I take a leaf from the glowing gem,
And fling the rest away.

Now why should I place this single leaf
Where my other treasures lie?
And why should I keep it like the grief
That is seen in a thoughtful eye?

I keep it because it was thus you stood
That summer afternoon,
Plucking a rose in your maiden mood,
And humming a low sweet tune—

Humming a low sweet tune alone,
And watching, with half a smile,
The fairy rose leaves that were strewn
Around your feet the while.

And I stood in the shade of the garden door,
And heard you at your song,
And saw the rich leaves downward pour,
As the low wind came along.

Now, when Death has plucked your life's sweet bud,
And your footsteps are heard no more,
I think it a joy to stand where you stood,
By the rose at the garden door.

So I creep in, as beneath a fear,
And pluck, with trembling hand,
A rose from the bush you held so dear,
Ere you went to the spirit-land.

And I take one leaf from the bud—no more—
And fling the rest away,
Then turn again to the garden door,
In the golden summer day;

And whisper, "The bud that I resign
Is thy clay to its own earth given;
But the leaf that I keep is that spirit of th
With its incense—all of heaven."

[Continued from No. 36, page 567.]

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVII.

IN THE SEASON.

IN the spring Mr. Granger took his wife and daughter to London, where they spent a couple of months in Clarges Street, and saw a good deal of society in what may be called the upper range of middle-class life—rich merchants and successful professional men living in fine houses at the West End, enlivened with a sprinkling from the ranks of the baronetage and lesser nobility. In this circle Mr. Granger occupied rather a lofty standing, as the owner of one of the finest estates in Yorkshire, and of a fortune which the common love of the marvelous exalted into something fabulous. He found himself more popular than ever since his marriage, as the husband of one of the prettiest women who had appeared that season. So, during the two months of their London life, there was an almost unbroken succession of gayeties, and Mr. Granger found himself yearning for the repose of Arden Court sometimes, as he waited in a crowded ball-room while his wife and daughter danced their last quadrille. It pleased him that Clarissa should taste this particular pleasure-cup—that she should have every delight she had a right to expect as his wife; but it pleased him not the less when she frankly confessed to him one day that this brilliant round of parties and party-giving had very few charms for her, and that she would be glad to go back to Arden.

In London Clarissa met Lady Laura Armstrong; for the first time since that September afternoon in which she had promised that no arts of George Fairfax's should move her to listen to him. Lord Calderwood had been dead a year and a half, and my lady was resplendent once more, and giving weekly receptions in Mr. Armstrong's great house in Portland Place—a corner house, with about a quarter of a mile of drawing-rooms stretching back into one of the lateral streets. For Mr. and Mrs. Granger she gave a special dinner, with an evening party afterward; and she took up a good deal of Clarissa's time by friendly morning calls, and affectionate insistance upon Mrs. Granger's company in her afternoon drives and at her daily kettle-drums—drives and kettle-drums from which Miss Granger felt herself more or less excluded.

It was during one of these airings, when they had gone a little beyond the crowd and splendor of the Park, and were driving across Putney Heath on the way to Roehampton, where my lady had to make some call, that Clarissa heard the name of George Fairfax once more. Until this afternoon, by some strange accident, as it seemed, Lady Laura had never mentioned her sister's lover.

"I suppose you heard that it was all broken off?" she said, rather abruptly, and apropos to nothing particular.

"Broken off, Lady Laura?"

"I mean Geraldine's engagement. People are so fond of talking about those things! you must have heard, surely, Clary."

"No, indeed, I have heard nothing."

"That's very curious. It has been broken off ever so long—soon after poor papa's death, in fact. But you know what Geraldine is, so reserved—almost impenetrable, as one may say. I knew nothing of what had happened myself, till one day—months after the breach had occurred, it seems—when I made some allusion to Geraldine's marriage, she stopped me, in her cold, proud way, saying, 'It's just as well I should tell you that that affair is all off, Laura. Mr. Fairfax and I have wished each other good-by forever.' That's what I call a crushing blow for a sister, Clarissa. You know how I had set my heart upon that marriage."

"I am very sorry," faltered Clarissa. "They had quarreled, I suppose."

"Quarreled! oh dear, no; she had not seen him since she left Hale with Frederick and me, and they parted with every appearance of affection. No; there had been some letters between them, that was all. I have never been able to discover the actual cause of their parting. Geraldine refused to answer any questions in a most arbitrary manner. It is a hard thing, Clarissa; for I know that she loved him."

"And where is Lady Geraldine now?"

"At Hale, with my children. She has no regular home of her own now, you see, poor girl, and she did not care about another season in London—she has had enough of that kind of thing; so she begged me to let her stay at the Castle, and superintend the governesses, and amuse herself in her own way. Life is full of trouble, Clary!" and here the mistress of Hale Castle, and of some seventy thousand per annum, gave a despondent sigh.

"Have you seen Mr. Fairfax since you came from Germany?" asked Clarissa.

"Yes, I have met him once—some months ago. You may be sure that I was tolerably cool to him. He has been very little in society lately, and has been leading rather a wild life in Paris, I hear. A prudent marriage would have been his redemption; but I dare say it will end in his throwing himself away upon some worthless person."

It was a relief to Clarissa to hear that George Fairfax was in Paris, though that was very near. But in her ignorance of his whereabouts she had fancied him still nearer, and in all her London festivities had been tormented by a perpetual dread of meeting him. Many times even she had imagined that she saw his face across the crowd, and had been relieved to find it was only a face that bore some faint resemblance to his.

He had kept his word, then, so far as the breaking of his engagement to Geraldine Challoner. He had been more in earnest than Clarissa had believed. She thought that she was sorry for this; but it is doubtful whether the regretful feeling in her heart was really sorrow for Lady Geraldine. She thought of George Fairfax a good deal after this conversation with Lady Laura—alas, when had she ceased to think of him!—and all the splendors and pleasures of her married life seemed to her more than ever worthless. What a hopeless entanglement, what a dismal mistake, her existence was! Had she sold herself for these things—for Arden Court and a town house, and unlimited millinery? No: again and again she told herself she had married Daniel Granger for her father's sake, and perhaps a little from a desire to keep faith with Lady Laura. This marriage had seemed to her the only perfect fulfillment of her promise that nothing should induce her to marry George Fairfax. But the sacrifice had been useless, since he had broken his engagement to Geraldine Challoner.

Sophia Granger's lynx eyes perceived a change in her step-mother about this time. Clarissa had never appeared especially enraptured by the gayeties of fashionable London; but there had come upon her of late a languor and weariness of spirit, which she tried in vain to disguise by an assumed air of enjoyment. That simulated gayety deluded her husband, but it could not deceive Miss Granger.

"She is getting tired of her life already, even here where we have a perpetual round of amusements," Sophia said to herself. "What will she be when we go back to Yorkshire?"

The time was close at hand for the return to Arden, when the thing which Clarissa had feared came to pass, and the hazard of London life brought her face to face with George Fairfax.

The season was at its height, and the Grangers found every available hour of their existence engaged in visiting and receiving visitors. There were so many people whom Lady Laura insisted upon introducing to her dear Clarissa—there was so much in the way of party-giving that Lady Laura wanted her sweet Mrs. Granger to do. Now it was a morning concert of my lady's planning, at which weird and wonderful looking denizens of the Norseland—Poles, Hungarians, Danes, and Swedes—with unkempt hair and fierce, flashing eyes, performed upon every variety of native instrument, or sang wild national songs in some strange language—concerts to which Lady Laura brought herds of more or less fashionable people, all of whom were languishing to know that "sweet Mrs. Granger." My lady had taken pains to advertise her share in the manufacturer's marriage. Every one belonging to her set knew that the match was her contriving, and that Clarissa had to thank the mistress of Hale Castle for her millionaire husband. She was really proud of her protégée's success, and was never tired of praising her and "that admirable Granger."

That admirable Granger endured the accession of party-giving with very good grace. It pleased him to see his wife admired; it pleased him still more to see her happy; and he was single-minded enough to believe her increased volatility a symptom of increased happiness. Whatever undefined regrets and dim forebodings there might be lurking in the secret recesses of his own mind, he had no doubt of his wife's integrity—no fear of hidden perils in this ordeal of fashionable life.

She would come to love him in time, he said to himself, trusting as blindly in the power of time to work this wonder for him as Clarissa herself had trusted when she set herself to win her father's affection. He believed this, not so much because the thing was probable or feasible, as because he desired it with an intensity of feeling that blinded him to the force of hard facts. He, the man who had never made a false reckoning in the mathematics of business life, whose whole career was unmarred by a mistake, whose great successes had been the result of unrivaled coolness of brain and unerring foresight—he, the hard-headed, far-seeing man of the world—was simple as a child in this matter, which involved the greater hazard of his heart.

But while Clarissa's husband trusted her with such boundless confidence, Clarissa's step-daughter watched her with the vigilant eyes of prejudice, not to say hatred. That a young lady so well brought up as Miss Granger, so thoroughly grounded in Kings and Chronicles as she was wont to boast herself, and with an appreciation of the more abstruse points in the Epistles to the Romans and the Hebrews that would have been invaluable to an under-graduate going in for his divinity examinations—for such a young lady to entertain the vulgar passion of hate seemed quite out of the question; but so far as a lady-like aversion may go, Miss Granger certainly went in relation to her step-mother. In this she was sustained by that model damsel, Hannah Warman, who, not having made much progress in Mrs. Granger's liking, had discovered that she could not "take to" that lady, and was always ready to dilate upon her short-comings whenever her mistress permitted. Sophia was capricious in this, sometimes listening eagerly, at other times suppressing Miss Warman with a high hand.

So Clarissa had, unawares, an enemy within her gates, and could turn neither to the right nor to the left without her motives for so turning becoming the subject of a close and profound scrutiny. It is hard to say what shape Miss Granger's doubts assumed. If put into the witness-box and subjected to the cross-examination of a popular queen's counsel, she would have found it very difficult to give a substance or a form to her suspicions. She could only have argued in a general way that Mrs. Granger was frivolous, and that any kind of wrong-doing might be expected from a person of such unstable character.

It was the beginning of June, and West End London was glorious with the brief brilliancy of the early summer. All the Mayfair balconies were bright with flowers, and the Mayfair knockers resounded perpetually under the hand of the archetypal Jeames. The weather was unusually warm—the most perfect weather for garden-parties, every one declared; and there were several of these al fresco assemblies inscribed in Mrs. Granger's visiting-book: one at Wimbledon; another as far afield as Henley-on-Thames, at a villa whose grounds sloped down to the river.

This Henley party was an affair in which Lady Laura Armstrong was particularly interested. It was given by a bachelor friend of her husband's, a fabulously rich stock-broker; and it was Lady Laura who had brought the proprietor of the villa to Clarges Street, and who had been instrumental in the getting-up of the fête.

"You must really give us some kind of party at your Henley place this year, Mr. Wooster," she said. "There is the regatta, now: I have positively not seen the Henley regatta for three years. The Putney business is all very well—supremely delightful, in short, while it lasts—but such a mere lightning flash of excitement. I like a long day's racing, such as one gets at Henley."

"Lady Laura ought to be aware that my house is at her disposal all the year round, and that she has only to signify her pleasure to her most devoted slave."

"Oh, that's all very well," replied my lady. "Of course I knew that if Frederick and I came down you would give us luncheon or dinner, and let us roam about the gardens as long as we liked. But that's not what I want. I want you to give a party on one of the race days, and invite all the nice people in London."

"Are there any nasty people on this side of Temple Bar, Lady Laura, before the closing of Parliament? I thought, in the season, every body was nice."

"You know what I mean, Sir. I want the really pleasant people. Half a dozen painters or so, and some of the nicest literary men—not the men who write the best books, but the men who talk cleverly; and, of course, a heap of musical people—they are always nice, except to one another. You must have marquees on the lawn for the luncheon—your house is too small for any thing more than tea and coffee; and for once let there be no such thing as croquet—that alone will give your party an air of originality. I suppose you had better put yourself entirely into Gunter's hands for the commissariat, and be sure you tell him you want novelty—no hackneyed ideas; sparkle and originality in every thing, from the eggs to the apples. I should ask you to give us a dance in the evening, with colored lamps, if that were practicable, but there is the coming back to town; and if we carried the business on to a breakfast next morning, some of the people might begin to be tired, and the women would look faded and limp. So I think we had better confine ourselves to a mere garden-party and luncheon, without any dancing," Lady Laura concluded, with a faint sigh.

"Will you send out the invitations, Lady Laura?"

"Oh no; I leave all that to you. You really know every body—or every body we need care about."

In this manner Mr. Wooster's party had been arranged, and to this party the Grangers were bidden. Even the serious Sophia was going; indeed, it is to be observed that this young lady joined in all mundane gayeties, under protest, as it were.

"I go out, my dear, but I never enjoy myself," she would say to a serious friend, as if that were a kind of merit. "Papa wishes me to go, and I have no desire to withdraw myself in any way from Mrs. Granger's amusements, however little sympathy there may be between us. I endeavor to do my duty, whatever the result may be."

Mr. Wooster did know a great many people. His abnormal wealth, and a certain amount of cleverness, had been his sole passport to society. Among Burke's "Landed Gentry" there was no trace of the Wooster family, nor had Mr. Wooster ever been heard to allude to a grandfather. He had begun stock-jobbing in the smallest way, but had at a very early stage of his career developed a remarkable genius for this kind of traffic. Those of his own set who had watched his steady ascent declared him to be a very remarkable man; and the denizens of the West End world, who knew nothing of stock-jobbing or stock-broking, were quite ready to receive him when he came to them laden with the gold of Ophir, and with a reputation of being something distinguished upon 'Change.

Time had begun to thin Mr. Wooster's flowing locks before he landed himself safely upon the shores of fashionable life, and Mr. Wooster's carefully trained mustache and whiskers had a purplish tinge that looked more like art than nature. He was short and stout, with a florid complexion, sharp black eyes, and a large aquiline nose, and considered himself eminently handsome. He dressed with elaborate splendor—"dressed for two," as some of his less gorgeous friends were wont to say—and was reputed to spend a small fortune annually in exotics for his button-hole, and dress boots.

His chief merits, in the estimation of the polite world, lay in the possession of a perfectly appointed town house, the villa at Henley, another villa at Cowes, and a couple of magnificent yachts. He was a perpetual giver of dinners, and spent his existence between the Stock Exchange and the dinner-table, devoting whatever mental force remained to him after his daily traffic to the study of menus, and the grave consideration of wine-lists. To dine with Wooster was one of the right things to do once or twice in the course of a season; and Wooster's steam-yacht was a pleasant place of rest and haven of safety for any juvenile member of the peerage who had been plunging heavily, and went in fear of the Bankruptcy Court.

So, on a brilliant June morning, the Grangers left the Great Western station by special train, and sped through the summer landscape to Henley. This garden-party at Mr. Wooster's villa was almost their last engagement. They were to return to Arden in two days, and Clarissa was very glad that it was so. That weariness of spirit which had seemed to her so strange in some of the young ladies at Hale Castle had come upon herself. She longed for Arden Court and perfect rest; and then she remembered, with something like a shudder, that there were people invited for the autumn, and that Lady Laura Armstrong had promised to spend a week with her dearest Clarissa.

"I want to put you into the way of managing that great house, Clary," said my lady, brimming over with good-nature and officiousness. "As to leaving the housekeeping in Miss Granger's hands, that's not to be dreamed of. It might do very well for the first six months—just to let her down gently, as it were—but from henceforth you must hold the reins yourself, Clary, and I'll teach you how to drive."

"But, dear Lady Laura, I don't want the trouble and responsibility of housekeeping. I would much rather leave all that in Sophy's hands," protested Clarissa. "You have no idea how clever she is. And I have my own rooms and my painting."

"Yes," exclaimed Lady Laura, "and you will mope yourself to death in your own rooms, with your painting, whenever you have no company in the house. You are not going to become a cipher, surely, Clarissa! What with Miss Granger's schools, and Miss Granger's clothing-club, and Miss Granger's premiums and prizes for this, that, and the other, you stand a fair chance of sinking into the veriest nobody, or you would if it were not for your pretty face. And then you really must have employment for your mind, Clary. Look at me; see the work I get through."

"But you are a wonder, dear Lady Laura, and I have neither your energy nor your industry."

Laura Armstrong would not admit this, and held to the idea of putting Clarissa in the right way.

"Wait till I come to you in the autumn," she said. And in that depression of spirit which had grown upon her of late, Mrs. Granger found it a hard thing to say that she should be rejoiced when that time came.

She wanted to get back to Arden Court, and was proud to think of herself as the mistress of the place she loved so dearly; but it seemed to her that an existence weighed down at once by the wisdom of Sophia Granger and the exuberant gayety of Lady Laura would be barely endurable. She sighed for Arden Court as she remembered it in her childhood—the dreamy quiet of the dull old house brightened only by her brother's presence; the perfect freedom of her own life, so different from the life whose every hour was subject to the claims of others.

Digitized by Google

She had changed very much since that visit to Hale Castle. Then all the pleasures of life were new to her—to-day they seemed all alike flat, stale, and unprofitable. She had been surfeited with splendors and pleasures since her marriage. The wealth which Daniel Granger so freely lavished upon her had rendered these things common all at once. She looked back, and wondered whether she had really ever longed for a new dress, and been gladdened by the possession of a five-pound note.

BOAZ AND RUTH.

See Illustration on page 621.

THE artist has beautifully illustrated the episode in the exquisite idyl of Ruth, where the fair Moabitess, overcome with the unexpected kindness of her rich kinsman, bows herself to the ground, clasping her sheaf to her breast, and exclaims, "Why have I found grace in thine eyes, that thou shouldest take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger?" Boaz looks down benignly upon her, as he tells her how the report of her filial conduct has come to his ears, and moved him with sympathy for one of a race whom the Israelites have been wont to hold in scorn. The sequel of the story needs no rehearsal—how the proud Boaz was led to love the stranger damsel, and how from their union sprang the house of David and the pedigree of Christ.

Suits for Ladies and Children, Figs. 1–7.

See Illustrations on page 616.

Fig. 1.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD. This dress with basque-waist is of white piqué; the skirt is trimmed on the bottom with three folds of buff piqué each two inches and two-fifths wide; belt and sash of similar material. The waist and basque are trimmed with white piqué ruffles, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR BOY FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD. Trowsers, vest, and jacket are made of blue tricot beaver; the jacket is ornamented with a braiding of black soutache.

Fig. 3.—PURPLE CHEVIOTTE SUIT. The dress is made of purple cheviotte. The basque-waist, cut heart-shape in the front, is furnished with purple silk revers. Purple buttons and cord bands close the waist.

Fig. 4.—COLORED SILK DRESS WITH BROWN VELVET JACKET. The over-skirt is draped at the sides and trimmed with two gathered pinked ruffles, the upper one of which is set on with a heading. The sleeveless jacket is made of brown velvet lined with silk. The jacket can be cut from Figs. 35–37 of No. IX., Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 34, Vol. IV.

Fig. 5.—GRAY CASHMERE WRAPPER. The skirt and waist of this wrapper are cut in one: the trimming consists of folds of darker gray gros grain two inches wide, which are edged on both sides with a piping of the material. The folds down the front form bands, which are closed by means of buttons and button-holes. White Swiss muslin cap, trimmed with lace and pink ribbon.

Fig. 6.—BLACK SILK SUIT. This dress consists of a double skirt and basque-waist; the over-skirt is draped at the sides and untrimmed, the skirt is trimmed with one wide and three narrow ruffles of the material. The basque-waist is also trimmed with ruffles.

Fig. 7.—STRIPED PÉKIN SUIT. The dress and paletot of this suit are made of gray and white striped pékin. A wide bias flounce is set on the skirt of the dress; the high waist is pointed in front, and has a short basque at the back. The waist may be cut from Figs. 1–4, No. I., Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 34, Vol. IV. Cut the paletot from Figs. 35ª, 35ᵇ–37ª, 37ᵇ, No. X., Supplement, Harper's Bazar, No. 38, Vol. IV., observing the illustration; it must be cut four inches shorter than the pattern, as shown by the illustration.

Ladies' Walking, Carriage, and Evening Dresses, Figs. 1–3.

See Illustrations on page 617.

Fig. 1.—WALKING DRESS. Blue silk skirt, trimmed with six flounces of the material, cut in points and edged with black velvet, and separated by black velvet bands. Brown cashmere polonaise, with deep pelerine collar, trimmed with two widths of black velvet. Brown silk hat, bound with black velvet, and trimmed with trailing sprays of roses with brown leaves. Blue parasol, bordered with black velvet.

Fig. 2.—CARRIAGE DRESS. Rose-colored silk skirt, with a flounce of the material, surmounted by a wide pleated ruche of white organdy. White organdy over-skirt, with a flounce of the material surmounted with a ruche of rose-colored silk ribbon. Sleeveless jacket of rose-colored silk, trimmed with grelot fringe, worn over a waist with flowing sleeves of white organdy, trimmed with rose-colored ribbon. Leghorn straw hat, with rose-colored and white feathers. Pink parasol, with white ruffle. This also makes a tasteful opera toilette.

Fig. 3.—EVENING DRESS. Tea-rose silk skirt, with white organdy flounce, surmounted by a white organdy ruche with a black gros grain ribbon through the middle. White organdy over-skirt, richly embroidered on the edge, and looped in a graceful manner by a broad black gros grain ribbon, as shown by the illustration. This new and effective manner of looping is that which was recently described by our Paris correspondent, Madame Emmeline Raymond. Low basque-waist and short sleeves of tea-rose silk, trimmed with white organdy ruches and black ribbon. Tea-rose with leaves in the hair.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

SEPTEMBER, with its shorter days and cooler nights, brings the commencement of that marvelous change of forest leaves which is one of autumn's choicest beauties. True, during August's sultry days we may catch a glimpse, here and there, of red and golden hues mingled with the forest green; but not until this mellow month does the glory begin to settle on tree and shrub with a rapidly increasing brilliancy. How lovely are the brightly tinted leaves, so delicately painted by Nature's master-hand! and no two alike. Nothing is more beautiful and wonderful than the progress of the change that overspreads field and forest, until the maple-trees gleam glorious and golden in the autumn sun, mingling their leaves with others yet brighter-hued. Now is the time to gather these brilliant leaves and press them. Tastefully arranged in vases, with pressed ferns and grasses, they will make the parlor or home sitting-room look gay when wintry winds are howling without. Some ladies varnish or oil the leaves after they are pressed; but this is not necessary. They will look well through one season if they are carefully pressed.

A woman was this year invited to furnish a commencement poem for the University of California. The poem was well suited to the occasion, and the reading by proxy was well done. In connection it may be mentioned that a man of wealth has made a donation to this university of pictures valued at $60,000.

Tourists who do not favor horseback riding can now drive through the Yosemite Valley in a carriage. The first invasion of a carriage into that spot was the latter part of July last. It was sent from Mariposa, packed on the backs of mules, and designed for the use of tourists.

He is safe, and will soon give an account of the result of his explorations. So says the British consul at Zanzibar. Of course we refer to Dr. Livingstone, whose whereabouts have so long caused anxious solicitude in the public mind. The public may feel compensated when it hears what the doctor has to say about Lake Tanganyika.

Some of the escapes from instant death in the recent disaster on the Eastern Railroad were almost miraculous. One man from Lynn, who had been on a vacation, was returning home with a friend, sitting on the same seat. His friend was instantly killed, while he was thrown to the top of the engine and held there pressed against the ceiling of the car. He remained in that position, unable to move, until the sides of the car were torn off, when he rolled down, the only injuries he sustained being those occasioned by the fall. A young man of Charlestown was sitting in the car a few minutes before the collision took place, and got up to give his seat to a young lady who was standing in the aisle. He went forward, and escaped without injury. When the dead were lifted out of the wreck he recognized one of the first bodies as that of the lady. Another passenger was sitting in the last seat of the rear car, and was looking out of the rear window as the engine of the express train came on. The cow-catcher, cutting like a keen blade into the car, threw the seat he occupied, and himself with it, some rods to the side of the track. He was tossed some distance into the air, and remembers catching a glimpse, before he reached the ground, of the name of the engine, illuminated by the glare of its lights. He escaped with only broken ribs. A boy, who was bruised and scalded, was standing on the platform of the rear car when he saw the head-light of the express train rounding a curve. With a scream he rushed inside the car, and knew no more till he found himself crawling out of the wreck.

A five-year-old boy lately fell from the window of a car on the Union Pacific Railroad, while the train was going at the rate of thirty miles an hour. The youngster was picked up, and found very slightly injured. About the same time a train-boy on the Boston and Maine Railroad was struck by a switch-iron while carelessly swinging his body out of the door of a baggage car, the train meanwhile going at the rate of thirty-five miles an hour. He was thrown twenty-five feet before he landed, and then bounded twenty-five feet more, by actual measurement, and this time hit a fence and knocked off a board. The next day he was on duty as lively as ever.

There seems to have been a suspicion of danger among many of the passengers of that ill-fated train on the Eastern Railroad. Many expressed themselves as feeling uneasy, especially when it became known that the express was behind them. At Somerville, a whistle having been sounded, the windows were shoved up, and the passengers looked out. The conductor called out, "Please keep your seats; there is no danger." One lady said, "There is something wrong about the train—I know there is something going to happen." Another felt so uneasy that she left the car, and did not return.

Those who value happiness in married life had better not delay making confessions affecting character till after the ceremony. Before the knot is tied the revelation of many facts would leave either party free to reconsider the question of marriage. A young husband in Detroit, Michigan, was horrified on learning three days after his marriage that his bride, whom he had known for years, was a victim of kleptomania. She confessed to him that she could not resist the temptation to steal. He discovered that she had often taken things that were not of the slightest value to her; and not even in the first days of the honey-moon could she restrain the morbid propensity. An uncomfortable honey-moon that for the husband.

The "kangaroo flop," as it is aptly designated, gives the hands the appearance of being dislocated at the wrists. Graceful, very.

A girls' lodging-house has been opened in St. Mark's Place. The rooms are plainly furnished, but cheerful and airy. Board and lodging are provided for $1 50 per week, or meals are furnished at six cents, and lodging at the same price. Friendless girls who are destitute of funds may pay for their board by assisting in household duties until some other resource is open to them. This is designed as a temporary stopping-place, not a home, and for young girls only.

On Mount Vesuvius there is an astronomical observatory which was erected by the University of Naples at a cost of $60,000. This observatory is now in serious danger of being destroyed by the river of red-hot lava which is slowly flowing down the side of the mountain, and has nearly submerged the hill upon which it is built.

A wounded Communist was brought to the celebrated French surgeon Nélaton. After examining the man's injuries the doctor said to the Communist's wife, who was standing by with a very anxious face:

"Oh, this is not very serious. Your husband will be all right again in three months."

"Three months!" she cried, in despair; "that is terrible: then he can not be present at the pillage of the city!"

A reminiscence of Ollendorf, given by an exchange, affords recent students of Ollendorf's system a chance for a laugh. On the morning of his arrival in Montreal, Mr. P—— met in the dining-room of his hotel a gentleman who was unmistakably a Frenchman, and being in Canada, of course was Canadian. As they were sitting together at the table, Mr. P—— having mentally rubbed up his knowledge of the French language, addressed his companion thus:

"Avez-vous le chapeau de mon frère?"

The gentleman thus politely addressed bowed, smiled, and after a little hesitation, answered:

"Non, monsieur; mais j'ai le fromage de votre sœur."

"Eh bien," said Mr. P——, as he scratched his head for a moment. "Otez-vous vos souliers et vos bas?"

The other answered promptly, "Je n'ôte ni les uns ni les autres."

"Votre père," remarked Mr. P——, "a-t-il la chandelle de votre oncle?"

His companion remained silent for a minute or two, and then he said:

"I forget the French of the answer to that, but I know the English of it; it is, 'No, Sir; but he has the apples-of-the-ground-of-sugar of my mother-in-law.'"

When Mr. P—— discovered, after a little conversation in the vernacular, that his companion was a New York dry-goods clerk, he gave up the study of the French Canadian character and went on with his breakfast.

A little boy was dreadfully scalded by the late explosion of the Ocean Wave at Mobile. People gathered about him to offer help. The brave little fellow said, "Please do go and help those who are suffering more. I can wait. Don't let them startle my poor mother."

English papers speak of a "new way to pay old debts" having been discovered in Calcutta. We remember to have heard of the same method—slightly varied—having been practiced in places much nearer us than Calcutta. In the instance referred to a young man lodging with an elderly widow, finding it inconvenient to pay his rent and bills, persuaded her that he wished to marry her, and kept her waiting until he had concluded his business in Calcutta. At last the day was fixed. The would-be bride provided her own wedding trousseau and that of her husband elect, and went to church with her friends. It was a case of

"Lo! the bridegroom was not there, Because he was away."

At the last moment the faithless youth escaped to Bombay, his bills unsettled, and his bride unwed. After waiting for him all day in church the lady and her friends returned home, and, it is to be hoped, solaced themselves with the wedding breakfast.

As sleep is the period for replenishing the system, for restoring the cells wasted by the nervous activity of the day—the period when the processes of digestion reach their final result, by identifying the new nutriment with the system in the place of the waste of the tissues—it follows that children need more sleep than grown persons. Many who might be plump, active, and happy, if given sleep sufficient, are flaccid and sallow, weary and fretful, because they do not sleep enough to allow the demand of the system for nutrition to be supplied. Children often feel it very hard that they are sent to bed early while the grown people sit up and enjoy themselves long after they are in bed. If any children chance to read this paragraph, to them we would say: You need more sleep than your parents, because you have to grow, and they do not. You need to use a good deal of the food you eat in growing larger and stronger; if you consume it all in activity you will not have enough to grow with. Therefore you ought to sleep a great deal, and let the body rest from exercise, if you would grow strong and healthy.

Take in a long breath before you attempt to ask where the Quoquinnapssakessosanagog House is located. Then, if you are not hopelessly choked, we will inform you that it is supposed to be somewhere in New Hampshire. We never ventured to pursue our investigations concerning it any farther.

At Rouen an interesting incident took place a short time ago on the occasion of a concert given by the Société d'Artistes. The news became known in the audience that Mlle. Levielli had fallen on the stairs of her hotel and broken her arm, and Mlle. Duguerret came forward to confirm the tidings, and to add that, although it was impossible for Mlle. Levielli to sing twice, as had been her intention, the courageous cantatrice had determined to sing one of her two songs—the beautiful berceuse from the "Africaine." The general feeling in the audience was the wish that the artiste should not make this effort, which might involve real danger; but the brave lady appeared nevertheless—her arm, which had been dressed with splints, in a broad sling—and was received with the warmest enthusiasm; and when she sang, with a voice fresh and clear as ever except for a slight, a very slight tremor, the applause, bearing the thanks that needed utterance, almost broke into her song, and redoubled at the close.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS. S. R. A.—The Marguerite Polonaise Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 37, Vol. IV., is the model for cashmere. Instead of velvet ribbon, use bias silk folds, gimp, and lace or fringe for trimming. Our short sacque pattern will be a handsome design for your water-proof suit.

CORA C.—Your sample is very similar to that used in the Marguerite Polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 37, Vol. IV. Use that pattern, and trim with dark brown velvet.

ADA T.—We do not reply by mail. A cut representing our paper patterns is always given in the Bazar of corresponding number. The new Marguerite polonaise is the most stylish model for your alpaca, but our postilion-basque suit is more like your design. Velvet trimming and fringe will be worn again.

SICK CANARY.—If your bird has taken cold, which you can perceive from his difficult breathing, accompanied by the movement of the tail, a little Cayenne pepper sprinkled on bread so stale that the liquid part, which is injurious, is entirely evaporated, will warm him and make him right. If he shows signs of constipation, give him a few drops of sweet-oil. If his feathers are ruffled, and he is inclined to peck himself, he probably has mites, and unless relieved will soon pine and die. The most effectual means of eradicating these vermin is to hold a lighted candle to every part of the cage where the insect may be found. We have seen no better device for keeping the cage clean than the Excelsior cage mat, which is inexpensive, and which consists of several sheets of water-proof paper, which are removed one after another by opening the cage door.

PERPLEXITY.—House dresses will also be made with polonaises this fall. We can send you a back number of the Bazar with pattern and sketch of a dress with court train to be looped for the street. The Marguerite polonaise will be worn in-doors and out.

ANNIE.—Have your blue silk made a Worth Basque House Dress by cut paper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV. Trim with flounces of the same and your lace. Make the green silk by the postilion-basque suit pattern, with self-trimmings; the gray and black silks by the Marguerite polonaise, using your velvet and black lace on the latter. A white poplin or alpaca would also look well with a Worth basque. Use our traveling dress pattern for your gray poplin; trim it with black velvet, and wear a black velvet hat. When sending for the patterns you should order Bazars containing illustrations of each pattern. Each Bazar costs ten cents, and will give much more information than we can here in regard to trimmings, etc.

IOWA.—Your sample is mourning silk.

MARGUERITE.—Get plum-colored empress cloth for your fall traveling dress, and make by cut paper pattern of the Marguerite Polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 37, Vol. IV. Plum-color, invisible green, and walnut brown will be leading colors.

MRS. J. O.—Make a polonaise of your pretty blue crape, trim with blue fringe and silk ruches, or with black velvet ribbon and bows, and wear with blue or black silk or white muslin skirt.

GRAZZIELLA.—A bound volume of the Bazar costs $7. The covers cost seventy-five cents, and a binder will charge about the same sum for putting them on.

L. A. N.—Get darkest green or navy blue French merino, and make a polonaise for your daughter to wear with her plaid skirts. Use the Misses' Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 28, Vol. IV.

CLO.—You will find illustrations of our cut paper patterns of infants' clothes in Bazar No. 35, Vol. IV. The set of six patterns, comprising all the important articles, costs 25 cents.

E. D. M.—You should send for our cut paper pattern of Water-proof Cloak illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV.—See answer to "Grazziella."

S. GREEN.—A solitaire diamond ring is preferred to a cluster of diamonds of equal value. $150 will buy a handsome ring.—We do not give addresses in this column.

S. E. C.—Trim your drab silk by design of the Marguerite Polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 37, Vol. IV.

SUSIE AND C. C.—For models for black silk and alpaca read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 33, Vol. IV. Get white or pearl-colored Irish poplin, or else faille, for your gas-light dress.

S. E. H. AND OTHERS.—We do not give cut paper patterns of gentlemen's shirts or pantaloons, or of any garment other than those mentioned in our list of cut paper patterns.

QUEEN DIDO.—Antwerp silk is the highest priced silk in market. It has sold for $20 a yard until very lately, but may now be had for less. It is a yard and a half wide.

RETTA.—Make the box-pleating on your under-skirt nearly half a yard deep, and use button-moulds covered with the dress material. Put a bias fold and fringe, or merely a box-pleating a finger deep, on the over-skirt.

WESTERN GIRL.—Get brown empress cloth or black alpaca for a traveling dress, as you can not pay over 75 cents a yard. Make by the Marguerite Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 37, Vol. IV. Your sample is Irish poplin. Make with deep basque, velvet vest, and demi-train. Your plaid épingeline does not need altering.

COUNTRY GIRL.—Make an over-skirt of the narrower stripe like sample.

MARIA W. B.—Your sample is very excellent Japanese poplin. A good summer silk will wear well, and some such silks may be washed.

FLORENCE.—Make and trim your alpaca dress by hints given in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 33, Vol. IV.—We do not give addresses here.—Read Fall Shawls, in Bazar No. 36, Vol. IV.

MRS. S. F. G.—Make a plain basque and slightly gored skirt of your plaid silk, and wear under a black polonaise in the street—without any over dress in the house.

MRS. T. S.—We have not illustrated feather stitch. It is the simple bias stitch so well known.

MRS. M. J. S.—Make your Hernani a Marguerite polonaise suit like that described and illustrated in Bazar No. 37, Vol. IV. The cut paper pattern is 25 cents. Line the upper part of the polonaise with silk or with farmer's satin, and wear the skirt over a petticoat to match the lining. Trim the skirt with a box-pleated flounce, straight, hemmed on each edge, and stitched on an inch from the top, and also half-way down the flounce.

A SUBSCRIBER.—For invitations to the weddings of two sisters married at home use a note-sheet containing the invitation from the parents; then inclose two cards, each one bearing the name of a bride and groom. Wear chatelaine braids, finger puffs, and short front curls, with a chaplet of orange blossoms.

MRS. H. S.—Any fancy store will furnish you reeds for making baskets. We do not give addresses here.

Digitized by Google

Fig. 1.—SUIT FOR GIRL, FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR BOY FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.

Fig. 3.—CHEVIOTTE SUIT.

Fig. 4.—SILK DRESS WITH VELVET JACKET.

Fig. 5.—CASHMERE WRAPPER.

Fig. 6.—SILK SUIT.

Fig. 7.—STRIPED PÉKIN SUIT.

FIGS. 1–7.—SUITS FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN.—[SEE PAGE 615.]

Digitized by Google

LADIES' WALKING, CARRIAGE, AND EVENING DRESSES.—[SEE PAGE 615.]

Digitized by Google

THE LAST OF MY LOVES.

EDIE is five years old;
Hair just that tint of gold
Shines in the leaflet's fold
Left in November;
Eyes of a turquoise blue;
Cheeks, roses dipped in dew;
Dimples, the sweetest two
I can remember.

I am of middle age,
Turning life's fiftieth page,
Weary of war men wage
'Gainst Time's advances.
Still the gray hairs will come,
"Stet nive candidum,"
My poor head bearing some Ill-natured glances.

Day-dreams of youth are passed,
And I'm in love at last—
Edie's face holds me fast,
Bound in love's fetters—
Love that is shy of speech,
And all unknown to each
Friend, as I daily teach
Edith her letters.

Is it her wee face seems
Like that face known in dreams,
Flying when morning beams
Cold through the casement?
Once in the years at rest,
Pillowed upon my breast,
Then with sin half confessed
Bowed in abasement.

May a far fairer fate,
Darling, upon thee wait,
When to a girl's estate
Swift years have brought thee!
Then if a love be thine
Deemed like a dream divine,
Ask for this tale of mine,
Learned ere I taught thee.

Know that all words are vain,
Love but a pleasant pain,
I shall not kneel again;
All smiles are hollow.
Age has snowed all my brow;
I make my farewell bow;
Nor "semper arcum" now
"Tendit Apollo."

AN UTTER IMPOSSIBILITY.

BY FLORENCE MARRYAT (MRS. ROSS-CHURCH),
AUTHOR OF "HER LORD AND MASTER," ETC.

IT was a Sunday afternoon in August—the time of all others when it is to be hoped that the recording angel is lenient toward frail human nature for feeling more sleepy than religious. Inside the whitewashed country church all was sunshine, languor, and heat, while the familiar form of the clergyman was becoming more and more indistinct to the heavy eyes which strove to look at him, and the dull ears, straining to listen, could hardly distinguish the monotonous hum of his voice from the buzz of the insects which had found their way into the sacred building. Of all the congregation, indeed, there seemed to be but one cool, collected, and wakeful person, and that one was a woman.

A delicate-looking woman, of about five or six and twenty, with a face that would grow very dear and very necessary to such as loved it—a quiet, thoughtful face, with sympathetic eyes, and a tenderly curved mouth, the smile of which was all the sweeter because it came so seldom. Robed in half-mourning, she sat in her pew alone, cool, calm, and composed. On the wall above the seat she occupied was a marble tablet, the gold and black letters of which set forth that it had been erected to the memory of John Hilton, Esquire, of Brooklands, in the parish of Hurstley, and of his daughter Edith, aged two years, whose deaths had occurred within a few months of each other, and whose bodies lay in the adjoining church-yard. As the service concluded, and the lady, rising from her seat, caught for a moment the name of "Edith" on the stone before her, a slight shudder ran through her frame, and a close observer might have seen her lip tremble; but the next minute she had sunk upon her knees, and hidden her face and her feelings from the gaze of man; and when she again resumed her seat, her look was as peaceful as before. But she seemed in no hurry to quit the church; for the crowd of men and women, old and young, fat and thin, had pushed each other down the aisle, and scattered far and wide, before her gray silk dress swept the length of the cocoa-nut matting, and appeared in the square, old-fashioned porch. But as she entered it a start, a flush on her pale cheek, and a look of intense pleasure lighting up her eyes showed that she had encountered a welcome surprise; and with an outstretched hand she advanced quickly to meet the figure of a gentleman evidently waiting for her.

"You here, Charley, after so many promises and so many delays! Why, what induced you to come to-day?"

Her words intimated that Sunday was not the day he should have chosen for his journey; but her looks said she was only too glad to see him there at all.

"I arrived in town yesterday," he replied, warmly returning the pressure of her hand; "and you know how I hate a Sunday in London, Beatrice; so I thought I would come on and spend it here. Besides, I want to speak to you."

He was a dark, handsome man, of about her own age, and usually appeared younger; but at the present moment there was an expression of perplexity or pain (it would have been difficult to decide which) upon his face that caused him to look the elder of the two. Yet, strange to say, the lady did not appear to notice the perturbation of his features, and her answer to his remark was given lightly.

"You don't want any more good advice, I hope, Charley, because you know you never take it; so it is only adding insult to injury to ask for it."

"Come, that's hardly fair, Beatrice," he answered, seriously. "I am sure I have always followed your advice when it was feasible, and been grateful for it when it was not. Your counsel and your sisterly affection have been the guiding-stars of my existence, and I was not aware that I had shown myself unmindful of them."

There appeared to be something in this last remark which grated on the lady's feelings, for her playful tone was quelled at once.

"My dear Charley, I was only joking. You know how ready I always am to give you the help of which I am capable. What is it that you wish to speak to me about?"

They had passed out of the church porch by this time, and she had turned into the path which led toward her home. But Charles Lennox placed his hand upon her arm and detained her.

"Stop, Beatrice! Don't go home just yet; it is cooler now. Let us take a little turn together in the church-yard."

"In the church-yard, Charley?" she asked, with surprise.

"Yes, in the church-yard," he repeated; "why not? I like to wander sometimes among the graves; they seem so quiet and so peaceful. Besides, I think I should like to tell you what I have to tell you—here."

She placed her arm within his as he spoke, and they turned toward the back of the church, and sauntered together down the narrow gravel-path which bordered the resting-places of the dead. For a few minutes they walked in silence: his heart seemed to be full, and hers was pondering on the coming revelation. When at last he spoke he did it so abruptly that his words seemed almost rough.

"Beatrice, I am going to be married."

"Charley!"

The arm linked within his slid suddenly from his hold, and the face she turned toward him bore a sickly, incredulous smile.

"It is true," he answered, with attempted unconcern, as he feigned to busy himself by flicking specks of dust off his attire with his cane. "I met her six weeks ago at the country house at which I have been staying; and as soon as ever it was a settled thing I ran down here, feeling not only that you have a kind of right to the first news, but that I should not feel quite happy or satisfied with myself until I had received your congratulations and approval."

"Thank you, Charley," she answered, in a voice which she hated for sounding so full of pain, and with lips which she despised for being so weak as to tremble. And then, when she had expressed her thanks for his consideration, it seemed as though neither of them could find any thing more to say on the subject; for they continued to walk side by side, but in complete silence.

For she could not congratulate her friend—not just yet; and she knew she had no right to reproach him, or even to feel hurt at his intelligence. For, many years before, a terrible scene had taken place between this man and this woman. They had fought a battle together—such a battle as is often fought in this world in secret and in tears; and they had achieved a victory, though not a bloodless one. Years before, when Beatrice Hilton had been a wife and mother, she had discovered to her horror, misery, and shame that her heart was no longer loyal to its rightful master, but had slipped, almost insensibly to herself, into the keeping of Charles Lennox. And then, when he had guessed her secret, and, emboldened by the fact, had dared to whisper that her affection for him was reciprocated, she had told him they must part forever. She had put away the temptation of his love, so dear to her, had turned a deaf ear to his entreaties, and bravely and resolutely torn herself away from the dangerous pleasure of his companionship. But though she had done all this, she had not satisfied her uneasy conscience. She was not able, all at once, to wrench the unhallowed love from her repentant heart; and when the discovery of this fact was quickly followed by the deaths of her husband and her child, Beatrice Hilton had permitted remorse to take such strong possession of her breast that she refused to believe it could be right to indulge her affection for Charles Lennox, even though she had become free. She thought that refraining from the happiness within her grasp was some sort of expiation for having rashly desired to pluck that which was unlawful; and therefore, when Mr. Lennox, as soon after her bereavement as he thought proper, had urged her to become his wife, she had given him what would have appeared to any one but lovers a decided refusal, and affirmed she should content herself with friendship for him until her life ended. But then she had always had him for her friend—her close, intimate, inalienable friend; and while she adhered to her resolution of becoming nothing nearer to him, Mrs. Hilton had inwardly gloried in the knowledge that no other woman came between them.

Mr. Lennox being, on the strength of an independent income and an expected baronetcy, that social evil, an idle man, was a gentleman much addicted to getting into all manner of scrapes except pecuniary ones; and whenever he was in need of counsel or sympathy he had been in the habit of going straight to Beatrice Hilton for the aid which she loved to give him. Had she been called upon to analyze her feelings in the matter, she would hardly have maintained that she expected this pleasant brother-and-sisterly sort of intercourse to go on forever; yet it is equally true that she never anticipated its being cut short by marriage with any one, unless, indeed, it were herself. Her first impulse, therefore, on the receipt of Charles Lennox's intelligence, was that it must be untrue; her second, to reproach him with his perfidy; her third, to remember that she had refused to be his wife, and thereby resigned all right to question his proceedings; her last, to wonder why he had chosen to tell her of it there.

Why had he led her down the very path beside which lay the bodies of her husband and her child? why regulated his words so that at the same moment the news of his intended marriage left his lips the sacred name of "Edith" gleamed on her from the small white cross before them, and her eyes were resting on the summer flowers which decked her darling's grave?

Had he been doubtful with what feelings she might receive his intelligence—fearful lest in the privacy of her own home she might have been betrayed into words which it would have been like sacrilege to utter beside that sacred spot? At the mere thought a woman's pride began to surge and swell in Beatrice Hilton's breast, and the tone in which she replied to Mr. Lennox's next remark was masterly in its acted unconcern.

"I have taken you by surprise, Beatrice," he observed.

"Not at all, Charley, except so far as the immediate fact is concerned. I only wonder"—with a light laugh—"you did not tell me of it long ago. Of course I knew you would marry some day, and have often tried to picture your future wife to myself. I shall be curious to know if your fiancée comes up to my ideal. You must tell me all about her, and begin at the beginning. What is her name?"

"Well, her name is Miss Ashton—Louisa Ashton," replied Charles Lennox; who, although he was very much taken with his new fancy, would rather his old love had betrayed a little more concern at the news.

"Ashton! What, the Devonshire family?"

"Yes; she is a niece of the old judge."

"Very pretty, I suppose, Charley?"

"Oh yes, she's decidedly pretty."

"Quite your own style, I conclude: fair hair and blue eyes, like that charming little actress we saw at the Strand together last year, and of whose beauty you raved for three months afterward."

"Three days, or three hours, more likely," replied Mr. Lennox, unresponsively. "I don't think I'm much given to raving, Beatrice. I'm getting rather too old for that sort of thing now, to say nothing of the circumstances of my life having been calculated to knock all such nonsense out of me."

She knew that he alluded to the former episode of their unhappy love, of which he often spoke in like manner, and which for some years had been the means of making him very wild. For the first time a mighty doubt assailed her heart as to whether she had been justified in refusing to heal the wound she had inflicted; but the next moment she remembered that to think of that it was too late. She had driven him to another for comfort, and thenceforth she must be less to him than she had ever been before. A spasm passed over her face as the thought crossed her mind; but though she had so little power over her features, she had sufficient control over her voice to continue the conversation easily.

"You have not yet described Miss Ashton to me, Charley."

"Well, she is fair, then, as you anticipated; rather mignonne, and very young; too young for me, in truth, for she has only just completed her seventeenth year."

Another pang for the suffering creature by his side; for what circumstance can a woman who has passed her première jeunesse feel more than the fact of her lover bestowing his affections on a girl more than half a dozen years younger than herself?

"She is very fond of you, Charley?" was the next interrogation, whispered rather than said.

"Oh yes, I believe so; indeed, I am quite sure of it," was the answer, while a smile of secret self-satisfaction stole over the features of Charles Lennox, and he pulled down the ends of his heavy mustaches caressingly.

"And you love her, of course?"

"Of course, or I shouldn't think of marrying her—that is to say, she is a very charming little creature, Beatrice, and very much attached to myself; but if you imagine I can regard her or any woman with a tithe of the affection with which we—"

"Hush! oh, hush!" said Mrs. Hilton, earnestly, as she raised her hand. "That is past, Charley; please don't allude to it."

"I know it's past," he answered, ruefully; "you've given me good reason to believe that, Beatrice; but I was not aware that the more mention of it was so distasteful to you."

"It is as well not to speak of it, and especially now," she said, gently, pressing her hand over her heart meanwhile to deaden its pain. "When are you to be married, Charley?"

"In a month," he answered, rather sullenly.

He was by no means aware that he regretted what he had done; that he was sorry that from flirting for mere pastime he had been led on into making a declaration of marriage; but it was very patent to him that if the coming change in his circumstances made any change in his friendship with Beatrice Hilton, the game would not be worth the candle. He wished, or he thought he wished, since the other had refused him, to marry pretty Louisa Ashton, with her ravishing white skin and melting blue eyes; but he had no idea of not retaining his old flame in the character of chief friend, adviser, and confidante. She had been too much to him for too many years past to enable him to dispense easily with her now. In all his late thoughts respecting the future he had pictured to himself these two women associating with and loving one another; the youthful beauty and innocence of Louisa setting off Beatrice's maturer grace and power of intellect, and both of them trying to show affection for himself.

In pondering on his lot as the husband of Louisa Ashton he had yet never failed to think of Beatrice Hilton as his chief good. Louisa was to be his Pleasure, beaming with loveliness and wreathed in constant smiles; but the other woman was to be his Comfort, the one to whom he brought all his troubles, and from whom alone he expected to derive their balm. And mingled with this steady friendship was to have been a spice of the old leaven—nothing deleterious to his marital faith, but just sufficient to infuse a little excitement and interest to his bond with Beatrice. An occasional sigh for the past, perhaps; a stray allusion to the hopes that were, the bliss that might have been; and through her eyes, or the pressure of her hand, to receive the assurance that regret sometimes claimed her also for its own.

Charles Lennox had purposed for himself, in fact, an utter impossibility: to keep a sentimental friendship, bordering on love, alight in the bosom of one woman, while he took another—a younger and a fairer one—to his arms. In some friendships we must be all—or nothing. When he spoke sullenly on the subject of his approaching marriage, it was not, therefore, at the thought of what was before him, but because Mrs. Hilton declined to discuss that which was to be left behind. For some time after her last remark they again preserved silence, during which period Mr. Lennox employed himself in switching off the heads of the nettles and the other weeds which grew among the grass. Then he said, in a tone of disappointment,

"I expected more sympathy from you, Beatrice."

"More sympathy, Charley! In what way?" she demanded, raising her weary eyes to his face.

"Well, I thought that, considering all things, you would be glad to hear that at last I had a chance of happiness, in so far as the prospect of a wife and home of my own can give it me."

"And, oh, Charley, you can not think that I am not glad—as glad as I should be at any thing which promoted your welfare!"

"I thought that you would sympathize more with my feelings in the matter, considering what a friend you have been to me. You will always be my friend, Beatrice, will you not?"

"Always. I have promised it again and again."

"And will love my wife for my sake?"

"I hope so; no less than for her own. And I rejoice in every good thing which happens to you, dear friend; and shall pray night and morning that your wife may prove so great a blessing to you that you may never remember there was a time when life was otherwise than happy. Can I say more?"

He shook his head with a pleased smile, and then he took her hand and pressed it, and thanked her warmly for all that she had done for him, and promised still to do.

"But, Beatrice, there are tears upon your cheek. That hardly looks as if you thought my news was good news."

She had been fighting hard with these rebellious tears for several minutes past, yet they had conquered her; and now, as she shook them indignantly away, crimsoning beneath the knowledge that they had met his observation, the effort to appear altogether indifferent was too much for her, and in another moment she had broken down entirely.

"You should not have brought me by my baby's grave if you wished me to be cheerful," she sobbed, blushing for the subterfuge she was compelled to use to allay his consternation at her tears. "Oh, my poor Edith! my poor dead baby! How I wish I were at rest with her!"

"I am so sorry!" stammered Mr. Lennox. "I never thought—I quite forgot— What a careless fool you must think me, Beatrice! Poor dear little Edith! Of course I should not have brought you here. Let us go out by the farther gate; it is a longer way home, but we shall avoid passing by the grave again. I almost hoped you had overcome that grief, dear Beatrice; that you had gained courage to confess that the child has made a good exchange."

"Oh yes, I do—I know it!" sighed the mother; "but, Charley, you do not, you can not understand all that I feel." And when she reached Brooklands she cried for little Edith (if it were for little Edith that she cried) through the whole of the ensuing night.

Although at any moment he might have returned to Miss Ashton and her fascinations, Mr. Lennox did not appear disposed to quit Hurstley in a hurry, but lingered in the neighborhood, having his apartments at the village inn, and spending most of his time about the house and grounds of Brooklands. After a few days the reason of this conduct on his part became apparent.

"Where are you likely to settle after your marriage?" demanded Mrs. Hilton of him, after he had been torturing her for the best part of an hour by discussions on the subject of curtains and carpets, and the relative merits of walnut and rose-wood. For though Mr. Lennox had plenty of money, he had no fixed habitation. He was waiting to inherit that with the baronetcy.

"What do you think of Moorcroft?" he inquired, with a meaning smile. "I have already applied to Moss about it."

Moorcroft was the name of a house standing in its own grounds, and next to Brooklands, which had long been advertised to let on lease.

Digitized by Google

"Charley, will that be advisable?" she inadvertently exclaimed.

"Advisable! Why not, Beatrice?"

"Because—because"—she was stammering now—"Miss Ashton may not like Hurstley, you know; it is so retired a place: she may find it dull."

"She has been used to the country all her life," returned Charles Lennox; "and if she had not, my wife must learn to like what I like. I have set my heart on getting Moorcroft, Beatrice. I have always intended, in the event of my marriage, to settle at Hurstley; for, with an establishment of my own to look after, I suppose I shall be compelled, in some measure, to abandon my dear old visits to Brooklands, and I can not entirely give up the pleasure of your company. I shall want your head to guide me still, Beatrice."

"You will have another adviser and counselor now, Charley," she said, gently.

He laughed with real amusement at the idea.

"You don't know Louey Ashton, or you wouldn't say that, Beatrice, by Jove! She is a dear little creature, very loving and affectionate, and all that sort of thing; but she's not exactly the sort of woman that a man would go to for advice."

At these words a thrill of pleasure ran through the breast of Mrs. Hilton—pleasure to think that she should still be the first in his esteem, if not in his affection; but the next moment she had rebuked her weakness with a sigh, and returned to the subject which they had in hand.

"But touching Moorcroft, Charley: pray think twice before you take the place. There is no society in Hurstley, remember. Beside the doctor's and the clergyman's wives, who is there fit to be the companion of a young girl reared as Miss Ashton has probably been?"

"There is yourself, Beatrice; and I desire no better companion for Louisa. I am sure you will get on admirably together, although there is little similarity between you. She is a child, of course, compared to you," he said, little recking the pain he inflicted on his hearer; "but a very lovable and companionable child all the same, and with a face to prove a passport through the world. You will be present at the wedding, Beatrice?"

"Oh no, no! don't ask me!" with a quick look of anguish unseen by Mr. Lennox. "Remember how seldom I go into society now, Charley."

"Well, that's true," he said, though gravely. "And, after all, I am not sure that I should like you to be there. It will be a very different sort of business to what I had looked forward to; and old remembrances are better left—"

"Are you sure that Moorcroft is not damp?" hurriedly interrupted Mrs. Hilton. "You know that it is in shocking repair."

"Moss has engaged to put all that to rights for me within the given time."

"Still, don't take it without due consideration. I am prepared to like your wife, Charley, and to be a friend to her, as I have been to you; but there are two sides to the question, and Miss Ashton may not like me."

"By Jove! if she doesn't!" exclaimed Charles Lennox, leaving his intended vengeance, too deep for words, to the imagination.

"But, even supposing that she does," persisted Mrs. Hilton, "I can not help thinking that you might find a livelier place than Hurstley to reside in, and a livelier companion for your wife than myself."

He looked annoyed and disappointed at her setting her face so determinately against his taking Moorcroft; but in this instance her persuasions were of no avail with him, and he appeared at Brooklands with a bright face, a couple of days afterward, to inform her that all preliminary matters were arranged, and the agent had promised that Moorcroft should be in thorough order before he returned from his wedding tour. He looked to herself, he added, affectionately, to see the interior of the house arranged as might appear most tasteful in her eyes; and he trusted that when he brought Louisa to the home she had adorned for her, the first sight they should see would be the figure of his dear friend upon the threshold, waiting to welcome them and wish them happiness. So he rattled on in the engrossing selfishness of his new attachment, and his "dear friend" promised all that he desired.

Her first impulse had been to refuse his request, for she felt as though the torture would be more than was required of her; but pride came to her aid, and pushed her weakness out of sight. And since she had been unable to prevent his taking Moorcroft (an event from which her instinct prophesied no increase of pleasure for either of them), she did not wish to refuse any assistance she could give him; and when he had taken his departure she derived a sad satisfaction in procuring every article of luxury and comfort which she thought might suit the taste or gratify the fancy of the coming bride.

It was two months before Mr. Lennox again visited Hurstley, and October was fast losing itself in November as the carriage containing the newly married couple dashed up to the porch of Moorcroft, and Beatrice, according to her friend's earnest request, came forward from a background of lighted lamps and blazing fires to bid them welcome home. It was an office which she would gladly have avoided, had she not been afraid that Charles Lennox would guess the reason of her refusal; but being there, she determined to be mistress of herself, though her usually pale face was flushed with excitement, and her manner was nervous and unsteady. Mr. Lennox was the first to alight; but he had little occasion to offer his assistance to the lissom figure which jumped out of the carriage after him, and which he had taken by the hand, and led into the drawing-room before Mrs. Hilton had time to reach the hall door.

"Beatrice, my dear friend," he said, earnestly, as he grasped her hand, "this is real kindness on your part." And then, turning to his wife, he continued, "Now, Mrs. Lennox, off with all these wraps, and prove I deserve a little credit for my choice;" and with playful roughness he unwound the warm shawl in which she was enveloped, and dragged the blushing girl forward beneath the bright lamp-light.

She was lovely—enchanting—almost perfect! Mrs. Hilton, sorely as she had tortured herself with imagining the various beauties of Charles Lennox's bride, had never dreamed she could be so fair a thing as this; and as she gazed at her she heaved a heavy inward sigh, and wondered no more that she herself had been forgotten.

In stature she was middle-sized; in figure, slight but rounded; in complexion, fair and rosy; but all this was nothing to her idealistic face, whence two large blue eyes, surmounting a piquant nose and curved red lips, gleamed out from beneath a nest of golden curls, which, in addition to the fashionable chevelure of the day, lay thickly about her forehead and the nape of her neck. She looked to Beatrice Hilton like some fancy portrait of a lovely girl, so rare and delicate and unearthly was her beauty; and after the first maddening stab of jealousy was past, her feeling was to take the childish figure in her arms, and beg of those wondering, star-like eyes to look upon her kindly. And the same impulse seemed to move Louisa Lennox. Her first glance at her husband's friend, of whom she had heard so much, was shy, and almost fearful, as though she expected to be criticised, and, perhaps, not approved of; but as she met the sad, subdued look of Beatrice Hilton, marked her half-mourning robes, and saw the faint smile which flickered on her mouth, all her timidity vanished; and withdrawing the hand which she had proffered, she ran up to her instead, and throwing her arms about her neck, laid her innocent lips to hers. Mrs. Hilton was taken by surprise; but all her womanly nature went out to meet that of the young creature who thus threw herself upon her friendship; and with a feeling of interest very different from that with which she had expected to welcome the wife of Charles Lennox, she clasped the girl to her bosom, and warmly returned her embrace.

Mr. Lennox, looking on at the meeting of the two women, already saw, as he imagined, the realization of his dream, and was delighted.

"Come, come!" he exclaimed, "that's right; thank you, Beatrice, ten thousand times. And now will you show my little wife to her own room, that she may prepare for the dinner which I hope is ready for us?"

Mrs. Hilton did not look at the speaker, but she held out her hand to the fair creature, whom she could scarcely yet regard as his wife, and led her from the apartment.

"I hope you will find every thing arranged to your liking," she said, as they entered the bedroom together. "I have done my best; but it is seldom that the tastes of two people entirely agree."

"Oh, I am sure it will all be very nice!" exclaimed the bride, whose voice, with a ring in it expressive of want of thought or ideas, was not so sweet as her person; "and I am sure it is uncommonly good of you to have taken so much trouble for us. Indeed, I told Charley a dozen times that he was very cool to ask it. But you can't think how glad I am, Mrs. Hilton, to find that you are not a bit like what I imagined. Charley quite frightened me, talking so much about your goodness and cleverness and sense; and I'm sure I thought, from his description, that you were quite an old woman."

"Did he tell you so?" the other asked, in a voice made tremulous by pain.

"Well, not exactly, perhaps; but he seems to have known you such a long time, and to think so much of all you do and say."

"He has known me during a great deal of sorrow," replied Beatrice Hilton, quietly, "and that ages a woman more than years."

"Ah, yes! your poor little baby and your husband. Charley told me all about them, too; and he says we must try and make up to you for all you have lost—that is to say, as far as our company can go. So that I hope we shall be great friends, Mrs. Hilton, and that you will very often come and dine and sit with us. Will you?"

"I don't know, my dear," said the elder woman, in a voice which rather restrained the other's eagerness. "I can not promise; I have lived now for some time alone, and I do not think I should care to break through my usual solitary habits."

Mentally she had writhed beneath the familiar mention of Mr. Lennox from Louisa's lips, but such pain was as nothing compared to the pang with which she now heard that he had already discussed her past sorrows and the remedy for them with his girlish bride.

The remedy! Good Heavens! was he going to offer to bind up her broken heart by the society of this child, and the sight of his own devotion to her? He must be made of stone or adamant himself, to fancy such a thing was possible! She could not help it; but Mrs. Lennox's proposition, though kindly made, seemed to close, instead of open, her heart farther to her; and it was in a constrained tone that she suggested that the dinner must be almost ready; upon which they descended together to the dining-room.

"Good-night!" said Beatrice Hilton, with forced gayety, as she advanced toward Charles Lennox. "I hope the dinner will be to your taste; but you have an excellent cook, and Mrs. Lennox will find she has but to order a thing to have it. Good-night to both of you!"

"You are not going!" he exclaimed, with real concern; "surely you will stay and dine with us!"

"Surely I will do no such thing, Charley! I am tired and sleepy; and I want nothing but a cup of tea at home—so please let me go."

"Oh no! you must not go—you must not, indeed. I quite reckoned on your spending the evening with us. I have a thousand things to say."

"Then you must say them to your wife, or keep them till to-morrow. I really am not in a fit state for being catechised to-night."

"Are you in earnest, Beatrice?" he reiterated, with a look of entreaty. "You will greatly disappoint me if you persist in going."

"Oh, nonsense!" she replied, with a light laugh; "you can do very well without me, and I am in no mind for any thing but bed this evening;" and with a final good-night to the bride, who stood regarding rather ruefully her husband's look of chagrin, Mrs. Hilton left the room.

She would have liked to stay with him; she, too, had a thousand things to say, which had bubbled up to the surface of her mind at the sight of her old friend; but she felt that she could not say them, she could not trust herself to say them, while that golden-haired apparition sat at the other end of the table and called him "Charley."

He would have accompanied her home; but she had provided against that contingency, for her carriage was waiting for her at the door; and once within its shelter, she threw herself back upon the dark cushions and gave way to a flood of bitter tears. She had done her duty; but would it ever become less hard to do it, and could she continue to dwell at Brooklands, with the chance of seeing him or her, or both of them, each hour of her life?

The next day she determined to spend by herself; and the morning and afternoon passed unmolested; but with the evening shadows in walked Mr. Lennox, eager to know the reason of her absence.

"Why have you not been over to see Louisa, Beatrice?"

"What! has she needed me?"

"Of course she has. Who would not need you? You might have helped her in a hundred ways."

"Did she tell you to say so?"

"No; but I know it. See how young she is."

"True; but she has plenty of experienced servants, who will not give her much trouble in housekeeping. She is best left to herself for the first few days. Have you dined yet?"

Yes, he had dined; but he volunteered to lounge by the fire while she took her solitary meal, and talked very much in the old style of all the things which interested them most. It was very delightful to her to see him there and hear him talk, and she had not the courage so early to tell him that he had better go home to his wife and his own fireside; but she knew that it must not become a habit with him, and therefore she made an early visit to Moorcroft on the following day, and offered to drive Mrs. Lennox out in her open carriage.

"Oh, Mrs. Hilton, I wish you had staid to dinner that first night when Charley asked you," exclaimed the bride, as soon as they found themselves alone (she looked still more lovely by day than by night, Beatrice thought, as she gazed on her peach-like complexion and liquid eyes); "for he was so dreadfully cross after you went; he was so put out about it that he hardly spoke a word all the evening."

"He was tired," suggested her companion.

"Oh no, indeed! he was cross. He says it doesn't feel natural to him to dine in Hurstley without you."

"Nothing will be more natural to him now than to dine with his wife," replied Mrs. Hilton, kindly.

But Louisa Lennox shook her head.

"I'm not clever, you know, Mrs. Hilton; I never was; and I can't talk sense like clever women. Charley says I was only made to look at."

"That's his nonsense," said Beatrice, as she watched the clouded face beside her. "He said that just to tease you; and you know you don't believe him."

"Oh, but I do! I shall never be a companion for him like you have been, Mrs. Hilton. I'm too young, I suppose, or too foolish. He said so before we had been married a fortnight;" and the information was accompanied by a light laugh, intended to cover the annoyance it had evidently caused.

"Then it was a great shame of him," returned Beatrice Hilton, indignantly.

And she felt indignant about it. Some one had been the means, by this marriage, of causing her a great pang; but it certainly was not this girl, who had married her lover almost in ignorance of the existence of such a person as herself. And at the thought that Louisa's happiness might be sacrificed in the matter as well as her own, all her sympathies were aroused, and she looked with new interest on the fair young face beside her, and resolved that, if need were, she would not shrink from pointing out his duty to Charles Lennox. So when, after the lapse of some weeks, she found that various hints were unavailing, and that he continued to appear at Brooklands whenever she was not at Moorcroft, she summoned up all her courage, and spoke boldly on the subject to him.

"Charley, why are you over here this evening? Louisa must be very lonely by herself."

"I might put a similar question, and say, why are you not at Moorcroft?"

"I do not see the point of that. Besides, I can not be always at Moorcroft. I have duties at home."

"Well, I don't want to keep you from your duties. Go on with them as you always used to do, and let me smoke in peace. I'm very happy."

"Yes; but, Charley," said Beatrice, gently, as she halted beside his chair, "you must remember that things are not as they used to be, and that your time is no longer your own to fritter away at Brooklands as you choose."

"My time not my own? I should like to know who the deuce's it is, then!"

"It belongs to your wife," she answered, firmly. "Your duty calls you in another direction, and you have no right to spend your evenings here while she sits alone at Moorcroft."

"Oh, she's happy enough! You don't know Louey yet, Beatrice. She's a perfect child, and amused with any nonsense."

"I know quite enough of her to be aware that she must feel your neglect, Charley. But even were it not so, I owe a duty to myself; and I must forbid your coming here in this familiar manner without your wife."

"The deuce!" he exclaimed, with real earnestness. "Do you mean, Beatrice, to condemn me to pass all my evenings at Moorcroft, without a soul to speak to?"

"You have Louisa."

"Pish!"

"It's no use talking in that way. You have married her, and must do what is right by her. At all events, I will not be the one to sanction your acting otherwise."

"I suppose you are tired of me; got a new friend, perhaps, and I am in the way. Is it so, Beatrice?"

The tears rushed to her eyes; but she would not let him see them, and turned away to gather strength before she answered him.

"That was not spoken like yourself, Charley. We have been friends, very close friends, for years, as you well know, and I hope we shall continue so till death. But I should not be your friend, if I aided you in doing what I know is wrong. So, once for all, come to Brooklands whenever you like, day or night my house is open to you; but when you come, you must bring Louisa also."

He grumbled for several minutes like a chidden child, and then he suddenly broke out, with a fierce oath:

"I wish to Heaven I had never been such a fool! When happiness was just within my grasp, to throw it all away for a mere face—a—"

"Charley!"

Her soft hand was laid upon his mouth, her sweet serious eyes gazed steadily into his own. The look and touch quieted him. He turned his head away and spoke no more.

"Go home now, Charley," she said, when her voice was again steady; "go home and make the best of what you find there; and the best is very sweet and very lovable, if you will but open your eyes and see it."

But Mr. Lennox did not choose to see it. Exiled, as he termed it, from the place with which he had expected to keep up his old relations, and scarcely ever seeing Beatrice Hilton except in the company of his wife, before whom he elected to believe it was impossible to converse on any rational subject, he became first gloomy, then morose, and finally quitted Moorcroft abruptly to pay a visit to some friends in London, and remained away for more than a month.

During that time Mrs. Hilton saw a great deal of his young wife; and the more she saw, the more she liked her. Louisa Lennox was not clever—there was no doubt of that; such extreme beauty as hers is seldom allied to mental power. But though childish and commonplace, she was, what her husband had designated her before their marriage, a "very lovable and companionable child," and the very manner in which she clung to Beatrice Hilton, and openly confessed her superiority, made the heart of the woman whom she had supplanted warm toward her, as though a daughter had claimed her sympathies. Beatrice Hilton had been terribly jealous of this girl; before she had seen her and Charles Lennox together she had imagined her beauty and his adoration of it, until she had felt ready to destroy herself for being so old and plain and grief-stricken as to have lost the power of charming him. But now she could be jealous no longer; and a great compassion for both of them—for her friend who had blighted his happiness, and the young girl whose happiness he was blighting—took the place of that feeling. She had been supplanted by a face, but it was only for a moment; and she saw that the reaction was causing a remorse on her lover's part almost inadequate to his crime. If Beatrice Hilton had been a dishonorable woman, she would have seized such an opportunity for reasserting her claim on Charles Lennox's heart; but she was not. She was all that is most pure and true and womanly; and far from such a desire arising in her, she grieved more for his disappointment than her own, and resolved to do every thing she could to cement the tie which should exist between the husband and his wife. Louisa was very affectionate and confidential with her during the time of Mr. Lennox's absence; but Beatrice could not help perceiving that while she regretted her own impotency to establish a claim on her husband's affections, she had evidently a strong suspicion that he had at some time felt more than friendship for the woman to whom she confided it.

"And I can't think, dear Mrs. Hilton," she would conclude, peering wistfully into her companion's face, "if Charley required so much in his wife, why he didn't tell me of it beforehand, or choose somebody else—somebody like yourself, for instance, who understands all his ways and wishes, and can talk to him on politics, or any of those dry subjects about which I understand nothing."

"And for not understanding which you are all the more charming," Mrs. Hilton would reply, with the blood suffusing her cheeks beneath Louisa's scrutiny. "Politics belong to men; a woman's vocation is to love and to look pretty."

"But Charley says that is all I can do, and that a doll can do as much," replied Mrs. Lennox, despondently. And then Mrs. Hilton looked down at her perfect features, and thought how

Digitized by Google

And so she half dragged, half led him back to Brooklands with her, and had the satisfaction to see that the new interest awakened in his breast really gave some zest to his reconciliation with Louisa; while the wife, shallow as she was pretty, speedily forgot all her husband's previous assertions in the assurance of his penitence for them.

But as soon as sunshine was restored and they resettled at Moorcroft, Beatrice Hilton made up her mind to a great sacrifice, which she never could have consummated for any one less dear to her than Charles Lennox. And this was, to leave Brooklands. She had lived in it and loved it for years; there lay the bodies of her husband and her child, and there were clustered her tenderest recollections. Yet she felt that she was a stumbling-block in the way of Charles Lennox's perfect union with his wife; that, as long as she remained in their company, he would always be liable to compare Louisa unfavorably with herself; and that this might end by destroying all their peace of mind forever. And therefore she resolved that she would be the one to take the initiative, and leave them to themselves, as from the first she felt they ought to have been. She did not tell Mr. Lennox of her resolution, knowing beforehand the arguments with which he would attempt to weaken it; but she stole away from Brooklands on a visit to her relations, and the next thing he heard was that Mrs. Hilton was going abroad, and that the estate was to let for seven or fourteen years.

"HE DOESN'T LOVE ME; HE SAYS SO."

"You blame me," she wrote in answer to Charles Lennox's reproachful remonstrance on the subject, "for taking this step without consulting yourself; but forgive me, dear friend, for saying that you are the last person I could have spoken to upon the matter; for I feel you would have attempted to persuade me to act in a manner contrary to what I know to be wisest and most right. Depend upon it, that for Louisa, for you, and for myself, it is best that I should leave Brooklands; and that, when this first pain of separation is over, you will acknowledge the same. You have tried, Charley, to effect an utter impossibility—and that is, to make the tender relations which have so long subsisted between us compatible with the higher duties you have taken on yourself. You would have gone on trying to combine the two, until you had made us all miserable; perhaps—God only knows, we are so weak—even criminal. But I leave you with your wife, and entreat you, by the remembrance of our former love, to go hand in hand with me in this undertaking, and not make my sacrifice, which I frankly acknowledge to be such, of no avail. You ask for my future address; but that I can not tell you. I am fond of traveling; and hope to move about a good deal, and visit many places of which I have no present knowledge but by name. But a letter to my agents will always be forwarded to me as early as possible; and through them I hope often to hear that you and Louisa are well, both in body and mind." And then, with an earnest, heartfelt blessing, the letter concluded; and Charles Lennox had seen the last of Beatrice Hilton for many, many years.

* * * * * *

But not forever. There came a time when her noble sacrifice of self brought forth fruit with power to heal the trouble of her life. Five years afterward we find her in Brussels, gazing out of her apartment windows on the pleasant boulevards, and wondering, as she watches the stream of pedestrians and crowd of vehicles, what part she has in that gay company. Five years had not passed over her, as may well be credited, without leaving some traces of their flight; but lonely and void of sympathy as they had been, they had brought her no fresh trouble, and had proved less harassing than those which she had spent in the company of Charles Lennox and his wife. So that the face of Beatrice Hilton, as it looked thoughtfully out of the window, though not less subdued and quiet than it had been at Hurstley, was far more peaceful and at rest. She had traveled all over the Continent during her term of exile—having visited Italy, Switzerland, Germany, and France; and now, having just returned from a long tour in Holland, she was resting at Brussels, and debating whether she should take a trip to England before crossing the Pyrenees into Spain, as she intended to do. She wanted to see her own relations: and she very much longed to take a peep at her old friends, now Sir Charles and Lady Lennox, and the children, of whose advent she had heard with the greatest interest. She thought she might venture to visit them again now; five years was a long interval; mutual ties had sprung up to cement their conjugal affection, and Louisa's letters to herself never breathed any thing but a spirit of the most perfect contentment. Besides, she felt a great desire to see "Charley" in his proper position as master of the splendid estate, Frapperton Hall, which he had inherited with the title; and, in consequence of moving about, she had received no letters from them, or news from home, for several months past. Indeed, she had but just written to her agents, desiring them to forward her letters at once to Brussels; and as she sat at the window, she was calculating how soon they would arrive, and what a budget of news she should receive from that long interval of silence. A servant entered with a salver: was it possible the facteur had arrived? No; it was only a visiting-card; but it was past the hour for calling, she could see no one—so she said, as she took the card in her hand; but her mind soon altered as she read the name upon it—"Sir Charles Lennox." Heavens! was it possible he had found her out, and crossed expressly to see her! How kind, how good of him!

Her face flushed scarlet with pleasure and surprise; her hands trembled; her voice shook; she could hardly give the order for his admittance. And when the servant had descended with her answer, she flew to the first landing, and felt as though he never would accomplish the long flight of stairs which parted them.

"Charley!"

"Beatrice!"

With both hands outstretched, the friends greeted one another, and met with a firm warm clasp, while their eyes glowed with affection and delight. There was no recollection at that moment of the weary years which had separated them, nor of the woman who had come between them; but their thoughts leaped backward to the time when they were all in all to one another, and lover met lover on the landing of the staircase. But the glow faded, the transient bliss resolved itself into a calm pleasure; and then Mrs. Hilton led her guest into the sitting-room, and found words wherewith to welcome him.

"Charley, I am so pleased, so very pleased to see you again. I was only just thinking of England and the dear ones there. But what brings you to Brussels—not to see me, surely?"

"And would that be too great a thing to expect from me," he answered, gravely, "after all that has passed between us, Beatrice?"

She was vexed to find that, in the first moment of their reunion, he referred to that past which she trusted he had buried; and it was with a slight shade upon her face that she evaded his question by another—

"How did you leave Louisa and the children—well?"

He turned and gazed at her with open eyes.

"Have you not heard?"

Then she saw he was in mourning, and cried suddenly:

"Heard! heard what? No—tell me quickly! I have been traveling in Holland, and received no letters for the last six months."

"And I have been a widower for the same time."

"Oh, Charley! never—it can not be true!" There was no tone in her broken voice, no sign in the color fading from her face, but what betokened a fine and unmixed feeling of womanly compassion for the brevity of a life so surrounded by all that makes life precious. "Charley," she continued, weeping, "is it really possible? Tell me all about it. Where did it happen, and how?"

"It happened at Frapperton, two days after her confinement; and I lost the child also. I can not but believe to this day that it might have been prevented."

"And the little ones that are left! Oh, how sad, how mournful it seems to me!"

"Ay, poor little mortals! they need a mother's care terribly," he answered, gravely.

There was silence between them for a few minutes, and then she said:

"Did you come to tell me this, Charley?"

"Yes; I have been longing to come and tell it you ever since it occurred, but I could not procure your address. However, the agents sent it to me yesterday, and I started at once. You may fancy how I have needed you, Beatrice."

"Have you? It is a great comfort to know it, though I could have been but of little use."

"You would have been of all the use in the world: you would have been every thing to me, as you always were before my own folly alienated us from one another. Beatrice, you have but just heard this news, therefore it may seem early days to you for me to speak of what lies uppermost in my heart; but remember that I have been living alone for six months, without the opportunity of receiving the assurance of either your sympathy or affection. Louisa is gone, therefore I will not tell you now whether I loved her or not; but if I made the last years of her life happy, as I trust I did, it was entirely through your means. You left me, dear Beatrice, with a precious charge, something to fulfill for love of you, and I fulfilled it. Will you never give me any thing in return? May I not cherish a hope that some day, not too far in the future, you will come back with me to Frapperton Hall, and be a mother to my motherless children? Is that an utter impossibility? Don't think of me as I am, dearest; nor yet as I have been—idle, sensuous, and overbearing; but throw back your thoughts, if you can, to those days long past, when we loved and suffered together, and would rather have died together than be wrenched asunder as we were."

"Oh, Charley! there is no need—there is no need," she answered, amidst her tears. "You have always been the first and the dearest in the world to me."

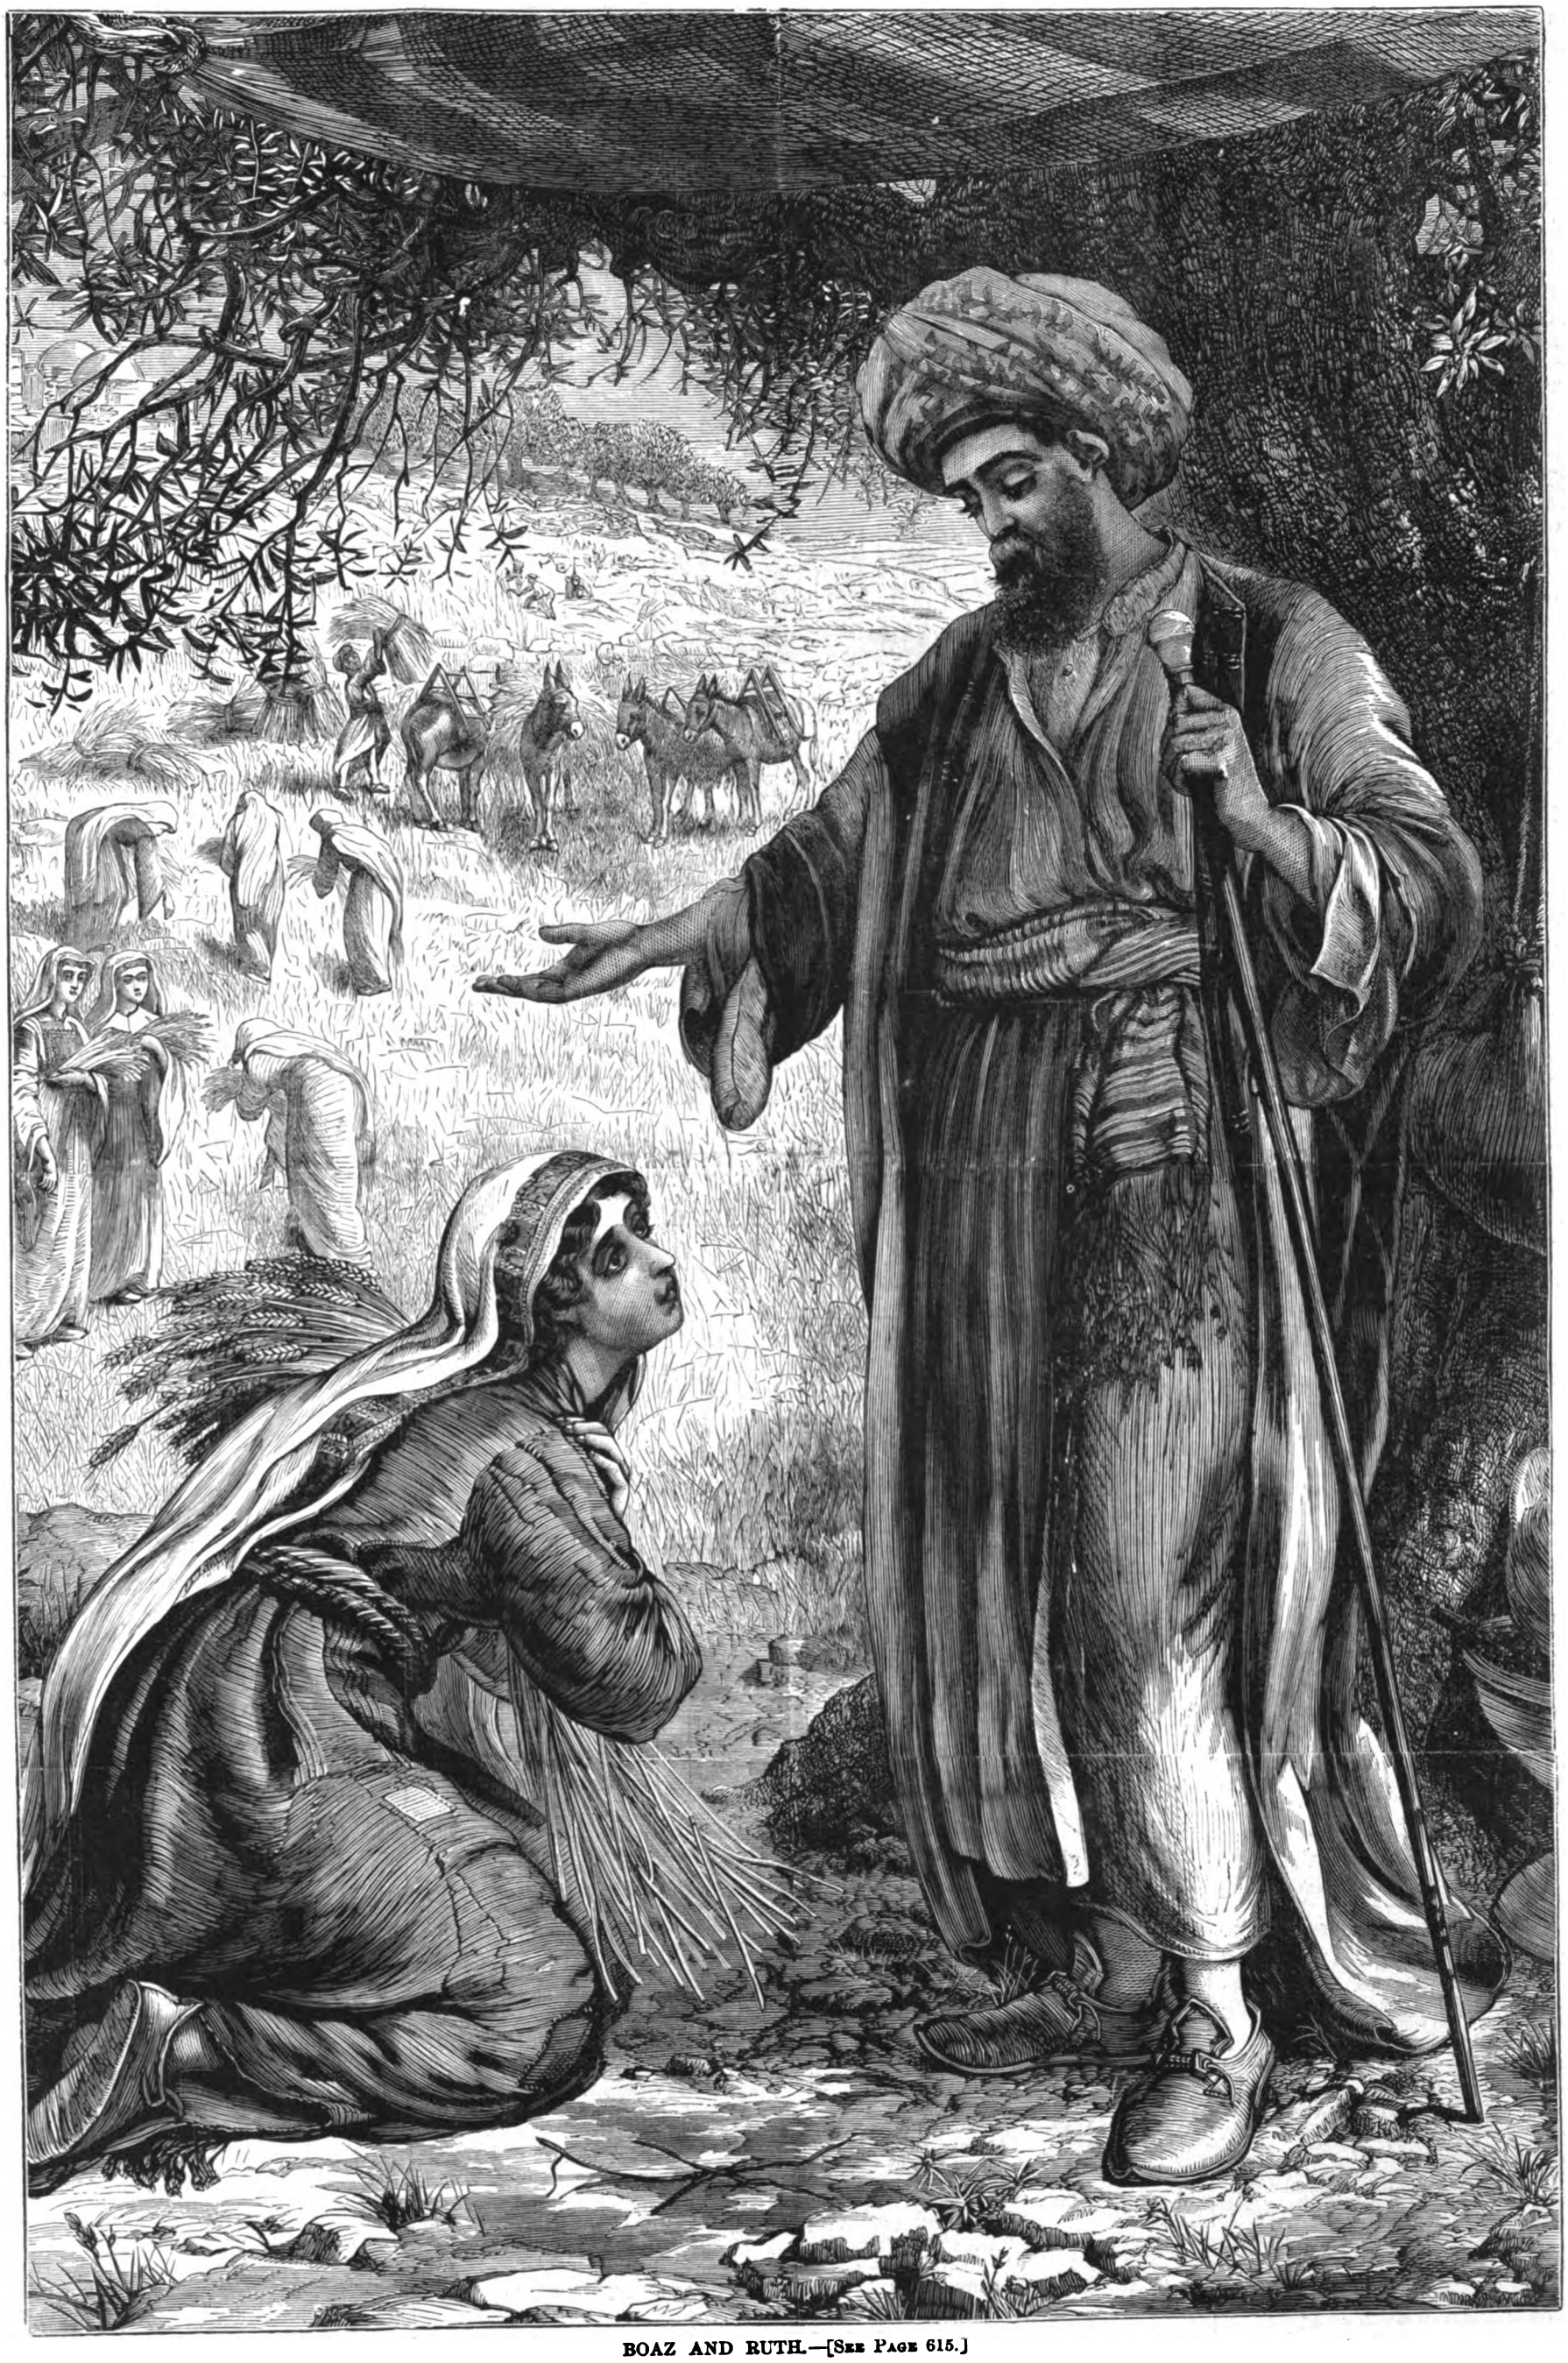
He took her hand in his; he showered kisses on her eyes, her cheeks, her mouth—kisses which she had as little power as inclination to refuse.

"And I have missed all this!" he exclaimed, with strange wonder at his own short-sightedness. "I missed real happiness for years to gratify a passing fancy; though, God knows, the sudden opening of my eyes to what I had passed over was more than punishment for my fatuity. But you have promised, Beatrice, have you not, to bury the past with me, and to begin a new fresh life of love and happiness?"

Yes, she had promised it: her liquid eyes swimming in tears which gave no pain, her bosom gently heaving beneath the fullness of content, her hand which clung to his as if it never would let go—all spoke in silence more eloquent than words, and made her lover giddy in the prospect of renewed delight.

Beatrice Hilton had promised to be his, and in due course of time she kept her word.

Digitized by Google



BOAZ AND RUTH.—[SEE PAGE 615.]

Digitized by Google

ART GRAVITATING TO BERLIN.

ANOTHER of the European celebrities of art and science, HELMHOLTZ, the distinguished physiologist and professor of natural philosophy, until recently the bright particular star of the University of Heidelberg, has accepted the call tendered him to a professorship at the University of Berlin. The world is indebted to this ardent and diligent investigator for the invention of the Ophthalmoscope (Speculum oculi), an instrument by which the interior of the eye, and its condition, whether healthy or diseased, can be observed; also for the invention of the Tone Analyzer, an acoustical apparatus, by the use of which every sound can be scientifically analyzed, in its constituent or component parts, and the fullness, richness, or poverty of each tone determined.

This apparatus is fully described in HELMHOLTZ'S celebrated work, entitled Ueber Ton Empfindungen (On Sound Perception), a subject that has also specially engrossed the attention of Prof. TYNDALL, of London, who co-operates with HELMHOLTZ in this direction.

Our eminently scientific piano manufacturers, STEINWAY & SONS, have been continually employed with acoustical experiments, and these have led to the invention of an apparatus (patented Dec., 1867) designated by them "The Patent Resonator," which heightens the sensibility of the sounding-board to such an extent that numerous harmonic combination tones, hitherto unknown, are developed, which produce that unparalleled richness of tone that invariably characterizes the Steinway Piano.

Their further experiments culminated in the invention and application (in conjunction with their patent resonator) of "The Free Vibrating Bridge"—for the purpose of avoiding or suppressing all false combination tones—which was patented by them in 1869.

The Royal Academies of Berlin and Stockholm recognized at once the importance of the former invention, and by diplomas conferred academical honors upon the Messrs. STEINWAY, creating them honorary life members, while HELMHOLTZ was induced by these successes to order one of their Concert Grand Pianos for his acoustical experiments at the scientific institutions in Berlin. This is certainly a great triumph for American Industrial Art, and a rare distinction and high compliment for the Messrs. STEINWAY.

Professor HELMHOLTZ'S letter of acknowledgment to Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS is before us, and we translate it literally as follows:

BERLIN, June 9, 1871.

DEAR SIRS,—Herewith I beg you to accept my very best thanks for the superb Grand Piano which you have sent me, and which has safely arrived.

I am amazed at the prolonged vibration of its tones, by which the instrument becomes somewhat organlike; by the lightness and delicacy of the touch (considering its great volume of tone); and by the precise and perfect cessation of the tones which the dampers effect—an element so essential to distinctness in playing.

The perceptibility of the bass tones is much improved by the use of the long scale of the strings; and it is evident that in ordinary pianos the short and too heavily weighted strings produce unharmonious secondary tones, the musical intervals become indistinct, and the quality decidedly smothered.

With such an instrument as yours placed before me, I must modify many of my formerly expressed views regarding pianos. I hear frequently many harmonic combination tones, while such a long vibrating tone as that of your Grand Piano is much more sensitive to dissonances than that of ordinary instruments, the tones of which so quickly die away, etc., etc.

I regret not having had the pleasure of meeting Mr. WILLIAM STEINWAY here, but I still hope to make his personal acquaintance, as he promised my wife he would call again.

Once more, my very best thanks.

Yours, H. HELMHOLTZ.

To Messrs. STEINWAY & SON, New York, U. S.

[Henry Ward Beecher—Christian Union.]

IT is saddening to see our hair blossoming for the grave too early. More especially women feel this affliction, and it is even a greater deformity to them than to men. AYER'S HAIR VIGOR removes it, and restores the hair sometimes, but its original color always.—[Com.]

BALD heads may have a new crop of hair by applying Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer, if the hair follicles are not entirely closed up.—[Com.]

BRUNETTE.—By dampening the face with cold water, after the first application of PERSIAN SPRAY, and again rubbing dry with a towel, detection is absolutely defied.—[Com.]

To have elegant, light Biscuits, Rolls, Buckwheat Cakes, Fruit Dumplings, etc., you should use Dooley's Yeast Powder. Ask your Grocer for it.—[Com.]

WHITCOMB'S ASTHMA REMEDY.—No established remedy has stood critical tests so well.—[Com.]

MAYHON, DALY, & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND DEALERS IN

SILKS, RIBBONS, LACES, STRAW GOODS,

MILLINERY ARTICLES, WHITE GOODS, EMBROIDERIES, GLOVES, &

FANCY DRY GOODS,

75 & 77 WABASH AVE., CHICAGO.

☞ ALL ORDERS entrusted to our care will be promptly filled and shipped the day they are received.

BEAUTY PERSIAN SPRAY, manufactured by Prof. DEVERNA at his laboratory, 37 John St., N.Y., restores the loveliness of youth by promoting healthy action of the skin. Its wonderful curative qualities have caused it to occupy the leading position among face preparations. Prepared from purely innocent vegetable compounds. Use none other. Sold by all Drug and Fancy Stores.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

TONE AND SOOTHE THE STOMACH.

Digestion is the primary function of the living machine. If that process is imperfect, every organ falters and fails in its appointed work. The stomach of the dyspeptic is weak and irritable. It requires to be strengthened, refreshed, and soothed.

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT

tones the gastric membrane and calms the uneasiness which superinduces nausea. The liver of the dyspeptic is inert. The Seltzer Aperient rouses and regulates it. The bowels are constipated or fretful in their action. This excellent saline laxative relieves and controls. In short, it is a true and all-sufficient Elixir for indigestion in all its varied phases, and for all the derangements which proceed from a disordered stomach.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

ARTISTS' MATERIALS.—W. SCHAUS, 749 Broadway, offers the best materials for drawing and painting, in oil, water colors, and pastel of the houses Winsor & Newton, Chas. Roberson & Co., and Lefranc frères.

FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES, and Tan, use Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists everywhere. Depot, 49 Bond St., New York.

It has the delicate and refreshing fragrance of genuine Farina Cologne Water, and is indispensable to the Toilet of every Lady or Gentleman. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in PERFUMERY.

COLGATE'S EAU-DE-COLOGNE TOILET SOAP.

PATENT DUPLEX

Ventilated Garter,

This elegant Garter surpasses, in beauty and comfort, any thing of the kind ever worn. It is made of a double row of spiral spring wire, heavily plated with silver and gold, and so arranged as not to impede the free circulation of the blood, thus insuring warm feet, while it leaves the limbs unmarked. Samples mailed on receipt of 50c., $1 00, $1 25, or $1 50.

GEORGE BETTS, Sole Agent, 543 Broadway, N. Y.

$10 A DAY with Stencil Tools. Samples free. Address A. E. GRAHAM, Springfield, Vt.

We make only one style, and have but one price for our Pianos, which are all made from thoroughly seasoned and kiln-dried materials, and have seven octaves—rosewood case—carved legs and lyre—large square grand overstrung scale—front round corners—serpentine bottom—iron plate—French action—and are all warranted five years. We have no agents, and allow no commissions or discounts to any one. This explains how we can sell a good Piano for $290, which is about the price Piano dealers pay to manufacturers for instruments similar to ours. Piano dealers are allowed by all manufacturers, except ourselves, to add 100 per cent., and upward, profit to all sales. This the public can prove by investigation to be strictly true. Piano dealers, teachers, professors, and everybody else, are excluded from any and every possibility of a single cent of commission on our Pianos. If you wish a Piano sent for trial, you must make the matter of reference and payment unquestionable; and if the instrument is in any respect inferior to any Piano made in the known world at any price, you may send it back to us at the end of ten days' trial, instead of paying for it. If you order a Piano sent, we have one request to make; and that is, that the trial shall be made by parties who are not interested in other Pianos. Please send for our Circulars containing full particulars and references to bankers, merchants, and families, in thirty-five States and Territories, who are using our Pianos. Address or apply to the UNITED STATES PIANO CO., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

NICOL & DAVIDSON, 686 Broadway,

Are receiving Novelties from Paris and London in

REAL BRONZES, COMPOSITION BRONZES, BISQUE GOODS,
FRENCH CHINA DINNER, DESSERT, AND TEA SERVICES,
VASES, PARIAN STATUARY (from Minton), MANTEL SETS,
GLASSWARE (from Baccarat),
GLASS CHANDELIERS (from Osler), SHEFFIELD TABLE CUTLERY, &c., &c.
ALSO, OF OWN MANUFACTURE,
GAS FIXTURES and FINE SILVER-PLATED WARE.

RIMMEL'S PERFUMERY,

PARIS, LONDON, BRUSSELS.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

THE NEW

ORIENTAL ASPERSOR,

For sprinkling Perfumes on the handkerchief, in apartments, sick-rooms, &c., &c.

Special Representatives for the United States,

EDWARDES & RUSSELL,
38 Vesey St., N. Y.

PRANG'S

AMERICAN CHROMOS.

NOW ON EXHIBITION

AT THE

Fair of the American Institute,

Together with the original Oil Paintings:

The Wayside Inn, after Thomas Hill.
Dessert, No. 3 (Fruit Piece), after C. P. Ream.
The Coming Storm, after James M. Hart.
Pastoral Scene, after James M. Hart.

ALSO:

Madonna (life size), after Murillo.
Dessert, No. 1 and No. 2, after R. D. Wilkie.
Trout, after Geo. N. Cass.
Pickerel, after Geo. N. Cass.
&c., &c., &c.

The above are some of our latest publications, and we would respectfully invite the public to examine them.

Prang's American Chromos, Imperials, Album Cards, Rewards of Merit, Illuminated Texts for Day and Sunday Schools, etc., etc., etc., etc., are for sale at all respectable Art-Stores throughout the world. But not all Chromos offered for sale are PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS, and we would therefore request those desiring to buy our Chromos to examine title and trade-mark before purchasing.

NOW IN PREPARATION:

Kaufmann's American Painting Book. The Art of Painting, or of Imitating the Effects of Color in Nature. With illustrations executed in colors. By Theod. Kaufmann. 4°. Price $5 00.

☞ ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES may be obtained at the Fair, or will be mailed gratis to any address on receipt of Postage Stamp.

L. PRANG & CO.,
BOSTON, MASS.

STRASBURGER & PFEIFFER,

(Successors to Strasburger, Fritz, & Pfeiffer),

IMPORTERS OF GERMAN, FRENCH, AND ENGLISH

TOYS,

China & Fancy Goods,

BOHEMIAN GLASS and LAVA WARES,
MUSIC BOXES, ACCORDEONS, HARMONICAS,
CONCERTINAS, &c., &c.,

394 Broadway, near Canal St., N.Y.

Parlor Ornaments, latest novelties in Toys, Fancy and Ornamental Goods constantly arriving to supply the general demand.

TRADE-MARK.

"RUSSIAN GORED KNIT UNDERSKIRT,"

A NEW ARTICLE,

Invented and manufactured exclusively by the NORFOLK & NEW BRUNSWICK HOSIERY CO., upon their Patented Knitting Looms, being superior to flannel, much lighter, perfect in shape, and will not shrink nor change in color from washing.

ALSO,

FULL-FASHIONED HOSIERY,

consisting of

Ladies', Gents', Misses', and Boys' Underwear, of every description, superior in quality and style to any goods made in this country, and fully equal to the best hand-loom imported goods, and at greatly reduced prices.

Full lines for sale, to the jobbing trade only, at H. J. LIBBY & CO.'S, 47 & 49 White St., N. Y.

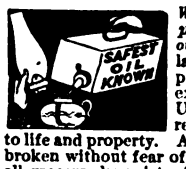
DENSLOW & BUSH'S "SAFETY" OIL



Will not explode! Safest and purest oil ever produced! Stands over 150° fire test! We take regular Kerosene oil and by our new process expel all impurities and explosive elements. The Fire Underwriters of N. Y. urgently recommend our oil as a protection to life and property. A lighted lamp may be upset and broken without fear of explosion or fire. For sale by all grocers, druggists, &c., in the U. S. Extra inducements to dealers. Address DENSLOW & BUSH, 180 Maiden Lane, N. Y.; 8 Custom H. St., Boston, Mass.; 34 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.; 51 S. Water St., Chicago, Ill.; or Cleveland, O.

MEN OF MIND, Women of heart, writing a Christian book. You may write. Send stamp for circular. JOHNSON & Co., 75 Fulton St., N.Y. Box 4015.

Digitized by Google

PLAIN SILK DEPARTMENT.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering a magnificent display

of

RICH PLAIN SILKS

of

THREE SHADES TO A COLOR,

Manufactured expressly for their Retail, and in the highest taste,

viz.:

A. B. C. — THREE TINTS for BODICE, POLONAISE, and UNDER PETTICOAT—or each color sold separately, in Cineraire, Cypres, Grenat, Fentre, Russe, Tourterelle, Tourterelle Camayeux, Moyer, Marine, Cendre, Van Dyck, Fumée, Marron Camayeux, Myrthe, and Scabieuse.

TRIMMING VELVETS CAMAYEUX, cut bias to match all the shades.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH & 10TH STS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

UPHOLSTERY DEPARTMENT.

Now open,

A LARGE AND ATTRACTIVE ASSORTMENT OF SATINS, DAMASKS, FIGURED AND PLAIN SILK TERRIES, COTELAINES, STRIPED S. & W. PEKINADES, SATINES, CHINTZES, CRETONNES.

LACE AND NOTTINGHAM CURTAINS, in Choice Designs.

MIRRORS, CORNICES, SHADES, BEDDING, &c., &c.

CARPETS.

1871. FALL. 1871.

Now open, a large and very attractive assortment of FRENCH, ENGLISH, and AMERICAN CARPETINGS.

Entirely New Styles of

TURKEY, AUBUSSON, AXMINSTER, MOQUETTE, TOURNAY, VELVET, and WILTON CARPETS.

Also, New Private Designs of Velvet Tapestry, English Body Brussels, Brussels Tapestry, Three-Ply, and Ingrain Carpets.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street.

INFANT'S WARDROBE "A"

FOR $75.

2 Flannel Bands	@	$0 37½	$0 75
2 Barrow Coats	@	2 00	4 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@	2 50	5 00
6 Linen Shirts	@	1 00	6 00
4 Night Dresses	@	2 25	9 00
4 Slips	@	2 50	10 00
2 Day Dresses	@	4 00	8 00
1 Robe			7 00
1 Basket, furnished			5 00
6 Pairs Socks	@	62½	3 75
2 Cambric Skirts	@	1 50	3 00
2 " " Tucked	@	2 00	4 00
1 Calico Slip			1 50
1 "Eureka" Diaper			1 00
Set of Linen Diapers			2 00
1 Rubber Bib			50
2 Quilted Bibs	@	50	1 00
1 Lace Cap			3 50
			$75 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent, C. O. D., by Express. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials.

LORD & TAYLOR,

BROADWAY & TWENTIETH ST.,

NEW YORK.

GLYCERINE CAKE.

RAWOLLE'S TOILET GLYCERINE CAKE is unequaled for Washing, Shaving, Shampooing, Tooth Soap, and Baby Wash; produces a clear, soft, white skin, and prevents pimples and chapping. Warranted over one-half pure Glycerine. For sale by druggists. MARX & RAWOLLE, Manufacturers of Glycerine, 179 William St., New York.

BUILDERS and all who contemplate building, supplied with descriptive circular of "Village Builder." Address A. J. BICKNELL & CO., Publishers, 27 Warren St., N.Y.

NEW YORK CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,

The oldest and best Music School in the country,
NOW OPEN FOR PRIVATE AND CLASS INSTRUCTION
In all branches of Vocal and Instrumental Music, Harmony and Composition, and the Modern Languages.
All Applications for Admission must be made at the
GENERAL CONSERVATORY OFFICES,
820 BROADWAY, near 12th St., over the Music Store.
(The branch at No. 82 Fifth Avenue removes up town.)
BROOKLYN BRANCH, 102, 104, & 106 COURT ST., near State.

WHY WALTHAM WATCHES

ARE THE BEST AND CHEAPEST.

Because, being made of the best materials, and every part being finished in the most perfect manner, they will run with great precision, and will not stop or run irregular, as is the case with other Watches.

We desire to increase the sale of these reliable timepieces, and have reduced the prices much lower than formerly.

Silver Hunting Watches, - - - - - - - - - $15
Gold Hunting Watches (18-carat cases), $75
Gold Hunting Watches (Ladies' size), - $60

We send single Watches to any place by express, with the bill to collect on delivery, and we give the purchaser the privilege of opening the package and examining the Watch before paying, and if, after it is taken and paid for, it should not prove satisfactory, we will exchange it or Refund the Money.

We have sent thousands of these Watches by express, and to every section of the country, and by our improved method of packing they will go safely to any distance. Persons living in the distant States and Territories can save from 50 to 100 per cent. by buying from us.

Do not order a Watch till you have sent for our Descriptive PRICE-LIST. It explains the different kinds, gives weight and quality of the Cases, with prices of each.

When you write for a price-list please state that you saw this in HARPER'S BAZAR. Address, in full,

HOWARD & CO.,
JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS,
No. 865 Broadway, New York.

The New Wilson Under-Feed.

THE BEST & CHEAPEST FIRST CLASS SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE IN THE WORLD.

Warranted for five years, and the warranty indemnified by a capital of half a million of dollars.

AGENTS WANTED in unoccupied territory. For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co. Cleveland, O.; St. Louis, Mo.; Providence, R. I.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Boston, Mass.; Pittsburg, Pa. Louisville, Ky.; Cincinnati, O.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Memphis, Tenn.; Chicago, Ill.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Toledo, O.; Albany, N.Y.; St. Paul, Minn.; Richmond, Va.; Montgomery, Ala.; New Orleans, La.; Galveston & Houston, Tex.; San Francisco, Cal.; or No. 707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

CARBOLIC HEALING C.S. COMPOUND SALVE

Beautifies the complexion by removing Pimples and all other disagreeable disorders of the skin. Twenty-five cents per box.

JOHN F. HENRY, Sole Proprietor,
No. 8 College Place, New York.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

A Great Offer.— HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

WICKES'
ECLECTIC OIL
Is Pure, Safe, Sweet, and Economical.
J. H. WICKES,
120 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

FREE Try samples of our great 8-page, $1 00, illustrated weekly—30 years established. Fine steel engravings free to subscribers. Agents make $5 a day. Send for The Saturday Gazette, Hallowell, Me.

$250 A Month easily made with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Secure Circular and Samples, free. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	" 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 13
POSTILION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 15
SHORT-SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 17
LADY'S TRAVELING SUIT	" 21
MISS'S POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 7 to 15 years old)	" 23
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)	" 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)	" 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)	" 29
BOY'S BLOUSE, SHIRT-WAIST, and KNICKERBOCKERS (for Boy from 4 to 9 years old)	" 31
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)	" 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt)	" 35
MARGUERITE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 37
LOUIS XIV. POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 39

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA,
with the Green-Tea Flavor. Warranted to suit all tastes. For sale everywhere. And for sale wholesale only by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 8 Church St., N.Y. P.O. Box 5506. Send for Thea-Nectar Circular.

H. HENDERSON'S
FAMILY LIQUOR CASES.

Each Case containing One Bottle of

OLD PALE BRANDY,	HOLLAND GIN,
OLD RYE WHISKY,	OLD PALE SHERRY,
FINE OLD PORT,	OLD BOURBON.

Guaranteed Pure and of the very Best Quality.
PRICE SEVEN DOLLARS.
Sent by Express C. O. D., or Post-Office order.
H. HENDERSON, 15 Broad St., New York.

UNPRECEDENTED SALES! — Wanted Agents to sell Pictures every where. One Agent has retailed over 9500 at 75 cents. Address, with stamp, WHITNEY & CO., Norwich, Conn.

RIFLES, Shot-Guns, Revolvers, Gun Material. Write for Price-List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents wanted.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE,	One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY,	One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR,	One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

BULWER'S KING ARTHUR. King Arthur. A Poem. By EARL LYTTON. 12mo, Cloth, Illuminated, $1 75.

BROUGHAM'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY. The Life and Times of HENRY, LORD BROUGHAM. Written by Himself. Vols. I. and II. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per vol. (To be completed in Three Volumes.)

THE COUSIN FROM INDIA. A Book for Girls. By GEORGIANA M. CRAIK, Author of "Mildred," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

LITTLE SUNSHINE'S HOLIDAY: a Picture from Life. A Book for Girls. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." With Illustrations by Frölich. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

COMFORT'S GERMAN CONVERSATION. A Manual of German Conversation: to succeed "The German Course." By GEO. F. COMFORT, A.M., Author of "A German Course," "A German Reader," &c. 12mo, Half Leather, $1 50.

POTTER'S MANUAL OF READING. A Manual of Reading, in Four Parts: Orthophony, Class Methods, Gesture, and Elocution. Designed for Teachers and Students. By H. L. D. POTTER. 12mo, Cloth, $1 40.

ABBOTT'S FREDERICK THE GREAT. The History of Frederick the Second, called Frederick the Great. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. Elegantly Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

JEFFERSON'S DOMESTIC LIFE. The Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson: compiled from Family Letters and Reminiscences by his Great-Granddaughter, SARAH N. RANDOLPH. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Illuminated Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

AMERICAN GUIDE TO EUROPE. Harper's Hand-Book for Travelers in Europe and the East: being a Guide through Great Britain and Ireland, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Spain, Russia, Denmark, and Sweden. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. With numerous Maps and Plans of Cities. Tenth Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Tucks, $5 00.

LYELL'S STUDENT'S GEOLOGY. The Student's Elements of Geology. By Sir CHARLES LYELL, Bart., F.R.S., Author of "The Principles of Geology," "The Antiquity of Man," &c. With more than 600 Illustrations on Wood. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

REINDEER, DOGS, AND SNOW-SHOES. A Journal of Siberian Travel and Explorations made in the Years 1865–'67. By RICHARD J. BUSH, late of the Russo-American Telegraph Expedition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

A DAUGHTER OF HETH. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "Kilmeny," "In Silk Attire," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

NEW LIBRARY EDITIONS by the Author of "John Halifax:"

OLIVE.—OGILVIES.—THE HEAD OF THE FAMILY.—JOHN HALIFAX.—AGATHA'S HUSBAND. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per volume.

A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Put Yourself in His Place," "Griffith Gaunt," "Hard Cash," "White Lies," "Foul Play," &c. With many Original Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 30 cents; 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

FOR LACK OF GOLD. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "Robin Gray." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE ISLAND NEIGHBORS. A Novel of American Life. By Mrs. A. B. BLACKWELL. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

WON—NOT WOOED. By the Author of "Bred in the Bone," "A Beggar on Horseback," "One of the Family," "Gwendoline's Harvest," "Carlyon's Year," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

NEW EDITIONS

OF BOOKS

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

FELIX HOLT. By GEORGE ELIOT. 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

TENANT OF WILDFELL HALL. By ANNE BRONTÉ. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

WUTHERING HEIGHTS. By EMILY BRONTÉ. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

ANTHON'S LATIN-ENGLISH AND ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY. 8vo, Sheep, $3 50.

CARLYLE'S FREDERICK THE GREAT. Vols. II., III., and V. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per vol.

CHARLES READE'S FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

DORÉ. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

ABBOTT'S CYRUS. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20.

DEMOSTHENES. Vol. II. New Classical Library. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THACKERAY'S PHILIP. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TROLLOPE'S BERTRAMS. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SMITH'S SMALLER GREECE. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

For particulars, address AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers, 331 Pearl St., New York.

Digitized by Google

MENACE.

LITTLE ANGLER (to her refractory Bait). "Keep Still, you tiresome little Thing! If you don't leave off Skriggling, I'll Throw you away, and take another!"

FACETIÆ.

THE Irish, rightly or wrongly, get credit for almost all the bulls that go the round of the papers. It was an Irishman who wanted to find a place where there was no death, that he might go and end his days there. It was an Irish editor that exclaimed, when speaking of the wrongs of Ireland, "Her cup of misery has been for ages overflowing, and is not yet full!" It was an Irish newspaper that said of Robespierre that "he left no children behind him except a brother, who was killed at the same time." It was an Irish coroner who, when asked how he accounted for an extraordinary mortality in Limerick, replied sadly, "I can not tell. There are people dying this year that never died before." It was an Irish handbill that announced, with boundless liberality, in reference to a great political demonstration in the Rotunda, that "ladies, without distinction of sex, would be welcome."

GREAT FALLING OFF.—Beware of any undertaking which is announced with a flourish of trumpets. The instruments on which the subsequent performances take place are too often penny whistles.

HIS MOTHER-IN-LAW.—He stood on his head on the wild sea-shore, and joy was the cause of the act; for he felt as he never had felt before—insanely glad, in fact. And why? In that vessel that left the bay his mother-in-law had sailed to a tropical country far away, where tigers and snakes prevailed. And more than one of his creditors, too—those objects of constant dread—had taken berths in the ship Curlew, whose sails were so blithely spread. Oh! now he might look for a quiet life, which he never had known as yet ('tis true that he still possessed a wife, and was not quite out of debt). But he watched the vessel, this singular chap, o'er the waves, as she upped and downed; and he felt exactly as if "the edifice was crowned." Till over the blue horizon's edge she disappeared from view; then up he leaped on a chalky ledge, and danced like a kangaroo! And many and many a joyous lay he pealed o'er the sunset sea, till down with a "fizz" sank the orb of day, and then he went home to tea.

What religious sect do you expect to meet with at the sea-side?—The Sandy-main-ians, of course.

A Scotch minister recently told his neighbor that he spoke two hours and a half the Sunday previous.

"Why, minister, were you not tired to death?" asked the neighbor.

"Aw, nae," said he, "I was as fresh as a rose; but it would have done your heart good to see how tired the congregation was."

The wisest of men must be totally out of his latitude — at the equator.

A man who has been arrested as a vagrant has protested that he had a regular trade or calling, viz., smoking glass for total eclipses of the sun; and, as these occur only a few times in a century, he was not to blame for being out of employment a good deal.

The story of an unhappy marriage is often a narrative of many words.

Nearly all women like soldiers, and some would like a good offer, Sir.

Squire L—— was very fastidious in his notions of propriety. At weddings and funerals he was quite officious, and very particular that every thing should be done decently and in order. In due time he was taken ill—fatally so—and relatives and friends were gathered round his bed, sad and weeping. One of these, more thoughtful than the rest, asked the departing squire if he would like to have a clergyman called in to pray with him; to which he replied,

"Well, yes; I think it would be appropriate."

LOVE'S REMONSTRANCE.

BY AN UNARTISTIC "SPOON."

Darling Grace, I know you love me;
I love you with love sincere:
Then by our love this question answer—
Why do you wear so much false hair?

White thy brow as artist's marble;
Worthy of a poet's song:
Take thy 'kerchief and brush from it
That hideous coat of poudre blanc.

Bright thine eyes as stars of even;
I see them now with love suffuse:
Mar not, sweet love, their glorious splendor—
Belladonna do not use.

Smooth thy cheeks as those of childhood,
And fair, no doubt, if fairly seen:
Then why with filthy rouge bedaub them?
Bloom of health should there be seen.

Tall thy form, my peerless treasure;
Straight it is as reed on end:
Disfigure not its fair proportions
By that hateful "Grecian bend."

Pretty feet thou hast, my loved one
(Nay, do not blush, thou charming imp):
But, in the name of all that's odious,
Why assume the "Alexandra limp?"

Press thy lips to mine, my darling;
Press I thus my lips to thine:
When next we meet, my heart's fond treasure,
Have on thy lips far less carmine.

Fashionable boot-makers can't always cure ladies' boots if they are bad; but they heel them.

A good many people take a sea-side view of things this time of year.

TO YOUNG CAMPAIGNERS.—If your tent is not waterproof, you should pitch it.

A manufacturer and vendor of quack medicines for rheumatism and the growth of hair combined recently wrote to a friend for a recommendation of his (the manufacturer's) "balsam." In a few days he received the following, which we call pretty strong:

"DEAR SIR,—The land composing this farm has hitherto been so poor that a Chinaman could not get a living off it, and so stony that we had to slice our potatoes, and plant them edgeways; but hearing of your balsam, I put some on the corner of a ten-acre field surrounded by a rail fence, and in the morning I found the stones had entirely disappeared, and a neat wall encircled the field; the rails were split up into fire-wood, and piled up symmetrically in my back yard. I put half an ounce in the middle of a huckleberry swamp; two days saw it cleared off, planted with corn and pumpkins, and a row of peach-trees in full blossom through the middle. As an evidence of its tremendous strength, I would say that it drew a striking likeness of my eldest son out of a mill-pond, drew a blister all over his stomach, drew a load of potatoes four miles to market, drew grease out of a flint, and eventually drew a prize of $97 out of a defunct lottery."

IMPORTANT TO TEETOTALERS.—At the next temperance festival all members must appear in pumps. Water-tight boots will be objected to. No person with glasses will be admitted, and individuals with bottle-noses will be removed by the police. No person of the name of Potts, nor any member of the bar, will be eligible as stewards. Soda-water will be substituted for tea, as the latter beverage requires brewing—a process to which the association objects on principle.

A PARODY.

BY A BITTER-BITTEN.

How doth the little busy flea
Delight to lark and bite,
And make one's lodgings by the sea
Unbearable at night!

ADVICE TO PERSONS MEDITATING LAW—Keep your own counsel.

SEA-SIDE SCIENCE.

The more nautical the cut of the clothes, the more certain is their wearer to cut the nautical.

The ringing laugh of the sea-side bell is often appeal for a wedding-ring.

The swell at Newport is not always a swell in town: don't trust too much to a-pier-ances.

Always take your own cigars to a watering-place. Sea-weeds are not smokable.

Money is a great lever in the affairs of man; so great a leaver, some of us can never keep it.

Any two apples are alike if they are pared.

A PAPER THAT TAKES—A sheriff's warrant.

ALL SOUND, AND NOT SOUND.

A Scotch minister in a strange parish, wishing to know what his people thought of his preaching, questioned the sexton:

"What do they say of Mr. ——?" (his predecessor).

"Oh," said the sexton, "they say he is not sound!"

"What do they say of the new minister?" (himself).

"Oh," replied the sexton, "they say he's all sound!"

"THE THINKER AND THE WORKER."

GOVERNESS. "Now, May, you've got Two Things to Look after—"

MAY (who is eminently practical). "All right—Bandbox and Carpet-Bag!"

GOVERNESS. "And you've Three Things to take Care of, Charlie. Now what are they?"

CHARLIE (a dreamy and absent boy). "Three Things to take Care of? Oh!—Oh yes! The World, the Flesh, and the D——."

GOVERNESS. "What are you Talking of, Charlie?"

WANTED—

A tailor, who can cook his own goose, and make it catable.

A fish-monger, who has a good character from his last plaice.

A lawyer, who is willing to come on trial; terms of engagement brief.

A gardener, who understands his business in all its branches, to live in the house, but must not object to bedding out.

A gentleman, to get up a company; there must be no limit to his lie-ability.

A blacksmith; must be a clever forger, and free from vice, and who his hand-will turn to any thing. Those on strike only need apply.

A baker; must be an industrious, well-bred man, who can rise early. No loafers need apply.

A shoe-black; a boy of understanding and polish preferred; and as it is doubtful when and how long he may be required, must be willing to brush at a moment's notice.

Nothing is more charming than the popping of Champagne, except sometimes the popping of the question.

OH, RAPTURE!

(LITERATURE FOR THE SEASON.)

SYMPATHETIC WIFE (reads). "'Cut up a cold fowl into small joints; steep them in a basin with a little oil, vinegar, pepper, and salt drain them on a cloth; dish them up in a pyramidal form on a thick bed of seasoned shred lettuces; mask them all over smoothly with some white Mayonnaise sauce, No. 37; garnish round the base with a border of neatly cut quarters of hard-boiled eggs, the hearts of lettuces, olives, fillets of anchovies, or croutons of aspic jelly; ornament the top with a few sprigs of tarragon or chervil!' Oh, Algernon, Algernon, isn't it sweet!"

HUSBAND. "Lovely, my own! Begin again just where you mask them all over with the Mayonnaise sauce, you know, and read slowly."

THE WORST OF TWO STRINGS.

YOUNGER BROTHER. "What's the Matter, Mary? Are you Unhappy because neither of those Fellows you were Flirting with at Croquet yesterday Proposed to you?"

MARY. "Both did, Tom! And—I said 'Yes' to the Wrong One!"

A DOMESTIC REVELATION.

NICE BOY. "I'm jolly glad you're going to stop with us."

VISITOR. "Are you, Darling? Why so?"

NICE BOY. "'Cause we shall have Nice Dinners now."

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 40.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Ladies' and Children's Suits, Figs. 1–5.

Fig. 1.—BLACK ALPACA DRESS, trimmed with a flounce, side-pleated ruffles, and folds of the material. The flounce, which is twelve inches wide, is set on the skirt, the seam being covered by a side-pleated ruffle three inches and a quarter wide; above this are three overlapping folds each two inches wide. The over-skirt is trimmed with a side-pleated ruffle of the same width and with two folds. To make the waist, cut of the material and muslin lining two pieces each from Figs. 1 and 2, Suppl., and one piece from Fig. 3; cut the sleeves from Fig. 4, observing the contour of the under part, and paying no attention to the straight line on Fig. 4. Baste the material on the lining, sew up the darts in the fronts, face the front edge of the right front with a strip of the material an inch and a quarter wide, and furnish the last with button-holes. Set on the front edge of the left front a double fly an inch and a quarter wide, which is furnished with buttons. Join the waist according to the corresponding figures, and face the bottom with a strip of the material an inch and a quarter wide, at the same time sewing in the side-pleated ruffle. Cord the neck of the waist. The folds are set on as shown by the illustration. Sew up the sleeves from 7 to 8, trim them as shown by the illustration, and sew them into the corded arm-holes according to the corresponding figures.

Fig. 2.—PIQUÉ DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 2 TO 4 YEARS OLD. The basque-waist with short sleeves is cut square in the neck. The trimming for the dress is formed by two side-pleated ruffles of white piqué and a braiding of white soutache.

Fig. 3.—GRAY POPLIN SUIT, consisting of skirt and over dress, and bound with maroon-colored velvet. The over dress is cut heart-shaped in the front, and furnished with revers. Tucked cambric chemisette, with linen collar. Gray straw round hat, trimmed with gray velvet and long maroon-colored feather; gray veil.

Fig. 4.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD. The skirt and high waist are made of white alpaca, and trimmed with bias strips of blue silk; the over dress with square peasant waist is of blue foulard, braided with blue silk cord. Bows of blue silk ribbon for the hair.

Fig. 5.—LAVENDER CHALLIE DRESS. This dress consists of a double skirt and high basque-waist, and is trimmed with side-pleated ruffles and ruches of the material. Lace barbe for the hair.

Fig. 1.—BLACK ALPACA DRESS. For pattern see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-4.

Fig. 2.—PIQUÉ DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 2 TO 4 YEARS OLD.

Fig. 3.—POPLIN SUIT.

Fig. 4.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.

Fig. 5.—CHALLIE DRESS.

FIGS. 1-5.—SUITS FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN.

SHADOW LANDSCAPES FOR TRANSPARENT SCREENS.

LANDSCAPES that will appear like beautiful sepia drawings for screens may be made in the following manner: Select a design—say a landscape containing buildings, rocks, trees, etc.; draw it in outline, taking care to observe the perspective, and then cut it out very accurately, following all the details of the prominent objects. On the parts where the shadows fall paste pieces of paper varying in thickness according to the depth of the shadows required. Where only a slight shade is wanted put on thin letter-paper, and where the shadow is intended to be very deep use thick brown wrapping-paper. Around the mouldings of doors and windows paste narrow strips, which may be doubled in some parts until the required tone is obtained. Foliage, water, and clouds may be very effectively indicated by the same means, the shape of their shadows being cut out and pasted on as above directed; and where these shadows become deeper, other smaller pieces of paper are to be cut out and pasted on as before In order to study the effect as we proceed, one only has to hang it against a window or hold it before a lamp, and then lighten or darken as may be required. Not only the masses, but all the variations of light and shade may be produced, with nice gradations and soft blendings, as well as the abrupt projections of rocks and buildings.—The more distant the objects, the lighter should be the shadows, while those in the immediate foreground will be thick and quite opaque. A moonlight view may be produced very finely, and the moon itself should be cut entirely out of the paper that [illegible] the gr[illegible] of [illegible] sides?

Digitized by Google

When all is done, a lining of white tissue-paper is to be pasted over the front, concealing all the design, and over this a glass, the whole being framed without the usual wooden back; this will allow the light to strike through it, and, if a ring be affixed, it will be conveniently hung up before the window of your sitting-room, and to those unacquainted with the method of its construction will be quite a marvel of beauty and ingenuity.

Smaller and still more simple designs will be very effective as panels for lamp-shades, to be used just as are the porcelain transparencies in the bronze or gilt frames. Even transom-windows, or side lights in a vestibule door, may be filled with such transparencies, being inclosed between two panes of glass, and thus safe from accident.

Should any prefer to have the picture slightly tinted, let the tissue-paper covering be of the desired color, and it will impart a corresponding tone to the whole.

LILAC CHAINS.

Let us make a necklace of the lilac flower—
The sun will not be setting yet for full an hour;
All that lilacs know of song and stars and showers
Shall be surely threaded on this chain of ours.

Beads of white and purple—pearls and amethyst—
Rains have dripped upon them, happy winds have kissed;
Slipping through our fingers on this pretty string,
Sha'n't we catch the magic of the early spring?

Catch the bluebird's whistle and the robin's cheer,
Catch the trick of blooming with the blooming year,
Catch the frolic spirit of the winds that bring
Over miles of country hints of blossoming?

Amber may be fragrant, so is sandal-wood,
But I wouldn't change them, even if I could:
Ah me! am I dreaming? Twenty years have passed
Since I strung a necklace of the lilacs last!

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1871.

FOUR MONTHS FOR ONE DOLLAR.

"POOR MISS FINCH,"

a new and beautifully illustrated serial story, by

WILKIE COLLINS,

author of "The Woman in White," "The Moonstone," etc., was commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY for September 2.

New Subscribers will be supplied with the WEEKLY from September 2 to the close of the year, four months, for ONE DOLLAR.

☞ A Cut Paper Pattern of a new and elegant Vest-Basque Walking Suit will be published with our next Number. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement in the last Number.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain an extra-sized Pattern Sheet, with patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Fall Wrappings, Bonnets, House, Evening, and Walking Dresses, and Lingerie for Ladies and Children; new and tasteful Fancy Articles, etc., etc.

SLIPSHOD.

"NO man is a hero to his valet de chambre." This is a fact to which every one, however careful of his dignity, must yield. He who puts on the royal robe, adjusts the judicial wig, or pulls off the military boot, necessarily beholds king, judge, and conqueror in more or less of the nakedness of humanity, and in his eyes the symbols, at least, of majesty, law, and command can not but lose much of their awe. The great MOLTKE, who still, even in these days of bearded heroes, shaves, can hardly present a heroic aspect to the barber who holds him by the nose, and beslobbers the portentous lines of his face with soap-suds.

Vain as may be the attempt to sustain the dignity of the person in the presence of those to whom closeness of intimacy reveals every weakness and defect, there is no reason for lessening ourselves in the eyes of the whole world by any unnecessary display of natural or acquired infirmity. We are all bound by the laws of decorum, the respect for self and others, to present ourselves with as graceful and becoming a mien as possible. Every one should feel it a duty to avoid lowering human nature even in its outward aspects. An unreserved disclosure of natural defect, a willful disobedience of the laws of taste, carelessness of the person, and negligence in its attire, are social offenses. The slattern in dress and slattern in manner alike degrade human dignity, and should be excluded from all decent company.

People should be careful not only to present a becoming exterior abroad, but at home. There are many who, while they lay great stress upon the duty of obedience to the laws of decorum in dress and behavior in formal society, are entirely careless of their attire and manners in the domestic circle. These attempts to assume the decorous on special occasions never succeed, and the habitual slattern and boor are soon detected under the fine dress and air of ceremony.

Familiarity does unquestionably beget contempt, if not checked and regulated by the formalities of polite society. Trifling as it seems in itself, mere negligence of dress is unquestionably a frequent cause of domestic unhappiness. When the richly attired bride degenerates into the slatternly wife, as too often happens, she loses her hold upon her husband's admiration, and consequently his affection. A fondness which has been awakened by outward charms is not always proof against an ugliness engendered by negligence and a disregard to appearances. The man, too, who at home allows himself to sink into a sloven, is in no less imminent danger of losing the regard of a fastidious woman, whose innate delicacy of refinement is sure to be shocked at any want of propriety in manner or nicety of dress.

Without requiring from the family the most rigorous observance of the formalities of attire and ceremony exacted from society, we doubt whether they can be entirely discarded with safety by husbands and wives, children, brothers and sisters, in their most intimate intercourse with each other. The forms of decorum, though they are but symbols, should not be undervalued, for they serve as reminders of the mutual consideration which they signify. The man who takes his seat at the family table in his shirt sleeves, reeking with the sweat of labor, is not necessarily devoid of respect for his wife; but the mere act of putting on a coat out of regard to her presence reminds himself of the duty of courtesy, and indicates to others his sense of it. All the outward manifestations of mutual regard—the uncovering of the head, the various salutations, the "good-morning" and "good-evening," the "good-by," the "welcome home," the "thanks" for this and that, the "please," "will you have the kindness?" and the thousand other expressions of politeness—are as essential to the comfort and grace of the intercourse of the family as of society.

The influence of these marks and outward signs of regard and courtesy is especially great upon children, in impressing upon them the duties of mutual forbearance, reverence for their parents, and consideration for others; for the young, it must be recollected, are only to be effectually taught, in the first instance, by what is objective or recognizable by their senses. A father who habitually keeps on his hat in the presence of his wife, or never utters a gentle word of courtesy to her, may repeat in vain the fifth commandment, with all its liberality of promise, to his children, if in his boorishness he shows no outward sign of honor to their mother.

No one questions the advantage of ceremonies and courtesies in all our relations with the world at large. "It is," says Lord BACON, "like perpetual letters commendatory to have good forms." To become masters of them we must acquire them early, and they are only effective and becoming in the service of those who have been long accustomed to their use. The ease which comes from habit is essential to their grace. The family is consequently the best school for the acquisition of these "good forms," as Lord BACON terms them, and we need hardly repeat that they are inconsistent with every thing that indicates in the mien or dress the least token of the slipshod.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Birth under a Lucky Star.

MY DEAR LEO,—As I sit quietly in my place and watch my fellow-passengers, hearing their conversation and seeing their conduct, I feel that if I were the fairy godmother invited to a child's christening, the gift that I should bring would be temperament. If you observe the grocer weighing sugar and salt, it is the last little whiff that he casts in which turns the scale. If you study the stream in which you are hoping and feeling for trout, it is a little stone or chance bough, a drift or a waif, which has turned its course. Temperament is indefinable and vague and shadowy, but it makes all the difference between happiness and unhappiness. I know a poet who has plenty of genius, whose song strengthens the heroic and consoles the afflicted and inspires the young, but he is personally a nuisance, and his coming to your house is an affliction. And we all know famous statesmen who will be magnificent figures a hundred years hence, but a wise man would run around the next corner rather than meet them. There are handsome and fascinating men, too, accomplished and distinguished, familiar to all of us, whose wives other women envy; but those wives are not happy. The handsome husband has not a happy temperament. That is all; but it is enough.

There are days in midsummer when the sky is clear and the fields are green and the flowers in blossom and the crops bask in the warm sun, and to the eye a benediction rests upon the world. But there is an uneasiness in the mind, a fateful feeling of storms and elemental fury, which destroys the deepest enjoyment. The temperament of the day is unsatisfactory. But in September, when the mid-glory of summer is past—when the leaves are a little sere and yellowing, and the fields are stripped of crops, and the pastures begin to fail, and there is a possibility of frost—there are often the most perfect days of the year both to the eye and the mind: full, rich, ripe, satisfactory days, which tranquilize yet exhilarate the pure mountain-tops of the year bathed in celestial elixir. It is the temperament of such days which explains them. You may meet them in October, in November—yes, in December sometimes, when every thing seems gone; but they have still that power of making you satisfied and happy: they are dearer than those days of summer in which every charm seemed concentrated.

Or in a friend's family how often I see two children, both apparently well and bright, and born to the same chances. One is cleverer than the other and more beautiful; but it is all in vain: every thing goes wrong with her. The other is neither very clever nor very beautiful, but every thing goes well with her. Their family resemblance is so marked that you would say one is a smile, the other a frown, upon the family face. The fond parent watches the smile. He sees it bringing sunshine every where, even irradiating and for a moment smoothing the frown. "That girl was born under a lucky star," he says. Yes—he is right. But

"The star that rises with us, our life's star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar."

It is temperament, and it proves her of angelic lineage. She is of the line of Eos—a daughter of the dawn. Her sister has a darker ancestry, and comes from the house of clouds.

What else is the old fable and the ever-new truth of the traveler tried by the wind and sun? Boreas tugs at him, harries him, smites him, confuses him, enrages him; but he holds his cloak fast, and does not surrender. Then the sun shines upon him, soft, silent, persuasive, and every muscle relaxes, the very marrow is warmed, and his whole being yields. I am that traveler. I sit here in my corner, and somebody, wise, witty, famous, powerful, seats himself by me, and we talk all day; but with all his imposing force he can not lift the veil that hides the real me. And, again, some one comes who will make no mark, who will never be heard of, and every barrier between us is at once melted, and our mutual confidence flows together like meeting waters. I have told you, I think, or some other of my correspondents, that one evening, long ago, at the theatre, Sappho, the queen of wit, leaned over to me and whispered, with sparkling eyes, "What is it, dear Mr. Bachelor, that you find to admire in your friend Orlando? He seems to me the most commonplace of mortals."

"'Tis his ancestry that I admire," I answered.

"Why, of what family is he?"

"He is descended straight from Apollo," replied I: "he is all sunshine. There is no blood in his veins; it is all ichor."

I am afraid that Sappho thought I had been drinking. But it was the simple truth. Apollo was not more truly the Sun-God than Orlando.

The secret of a happy temperament is what we call good-humor. Is there any thing so invincible? The gusts of anger and pride and of every passion dash against us, and we merely resist. But we no more resist good-humor than a snow bank the April sun. Hostility melts; opposition trickles away. The great orator rises in wrath, and foams along his speech in tremendous invective; but his opponent, with one little sally of good-humor, turns the whole force of the indignant current away. So argument and reasoning are launched with power against a public wrong, but launched in vain, when suddenly a stroke of satirically truthful good-humor raises a laugh that annihilates the wrong. "Lillibullero," which my Uncle Toby whistled, was the song that sung King James out of three kingdoms. A song and a jest may be more terrible than an army and a navy, and a British minister may fear a good-humored laugh in Punch as much as an adverse vote in Parliament.

To be born under a lucky star is to be born good-humored; for to good-humor there is no ill luck. Orlando or any other invincibly good-humored man should be labeled, "All is grist that comes to this mill." A happy temperament is the eye that always sees the silver lining in the darkest cloud. If you remember Charles Lamb's Captain Jackson, you know what it is. The other day I went to my shelves for a book, and before my hand touched it my eye fell upon "Elia." There was a temperament! There was a heroism to which I always pay the episodical homage of reading a page when I encounter the book. (As if I did it for homage, and not for pleasure!) So I opened the book, and, happily, at Captain Jackson. I hope that nobody supposes there was no such person. The only doubt would be which of all the Captain Jacksons it is! "Wine we had none," says Elia, speaking of the half-Barmecide supper at the "cottage" of Captain Jackson, "nor, except on very rare occasions, spirits; but the sensation of wine was there. Some thin kind of ale I remember. 'British beverage,' he would say: 'push about, my boys; drink to your sweethearts, girls.' At every meagre draught a toast must ensue or a song. All the forms of good liquor were there, with none of the effects wanting. Shut your eyes, and you would swear a capacious bowl of punch was foaming in the centre, with beams of generous port or Madeira radiating to it from each of the table corners. You got flustered without knowing whence, tipsy upon words, and reeled under the potency of his unperforming bacchanalian encouragements."

Here, you see, was temperament actually plucking the sting from poverty. Captain Jackson gave his guests at his spare table the sense of "feast-oppressed chargers." "Then sliding a slender ration of single Gloucester upon his wife's plate, or the daughters', he would convey the remanent rind into his own, with a merry quirk of 'the nearer the bone,' etc., declaring that he universally preferred the outside." There was a temperament that filled a whole house with sunshine and happiness. I am afraid, dear Leo, that you and I sometimes grumble if our beef is not done to a turn, or if our Champagne is not perfectly frappé in the dog-days. Let us think of Captain Jackson, and be shamed into silence. Why, when I think of my fellow-passengers who sulk and fret in houses full of comfort, and of luxury even, the Sybarites who chafe at the wrinkle in the rose leaf, or of those others whose salaries are small, and whose homes require all the more sweetness and forbearance to relieve the hard work of the young wife or the old one, but who snarl and snub whenever they darken their own doors, I am convinced that the American Tract Society could do no more useful act than to issue a few hundred thousands of copies of Elia's Captain Jackson for distribution gratis in the Fifth Avenue and other suffering parts of the country.

I know that temperament is of nature, and I understand the indignation of Hotspur, who declares that it is all very well for Sereno, whose blood never quickens, to exhort every body to calmness. "Gad, I have more devils to subdue every morning before breakfast than Sereno has seen in his whole life!" cries Hotspur: "it's very easy to be virtuous if you're never tempted." But if you are not born under a lucky star, you can acquire a great deal of its influence by steady resolution. We need not be fatalists because we acknowledge that some are born blue-eyed and some black. If you have heard Cecilia play the piano, you know what delightful melody it is. But know also that she was born with no ear for music and no facility in her fingers, but that she has achieved this excellence by vigorous resolution. If she had said, "Oh, I'm not made for music," she would have been tuneless all her life, and all this pleasure which she gives to others would have been unknown. It would have been as if Captain Jackson had said, "If I can have no cheese but single Gloucester, I'll make the worst of it, and not the best."

Now, seeing what happiness flowed from his temperament upon every body, if you are not born with one so happy, repair the defects of your fortune—don't aggravate them. When I crossed the ocean it was with my old friend Captain Taffrail. The captain was one of the unfortunates who awake cross, and who are always ill-humored until after breakfast. He used to come up on deck before that repast, when we passengers were all breathing the morning air; and whenever any one in a loud, cheerful, hearty tone exclaimed, "Good-morning, Captain Taffrail," the captain always bowed and responded politely, "Good-morning!" but then, turning his head, he whispered vehemently to himself through his clenched teeth, "Oh, h—!" The captain did his best. He could not change his temperament, but he could withstand some of its effects. Indeed, what are manners but good-humored behavior? In the "Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson," which has been just published, Pomona lately showed me something so apt to our subject that I will quote it, so that my sermon may leave a sweet taste in your mouth. Jefferson was President, and he writes from Washington to his grandson: "I have mentioned good-humor as one of the preservatives of our peace and tranquillity. It is among the most effectual, and its effect is so well imitated and aided, artificially, by politeness, that this also becomes an acquisition of first-rate value. In truth, politeness is artificial good-humor: it covers the natural want of it, and ends by rendering habitual a substitute nearly equivalent to the real virtue. It is the practice of sacrificing to those whom we meet in society all the little conveniences and preferences which will gratify them, and deprive us of nothing worth a moment's consideration."

Digitized by Google

President Jefferson pushes it a little further—further, indeed, than is necessary. But this is the very case in which you are to "Assume a virtue, if you have it not."

Your friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

COSTUMES.

AMONG new costumes tight-fitting garments prevail. Paletots and round mantles are shown in abundance, but they are made of velvet, cloth, fur, or cashmere, not of the material of the suit, and are designed to wear with any costume of harmonious colors. This reduces the suit proper to the polonaise, or a basque and upper skirt. True, such garments have been worn a long while, but they meet the general need so well that modistes exercise their ingenuity in remodeling and varying them rather than in devising novelties. The newest polonaises are long, with close corsage without a belt. When basques and over-skirts are made, the skirt is not as long as those of polonaises. Indeed, French importations and the designs of leading modistes point to short over-skirts, but the long over-skirt of last year is so warm and comfortable that it will scarcely be abandoned this season.

Waists of French dresses are cut long, and are very high in the neck, a standing bias band half an inch wide being added to some, while others are merely corded. Shoulder seams are very short and high, defining the line of the shoulders. There is a seam down the centre of the back of all dresses, and two side bodies are seen in many, thus cutting the back in six separate pieces. The longest of the side forms goes into the armhole just below the elbow. Basques still prevail, though postilion pleating is not as universal as last year, many plain basques being fitted smoothly over the tournure. There is also a tendency to lengthen basques. Square and pointed vests are both worn, usually falling open below the waist. Many basques on which vests appear are not cut with separate vests, but the material of the trimming (of which vests are invariably made) is laid on the front of the basque to simulate a vest, and is bordered with trimming. For example, a rich Parisian suit is of peacock green and black silks combined. The skirt is of peacock silk, with diagonal pleatings of the same; the over-skirt of black silk is piped and faced with peacock silk, and edged with black passementerie and fringe; the black silk basque has a pointed vest of peacock silk laid on the front, and edged with passementerie. Buttons and button-holes finish the front of vests; basques without vests are often fastened by hooks and eyes, and ornamented with bows.

Sleeves are close-fitting coat shape, provided with broad, square cuffs, or else open up the outer seam nearly to the elbow, and trimmed up the opening. The half-flowing sleeve, with frill toward the wrist, is also retained. Wide flowing sleeves are only seen on outside garments.

Skirts are not changed in shape, but are now seldom lined, and are no longer finished with worsted braid around the bottom. They are faced to the knee with crinoline muslin, and the dress material is turned up at the edge for about two inches, and hemmed on the crinoline.

Fringe will be the trimming of the season. It is shown in every conceivable design, and arranged on every part of the dress, two rows often passing straight around the skirt, taking the place of flounces, and being headed like flounces by bias bands and folds. These fringes are often made by hand at the modistes', being many strands of thick Italian silk caught in the edge of a bias band, and tied in separate tassels. Again, there are richly embroidered velvet bands, or bias pieces of the dress material braided, the lower edge cut in deep Gothic points, to which is added a wide fringe, with rich heading netted in points to fill up the spaces between the velvet points. Although ruffles and flounces are still greatly used, there is at last a probability that flat trimmings will be considered most stylish and distinguished. Indeed, fringe embroidery, braiding, passementerie, and folds represent the trimmings most seen on French garments. Folds are deprived of their stiffness and made very attractive by placing them of two shades alternately, or of two materials. A pretty gray poplin suit is trimmed to the knee by four bias folds of two alternating shades, the folds overlapping, and the cluster finished at the top by a wide passementerie and fringe; a brown delaine skirt has velvet folds alternating with others of delaine, each fold edged by Tom Thumb fringe; An ashes-of-roses poplin has two bias bands of black velvet corded on the upper edge with gray velvet, while a row of tassel fringe (black) falls from below each band. Royale, or uncut velvet, is much used for folds, bands, piping, cuffs, collars, and vests on silk and fine woolen dresses. Few crochet or other fancy buttons are used; the preference is for large button-moulds covered with the material with which the dress is trimmed.

GLOVES.

French kid gloves are imported in shades to match the dark, invisible tints of winter costumes, and in rich purple and reddish-maroon for black suits. Quiet neutral tints are still the choice of refined tastes. Prettiest among these is a new soft shade called putty-color; ashes-of-roses is revived in eight shades; real violet-purple, with white stitching, is commended for plum-colored suits; and there is a wide range of pleasing grave shades, beginning with clear Quaker drab and ending in clear Vandyck brown. Drab, it should be remembered, is a brown shade, not gray; many people confound it with stone or slate color. London smoke is the darkest gray shown. Black kid will be greatly used, and a new idea among these is to have the stitching on the back and the welts at the wrist of a bright color. If this is too brilliant, then a colored line of broidery on the back between white stitching and white welts is chosen. Very handsome black gloves are wrought with gold thread in imitation of scalloped frills. Deep ultramarine blue, and the invisible green gloves that were sought after in vain last season, are now shown in abundance. For those who fancy brilliant colors fuchsia red and bright Magenta gloves are prepared; but the Bazar can not say a word in their favor.

Long-wristed gloves, with two or three buttons, or the demi-long, with a clasp and volante (or scalloped cuff), are the choice for street and church. Plain gloves without ornamental stitching are prettiest, but there is a tendency in favor of trimming The ordinary one-button glove costs $1 75; the demi-long and two buttons, $2 25; with three buttons, $2 75; four buttons, $3 25; with six, $3 75.

Evening gloves are rather deeper in tone than those of last season. Pearl, buff, salmon, and pale pink is the range of colors shown in numberless boxes of long gloves for full dress. These are entirely without stitching. The length of the glove depends upon the sleeve, and, withal, upon the beauty of the arm. Those with three buttons are long enough with Marie Antoinette sleeves frilled to the elbow. Six-button gloves, reaching almost to the elbow, are worn with short sleeves.

Tiniest so-called infants' gloves are shown in buff, gray, and brown, beautifully stitched and eyelcted. They cost $1 25; misses' larger sizes are $1 50; with two buttons, $2.

EVENING MANTLES AND HOODS.

The Russian cape in ottoman reps is shown for evening wraps. White and scarlet reps are most largely imported, trimmed with folds, braiding, and fringe. Black capes are richly embroidered in the Japanese work in bright colors.

Pretty hoods are made of squares of cashmere folded three-cornered like a shawl, fitted over the forehead by three box-pleats in the centre of the long side, tied under the chin by a cord and tassel, and fringed on the lower edges.

CORSETS.

The demand for colored corsets increases every winter, the prejudice against them giving way gradually as it did to Balmoral petticoats. Bright, warm-looking scarlet and gray merino are the colors most worn. These are beautifully made up in the comfortable glove-fitting shape; are prettily stitched with white floss, and furnished with the new "unbreakable busks." These busks are of strong yet flexible metal, with a double covering of gutta-percha, which so closely enwraps the metal that the corsets may be washed without danger of being stained by rust from the metal. Colored satin corsets, black, blue, and cherry, trimmed with white lace and embroidery, are shown for masquerading costumes. White satin corsets, filled with bones, and beautifully wrought with white, are for brides.

VARIETIES.

The rich gros grain ribbons seen at the importers' show two tones of a color, thus doing away with the use of two ribbons for trimming hats and bonnets in last year's fashion. The ribbon is about two and a half inches wide, two-thirds of its width being the darkest shade, the other third lighter. Paon green, ultramarine blue, pastile drab, prune, cypress green, and scabieuse are shown in two dark tints. The paler tints are shaded in the same proportion. Wider ribbons for sashes are shown also in two tones, among them olive brown, Vandyck brown, tan-color, garnet, and the darkest wine-color. Some stylish contrasts are also brought out in the same style of ribbons; for instance, prune and drab are seen together, brown and buff, gray and chair (a lovely flesh tint), and plum and chair. A well-selected stock of ribbons contains eighty shades of the fashionable colors. Watteau ribbons of pale tints in Roman bars are found in new combinations, such as green and flesh-color, pink and chair, blue and écru, apricot and Nile green, pink and blue, and pink with green. For the hair there are narrow double-faced ribbons, one side velvet, the other of satin. Soft lustreless finely corded gros grain ribbons are also shown for the hair, for neck-ties, and sashes. Wider ribbons for trimming bonnets are also double-faced.

Clerical-looking collars, with squares of linen in front, are stylish; but in order to be pretty they require more collar at the back than the straight standing band usually seen with them.

The black lace scarf so generally worn is prettily shaped at the furnishing houses by putting three or four pleats in the centre to make it lie smoothly on the shoulders. It is of dotted net folded nearly double, the under side deepest, pleated behind, and laid in flat pleats again where it meets on the breast. The whole scarf has an edge of lace. Made up of imitation netting, they cost $2 50.

New neck-ties have a band to pass around the neck, and a great carelessly puffed rosette in front with short fringed ends. They are made of faille ribbon of all the fashionable tints, and in Roman ribbons also.

Box-pleated blouses of woolen fabrics are shown at the furnishing houses. They are of gray, scarlet, or blue merino, or of fine flannel, or else of black cashmere, or even alpaca. They are for breakfast and house wear instead of jackets, and will serve a good purpose with double skirts of dresses whose bodies are worn out, or have gone out of fashion. Mothers will find them invaluable for growing girls. Three double box-pleats in front and back is the handsomest style; coat sleeve with square cuff and collar of black velvet. For stout figures a plain blouse is made, the pleats being simulated by bias bands piped at each edge with a color, such as tan, plum, or white. Plaid pipings enliven black waists worn by young girls with plaid skirts.

Cloth paletots are imported from Berlin for girls from three to twelve years of age. They are in gray, brown, and plum-colored shades, and are beautifully trimmed with velvet bands, fur, and elaborate cording in braiding designs. They cost from $13 to $22.

Water-proof dresses with plain waist fastening behind, coat sleeves, and over-skirt, are also shown for little girls. They are prettily lighted up by machine embroidery in gay colored silks—scarlet, green, or blue with white.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; THOMSON, LANGDON, & Co.; and AITKEN & MILLER.

PERSONAL.

PRECOCITY bases its claim to future greatness on the fact that FISHER AMES entered Harvard at the age of twelve, and EDWARD EVERETT at thirteen; Bishop HEBER translated "Phædrus" into English at seven; ANNA SEWARD repeated from memory the first three books of "Paradise Lost" at nine; and Lord BROUGHAM wrote on philosophy at eighteen.

—It is said of WALT WHITMAN that during the war he was a frequent visitor at the hospitals in and around Washington, bringing cheer and comfort to many a poor soldier. During this time he worked for the government for $100 a month, slept in a garret, ate frugally, wore mean clothes, and spent $70 a month for the sick soldiers.

—The Pope has sent a letter to M. THIERS congratulating him upon the continuance of his term of office.

—The Empress EUGÉNIE has gone to Spain for a couple of months, during which time the ex-Emperor will assuage his grief with such pleasures and comforts as are obtainable in Torquay.

—Mrs. LUCINDA STONE, of Michigan, who is traveling in Europe with a battalion of twenty-six young ladies, expresses delight with the young women who act as head clerks in the hotels in Ireland. Mrs. S. says they are quicker, more accurate, and understand questions much better than men.

—PASCHAL GROUSSET is not more eminent as a Communist than he is famous as a dandy. Paris has no daintier or better-dressed man. In gloves especially he develops great force. Since his arraignment he drapes his person with such care that the satirists on the Seine style him the perfumed and curled cut-throat of the Faubourg St. Antoine.

—Mrs. MARY E. DODGE, who writes pleasant things for Hearth and Home, is paid $3000 a year for that service. She is both clever and beautiful, and is educating two boys in a manner worthy the fame of their grandfather, the late Professor JAMES J. MAPES, one of the wittiest and most cultivated men of his day.

—The King of Burmah, animated by the spirit of the New England trader, has amazed the merchants of his kingdom by buying on three months' credit $45,000 worth of cotton goods, and is underselling the ordinary retailers.

—It is the agreeable custom of the Pope every year to send to some Catholic princess a golden rose. This year the recipient is the Queen of the Belgians.

—Mrs. ELIZABETH DONELSON, widow of the late Major ANDREW J. DONELSON, who was private secretary to General JACKSON, died in Tennessee on the 30th of August. Her first husband was LEWIS RANDOLPH, a grandson of THOMAS JEFFERSON.

—Count OTTO BISMARCK, son of the Prussian premier, is described as a tall young fellow, very much resembling an Englishman. He spent two years in England studying the English army organization, and afterward took lessons in diplomacy in Paris, where he was a frequent visitor at General DIX's receptions. He is master of five modern languages, and a great sportsman.

—Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS, during the last few years, has found but two things to commend in the public press. One was the elaborate and able statement of the position of the Communists, from their point of view; and the next, of more recent date, is an approval of the New Jersey Railroad Company, which, during the last thirty-seven years, has transported over seventy millions of passengers, without loss of life or limb to any one inside the cars.

—The Prince of Wales is declared by a London letter-writer not to have read a book since he left college, and that he declares himself unable to keep awake over the cleverest novel more than five minutes at a time.

—The gossip in Washington diplomatic circles just now is about the Russian minister and "M. FISH," as the Russian representative amiably calls him. The difficulty has assumed such proportions that unless M. CATACAZY retires before the Grand Duke ALEXIS beams upon us, the President will kindly furnish M. CATACAZY his passports, and permit him gracefully to exude from the country.

—Colonel FORNEY's "Reminiscences of Public Men"—the best by far that have thus far appeared in this country—will be published in book form when they shall have reached their hundredth number.

—Professor SEELEY, author of that strong and wonderfully well-written book, "Ecce Homo," has completed the first volume of his edition of "Livy," which will soon be published.

—The gentleman known as the "Fat Contributor" of the Cincinnati Commercial comes to the rescue of that much-criticised woman, XANTIPPE. He estimates that it was useless for her to endeavor to please Mr. SOCRATES, and nonsense to get up a good dinner for him, as no one could tell when he would come home to eat it. He washed very rarely, and let his hair grow long, greatly to the disgust of XANTIPPE, who was a neat woman herself. So much wrapped up was he in philosophy that he would only half dress himself in the morning, and he appeared on the street so often in his stocking feet that the boys dubbed him "Old Soc."

—"The Battle of Dorking," of which Colonel GEORGE CHESNEY is now the admitted author, is about to be published in French with the title of "La Bataille de Dorking; Invasion des Prussiens en Angleterre," with a preface by M. CHARLES YRIARTE. The English "Dorking" has sold to the extent of 100,000 copies.

—At the EDGAR-BONAPARTE nuptials, celebrated on the 7th September in the Roman Catholic church at Newport, Rhode Island, by Father GRACE (pleasant name!), the bride, who is very beautiful, wore a traveling dress of gray silk and cashmere, and hat to correspond. She was given away by her uncle APPLETON, Mrs. JULIA F. ORMSTADT, her sister, being bride-maid, and Mr. CHARLES BONAPARTE, of Baltimore, brother of the groom, groomsman. Mrs. BONAPARTE is daughter of the late SAMUEL APPLETON and JULIA WEBSTER APPLETON, granddaughter of DANIEL WEBSTER, and widow of NEWBOLD EDGAR, who died in Paris in the spring of 1870. The groom is son of the late JEROME NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, grandson of JEROME BONAPARTE and Madame PATTERSON BONAPARTE, and grand-nephew of NAPOLEON I.

—WACHTEL, the eminentest of German tenors, has made his advent in this city, and is now singing in German opera at the Stadt Theatre. WACHTEL is out of his first youth, being forty-seven, yet well preserved; voice perfect, and of the purest as well as of the most robust quality. His start in life was as a conveyancer—that is to say, as a hack-driver, an occupation hereditary in the W. family; but having found out that he had a voice, he cultivated it until he became one of the best of actors and singers in Europe, and has kept on in the even tenor of operatic life ever since. London, Paris, Vienna, and Berlin have indorsed him, and he now comes and begs New York to consummate his musical happiness.

—Alderman CAMPBELL, Lord Mayor of Dublin, did himself the honor to refuse a knighthood from the Lord Lieutenant when the royal princes were in Dublin. He is a grocer and wine merchant, and opulent.

—The congregation of the Rev. Dr. CHEEVER, when he preached in the stone church which stood where TIFFANY'S now stands, was not rich, and therefore let his salary run behind some $60,000. When the church was sold this was paid, principal and interest, and he now lives in a villa in New Jersey, and enjoys, as was once remarked by a druggist, his opium cum digitalis.

—In England quite recently a marriage took place which comes up to the highest point of romance. Some three years ago the Earl of Normanton died, leaving personalty valued at $3,500,000. He had two sons and one daughter, and in his will was a clause to the effect that he believed that happiness in this world was fully attainable only in the married state; that he regretted his second son was still single, and that unless he married by a certain given date he was only to enjoy a comfortable competence, whereas, if he would mate by the time named, he should have a handsome fortune. Up to a month ago there was apparently no sign that the young man would comply with the terms of his father's will; but, lo and behold! a few days since he "went and did it"—married a Tasmanian lady.

—Madame LOUISA MUHLBACH is giving herself to the study of English with great assiduity, in view of her approaching visit to this country. She proposes to lecture to the Germans and Gerwomen of the U. S.—a speculation that may turn out well, and may not. German folk are given to opera, ball, concert, and the salon de lager, but do not rave about lectures.

—Mr. WILL M. CARLETON has been engaged to edit the weekly edition of the Detroit Tribune, and will contribute his rural sketches hereafter to that paper.

—The late Duke of Argyll was "a fine old Scottish gentleman—one of the olden time," and not possessed of the proverbial thrift of his countrymen. On the contrary, he left the property much mortgaged. The present duke has, with commendable self-denial, paid off a good portion of it, so that the Marquis of Lorne will, in the ordinary course of nature, find himself master of a fine fortune.

—The foreign diplomatic world will soon be compelled to yield to American sway. There are few Continental embassies that are not ruled by American influence. The American belles have taken the place so long held by the English. The Comtesse de Gabriac was a Miss THALON, from the South; the Princess de Lynar, Miss MARY PARSONS, from Cleveland, Ohio; Miss DODGE is the wife of the Governor of Sedan; and the wife of Commander GAILLARD, who had the Communist prisoners in charge, is a lady from Boston. The Duc d'Aumale's secretary, M. LANGEL, is married to Miss CHAPMAN, daughter of Mrs. CHAPMAN of antislavery celebrity; and the American marriages at the imperial court are without number.

—Mr. J. EDGAR THOMPSON, who is to the Pennsylvania railroads what Commodore VANDERBILT is to the railroads of New York, is said to be one of the calmest and most persevering of men, always preserving silence himself, and making others talk without asking questions. An English capitalist, having business with the railway magnate, was told by a wag that THOMPSON liked to do all the talking, and the result was that in an interview of fifteen minutes not twenty words were spoken. When the Briton came out the wag inquired his opinion of the railway financier. "He seems to be an idiot," was the response. THOMPSON, questioned respecting the Englishman, expressed the opinion that he must be a Trappist.

—JOSEPH W. FOWLER, Esq., of Troy, proposes to erect on the grounds of Union College a new residence for the president elect, Dr. POTTER, who is his son-in-law. He has also added $10,000 to the college fund. The new residence is to become the property of the college.

—Uncle JEREMIAH GOFFIN, a disseminator of the truths of the Gospel among his colored brethren in New Orleans, recently put the question to certain dissatisfied converts in this wise: "What yer grumbling about? Yer all better off dan yer ever spected to be—dan ye ever deserved to be. Did yer tink when Massa LINKUM guv ye yer freedom he was gwine to buy tickets in de Louisiana State Lottery for you besides? Dat's what I want t' know?"

Digitized by Google

Feather Duster, Figs. 1 and 2.

duster is made of white tissue-paper, cut in the shape of feathers, and furnished handle of strips of split cane, which are held together with a head of red carriage

Make the handle first by winding hyr worsted around twelve strips of ne, each twenty-four inches long. he strips of cane are wound firmly r, wind red worsted closely on one the handle thus formed to a length inches from the end. Bend the f cane over as shown by the illustra- them around the handle two inches half lower down, and wind them here with red worsted to a length inches. The ends of the canes are l on the under end of the handle, y must spread out somewhat, as by the illustration. To make the cut of double tissue-paper strips hes and three-quarters long and an d three-quarters wide, slitting the lges as shown by Fig. 2, and run red backward and forward through the of these strips. The head of red leather, taken double, is cut from Supplement, and is worked in point in the design given, with silk of the the cane; the scallops on the outer button-hole stitched. The head is d with buttons and button-holes, so nay easily be removed to replace the when worn out.

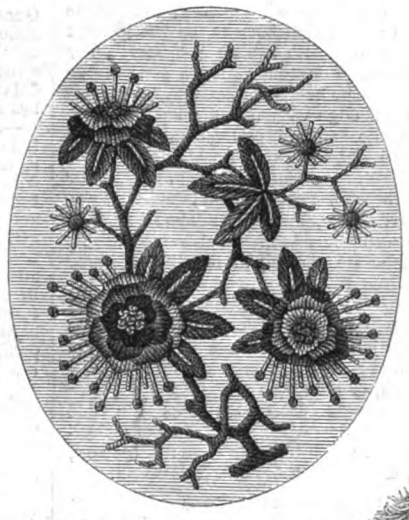

Fig. 1.—MEDALLION IN SATIN AND HALF-POLKA STITCH EMBROIDERY.

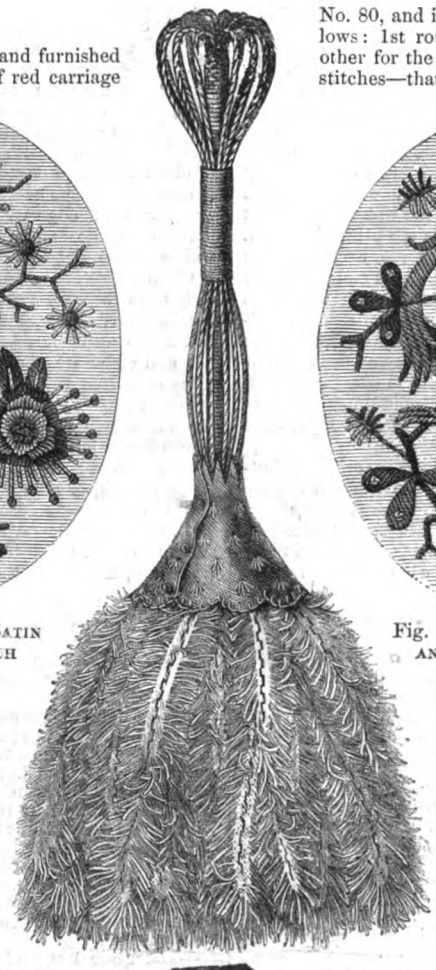

Fig. 1.—FEATHER DUSTER.—[See Page 629.]

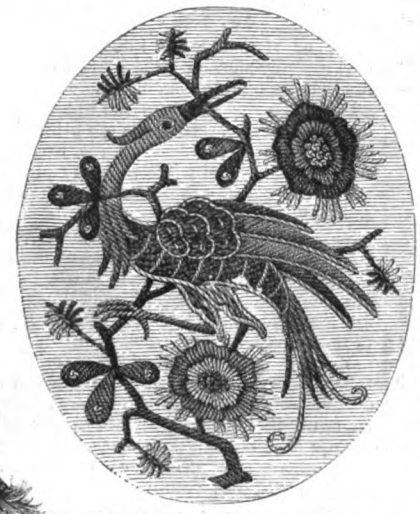

Fig. 2.—MEDALLION IN SATIN AND HALF-POLKA STITCH EMBROIDERY.

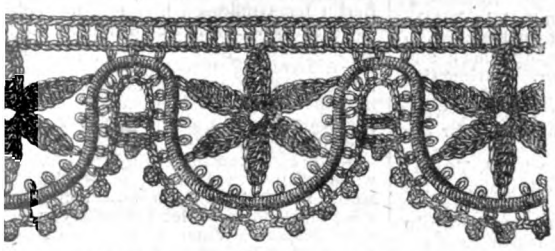
dallions in Satin and Half-polka Stitch Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

E medallions are especially adapted for ornamenting memorandum-



CROCHET AND MIGNARDISE EDGING.

ard-cases, cigar-cases, etc. They are worked with saddler's silk or dark silk cloth, velvet, or leather. On gray leather, em- in different shades of gray silk and gold thread has a pretty The two designs here given are worked in half-polka, and satin stitch, and in point Russe, as shown by the ions.

Crochet and Mignardise Edging.

edging, which is suitable for trimming lingerie, ed with mignardise and twisted crochet cot- . 60. Work, first, the six-leaved figures ly; to do this, crochet, beginning at the * 8 ch. (chain stitch), going back- these and passing over the last, ngle crochet), 1 sdc. (short dou- het), 3 dc. (double crochet), sc. This forms a leaflet; ive times more from *, ten the thread. In these leaflets, how- sten the point of a loop of the lise as shown llustration. he requi- nber of gures is work on r side of the lise one round vs: * nine times ly 1 sc. on the next the mignardise, and p. (picot), 1 ch.; the p. of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the hese. Then twice alternate- on the next loop, and 3 ch.; en times alternately 1 sc. on the p, and 1 ch. Then 1 sc. on the fol- loop, 4 ch., fasten to the ch. opposite, ing back on the 4 ch.; this completes the first of the cross bands in the hollow be- tween two scallops; now crochet 1 ch., 1 sc. on the next loop, 1 cross band like the for- mer, after the second sc. of the band 1 p. of 4 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of the 4 ch., and repeat from *. Finish the lace by working one round of ch. and one round of open-work dc. for the upper edge, observing the illustration.

Tatted Edging.

THIS edging is worked with tatting cotton, No. 80, and is used for trimming lingerie. It is worked with two threads (shuttles) as follows: 1st round.—Tie both threads, one of which serves for the foundation thread, the other for the working thread, together, and on the foundation thread work 3 ds. (double stitches—that is, 1 stitch right, 1 stitch left); turn these stitches downward, and work, * with one foundation thread only, thus paying no attention to the working thread, one ring of 6 ds., 1 short p. (picot), 6 ds., 1 p. two-fifths of an inch long, 6 ds., 1 short p., 6 ds. Turn the ring downward, and on the foundation thread 3 ds.; now, with the working thread only, make one small ring of three times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 2 ds.; now again on the foundation thread 3 ds., with the working thread only, one small ring like the former; this ring must be fastened to the preceding ring as shown by the illustration; on the foundation thread again 3 ds., and with the working thread only, one small ring like the preceding; turn the scallop thus formed downward with the three small rings, and repeat from *, always fastening to the last p. of the preceding ring. Continue the work, observing the illustration. In the second round, which consists only of one row of stitches worked on the foundation thread, fasten to the large rings of the first round, and hold every six of the long picots together.

Netted Guipure Square.

SQUARES of this kind are used for setting tidies together. They can be joined by means of netted guipure or crocheted insertion, or else with strips of colored silk, or brown or écru linen. These strips may be ornamented in simple point Russe embroidery. For the design of the square here given work, first, the plaid parts of the illustration in point de toile, darn the open-work foundation in point d'esprit, and work the closer strips, which rest on the plaid parts in the middle figure of the square, and the remaining close figures shown by the illustration, in point de reprise. Work a wheel in the centre of the square.

TATTED EDGING.

Corners of Tapestry Borders, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE borders are suitable for mats, cushions, covers, etc. They are worked on canvas in cross stitch embroidery. The colors are given by the description of symbols under the designs. For mats work the border on coarse canvas in Smyrna stitch (double cross stitch), and fill the centre with deer-skin, a plush foundation, or embroidery.

Canvas Bell Cover.

See illustration on page 629.

THIS bell cover is made of No. 4 single canvas, and steel springs an eighth of an inch wide, trimmed with red worsted braid. Cut eight pieces of equal size from Fig. 84, Supplement, and sew them together according to the corresponding signs. Furnish the cover on the inside along the seams with covered steel springs, which are bent in at the points indicated by : on Fig. 84, in order to obtain the shape of the bell cover. Sew the red braid on along the seams on the outside, first in loops, and then straight, ornament with beads along the middle of the loops, and set a steel spring half an inch wide, covered with red braid, on the under edge of the bell cover. This spring is sewed on with slanting stitches of black silk, and furnished underneath with a ruche of red worsted braid. Following the straight line partly indicated on the pattern, trim the bell cover with similar braid, on which sew a narrower steel spring similar to that on the under edge. Inside of the bell cover, covering the steel springs that meet at the point, set a round piece of pasteboard an inch in diameter, and covered with the material. Trim the outside of the point of the cover with a rosette of box-pleated red worsted braid, and on this rosette sew a ring of a narrow covered steel spring for a handle. In sewing on the ring pass the needle through escription of Symbols: ■ Black; ⊡ Green; ▪ Gray; ⊡ 1st (darkest), ⊠ 2d, Reddish-Brown; ■ 1st (darkest), ⊠ 2d, ⊞ 3d, ⁞ 4th (lightest). Fawn,

21868

Fig. 1.—CORNER OF TAPESTRY BORDER.

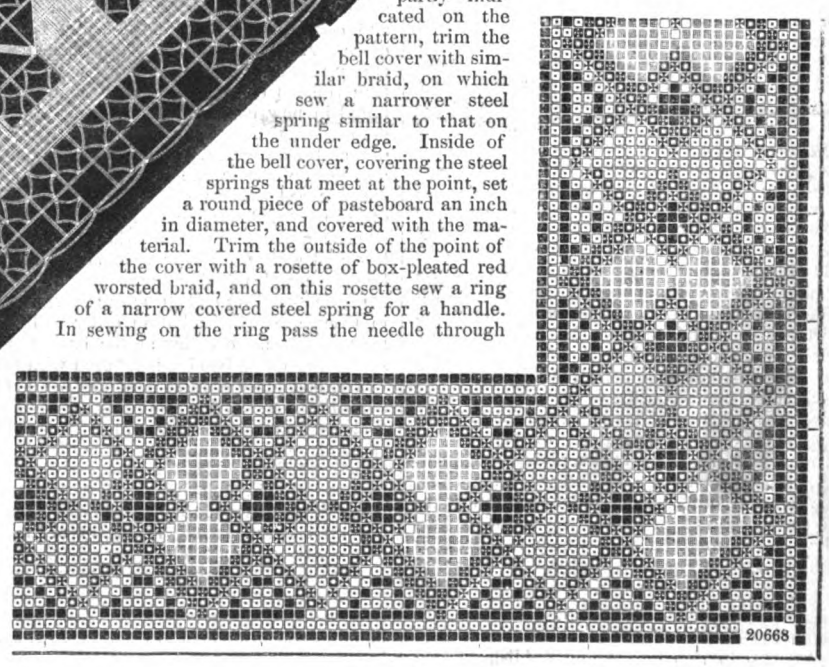
NETTED GUIPURE SQUARE.



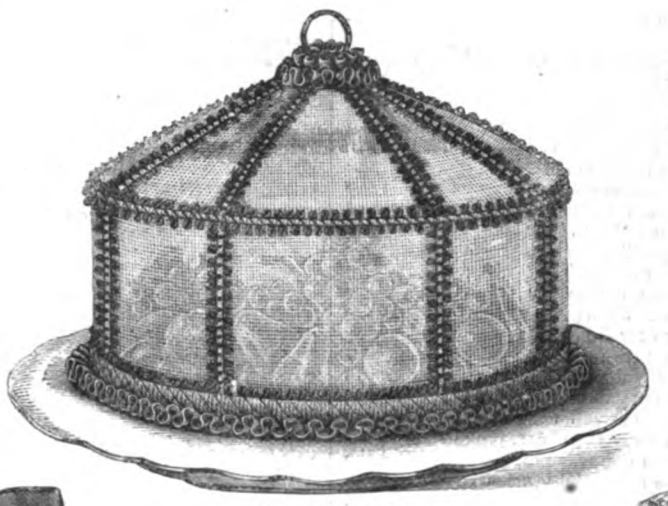
20668

Fig. 2.—CORNER OF TAPESTRY BORDER.
Description of Symbols: ■ Black; ⊡ Red; ▪ Green; ■ 1st, ⊡ 2d, ⊠ 3d, □ 4th, Fawn.

Digitized by Google

For pattern and design see Supplement, No. VI., Fig. 17.

Fig. 1.—GROS GRAIN RIBBON BOW FOR THE HAIR.



CANVAS BELL COVER.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXIV., Fig. 84.

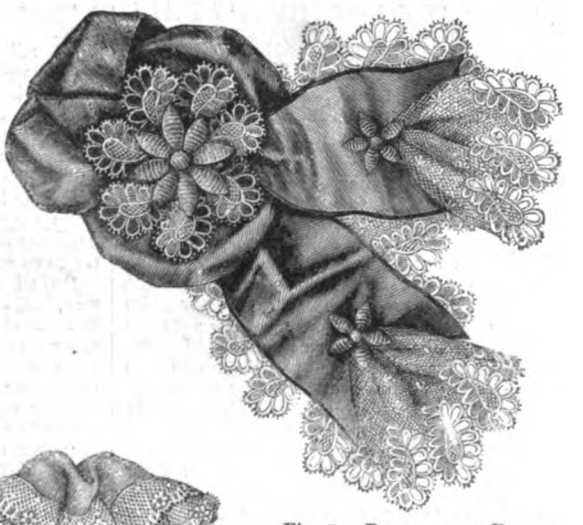


Fig. 5.—RIBBON AND BLONDE BOW FOR THE HAIR.

the piece of pasteboard on the inside of the bell cover.

Cravat Bows and Bows for the Hair, Figs. 1-5.

Fig. 1.—GROS GRAIN RIBBON BOW FOR THE HAIR. This bow is made of light blue gros grain ribbon. The ends, of different lengths, are fringed two inches and a half deep, as shown by the illustration. The seam made by setting on the ends is covered by a rosette of ribbon loops, trimmed with a tassel in the middle. To make this tassel take a piece of ribbon thirteen inches and a quarter long, cut off the woven edge on one side, and fringe out the ribbon until an edge a quarter of an inch wide only remains. Roll this edge together so as to form a tassel, and set it on the middle of the rosette.

Fig. 2.—GROS GRAIN RIBBON AND LACE CRAVAT BOW.

Fig. 3.—VELVET RIBBON AND FRINGE CRAVAT BOW.

Fig. 4.—CRÊPE DE CHINE AND LACE CRAVAT BOW.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXV., Fig. 85.

Fig. 2.—GROS GRAIN RIBBON AND LACE CRAVAT BOW. This bow is of two shades of violet gros grain ribbon and lace. The loops, the knot, and the two under ends are of the darkest shade of the ribbon; between this the lace is set on. The shorter ends are of the lighter shade, and are set on a stiff lace foundation, overlapping each other in fan shape.

STIFF LACE BUSTLE.

Fig. 3.—VELVET RIBBON AND FRINGE CRAVAT BOW. This cravat bow is made of black velvet ribbon and corn-colored fringe. Make the fringe of corn-colored gros grain ribbon forty-four inches long and two inches and a half wide. Cut off the woven edge on one side, and fringe it out so that only an edge a quarter of an inch wide remains. Cut the fringe thus formed in half, gather both pieces at the firm edge, and sew them on two pieces of stiff lace five inches and a quarter long and an inch and a quarter wide, each in coils as shown by the illustration. Between the coils set on loops of velvet ribbon. The seam made by sewing on the ends thus arranged is covered by two loops and a short piece of velvet ribbon cut in points. A band of velvet ribbon is finally set on the middle, as shown by the illustration.

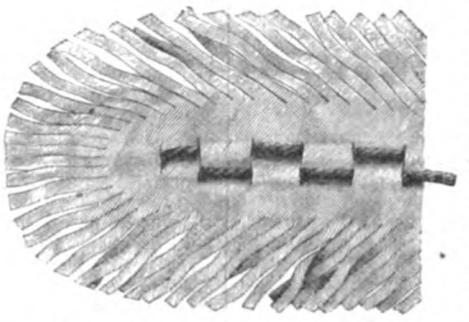

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF FEATHER DUSTER. FULL SIZE.—[See Page 628.]

Fig. 4.—CRÊPE DE CHINE AND LACE CRAVAT BOW. This bow is made of pink crêpe de Chine, trimmed with lace an inch and three-quarters wide. To make the bow cut one piece of crêpe de Chine from Fig. 85, Supplement; cut a slit in this piece to :, as indicated on the pattern, and edge it with lace an inch and three-quarters wide. Pleat both sides of this piece as shown by the illustration, bringing ×a on ●a and ×b on ●b on each half of the piece. Make two more pleats on the outer edge, bringing ×c on ●c and ×d on ●d. The upper edge of the material is folded over along the dotted line so that it forms a sort of revers. Sew the top together on the under side so that * of one half comes on * of the other half, thus forming a pleat on the outside.

Fig. 5.—RIBBON AND BLONDE BOW FOR THE HAIR. To make this bow take a piece of cherry gros grain ribbon twenty-four inches long and two inches wide. Tie this in a loose knot at the middle, which is fastened on the edge of a round piece of stiff lace two inches and three-quarters broad.—Lay the two ends of the ribbon on the stiff lace foundation in the shape of a diadem, and interloop them again; the ends are cut in points as shown by the illustration. Then take blonde two inches and three-quarters wide, gather it, and arrange it on the inside of the diadem of ribbon. The centre is ornamented with an embroidery figure. Edge the ends of the ribbon with similar blonde, as shown by the illustration, and trim them with smaller embroidery figures. Instead of embroidery figures, artificial flowers may be used.

Stiff Lace Bustle.

THIS bustle consists of four overlapping pieces, in the outer edges of which coarse cotton cord is hemmed. Cut of a double layer of stiff lace four pieces. The under piece is eleven inches and a quarter long and thirty-four inches wide. The upper pieces are cut two inches shorter and two inches narrower each than the under piece. Round off these four pieces at the under edge as shown by the illustration. Hem cord into the outer edges, the top excepted, baste the pieces on each other at the upper straight edge, sew them into the double material of a shirting binding an inch wide, and gather them by means of linen tape drawn through the binding. The ends of the tape are tied in front. This bustle can be washed easily.

CRINOLINE BUSTLE.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXIII., Fig. 83.

Crinoline Bustle.

THIS bustle is made of crinoline, trimmed with ruffles and ruches of the material. Cut one piece from Fig. 83, Supplement. Edge this piece with a box-pleated ruffle four inches wide, which is sewed on so as to form a heading an inch and a quarter wide. Arrange the upper edge in two pleats, bringing × on ●. Cover the remainder of the bustle with ruches three inches and three-quarters wide, arranged in double box-pleats. The ruffle and ruches must previously have been bound with linen tape. Bind the upper edge of the bustle with shirting, and to the under side sew a small roll made of shirting, and filled with curled hair or elastic springs. Finish with strings of linen tape.

Fig. 1.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 5-10.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR BOY FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 11 and 12.

REMOVAL OF TATTOO MARKS FROM THE SKIN.

INQUIRY is frequently made for methods for the successful removal of tattoo marks in the skin. While these are generally asserted to be indelible, if produced by the insertion of some carbonaceous matter, a correspondent of the Chemical News says that, in one attempt, the marks disappeared after being first well rubbed with a salve of pure acetic acid and lard, then with a solution of potash, and finally with hydrochloric acid. For further details the inquirer is referred to Casper's "Hand-Book of Forensic Medicine," vol. i. p. 108.

Digitized by Google

WHY LADY HORNBURY'S BALL WAS POSTPONED.

BY HENRY KINGSLEY, AUTHOR OF "RAVENSHOE."

COURT JOURNAL, April 12. "Lady Hornbury's ball on May 2 is unavoidably postponed."

"What is the matter?" said all the world and his wife. On this occasion the world and his wife were very easily satisfied. Sir John must have had another stroke, and Lady Hornbury would soon be the most beautiful widow in England of her age, while her daughter Edith would be one of the greatest heiresses. The male line was notoriously extinct. Sir John was a shrewd man of business, a little apt to be near, and the very last man in the world to enrich unnecessarily a successor to his house in the shape of a new husband for Lady Hornbury. The world and his wife were easily satisfied: one of the pleasantest houses in London would be closed that season, and of course Lady Hornbury could not go out in the present state of her husband's health. So said the world that week, but the world was astonished out of all propriety when it went into the Park next day to find Sir John—faultlessly dressed and as upright as if paralysis and he had never made acquaintance—riding his celebrated bay, with his faultlessly appointed groom quite a long way behind him—by no means close to him as he used to ride when Sir John was likely to have a seizure. The world, in short, was utterly puzzled; the more so when he answered that Lady Hornbury was perfectly well, but had been called suddenly from town on business, and would probably not appear for a considerable time. Sir John was a man who generally did his own business as well as his wife's, and it seemed very strange that he should be riding about so coolly in the Park, and Lady Hornbury gone away on business. Mystery was added to mystery when Hunter, of the dragoons, came on the scene and reported himself returning from the camp at Chalons, where he had been professionally examining the French cavalry: he said that he had met Lady Hornbury at the station at Calais, just getting into the Paris train. Here was a great mystery: Edith Hornbury was at school in Paris, and was to come out at the great ball now postponed. What on earth was the matter?

Sir John and Lady Hornbury were, deservedly, nearly the most popular people in London; they were wealthy, clever, kindly, and good-humored. He was much older than she, but she was absolutely devoted to him, and never left him for an instant in his very numerous illnesses, one of which had resulted in a very dangerous attack of paralysis. There was perfect confidence between them, although Sir John had hitherto left all matters relating to his daughter to the care of his wife, only asking from time to time how the girl was getting on. She was all that could be desired: discreet, beautiful, accomplished, and perfectly obedient in every thing—a most model young lady in every respect. Early in her life she had shown a will of her own, but it seemed to have been perfectly subdued by her parents' kindness and indulgence. An event which had taken place a year before this had shown her submission in the most remarkable way. She had been staying at a country house—her old aunt Hornbury's—where there was a large general society, and a style of living under the careless, good-humored old maid most conducive to mild flirtation, or, what the old lady called it, "the young people being happy together." The old lady, however, drew a pretty sharp line in these matters; and thinking that Edith's attention was a little too much engaged by a very handsome young fellow, a Mr. Holmsdale, wrote to her mother quietly, and Edith went very submissively home. Her mother never mentioned the matter to her, and all was perfectly secret, until, some months after, the maid who had been with her at her aunt's tremblingly told her that Miss Edith was corresponding with this Mr. Holmsdale, and handed her a letter, of which the following were the contents:

"SIR,—Once more I request you to cease this utter folly. I have unfortunately once told you that you are not indifferent to me, and for that one expression in a moment of weakness I am to be persecuted to death. You take your final answer, and further letters from you, Sir, will be instantly laid before my father."

"I think that our girl has behaved very well indeed," said Sir John, when his wife showed him the letter. "Deuced well. I wish my sister would keep her house in better order. The girl sha'n't go there again. I think we are very well out of it. Give me the letter."

"What are you going to do with it?"

"Send it to him, addressed in my handwriting, with my name signed in the corner. I shall send it under cover to my sister: he. butler knows his address. Who is this Holmsdale?"

"I don't know. The villain!" exclaimed Lady Hornbury.

"We don't know that he is a villain, my dear," said Sir John: "he must be a gentleman, or my sister would never have had him to her house."

"A clandestine correspondence!" said Lady Hornbury, bridling.

"My dear, did we have no clandestine correspondence when I was a younger brother and a dragoon, with five hundred a year, and you a fine lady, with Lord Bumpster at your heels every where? Did not you tell me once that if your mother pressed on the match with him that you would run away with me on five hundred a year and your own fortune, and trust to my poor brother Tom to get us something? And you would have done it, my lady: come."

"I was very young and foolish," said Lady Hornbury.

"Well, and Edith is young and wise," said Sir John, kissing her. "Now the first thing to do is to turn that maid of Edith's out of the house."

"Why, we owe her much," said Lady Hornbury.

"I tell you that no right-thinking young woman would have betrayed a kind and gentle young mistress, like Edith, in a love affair," said the atrocious dragoon, Sir John. "What would you have said to your own maid in old times if she had done it to you?"

The argumentum ad hominem was a little too much for honest Lady Hornbury, and she had to laugh again. "But," she added, "if we send her away she will talk about the matter all over the town and country."

"Well, then, double her wages and let her stay," said Sir John; "but don't let me see her. And as for Edith, let her have change of scene; give her a year's school somewhere. Send her to Comtesse d'Aurilliac, at Paris; she can't come to any harm with that old dragon."

"My daughter will come to no harm any where," said Lady Hornbury, proudly.

"That I am quite sure of, my dear. But the society at the old lady's pension is very agreeable; none but the very best legitimist girls, and no followers allowed."

"I would not be vulgar, Sir John, if I were in your place," said the lady. "Will you ever forget the barracks?"

"You were very nearly knowing a good deal about them yourself, my lady, that night when you proposed to run away with me."

Lady Hornbury swept out of the room majestically, and left Sir John laughing. There was very little conversation between mother and daughter, for Edith found in a day or two, by an answer which came from Holmsdale, that her father and mother knew every thing. She was completely impassive in their hands; but apparently the Holmsdale wound had gone a little deeper than her mother had thought for. Edith spoke very little, and seemed cheerful at the thought of going to Paris. In a week she was with the Comtesse d'Aurilliac.

Every letter from the comtesse breathed delightful admiration for her charming and beautiful pupil. Since madame had been forced by the lamentable occurrences of the revolution (her two aunts perished in the September massacres) to take pupils, she had never had such a pupil as Edith. She was the admiration of every one who had seen her, and the brightest star in her little legitimist galaxy: every thing went perfectly well for three months, and Sir John and Lady Hornbury were delighted.

About this time there came to Sir John and Lady Hornbury a lumbering young nobleman of vast wealth, who was in some sort a connection of theirs; so near that they called him cousin. He called one morning to say that he was going to Paris, and to burden himself with any commission to Edith.

"I should like to see my old playmate very much," he said. "I was a lover of hers when we were in the school-room; I should like very much to see her once more, though I suppose she is getting too fine for me."

There was not the slightest objection to his seeing as much of his cousin as he chose, and Lady Hornbury wrote a note in her best French (Madame D'Aurilliac did not speak English, nor did Lord Lumberton speak French), whereby the Comtesse d'Aurilliac was requested to receive Lord Lumberton as one of their own family. The comtesse received him in French, and he responded in English: he staid on in Paris, and in two months the comtesse found it necessary to write to Lady Hornbury as follows:

"MADAME,—My Lord Lumberton's visits are extremely frequent here, and I should be very glad to know your instructions as regards them. I have not the least reason to believe that any thing has passed between milord and your beautiful daughter; but, at the same time, madame, I think that he thinks of her a little more than he does of my other young ladies, while she treats him with merely the kindness of a cousin. I observe that in our little family parties she prefers dancing with M. De Rocroy, a gentleman of the very highest refinement and introduction, until lately gentleman in waiting to his most Christian Majesty Henri V. at Frohsdorf (whom may the holy saints have in their keeping!); M. De Rocroy, however, appears as indifferent to her as she is to him. This feeling of Milord Lumberton's may ripen into an attachment, or it may not. I only await your instructions as to my management in this affair."

Lady Hornbury answered the letter at once before she went out, and, being in a hurry, wrote in English. What follows is a part of her letter:

"Both Sir John and I quite approve of Lord Lumberton's visits. Edith and he were cousins and playmates, and the matter is quite a family one."

Which madame, with the aid of a dictionary, translated to mean that the two families had agreed on a mariage de convenance in the French fashion.

The effect of this wonderful discovery on the part of madame was singularly delightful to Lord Lumberton, who was by this time honestly head over heels in love with his cousin; and also singularly and terribly disagreeable to poor Edith, who, for reasons of her own, was nearly out of her mind. Whenever Lord Lumberton came now he was left alone with her, Madame D'Aurilliac always quitting the room after a short time, with a far-seeing air, as though she was looking toward St. Petersburg to see if the ice was breaking up so as to allow of navigation; and the young ladies leaving also with that air of espièglerie, or archness, of which some Parisian ladies are mistresses, and which has occasioned more than one British islander, while suffering from the spleen, to long to throw his boots at their heads. Lumberton desired to do nothing of the kind; he was in love, and he liked it, though sometimes he would have wished when they were alone that he had something to say for himself. Edith, of course, knew that he loved her, and she had no dislike for him, but would chat with him over old times, about his sisters, his horses, his dogs, and such things, which helped him on wonderfully. Edith knew that some day or another he would speak, and she was quite ready for him. Good fellow as he was, she would as soon have married a chiffonnier. She never alluded to his attentions to her mother, and Madame D'Aurilliac only occasionally mentioned his presence at her house as a matter of form. So matters went on for months, until there came a cataclysm. Lady Hornbury received this letter:

"MADAME,—When I receive a viper into my bosom, or a snake into my house, what do I do? I expel that snake or that viper. Madame, I have discovered a snake in the form of your daughter's maid, Rose Dawson, and I have expelled her with ignominy, having first had her boxes searched by warrant from the Juge d'Instruction. Madame, we found four thousand francs in gold, which we could not retain, so she is gone free.

"My eyes, Madame, have long been directed in a certain quarter. I have now, in consequence of the revolution, to address my attention to the forming of young ladies. I have, therefore, an eye not readily deceived. I have noticed for a long time looks of intelligence pass between M. De Rocroy and your daughter's beautiful but wicked maid. I saw an intrigue, and I watched; last night they were in the shrubbery together for an hour, and at last I came on them as they were saying farewell. Him I banished my house at once, telling him that his sacred Majesty Henri V. (whom the Virgin and saints preserve till he comes to his own!) should hear of this violation of my hearth. Her I dispatched as you have heard. I have broken the truth to your sweet and gentle daughter, who has acquiesced, though with sorrow."

"I told you that girl was no good," said Sir John. "You had better send for her home and provide for her, or she will be talking about the Holmsdale business, with emendations and additions. I shall, if Lumberton ever says any thing to me about Edith, tell him the whole of that matter."

Lumberton spoke very shortly afterward. He spoke kindly, honestly, and tenderly. He said he would wait any time she chose, that she should come out and look round in the London world to see if there was any one she liked better, but that he would not take No as an answer now. He looked so noble and manly in his faith and honor that for one instant she felt inclined to confide every thing to him, but she felt a chill as she reflected that she was in France, and that a deadly duel would be the consequence. She had been ready for him very long, and she was ready for him now.

"Cousin," she said, "if you think that I do not love you and respect you for what you have said, you are very much mistaken; but I vow before Heaven that if you ever speak to me like this again I will take the veil."

"Edith!"

"Do you remember, in old times, my starving myself for a day because I was not allowed to go to Lady Maitland's children's ball?"

"Yes, I remember it."

"I will starve myself for good if you ever speak to me like this again. Now you must go; you must go at once."

"Never to meet again?"

"Never until you have given up all intention or hope of mentioning this subject to me."

"Then it is never," said the poor young gentleman. "Good-by, Edith." And so he went.

"I could have managed him in no other way," thought Edith, after he had gone. "Poor fellow! how happy he will make some good woman when he has forgotten me! He has gone up stairs to Madame D'Aurilliac to tell her. Well, madame, you will not be long in arriving, but it is to no purpose."

In fact, Madame D'Aurilliac arrived in about a quarter of an hour, with some crochet-work, smiling; and Edith's old will was roused, for she saw that the old Frenchwoman was going to play a game with her which a child of six years old could have seen through, and she was determined to beat madame's refined French fence by what madame would have called the British boxe.

"I have intruded, I am afraid," said madame, "but where, then, is Lord Lumberton?"

"I thought he was up stairs with you, madame," said Edith, looking straight at her.

"He was on the stairs, and I saw him just one instant. I thought he had come back."

"I thought I heard you wishing him good-night outside the door, madame, and telling him that you would put every thing right for him."

"Lovers' ears are quick," said madame, with a smile, which showed Edith that she had aroused the hereditary temper of the D'Aurilliacs: a notoriously bad one.

"There are no lovers' ears here, madame," said Edith. "It is useless to fence. You know as much as I can tell you. My cousin Lumberton proposed to me just now, and I have vowed that I would sooner take the veil or starve myself to death than see him again."

"Mademoiselle is doubtless aware that the match has been made up between the two families."

"That is utterly false," replied Edith.

"I have it in black and white in your mother's own hand," said the French school-mistress. And we must remember that she believed that she was speaking the truth and doing her duty.

"It is impossible!"

"But it is true, mademoiselle. It is very easy to see why it is true. In France it is said by English tellers of falsehood tha the majority of French ladies have attachments after they are married. It is false, at least with regard to the court of our Majesty of France, Henri V. (as for Orleanists, Bonapartists, Republicans, all things are possible with them). But the worst detractors of our country always say of French girls that they are carefully watched and guarded until they leave the cloister or the pension for an establishment. After that the lady superior or the lady of the pension is not considered answerable. The husband is answerable then, and that is the reason why French husbands are the most attentive of all."

"What is all this to me, madame?"

"Thus much, mademoiselle," replied Madame D'Aurilliac, glowering at her: "if I had known as much about you as I do now, I would never have admitted you into my house."

"What do you mean by that?" said Edith, turning deadly pale, but still perfectly courageous. She saw herself brought to bay with Madame D'Aurilliac, and determined to fight.

"If I had known before that there had been a scandal about you with that M. Holmsdale I would never have had you here. If it got abroad it would ruin me. Great Heaven, a clandestine correspondence!"

"Did my father and mother tell you this unhappy business!"

"It is quite true, then," said madame, taking up a missed stitch. "No, or I would never have had you here at all. It was your treacherous viper of a maid who told me, and gave me proofs in black and white, long after you came here, for five francs. I make inquiries of all young ladies. She is a wicked viper, that girl. You were so kind and so good to her, and she betrays you not once to your father, but twice to me. Is it true? But I know it is, for you lean against the wall."

Edith roused herself. "Madame," she said, "there was a complication with Mr. Holmsdale."

"Which now is in the possession of an infuriated maid-servant," hissed out Madame D'Aurilliac, "who may ruin the character of my establishment by telling your story. Come, mademoiselle, no more words! This match with Lord Lumberton is fixed on by your parents. I have told Lord Lumberton to call and renew his proposals in a week. If they are not answered satisfactorily then, I must take means to vindicate the honor of my establishment at whatever cost. Go to your room, mademoiselle."

On the 11th of April Lady Hornbury received the following telegram:

"D'Aurilliac, Rue St. Honoré, Paris, to Lady Hornbury, Portland Place, London. Come instantly. Frightful trouble about Edith."

"What on earth is the matter now?" said Sir John.

"I can't conceive," said Lady Hornbury. "Edith must be ill. I must hurry away. Put off the ball."

And so we have got round to the beginning of the story again.

We must, however, leave Lady Hornbury to go to Paris, and stay in London with Sir John for a short time. Sir John took his ride in the Park very comfortably in spite of Madame D'Aurilliac's telegram, he not believing that any thing very great was the matter. During his ride he met with an old friend, who inquired after his wife, and on being told that she was gone to Paris, asked Sir John to come and take dinner with him. Sir John declined, on the ground that his lawyer was coming to dine with him and to discuss very particular business. "Indeed," he said, "old Compton is so very urgent and mysterious that he makes me a trifle uneasy. His news is very disagreeable, because he says that he will only discuss it after dinner."

Sir John went home to dinner at six, the hour in which he delighted, but at which he never was allowed to dine when Lady Hornbury was at home. Mr. Compton was very punctual, but was evidently very serious, and before dinner was over Sir John had calculated his losses at about from ten to twenty thousand pounds. When the servants were out of the room, and Mr. Compton proposed business, that gentleman looked so very grave that Sir John thought he should be well out of it with fifty thousand.

"Now, frowner, how much is it?" said Sir John, laughing. "How much is it? Put a name to the figure, and have it over."

"Sir John, did you ever hear of your brother Sir Thomas's domestic life?"

"Yes," said Sir John.

"Do you remember a certain Marchioness de Toul?"

"And poor Tom's connection with her? Certainly. She left her husband for him, you know, and there was a fearful scandal. Tom fought the marquis, and was wounded; but he and the marchioness did not live long together after she was divorced from her husband. She was a violent and reckless woman, and became more violent and reckless after the loss of her good name. She died in a religious house at Amiens, and poor Tom broke his heart over her desertion of him, for, with all his faults, he was a most affectionate fellow. I knew my brother so well that I am perfectly sure that she left him through no fault of his. I feel certain he would have made her every reparation in his power. As you yourself know, three thousand a year was paid to her under his will out of the estates."

"I fear," said Mr. Compton, "that he had married her before she left him: in fact, I know it. She had a son in the convent. It would seem that she left with the lady superior at her death a packet which was not to be opened for twenty-four years. This trust was handed from one lady superior to another, and was opened last year only. It contains, according to the other party, the proofs of her marriage and of the birth of this boy, which the other party have verified and are prepared to bring into court to-morrow. The other party have a terrible case, and Watson & Hicks are about the most respectable and safe firm in London."

"Then I have never been Sir John Hornbury at all?" said Sir John, with a coolness which utterly astonished Mr. Compton.

"If their story is right," said Mr. Compton. "We have got to see about that."

"What became of this boy?"

"He was given over to the Jesuits, and was brought up at Stonyhurst. His mother provided for him partly with the nine thousand pounds which she had drawn from the estate in three years, and partly from her own property, which was a very good one. The Jesuits were honest stewards for the boy, according to Watson &

Digitized by Google

Hicks, and although he refused to become a priest, the young man is pretty well off."

"Do you believe this story?"

Mr. Compton did not speak one word, but shook his head.

"Ruin?" said Sir John, quietly.

"It looks very much like it," said Mr. Compton. "I have been busy about the thing without troubling you, and I can not at present see that we have a leg to stand on. But I come to the strangest part of the whole story. This young man will make any compromise which you please on your own terms; will leave you in possession of the estates and title for your life; will do any thing you can suggest—on one condition."

"You amaze me. What is his condition?"

"The hand of Miss Edith."

"Like his impudence," exclaimed Sir John, "to ask Edith to marry him before she has seen him. Why, Compton," he went on, almost violently, "if Edith were to offer to save me by such an unnatural match I would refuse my consent in such terms as would render a renewal of the offer impossible. I would sooner live in a garret on bread than consent to such an arrangement. And Edith, my own daughter, do you think that she would degrade herself by marrying a man she did not love? You know her better, Compton."

"I do, Sir John, and I know you pretty well also. Of course, neither of you would consent for an instant: only—"

"We shall have nothing, then," said Sir John, "if this is true. My poor Mary! my poor Mary!"

"You will have Lady Hornbury's fortune, Sir John; five hundred a year."

"Ay, but he will want that. I must be three hundred thousand pounds in his debt."

"It is settled on herself."

"Ay, but I will make her give it to him—every penny: she never disobeyed me yet, and she will not now."

Mr. Compton looked at his old friend with eyes which were brightened with admiration. "And this," he thought, "is the man whom the world calls mean in money matters, and jealous of his young wife!" "Sir John," he continued, aloud, "I have something to tell you which will surprise you more than any thing, my dear old friend. This young man has told Watson in confidence, and Watson has told me in confidence, that he not only knows Miss Edith, but is absolutely certain that he gained her affections eight months ago, when she was staying with her aunt. Mr. Holmsdale says—"

"What!" cried Sir John.

"Mr. Holmsdale—by-the-bye, I forgot to tell you that the young gentleman who claims to be Sir Richard Hornbury goes by the name of Holmsdale, which the Jesuits gave him (they seem to have given him none of their evil ways, for he is behaving very well)—Mr. Holmsdale says that he is absolutely certain that his attentions would not be disagreeable to Miss Edith, and should his claim, on examination, be allowed by you, he asks you to put the question to the young lady herself."

"Why, Compton," said Sir John, solemnly, striking his hand on the table, "Lady Hornbury and I sent that young man to the right-about with a flea in his ear eight months ago. I believe Edith did care for him, though she behaved splendidly, Sir — nobly. Have you any idea whether he knew of this when he first knew my daughter?"

"Yes," said Mr. Compton; "as Watson pointed out to me, he had been to them about his claim before he ever saw her. His affection for her is utterly disinterested. When he got his dismissal from her he waited to see if he could see her again, and win her affections entirely without letting her know the fearful power in his hands. Watson says—and Watson knows young men pretty well—that Mr. Holmsdale will not move in the matter at all during your life unless Miss Edith marries some one else. That is Watson's opinion. I am of opinion that he might if he was to find a young lady more accessible than Miss Edith; but that is all guesswork. Has Miss Edith any predilections in another quarter?"

"That good ass Lumberton seems smitten," said Sir John, "but I don't think old D'Aurilliac has given him much chance. Good-night."

We must now leave Sir John to his own thoughts, and take flight to Paris, where the most terrible events were taking place. Lady Hornbury got to the Hôtel Meurice by two o'clock in the day, and by half past two she was in the salon of Madame D'Aurilliac, in the Rue St. Honoré, awaiting that lady's pleasure with deep anxiety. She had not asked for Edith, considering it wiser to see the duenna herself. It is worthy of note that Lady Hornbury had been thinking matters over, and had come to the conclusion that Edith was not ill. Having allayed her maternal fears on this point, without the least foundation, she had traveled on alone, and by thinking about her seasickness, the rumbling of the railway, and her postponed ball, she had arrived in Paris extremely cross; and was just nourishing a mortal hatred against Madame D'Aurilliac for having telegraphed instead of writing more fully, when that good lady entered the room in full war-paint and feathers, looking daggers. Lady Hornbury saw that there was going to be a fight, and determined that she would not be the last to begin it. The conversation was carried on in French, which was greatly to Madame D'Aurilliac's advantage. But then Lady Hornbury had a great advantage in not understanding the most stinging of madame's points, and so preserving a coolness which deserted that lady at one period of the conversation.

"How do you do, madame, and how is my daughter Edith? May I ask the reason of this mysterious telegram, and whether my daughter is ill?"

"I am not in the least degree aware of the state of your daughter's health, madame."

"Would you be kind enough to explain yourself, madame?"

"Certainly. Your daughter left here five days ago."

"And where is she gone, if you please?" said Lady Hornbury.

"Into Burgundy."

"With your leave, madame?"

"No, madame, without my knowledge. I have nourished a viper in my bosom which I was weak enough not to expel."

"If you allude to my daughter as a viper, madame, you forget yourself; and as for expelling her, she seems to have expelled herself. Are any further explanations convenient?"

"I have been most grossly deceived, yet I have borne every thing. Madame, when I took your daughter into my house, did you say a word about the clandestine correspondence with Holmsdale?"

"Certainly not," said Lady Hornbury. "It was no business of yours. And what you choose to call a clandestine correspondence was limited to a single letter from her, in which she forbade Mr. Holmsdale to speak to her."

"Madame, her late maid tells quite another story," said Madame D'Aurilliac.

"If madame chooses to believe the word of a discharged and most unprincipled servant in preference to mine, I can only pity madame. My daughter is incapable of a mean or underhanded action."

"I think that you will change your opinion of Madame Rocroy directly," said Madame D'Aurilliac.

"Madame Rocroy? I never heard of the woman," said Lady Hornbury.

"Your daughter Edith is now Madame Rocroy," said Madame D'Aurilliac. "She was married four days ago secretly at the Mairie of this arrondissement, and afterward at the Carmelite chapel in the Rue de Brissac, and at the Protestant church in the Rue d'Agues- "

Though Madame D'Aurilliac said this while she was looking straight into the eyes of Lady Hornbury, the Englishwoman never flinched or changed color. Her mouth was as dry as dust, and her heart going wildly, but she never moved a muscle before the Frenchwoman. "Not before her," she thought, "not before that woman."

"And who," she asked, "is the gentleman whom madame has selected for my son-in-law?"

"Madame is kind enough to throw the blame on me. I thank madame very much indeed for allowing me to admit a viper to my house, and then throwing the blame of what has happened on me."

"Now, my dear madame," said Lady Hornbury, who by this time had managed to moisten her dry mouth and get her heart a little quiet, "we do not want any more vipers, if you please; we have had vipers enough. I must ask you civilly to give me an account of this matter from beginning to end, first requesting you to give me your honor as a D'Aurilliac that my daughter was married as you say."

"Madame De Rocroy," said Madame D'Aurilliac, "has made a marriage which I should have recommended myself had it been sanctioned by your ladyship. M. De Rocroy is a gentleman in every way worthy of the best woman in France, and of fortune, not large, but good. He is a gentleman high in favor with his Majesty Henri V., as these jewels will show. It would seem that his Majesty condescended to take interest in the love affairs of M. De Rocroy, and knew what was going on, for these jewels have arrived only to-day from Frohsdorf as a bridal present for Madame Rocroy. Here are the jewels, my lady; perhaps you will take charge of them."

"Thank you," said Lady Hornbury, coolly. "I may as well take them until my daughter arrives in England. They are very fine jewels; indeed, I think I will wear them myself until my daughter, Madame— What name did you say?"

"Rocroy."

"—Ah! Rocroy—claims them. And now, my dear creature, how did all this come about? I am really dying to know."

"Insular wretch!" thought Madame D'Aurilliac; "she cares nothing for her daughter."

There was a wild, nearly bursting heart behind Lady Hornbury's broad bosom which told another tale, though; and one sentence was ringing in the ear of her mind continually: "It will kill John; it will kill John;" but she faced the Frenchwoman as though she had no fox under her tunic.

"In consequence of your directions with regard to the visits of Lord Lumberton as the fiancé of Miss Hornbury—"

"None such were given," said Lady Hornbury, interrupting.

"I beg madame's pardon. Here is madame's letter, in which you told me that his visits were a family affair."

"I wish I had written in French," said Lady Hornbury.

"I wish you had, madame. I suppose that with that letter in my hand I may be excused from blame."

"Go on with your tale, and we will talk about blame afterward," said Lady Hornbury, who felt a trifle guilty, though she would have died sooner than show it.

"In consequence of that letter I admitted Lord Lumberton's visits; nay, after I had discovered the affair Holmsdale, I encouraged them."

Lady Hornbury nodded, and sneezed in the most unconcerned manner, and said, "Go on, madame, for you begin to interest me."

"I encouraged his visits, knowing what I knew, and at last he proposed to her. She refused him with scorn, and he told me of it. I went to her and told her that in consequence of the affair Holmsdale she was destined to marry that young man by her parents' orders."

"Oh, you told her that, did you, madame?" said Lady Hornbury.

"Yes, madame; I considered that I was acting under your instructions, and I told her that. I told her that she must give Lord Lumberton a favorable answer in five days. On the second day after that she was gone, and at night the young Comte de Millefleurs came and told me all that had happened. He had acted as groomsman and his sister as bride-maid."

"How very nice of them!" said Lady Hornbury. "You have not got such a thing as a hair-pin, have you, countess? for I slept in the train last night, and my hair is coming down. Now about this young Millefleurs. He is quite respectable?"

"He is gentleman in waiting to his Majesty Henri V."

"Ah! we call him Comte de Chambord; I respect your prejudices; he will claim his title as King of France some day, and I wish he may get it." (This vulgarism was utterly lost on Madame D'Aurilliac.) "Well, madame, if you will send me a note of my daughter's expenses here to my hotel to-night, I will discharge it. May I ask, had you any suspicions of the attentions of M. De Rocroy toward my daughter?"

"Madame's memory is short. I thought that his attentions were directed to your daughter's maid, and so I discharged her: she was only the go-between subsidized by Rocroy."

"Ah! I see," said Lady Hornbury. "Well, madame, I suppose that neither of us has much cause to talk about this matter. I do not want to talk about it, and I should think you did not either. You had better not. If you hold your tongue, I will hold mine; if you speak, I will ruin you. You depend on your pension; and affairs of this kind, so grossly misconducted as this has been by you, would ruin a dozen pensions."

So Lady Hornbury got into her fiacre and went to the Hôtel Meurice after her great victory. Madame D'Aurilliac would have given a year's income had she seen her in her bedroom alone with her maid, an old friend, who had been her nurse in times gone by.

"Pinner," said Lady Hornbury, throwing herself in a chair, "I have borne up before that woman, but I am going to die."

"What is the matter, my lady?" said the maid, kneeling before her.

"I never can face Sir John. And oh, my Edith! my Edith! dearer than ever, why could you not have trusted your mother?"

"Is Miss Edith dead?" asked the frightened maid.

"No, Pinner; but she has married a Frenchman, and deceived us all. Oh, Madame D'Aurilliac, I will remember you!"

Pinner got her mistress to bed as soon as possible. Lady Hornbury wrote a letter to her daughter, poste restante, Dijon, full of tenderness and kindness, only regretting that Edith had not confided in her, and putting her entirely in the right about Lord Lumberton's attentions. "I will not conceal from you the fact, my darling, that we should have liked you to marry Lord Lumberton, but that old idiot, Madame D'Aurilliac, mistook every thing. As for this Rocroy of yours, give him a box on the ears for me, and tell him that I will give him another when I meet him."

This was the way that Lady Hornbury got out of the difficulty: was she a wise woman, or was she not? I think that she was wise. She said to Pinner before she cried herself to sleep, "She shall love me still, though that miserable old Frenchwoman made her distrust me. We must be off by the first train to Calais, and I must break it to Sir John. That woman D'Aurilliac will send in her bill to-night. Wait up and pay it. It will be ten thousand francs, or thereabouts. Don't haggle; I'll give her her receipt some day."

Sir John slept over Mr. Compton's astonishing communication, and he came to this conclusion, that it was in all probability perfectly true.

In the first place, it was obvious that Compton believed it, and Compton was the first solicitor in London. It was also obvious that Watson believed it, and Watson was the last man in the world to take up a case unless he was as good as certain. Compton might still find something not known as yet, but it seemed highly improbable. Sir John quietly acquiesced in the matter as far as he was concerned: the worst thing was the breaking it to his wife.

"How will she take it?" he repeated to himself a hundred times over. "There will be one explosion when I tell her the truth about Compton's story, and another when I order her to give up her fortune. I wonder how she will go through with it. Poor sweetheart, she has never seen trouble yet."

Here she was, late the next day, fresh from Paris with a new bonnet and a frank smile. "Now, John," she said, "you may kiss me, but if you rumple my bonnet you rumple two pound four, and so I warn you."

Sir John sat down and told her the whole matter, as Compton had related it, from beginning to end.

"Edith could make every thing straight for us," said he, in conclusion.

"How?"

"The claimant is that young man Holmsdale who was in love with Edith. He will never move in the matter during my lifetime if Edith marries him. He says that he has won her love, could the match be brought about. And, by-the-way, how is Edith, for I had forgotten to ask you?"

"Now this is checkmate!" said Lady Hornbury. "How is Edith? Why, Edith is as well as a bride can expect to be. Edith, living in that atmosphere of lies which every Frenchwoman carries about with her, has been frightened by old D'Aurilliac into running away with a French count. Edith is now Madame De Rocroy."

"Is he a gentleman?" asked Sir John.

"Oh yes; a man about Frohsdorf. By-the-bye, here are the jewels which the Comte de Chambord sent her."

"She might have done worse," said Sir John. "Has he money?"

"He has enough," said Lady Hornbury.

"Well, then, under the circumstances, we really must not grumble," said Sir John. "Now come, let us go down and meet old Compton."

Old Compton was waiting for them, and dinner was waiting for all three of them; but old Compton wanted a few words on business before they went into the dining-room.

"Sir John," he said, "you have, I suppose, put her ladyship in possession of the facts?"

"I have," said Sir John.

"My lady," said Mr. Compton, "I have been at work ever since I spoke to Sir John, and I have to tell your ladyship that we have not a leg to stand on; those Jesuits are good men of business."

"Well, we have prepared our minds. We are beggars."

"Sir John told you the terms of the compromise?"

"Yes," said Lady Hornbury, "but such a compromise happens to be impossible. My daughter Edith has married a Frenchman. She is now Madame De Rocroy."

"Madame De what?" shouted old Compton.

"Madame De Rocroy," said Lady Hornbury. "My daughter's husband's name is Richard de Rocroy."

"Have the goodness to bring me a glass of wine," said old Compton. "I am faint."

Lady Hornbury rang the bell violently, and not waiting for the footman, hurried Mr. Compton and Sir John into the dining-room, where she poured out a glass of wine.

"Don't you see what you have done?" said Mr. Compton, after he had drunk his wine.

"Not in the least," said Lady Hornbury.

"Don't you see that your daughter has married Holmsdale—the very man we wanted her to marry. This Holmsdale, whom I believe to be your nephew, always has taken the title of Rocroy in France. Your daughter has married her cousin, and we are uncommonly well out of it. Sir John, do you forget every thing when you forget that the family name of the De Touls was Rocroy?"

"I had completely forgotten it," said Sir John. And so they went to dinner, and discussed matters very quietly.

"How could this astounding result have come about?" said Sir John.

"It is perfectly plain to me now that we have to thank the folly and stupidity of the Comtesse d'Aurilliac for this," said Lady Hornbury. "She put things in a false light to Edith, and Edith was foolish enough to believe that we should force her into a marriage with Lumberton. Well, now, what do you say about my going to Dijon and taking Mr. Compton?"

"Or what do you say to my going to Dijon and taking Lady Hornbury?" said Mr. Compton.

"Well, you must fight it out on the way as to who is the commander-in-chief," said Sir John, "but you had better both go. Compton, you have full power to act for me with this man. I feel sure that I shall like him. Mary, my love, what do you say to dropping the title, and becoming Mrs. Hornbury?"

"I think, on the whole, that it would be the best thing to do for Edith's sake. The world will say some hard things of us, but we can laugh at that. However, nothing can be done until I have taken Mr. Compton to Dijon."

Edith had written a letter to her mother, which had crossed that lady's; she was therefore profoundly astonished, as she was sitting alone, deeply anxious, to see her mother come sailing into the room, and saying, "My sweet Edith, get me some tea. I am as tired as if I had walked all the way. Where is your cousin?"

"My cousin, mamma?"

"I should say your husband. Don't you know that you have married your cousin, and are Lady Hornbury? Come here and kiss me, you curious child. So he has never told you."

Meanwhile Mr. Compton and Edith's husband had been in conversation. At first that young gentleman refused emphatically to touch the estates, titles, or any thing else, save a decent allowance from Sir John. The most that he could be got to do was this: he was to be received as a nephew of Sir John's and heir to the baronetcy at Sir John's death, drawing such money as should be decided on from the estates. The marriage was to be immediately announced, and Sir John was at once to be told to do so.

"Now, my dear Sir, I want to ask you to do a certain thing very much."

"I will do it," said Richard Hornbury.

"Go at once, to-morrow, to Frohsdorf, and take your wife with you. You are pretty sure of a welcome there."

"I see," said the bridegroom, laughing.

People in London have got over the matter very easily. Sir John appeared in the Park on his famous horse, and told every body his own version of the affair. His daughter Edith had married her cousin Dick, abroad, and her mother had gone over to see her. The bride and bridegroom were staying with the Comte de Chambord at Frohsdorf: the jewels which the bride had received from the legitimist aristocracy were very handsome, monstrous handsome: the girl had won every body's heart over there.

The world was a little puzzled about this new nephew of Sir John's, and also rather amazed at the suddenness of the marriage; but there came half a dozen other things to wonder about, and so the postponement of Lady Hornbury's ball was soon forgotten.

Digitized by Google

Pearl Gray Silk Walking Suit.

PEARL-COLORED silk dress with over-skirt and plain high waist. The draped over-skirt and the sleeves are trimmed with box-pleated ruffles of the material. Mantelet of steel blue gros grain, trimmed with a velvet border and bows of gros grain ribbon. Gray poult de soie bonnet, trimmed with feathers and gros grain ribbon of the same color. To make the mantelet, first join on the pieces turned down in Supplement on Figs. 45ª and 45ᵇ, and complete the pieces by joining them along the line cut across according to the corresponding letters in the shape of the diagrams, Figs. 45ª and 45ᵇ, which are reduced to one-sixteenth of full size. Then cut of gros grain and silk for the lining two pieces from Figs. 45ª and 45ᵇ. Sew up these pieces from 1 to 2 in the middle of the back, sew the shoulder pleats in the mantelet, fell the lining to the material along the front and bottom, and cord the neck. Cut a slit from × to : along the double line on Fig. 45ª, fell the material on the lining, and sew the trimming on the mantelet as shown by the illustration. Finish with hooks and eyes for closing.

Beaver Mohair Walking Suit.

THIS suit consists of a double skirt and basque-waist, and is made of black beaver mohair. The trimming is composed of bias strips of black velvet and twisted silk fringe. The velvet strips are cut out in scallops at the upper edge. Black Neapolitan bonnet, trimmed with feathers and flowers. To make the waist, cut of the material and muslin lining two pieces each from Figs. 46–48, Supplement, allowing an inch and a quarter extra material at the front edge of Fig. 46, and one piece from Fig. 49. Cut the sleeves from

BEAVER MOHAIR WALKING SUIT.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 46–49.

Fig. 4 of No. I. of the present Supplement, but only to the straight line given on the pattern. Baste the material on the lining, sew up the darts in the fronts, hem down the extra material of the right front on the wrong side, and make the button-holes therein. The extra material on the left front is left for a fly, on which the buttons are sewed. When the waist has been joined according to the corresponding figures, cut a slit in the back from the bottom along the double line to *, and face the bottom of the waist, including the slit, with a bias strip of the material an inch and a quarter wide; the neck of the waist is corded. Sew on the trimming as shown by the illustration and partly indicated on the pattern. Sew up the sleeves, face the bottom with a strip of silk an inch and three-quarters wide, trim them as shown by the illustration, and sew them into the corded armholes.

Silk and Cashmere Walking Suit.

SKIRT of fawn-colored silk; over-skirt and basque-waist of cashmere of the same color. The skirt is trimmed with a puff seven inches and a quarter wide, and box-pleated silk ruches three inches and a quarter wide. A ruffle an inch and three-quarters wide, pleated in a similar manner and turned upward, is set on in connection with the upper ruche. The over-skirt and basque-waist are trimmed with folds of the material an inch and three-quarters wide. These folds are headed with silk piping. Fawn-colored crape bonnet, trimmed with roses.

Poult de Soie Evening Dress.

THE suit consists of a skirt, over-skirt, and pointed waist of violet poult de soie. The under-skirt is trimmed with three box-pleated ruches of the material five inches wide. The back breadths of the over-skirt are cut straight. Arrange the shorter front breadths as shown by the illustration. The waist, which is heart-shaped and has a long point at the front, is cut from Figs. 1–3 of No. I. of the present Supplement, making the point somewhat longer. The small basque consists of a box-pleated strip of the material four inches wide, which is sloped off toward the front as shown by the illustration. Tight sleeves. Collar and cuffs of fine linen trimmed with lace.

PEARL GRAY SILK WALKING SUIT
For pattern see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 45ª and 45ᵇ.

POULT DE SOIE EVENING DRESS.

Girls' and Ladies' Coiffures, Figs. 1–6.

See illustrations on page 633.

Fig. 1.—COIFFURE FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD. Part the hair from ear to ear and down through the middle. Tie the ends of the back hair together with a ribbon, and fasten them under the hair at the neck. The hair is then held together, as shown by the illustration, with a silk ribbon, which is tied in a bow. The front hair is combed up and fastened on the crown crosswise, so that the curled ends of the hair fall over the back hair. The bow is set on as illustrated.

Fig. 2.—COIFFURE FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD. The hair is slightly waved, and parted from ear to ear and down the middle. The back hair is combed down. Each half of the front hair is combed up, a colored silk ribbon is then wound around each half, and the ends of the ribbon are tied in a bow. In order to prevent the front hair from falling, draw a strand of it tight toward the middle of the parting, so that the bow thus comes nearer the roots of the hair.

Fig. 3.—LADY'S COIFFURE. For this coiffure a small part of the front hair, parted in the middle, is partly combed down over two small crêpes at each side, and partly combed up and fastened above the ear for the present. A larger part of the front hair is combed down on each side over a thick crêpe; the ends of this are also left unnoticed for the present, and are pinned together on the middle of the back of the head. Each half of the back hair parted in the middle is then combed up toward the side and joined with the smaller part of the front hair pinned above the ear, after which it is plaited in a loose braid over a three-strand crêpe. The end of the braid at the right side is fastened above the beginning of the braid at the left side. The left braid is fastened on the right braid, lower down, as shown by the illustration, and this point is covered with a bow of colored ribbon. The ends of the front hair previously left unnoticed are then arranged in the middle of the back of the head in a loop turned upward and a larger loop turned downward; to do this tie the hair tightly together with a narrow ribbon, and cover the latter with a bow of colored ribbon.

SILK AND CASHMERE WALKING SUIT.

Fig. 4.—LADY'S COIFFURE. For this coiffure part the hair evenly from ear to ear. The back hair is parted once more in the middle of the back, and each half rolled up over a crêpe toward the middle; the two ends are fastened underneath the rolls. The under parts of the front hair directly above the ears are combed back smoothly, and the ends are fastened between the rolls of the back hair. Comb down the upper front hair on each side over two flat crêpes, so that it forms loose puffs; arrange the ends in curls, which are suffered to fall down the back. Of the remaining front hair, which must be short, form several tufts of small curls, and arrange them as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 5.—LADY'S COIFFURE. This coif-

Digitized by Google

ture resembles Fig. 2 in its first detail. Divide the hair, which is parted in the middle, into two halves from ear to ear, comb the top of the front hair to the sides over crêpes, and brush the under part up smoothly. Comb up each half of the back hair toward the ear, join it there with the ends of the front hair, and part it in two strands, which are laid over two crêpes of equal length and wound around each other. The wound hair roll at the right side hangs low down the neck, and the end is fastened underneath the beginning of the left roll. The latter is wound around the head in the shape of a diadem, as shown by the illustration. Several tufts of long and short curls, arranged as shown by the illustration, complete the coiffure.

FIG. 1.—GIRL'S COIFFURE.

FIG. 6.—LADY'S COIFFURE. For this coiffure arrange the back hair in several long curls. The front hair is combed up over several small crêpes, and also arranged in curls, which fall over the curls at the back. A sprig of blackberries and several loops and ends of colored silk ribbon trim the coiffure as shown by the illustration.

FIG. 3.—LADY'S COIFFURE.

FIG. 2.—GIRL'S COIFFURE.

Manner of arranging Veil, Figs. 1 and 2.

THE illustrations allow a simple and becoming manner of arranging a veil made of a piece of lace three-quarters of a yard square. The centre of the veil is laid on the middle of the head, so that one corner covers the face and the opposite corner the neck. The corners that fall at the sides are held together by a jet agrafe on the middle of the back of the head. In arranging larger veils the corners are crossed and tied loosely, so that the veil falls comfortably on the face.

FIG. 2.—ARRANGEMENT OF VEIL.—BACK.

FIG. 4.—LADY'S COIFFURE.

FIG. 1.—ARRANGEMENT OF VEIL.—FRONT.

WHITE ELEPHANTS.

THERE is something very attractive in what is transparent, pure, or white. What pretty descriptions have been given of mountain snows, of white roses, and lilies of the valley! We clothe our very angels in white robes, and look upon a diamond with singular complacency. What are all the colors of the rainbow or of the prism created for but to be blended into an all-absorbing whiteness? What is virtue but purity? what is vice but a stain? what is infancy but a white page without a blot? The Buddhists, it is known, have a special reverence for white quadrupeds. I have seen a white monkey honored with special attention. And white elephants have been the cause of many a war, and their possession more an object of envy than the conquest of territory or the transitory glories of the battle-field. In the money market a white elephant is almost beyond price. Ten thousand sovereigns would hardly represent their pecuniary value. A hair from their tail is worth a Jew's ransom. It was my good fortune to present to the First King of Siam (the Siamese have two kings, exercising supreme authority) presents with which I had been charged by my royal mistress. I received many presents in return; but the monarch placed in my hand a golden box, locked with a golden key, and he informed me the box contained a gift far more valuable than all the rest, and that was a few hairs of the white elephant. And perhaps it will be well to state why the white elephant is so specially reverenced.

Because it is believed that Buddha, the divine emanation from the Deity, most necessarily, in his multitudinous metamorphoses—or transmissions through all existences, and through millions of cons—delight to abide for some time in that grand incarnation of purity which is represented by the white elephant. While the bonzes teach that there is no spot in the heavens above, or the earth below, or the waters under the earth, which is not visited in the peregrinations of the divinity, whose every stage or step is toward purification, they hold that his tarrying may be longer in the white elephant than in any other abode, and that in the possession of the sacred creature they may possess the presence of Buddha himself. It is known that the Cingalese have been kept in subjection by the belief that their rulers have a tooth of Buddha in the temple of Kandy, and that on various tracks of the East impressions of the foot of Buddha are reverenced, and are the object of weary pilgrimages to places which can only be reached with difficulty; but with the white elephant some vague notion of a vital Buddha are associated, and there can be no doubt that the marvelous sagacity of the creature has served to strengthen their religious prejudices. Siamese are known to whisper their secrets into an elephant's ear, and to ask a solution of their perplexities by some sign or movement. And most assuredly there is more sense and reason in the worship of an intelligent beast than in that of stocks and stones, the work of man's hands.

And yet, after all, the white elephant is not white, nor any thing like it. It is of a coffee-color, not of unburned, but of burned coffee—a dull brownish-yellow, or yellowish-brown—white only by contrast with his darker brother. The last which reached Bangkok was caught in the woods. The king and court went a long way out into the country to meet him, and he was conducted with a grand procession, much pomp and music and flying banners, to the capital. There a grand mansion awaited him, and several of the leading nobility were appointed his custodians. The walls were painted to represent forests, no doubt to remind him of his native haunts, and to console him in his absence from them. All his wants were sedulously provided for, and in his "walks abroad," when "many poor he saw," he was escorted by music and equipage by costly vestments. His grandest and farthest promenades were to bathe in the river, when other elephants were in attendance, honored by being made auxiliaries to his grandeur. Now

DRESS CAP FOR ELDERLY LADY.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 15 and 16.

FIG. 5.—LADY'S COIFFURE.

FIG. 6.—LADY'S COIFFURE.

DRESS CAP FOR ELDERLY LADY.
For pattern and description see Supplement No. IV., Figs. 13 and 14.

Digitized by Google

and then the two sovereigns sought his presence, but I did not learn that his dignity condescended to oblige them with any special notice. But he wanted no addition to that dignity. Every thing associated with majesty and rank bore his image. A white elephant is the badge of distinction. The royal flags and seals, medals and moneys—on all sides the white elephant is the national emblem, as the cross among Christians, or the crescent among Turks; and the Siamese are prouder of it than Americans, Russians, Germans, or French are of their eagles, or Spaniards of the golden fleece. The Bourbon oriflamme, the British union-jack, show but faintly in the presence of the white elephant.

PARIS MODES.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

PARIS is dispersed at this season over every corner of France. The sea-side resorts, watering-places, and country houses afford hospitality to the Parisians exiled from their homes by the fervid heat of summer; and Versailles, after a century of solitude, has regained an animation which it scarce knew with such intensity under Louis XIV. Versailles has witnessed, indeed, after the German invaders, the Assembly, and the council of war called to try the handful of criminals snatched from the fleeing Commune. It is also at Versailles that are found, if not the ministries, at least the ministers, and that M. Thiers every Sunday gives his little select dinner-parties, which never exceed twelve in number. It is at Versailles that the new fashions are put on trial; and if one does not take the trouble to study Versailles, he will no longer know Paris. Versailles is this year, as regards our political men and the interests that gravitate round them, both town and country.

Fashion has just invented a new shade, called Paris en feu—a reddish, petroleumish tint, with orange and brown veins running through it. But why should we be surprised at such a lugubrious fancy? Surprise is only possible where memory is lacking. Have we forgotten that in 1794 ladies wore their hair dressed à la victime—that is, cut short in the neck, as the executioner was wont to clip the locks of the condemned in the toilette for death? Were not miniature guillotines of gold and precious stones hung round the neck in the guise of ornaments? Oh, Frenchmen, Frenchmen! you are always the same—never disciplined by dangers, but laughing and jesting on every occasion.

Thus we deck ourselves with roses of the Paris en feu shade, and labor on all sides to prepare fashions for the coming winter. That which will be the most generally adopted will be the cape, of all dimensions, and, in the way of trimmings, soutache, which will be used color on color, or else of a contrasting shade, in which case the soutache will be cross stitched over with embroidery silk of the same color as the garment.

Corsages are almost all made with basques. When they are very long the bottom of the waist is marked at the back by a bow of ribbon or of the material without ends.

A favorite style of head-dress for the opera or demi-evening toilette is composed of a black lace scarf, gathered in the middle and trimmed with ruches around the part that is to rest on the head. Above and behind the ruches, forming a diadem, is set a large Alsace bow of black velvet. The ends of the scarf fall behind, separately, veiling the shoulders, and are joined in front under a velvet bow. This head-dress is readily improvised, and, adorned with a flower fastened on the side with a jet pin, is suitable for all dresses and all ages.

There seems to be a de[illegible] break loose from the flashy [illegible]ch France has been affected for [illegible] twenty years to return [illegible] and genuine in which [illegible]1848. At that [illegible]ch la[illegible]s, which furnish [illegible]ments for their toilettes [illegible]me and evening. It was [illegible]1852 that the fashion sprang [illegible] general of morning costumes [illegible]g from two to three hundred dollars each, half a score a month of which were needed for the dames of the empire. The end of all this was that in the moment of her peril France found herself without munitions and without an army. This ruinous and senseless luxury has disappeared, we hope forever; and now when ladies spend large sums for articles of dress it will be to buy what will last them a lifetime, and not be worn out in one or two mornings.

The elegant dames who were present at the sessions of the council of war assembled for the trial of the Communist prisoners wore dresses of crape. Yes, of real crape, in dark shades. Two of these dresses were so remarkably pretty that I shall describe them for the benefit of my readers. One was of brown silk, trimmed with three flounces of brown crape, pinked; brown crape over-skirt, trimmed with a flounce; high basque-waist of brown silk, covered with brown crape; brown crape scarf, draped over the front of the bust, and fastened with an agrafe, and then tied behind in a very loose knot. The second dress was of dark gray crape over silk of the same shade; each flounce was surmounted with a very narrow galloon of gray silk, ornamented with jet; jet jewelry composed of two bracelets fitted closely to the wrists; a large jet cross; and a jet diadem worn under the bonnet. I have noted these dresses, by-the-way, not only to describe them, but because in the coming winter crape will be worn on all occasions—at the opera, concert, evening receptions, and dinner-parties—in short, wherever low-necked dresses are not absolutely required, which will generally be the case at full dress balls, high or half-high crape dresses will be the prevailing fashion. Black crape especially will be the rage for demi-toilettes; this will be worn over black silk, satin, and velvet, but more particularly over satin, which is the best combination of the three. Black crape, satin, and jet produce a most harmonious effect. To take away the somewhat sombre aspect of the toilette the head-dress is composed of bright-colored flowers—pomegranate blossoms, roses, or fuchsias. Black or dark crape will also be used for flounces and over-skirts on silk and velvet dresses of the same shade.

Hitherto we have not gone beyond theatres and evening receptions. No one has ventured as yet to utter the word ball, and, in fact, it is supposed that there will not be much dancing next winter. But who can answer for a nation which rebounds the higher the harder it has been struck; which is ruined, and raises five billions of francs in six hours; and which has no government, yet undertakes works of reorganization before which the most stable governments would shrink appalled? We need be surprised at nothing—not even at seeing the Parisians dancing among the piles of ruins in their city, the work of the Commune and its accomplices.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

AUTUMN—the transition period from hot to cold weather—with all its brilliant beauty and its soft, mellow days, is a time when certain kinds of malarious fevers are prevalent. Many theories have been advanced to account for the origin of these fevers. One, which has been recently suggested, is worthy of special consideration, because, if correct, the preventive against this class of disease is simple, and within reach of every individual. This theory is, in brief, that malaria is chill; and that warm clothing, particularly at night, and a fire, are safeguards. Whenever and wherever the days are hot and the nights cold it is likely to be unhealthy; and many malarious districts are noted for their extremes of daily heat and nightly cold. The Christian Union, in a lengthy article on this subject, gives many striking instances in proof of this theory. We mention one or two only, which will be sufficiently suggestive to the thoughtful.

The pestilential rocks at Hong-Kong, and those of the cataracts of the Orinoco, are hot as a furnace during the day; at night they become rapidly chilled by the excessive radiation. Near Payta, in Peru, the heat of the day is intense, but at sunset an icy wind—which is doubtless pure in itself—blows down from the Cordilleras, and causes a malaria so active that the most malignant fevers result. Amidst the malarious swamps of India a tribe of people called the Jevas spend much of their time, yet enjoy comparative immunity from disease. But experience has taught them to keep warm. They wear a thick, wadded garment at night, which completely covers the body, and when the Jeva is watching his nets and snares in the swamp he does not forget to have a fire in his boat. A physician—Dr. Oldham—while stationed amidst the jungles of India slept in the open air, close to the ground, during four months of the hot, rainy season. Not many, perhaps, would care to try such an experiment, especially if, like the doctor, they had previously suffered from malarious fever. But he contracted no fever this time, and his only precaution was to keep himself thoroughly warm, without the possibility of a chill. The late epidemic near Chicago was in many cases distinctly traced to [illegible] exposure to night air.

A rich American [illegible] a Paris paper, [illegible] ed to rebuild [illegible] at his own [illegible] on condi[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [ ably placed in a recess among the greenery. She was more than usually depressed to-day, and no longer able to maintain that artificial vivacity by which she had contrived to conceal her depression. Her sin had found her out. The loveless union, entered upon so lightly, was beginning to weigh her down, as if the impalpable tie that bound her to her husband had been the iron chain that links a galley-slave to his companion.

"I have been very wicked," she said to herself; "and he is so good to me! If I could only teach myself to love him."

She knew now that the weakness which had made her so plastic a creature in her father's hands had been an injustice to her husband; that it was not herself only she had been bound to consider in this matter. It was one thing to fling away her own chances of happiness; but it was another thing to jeopardize the peace of the man she married.

She was meditating on these things with a hopeless sense of confusion—a sense that her married life was like some dreadful labyrinth, into which she had strayed unawares, and from which there was no hope of escape—when she was startled by an approaching footstep, and, looking up suddenly, saw George Fairfax coming slowly toward her, just as she had seen him in Marley Wood that summer day. How far away from her that day seemed now!

They had not met since that night in the orchard, nearly two years ago. She felt her face changing from pale to burning red, and then growing pale again. But by a great effort she was able to answer him in a steady voice presently when he spoke to her.

"What a happiness to see you again, my dear Mrs. Granger!" he said, in his lightest tone, dropping quietly down into the seat by her side. "I was told you were to be here to-day, or I should not have come—I am so heartily sick of all this kind of thing. But I really wanted to see you."

"You were not at the luncheon, were you?" asked Clarissa, feeling that she must say something, and not knowing what to say.

"No; I have only been here half an hour or so. I hunted for you among that gaping crowd by the river, and then began a circuit of the grounds. I have been lucky enough to find you without going very far. I have some news for you, Mrs. Granger."

"News for me?"

"Yes; about your brother—about Mr. Austin Lovel."

That name banished every other thought. She turned to the speaker eagerly.

"News of him—of my dear Austin? Oh, thank you a thousand times, Mr. Fairfax! Have you heard where he is and what he is doing? Pray, pray tell me quickly!" she said, tremulous with excitement.

"I have done more than that: I have seen him."

"In England—in London?" cried Clarissa, making a little movement as if she would have gone that moment to find him.

"No, not in England. Pray take things quietly, my dear Mrs. Granger. I have a good deal to tell you, if you will only listen calmly."

"Tell me first that my brother is well—and happy, and then I will listen patiently to every thing."

"I think I may venture to say that he is tolerably well; but his happiness is a fact I can not vouch for. If he does find himself in a condition so unusual to mankind, he is a very lucky fellow. I never met a man yet who owned to being happy; and my own experience of life has afforded me only some few brief hours of perfect happiness."

He looked at her with a smile that said as plainly as the plainest words, "And those were when I was with you, Clarissa."

She noticed neither the look nor the words that went before it. She was thinking of her brother, and of him only.

"But you have seen him," she said. "If he is not in England, he must be very near—in Paris perhaps. I heard you were in Paris."

"Yes; it was in Paris that I saw him."

"So near! Oh, thank God! I shall see my brother again. Tell me every thing about him, Mr. Fairfax—every thing."

"I will. It is best you should have a plain, unvarnished account. You remember the promise I made you at Hale? Well, I tried my utmost to keep that promise. I hunted up the man I spoke of—a man who had been an associate of your brother's; but, unluckily, he and Mr. Lovel had kept up no correspondence after your brother went abroad; in short, he could tell me nothing—not even where your brother went. He had only a vague idea that it was somewhere in Australia. So, you see, I was quite at a stand-still here. I made several attempts in other directions, but all with the same result; and at last I gave up all hope of ever being of any use to you in this business."

"You were very kind to take so much trouble."

"I felt quite ashamed of my failure; I feel almost as much ashamed of my success—for it was perfectly accidental. I was looking at some water-colored sketches in a friend's rooms in the Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré—sketches of military life, caricatures full of dash and humor, in a style that was quite out of the common way, and which yet seemed in some manner familiar to me. My friend saw that I admired the things. 'They are my latest acquisitions in the way of art,' he said; 'they are done by a poor fellow who lives in a shabby third floor near the Luxembourg—an Englishman called Austin. If you admire them so much, you might as well order a set of them. It would be almost an act of charity.' The name struck me at once—your brother's Christian name; and then I remembered that I had been shown some caricature portraits which he had done of his brother officers in the Fifty-first—things exactly in the style of the sketches I had been looking at. I asked for this Mr. Austin's address, and drove off at once to find him, with a few lines of introduction from my friend. 'The man is proud,' he said, 'though he carries his poverty lightly enough.'"

"Poor Austin!" sighed Clarissa.

"I need not weary you with minute details. I found this Mr. Austin, and at once recognized your brother, though he is much altered—very much altered. He did not know me until afterward, when I told him my name, and recalled our acquaintance. There was every sign of poverty: he looked worn and haggard; his clothes were shabby; his painting-room was the common sitting-room; his wife was seated by the open window patching a child's frock; his two children were playing about the room."

"He is married, then? I did not even know that."

"Yes, he is married; and I could see at a glance that an unequal marriage has been one among the causes of his ruin. The woman is well enough—pretty, with a kind of vulgar prettiness, and evidently fond of him. But such a marriage is moral death for any man. I contrived to get a little talk with him alone—told him of my acquaintance with you, and of the promise that I had made to you. His manner had been all gayety and lightness until then; but at the mention of your name he fairly broke down. 'Tell her that I have never ceased to love her,' he said; 'tell her there are times when I dare not think of her.'"

"He has not forgotten me, then? But pray go on; tell me every thing."

"There is not much more to tell. He gave me a brief sketch of his adventures since he sold out. Fortune had gone against him. He went to Melbourne soon after his marriage, which, he confessed, was the chief cause of his quarrel with his father; but in Melbourne, as in every other Australian city to which he pushed his way, he found art at a discount. It was the old story: the employers of labor wanted skilled mechanics or stalwart navigators; there was no field for a gentleman or a genius. Your brother and his wife just escaped starvation in the New World, and just contrived to pay their way back to the Old World. There were reasons why he should not show himself in England, or, in plainer words, creditors whom he did not care to face, not having passed through the purifying ordeal of the Bankruptcy Court. So he shipped himself and his family in a French vessel bound for Havre, and came straight on to Paris, where, he told me, he found it tolerably easy to get employment for his pencil. 'I give a few lessons,' he said, 'and work for a dealer; and by that means we just contrive to live. We dine every day, and I have a decent coat, though you don't happen to find me in it. I can only afford to wear it when I go to my pupils. It is from-hand-to-mouth work; and if any illness should strike me down, the wife and little ones must starve.'"

"Poor fellow! poor fellow! Did you tell him that I was rich—that I could help him?"

"Yes," answered Mr. Fairfax, with an unmistakable bitterness in his tone; "I told him that you had married the rich Mr. Granger."

"How can I best assist him?" asked Clarissa, eagerly. "Every penny I have in the world is at his disposal. I can give him three or four hundred a year. I have five hundred quite in my own control, and need not spend more than one. I have been rather extravagant since my marriage, and have not much money by me just now, but I shall economize from henceforward; and I do not mind asking Mr. Granger to help my brother."

"If you will condescend to take my advice, you will not do any thing of that kind. Even my small knowledge of your brother's character is sufficient to make me very certain that an appeal to Mr. Granger is just the very last thing to be attempted in this case."

"But why so? my husband is one of the most generous men in the world, I think."

"To you, perhaps, that is very natural. To a man of Mr. Granger's wealth a few thousands more or less are not worth consideration; but where there is a principle or a prejudice at stake, that kind of man is apt to tighten his purse-strings with a merciless hand. You would not like to run the risk of a refusal?"

"I do not think there is any fear of that."

"Possibly not; but there is your brother to be considered in this matter. Do you think it would be pleasant for him to know that his necessities were exposed to such a—to a brother-in-law whom he had never seen?"

"I do not know," said Clarissa, thoughtfully; "I fancied that he would be glad of any helping hand that would extricate him from his difficulties. I should be so glad to get those dreadful debts paid—to see him restored to his proper position in the world."

"My dear Mrs. Granger, it is better not to think of that. There is a kind of morass from which no man can be extricated. I believe your brother has sunk into that lower world of Bohemianism from which a man rarely cares to emerge. The denizens of that nethermost circle lose their liking for the upper air—can scarcely breathe it, in fact. No, upon my word, I would not try to rehabilitate him; least of all through the generosity of Mr. Granger."

"If I could only see him," said Clarissa, despondingly.

"I doubt whether he would come to England, even for the happiness of seeing you. If you were in Paris, now, I dare say it might be managed. We could bring about a meeting. But I feel quite sure that your brother would not care to make himself known to Mr. Granger, or to meet your father. There is a deadly feud between those two; and I should think it likely Mr. Lovel has prejudiced your husband against his son."

Clarissa was fain to admit that it was so. More than once she had ventured to speak of her brother to Daniel Granger, and on each occasion had quickly perceived that her husband had some fixed opinion about Austin, and was inclined to regard her love for him as an amiable weakness that should be as far as possible discouraged.

"Your father has told me the story of his disagreement with his son, my dear Clarissa," Daniel Granger had said, in his gravest tone, "and after what I have heard, I can but think it would be infinitely wise in you to forget that you ever had a brother."

This was hard; and Clarissa felt her husband's want of sympathy in this matter as keenly as she could have felt any overt act of unkindness.

"Will you give me Austin's address?" she asked, after a thoughtful pause. "I can write to him, at least, and send him some money, without consulting any one. I have about thirty pounds left of my last quarter's money, and even that may be of use to him."

"Most decidedly. The poor fellow told me he had been glad to get ten napoleons for half a dozen sketches—more than a fortnight's hard work. Would it not be better, by-the-way, for you to send your letter to me, and allow me to forward it to your brother? and if you would like to send him fifty pounds, or say a hundred, I shall be only too proud to be your banker."

Clarissa blushed crimson, remembering that scene in the orchard, and her baffled lover's menaces. Had he forgiven her altogether, and was this kind interest in her affairs an unconscious heaping of coals of fire on her head? Had he forgiven her so easily? Again she argued with herself, as she had so often argued before, that his love had never been more than a truant fancy, a transient folly, the merest vagabondage of an idle brain.

"You are very good," she said, with a tinge of hauteur; "but I could not think of borrowing money, even to help my brother. If you will kindly tell me the best method of remitting money to Paris."

Here, Mr. Fairfax said, there was a difficulty; it ought to be remitted through a banker, and Mrs. Granger might find this troublesome to arrange, unless she had an account of her own.

Clarissa said she had no account, but met the objection by suggesting bank-notes; and Mr. Fairfax was compelled to own that notes upon the Bank of England could be converted into French coin at any Parisian money-changer's.

He gave Clarissa the address, 13 Rue du Chevalier Bayard, near the Luxembourg.

"I will write to him to-night," she said, and then rose from the rustic bench among the laurels. "I think I must go and look for my husband now. I left him some time ago on account of a headache. I wanted to get away from the noise and confusion on the river bank."

"Is it wise to return to the noise and confusion so soon?" asked Mr. Fairfax, who had no idea of bringing this interview to so sudden a close.

He had been waiting for such a meeting for a long time; waiting with a kind of sullen patience, knowing that it must come, sooner or later, without any special effort of his; waiting with a strange mixture of feelings and sentiments—disappointed passion, wounded pride, mortified vanity, an angry sense of wrong that had been done to him by Clarissa's marriage, an eager desire to see her again, which was half a lover's yearning, half an enemy's lust of vengeance.

He was not a good man. Such a life as he had led is a life that no man can lead with impunity. To say that he might still be capable of a generous action or unselfish impulse, would be to say much for him, given the history of his manhood. A great preacher of to-day has declared that he could never believe the man who said he had never been tempted. For George Fairfax's life had been crowded with temptations, and he had not made even the feeblest stand against the tempter. He had been an eminently fortunate man in all the trifles which make up the sum of a frivolous existence; and though his successes had been for the most part small social triumphs, they had not been the less agreeable. He had never felt the sting of failure until he stood in the Yorkshire orchard that chill October evening, and pleaded in vain to Clarissa Lovel. She was little more than a school-girl, and she rejected him. It was as if Lauzun, after having played fast and loose with that eldest daughter of France who was afterward his wife, had been flouted by some milliner's apprentice, or made light of by an obscure little soubrette in Molière's troop of comedians. He had neither forgotten nor forgiven this slight, and mingled with that blind, unreasoning passion, which he had striven in vain to conquer, there was an ever-present sense of anger and wrong.

When Clarissa rose from the bench he rose too, and laid his hand lightly on her arm with a detaining gesture.

"If you knew how long I have been wishing for this meeting, you would not be so anxious to bring it to a close," he said, earnestly.

"It was very good of you to wish to tell me about poor Austin," she said, pretending to misunderstand him, "and I am really grateful. But I must not stay any longer away from my party."

"Clarissa—a thousand pardons!—Mrs. Granger" (there is no describing the expression he gave to the utterance of that last name—a veiled contempt and aversion that just stopped short of actual insolence because it seemed involuntary), "why are you so hard upon me? You have confessed that you wanted to escape the noise yonder, and yet to avoid me you would go back to that. Am I so utterly obnoxious to you?"

"You are not at all obnoxious to me; but I am really anxious to rejoin my party. My husband will begin to wonder what has become of me. Ah, there is my step-daughter coming to look for me."

Yes, there was Miss Granger, slowly advancing toward them. She had been quite in time to see George Fairfax's entreating gestures, his pleading air. She approached them with a countenance that would have been quite as appropriate to a genteel funeral—where any outward demonstration of grief would be in bad taste—as it was to Mr. Wooster's fête; a countenance expressive of a kind of dismal resignation to the burden of existence in a world that was unworthy of her.

"I was just coming back to the river, Sophia," Mrs. Granger said, not without some faint indications of embarrassment. "I'm afraid Mr.—I'm afraid Daniel must have been looking for me."

"Papa has been looking for you," Miss Granger replied, with unrelenting stiffness.—"How do you do, Mr. Fairfax?" shaking hands with him in a frigid manner.—"He quite lost the last race. When I saw that he was growing really anxious, I suggested that he should go one way and I the other in search of you. That is what brought me here."

It was as much as to say, "Pray understand that I have no personal interest in your movements."

"And yet I have not been so very long away," Clarissa said, with a deprecating smile.

"You may not have been conscious of the lapse of time. You have been long. You said you would go and rest for a quarter of an hour or so, and you have been resting more than an hour."

"I don't remember saying that; but you are always so correct, Sophia."

"I make a point of being exact in small things. We had better go round the garden to look for papa. Good-afternoon, Mr. Fairfax."

"Good-afternoon, Miss Granger."

George Fairfax shook hands with Clarissa.

"Good-by, Mrs. Granger."

That was all, but the words were accompanied by a look and a pressure of the hand that brought the warm blood into Clarissa's cheeks. She had made for herself that worst enemy a woman can have—a disappointed lover.

While they were shaking hands, Mr. Granger came in sight at the other end of the walk; so it was only natural that Mr. Fairfax, who had been tolerably intimate with him at Hale Castle, should advance to meet him. There were the usual salutations between the two men, exchanged with that stereotyped air of heartiness which seems common to Englishmen.

"I think we had better get home by the next train, Clarissa," said Mr. Granger: "five-fifty. I told them to have the brougham ready for us at Paddington from half past six."

"I am quite ready to go," Clarissa said.

"Your headache is better, I hope."

"Yes; I had almost forgotten it."

Miss Granger gave an audible sniff, which did not escape George Fairfax.

"What! suspicious already?" he said to himself.

"You may as well come and dine with us, Mr. Fairfax, if you have nothing better to do," said Mr. Granger, with his lofty air, as much as to say, "I suppose I ought to be civil to this young man."

"It is quite impossible that I could have anp thing better to do," replied Mr. Fairfax.

"In that case, if you will kindly give your arm to my daughter, we'll move off at once. I have wished Mr. Wooster good-afternoon on your part, Clary. I suppose we may as well walk to the station."

"If you please."

And in this manner they departed, Miss Granger just touching George Fairfax's coat sleeve with the tips of her carefully gloved fingers; Clarissa and her husband walking before them, arm in arm. Mr. Fairfax did his utmost to make himself agreeable during that short walk to the station; so much so that Sophia unbent considerably, and was good enough to inform him of her distaste for these frivolous pleasures, and of her wonder that other people could go on from year to year with an appearance of enjoyment.

"I really don't see what else one can do with one's life, Miss Granger," her companion answered, lightly. "Of course, if a man had the genius of a Beethoven, or a Goethe, or a Michael Angelo, or if he were 'a heaven-born general,' like Clive, it would be different; he would have some purpose and motive in his existence. But for the ruck of humanity, what can they do but enjoy life after their lights?"

If all the most noxious opinions of Voltaire and the rest of the Encyclopedists had been expressed in one sentence, Miss Granger could not have looked more horrified than she did on hearing this careless remark of Mr. Fairfax's.

She gave a little involuntary shudder, and wished that George Fairfax had been one of the model children, so that she might have set him to learn the first five chapters in the first book of Chronicles, and thus poured the light of what she called Biblical knowledge upon his benighted mind.

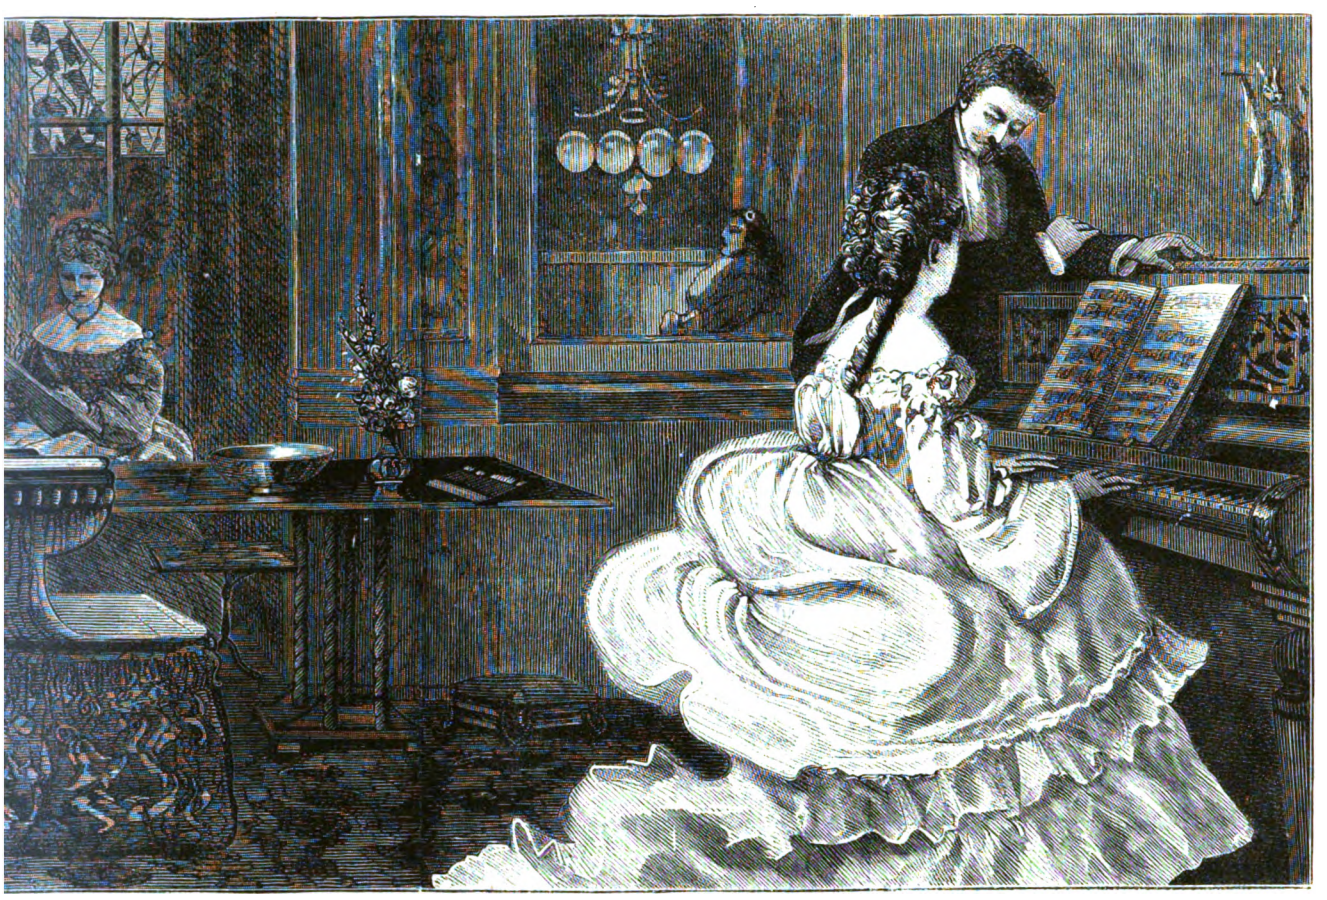
"I do not consider the destiny of a Michael Angelo or a Goethe to be envied," she said, solemnly. "Our lives are given us for something better than painting pictures or writing poems."

"Perhaps; and yet I have read somewhere that St. Luke was a painter, and painted the portrait of his great Master," returned George Fairfax.

"Read somewhere" was too vague a phrase for Miss Granger's approval.

"I am not one of those who set much value on tradition," she said, with increased severity.

Digitized by Google



"HE HAD HIS OPPORTUNITY, AND HE KNEW HOW TO IMPROVE IT."

t has been the favorite armor of our adversa-s."

"Our adversaries?"

"Yes, Mr. Fairfax. Of ROME!"

Happily for George Fairfax they were by this ie very near the station. Mr. and Mrs. Gran- had walked before them, and Mr. Fairfax l been watching the tall, slender figure by the nufacturer's side, not ill pleased to perceive t those two found very little to say to each er during the walk. In the railway carriage, sently, he had the seat opposite Clarissa, and s able to talk to her as much as he liked; for . Granger, tired with staring after swift-flash- floats in the open sunshine, leaned his head k against the cushions and calmly slumbered. e situation reminded Mr. Fairfax of his first eting with Clarissa. But she was altered ce then: that charming air of girlish candor, ich he had found so fascinating, had now en place to a womanly self-possession that zzled him not a little. He could make no dway against that calm reserve, which was not ungracious. He felt that from first to t in this business he had been a fool. He l shown his cards in his anger, and Clarissa l taken alarm.

He was something less than a deliberate vil-n: but he loved her; he loved her, and until w fate had always given him the thing that cared for. Honest Daniel Granger, sleeping sleep of innocence, seemed to him nothing re than a gigantic stumbling-block in his way. was utterly reckless of consequences—of m done to others, above all—just as his fa- r had been before him. Clarissa's rejection l aroused all the worst attributes of his nature: obstinate will, a boundless contempt for any hu-n creature not exactly of his own stamp—for t prosperous trader, Daniel Granger, for in-nce—and a pride that verged upon the diabolic. So, during that brief express journey, he sat king gayly enough to Clarissa about the Pa-ian opera-houses, the last new plays at the nçais and the Odéon, the May races at Chan-y, and so on, yet hatching his grand scheme the while. It had taken no definite shape as , but it filled his mind none the less.

"Strange that this fellow, Granger, should have n civil," he said to himself. "But that kind man generally contrives to aid and abet his n destruction."

And then he glanced at this fellow, Granger, eping peacefully with his head in an angle of carriage, and made a contemptuous compar-n between himself and the millionaire. Mr. anger had been all very well in the abstract ore he became an obstacle in the path of orge Fairfax. But things were altered now, l Mr. Fairfax scrutinized him with the eyes an enemy.

The dinner in Clarges Street was a very quiet air. George Fairfax was the only visitor, and Grangers were "due" at an evening party. learned with considerable annoyance that y were to leave London at the end of that ek, whereby he could have little opportunity seeing Clarissa. He might have followed her wn to Yorkshire, certainly; but such a course uld have been open to remark; nor would it good taste for him to show himself in the ghborhood of Hale Castle while Geraldine alloner was there. He had an opportunity of king confidentially to Clarissa once after din-, when Mr. Granger, who had not fairly fin-ed his nap in the railway carriage, had retired a dusky corner of the drawing-room and sunk ew into slumber, and when Miss Granger med closely occupied in the manufacture of embroidered pincushion for a fancy fair. Ab-bing as the manipulation of chenille and ds might be, however, her work did not pre-t her keeping a tolerably sharp watch upon se two figures by the open piano: Clarissa with one hand wandering idly over the keys, playing some random passage, pianissimo, now and then; George Fairfax standing by the angle of the piano, bending down to talk to her with an extreme earnestness.

He had his opportunity, and he knew how to improve it. He was talking of her brother. That subject made a link between them that nothing else could have made. She forgot her distrust of George Fairfax when he spoke with friendly interest of Austin.

"Is the wife very vulgar?" Clarissa asked, when they had been talking some time.

"Not so especially vulgar. That sort of thing would be naturally toned down by her association with your brother. But she has an unmistakable air of Bohemianism; looks like a third-rate actress or dancer, in short; or perhaps an artist's model. I should not wonder if that were her position, by-the-way, when your brother fell in love with her. She is handsome still, though a little faded and worn by her troubles, poor soul! and seems fond of him."

"I am glad of that. How I should like to see him and the poor wife and the children—my brother's children! I have never had any children fond of me."

She thought of Austin in his natural position, as the heir of Arden Court, with his children playing in the old rooms—not as they were now, in the restored splendor of the Middle Ages, but as they had been in her childhood, sombre and faded, with here and there a remnant of former grandeur.

Mr. Granger woke presently, and George Fairfax wished them good-night.

"I hope we shall see you at the Court some day," Clarissa's husband said, with a kind of stately cordiality. "We can not offer you the numerous attractions of Hale Castle, but we have good shooting, and we generally have a houseful in September and October."

"I shall be most happy to make one of the houseful," Mr. Fairfax said, with a smile—that winning smile which had helped him to make so many friends, and which meant so little. He went away in a thoughtful spirit.

"Is she happy?" he asked himself. "She does not seem unhappy; but then women have such a marvelous power of repression or dissimulation one can never be sure of any thing about them. At Hale I could have sworn that she loved me. Could a girl of that age be absolutely mercenary, and be caught at once by the prospect of bringing down such big game as Daniel Granger? Has she sold herself for a fine house and a great fortune, and is she satisfied with the price? Surely no. She is not the sort of woman to be made happy by splendid furniture and fine dresses; no, nor by the common round of fashionable pleasures. There was sadness in her face when I came upon her unawares to-day. Yes, I am sure of that. But she has schooled herself to hide her feelings."

"I wonder you asked Mr. Fairfax to Arden, papa," said Miss Granger, when the visitor had departed.

"Why, my dear? He is a very pleasant young man; and I know he likes our part of the country. Besides, I suppose he will be a good deal at Hale this year, and that his marriage will come off before long. Lord Calderwood must have been dead a year."

"Lord Calderwood has been dead nearly two years," replied Miss Granger. "I fancy that the engagement between Mr. Fairfax and Lady Geraldine must have been broken off. If it were not so they would surely have been married before now. And I observed that Mr. Fairfax was not with Lady Laura to-day. I do not know how long he may have been in the gardens," Miss Granger added, with a suspicious glance at her step-mother, "but he certainly was not with Lady Laura during any part of the time."

Clarissa blushed when Lady Geraldine's engagement was spoken of. She felt as if she had been in some manner guilty in not having communicated the intelligence Lady Laura had given her. It seemed awkward to have to speak of it now.

"Yes," she said, with a very poor attempt at carelessness, "the engagement is broken off. Lady Laura told me so some time ago."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Sophia. "How odd that you should not mention it!"

Daniel Granger looked first at his daughter, and then at his wife. There was something in this talk—a sort of semi-significance—that displeased him. What was George Fairfax, that either his wife or his daughter should be interested in him?

"Clarissa may not have thought the fact worth mentioning, my dear," he said, stiffly. "It is quite unimportant to us."

He waived the subject away, as he might have done if it had been some small operation in commerce altogether unworthy of his notice; but in his secret heart he kept the memory of his wife's embarrassed manner. He had not forgotten the port-folio of drawings among which the likeness of George Fairfax figured so prominently. It had seemed a small thing at the time—the merest accident; one head was as good to draw as another, and so on, he had told himself; but he knew now that his wife did not love him, and he wanted to know if she had ever loved any one else.

REFLECTIONS.

THE crystal lake is smooth outspread,
The sun is bright, the air is still:
Unmoved the lilies in their bed,
And scarce a ripple on the rill:
The lilies from their reedy nest
Their own selves in the waters see:
The slumbrous tide it tells of rest,
And tree looks down on mirrored tree.

And gracefully the swans glide on,
Where shines the sun or darkens shade.
And here the beams flash down upon
The checkered velvet of the glade.
And there she sits: upon the mere
Her eyes intently fixed before her:
What sees she in those waters clear,
What hears in breezes hov'ring o'er her?

My lady—what? A calm delight,
Like that of this unruffled day,
O'erspreads your features: to your sight
What pleasant shapes float onward, say?
Or what your thoughts as oft you gaze
On Nature's gladness and her joy?
Or, faintly seen through golden haze,
What fancies, say, your mind employ?

Or what reflections note you there
Upon the water's outspread face,
Or, doubtful 'twixt the gloom and glare,
What shapes fantastic can you trace?
The heaven, the trees, the sun's glad gleam
Yon swans that sail adown the rill,
Or, as they are, or mirrored, seem—
Are these the thoughts your fancies fill?

And yet, methinks, might I divine
What is it holds your pensive mind,
It is not these, I dare opine,
These images that I should find.
She waits for him: her fancy sees
One face upon the wavelet's tide;
She hears his voice in every breeze,
His presence even by her side.

REFLECTIONS.

Digitized by Google

Drawers for Girl from 3 to 5 Years old.

THESE drawers of fine shirting are trimmed with needle-work insertion and a needle-work ruffle. Cut two pieces from Fig. 73, Supplement, observing the sloping contour of each front of the drawers. Gather the bottom of each leg and sew it on a needle-work binding twelve inches wide, the other side of which is edged with a gathered needle-work ruffle an inch and three-quarters wide, and cover the seams made by doing this with a strip of the material a quarter of an inch wide, which is stitched on at both edges. Sew up the legs from 60 to 61, and from there to the under edge of the needle-work ruffle, with a double seam; face each half of the drawers along the piece cut out with a bias strip of shirting half an inch wide, join the fronts of the drawers from 62 to 63 with overhand stitches, and at the under end of the seam work a button-hole stitch stay. Gather the top of the drawers, sew them into a double belt an inch and a half wide and of the length required; sew through the upper edge of this belt from the middle of each part of the drawers to the back edge for a shirr, through which run linen tape. Finish with a button-hole on the middle of the front, as shown by the illustration.

DRAWERS FOR GIRL FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XIX., Fig. 73.

Drawers for Girl from 10 to 12 Years old.

THESE drawers of fine shirting are tucked on the bottom and trimmed with needle-work. Cut two pieces from Fig. 74, Supplement, having previously joined on the piece turned down in Supplement, and observing the contour of the front of the drawers. Allow the extra material necessary for the tucks at the bottom of the drawers. Cut the belt of double shirting from Fig. 75, Supplement. After tucking the bottom of the drawers, and trimming them with needle-work, sew up each leg from 64 to 65 with a double seam, face the drawers along the piece cut out with a bias strip of the material three-quarters of an inch wide, and overhand the parts together from 66 to 67. Sew up the belt pieces from 66 to 68, join the double material along the upper edge, at the same time sewing in a cording. Gather the top of the drawers, and sew them into the double belt. Make a shirr through the latter along the straight line, and run tapes through it for tying the drawers.

DRAWERS FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XX., Figs. 74 and 75.

CHEMISE FOR CHILD FROM 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 56 and 57.

UNDER-DRAWERS FOR BOY FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVIII., Figs. 71 and 72.

tom with a bias strip of shirting half an inch wide, and stitch it on the right side. Set a bias strip an inch and three-quarters wide on the under side of the front as indicated on the pattern, and sew two rows of buttons on the corsets as shown by the illustration. Furnish the back with corresponding buttons and button-holes, and, finally, sew on the shoulder straps, which are stitched along the outer edge according to the corresponding figures.

Under-Waist for Girl from 6 to 8 Years old.

THIS waist is made of white coutil. It is trimmed on the upper edge and armholes with white thread lace, and furnished with buttons for fastening on the under-garments. Cut one piece from Fig. 76, Supplement, and two pieces from Fig. 77. Join the front and back pieces from 70 to 71 and from 72 to 73 with a double back stitch seam, turning down the edges toward each other very narrow. Face the outer edge of the waist and the armholes with a strip of shirting or linen an inch and a quarter wide at the under and back edges, and half an inch wide at the upper edge and along the armholes. Furnish the back of the waist with buttons and button-holes, and the under edge with three buttons, which serve for buttoning on the under-garments. Run linen tape through the hem on the upper edge, and trim the waist with thread lace, which is set on slightly gathered.

Corsets for Girl from 3 to 5 Years old.

THESE white corded piqué corsets are furnished with a double row of buttons, so as to lengthen or shorten the skirts as may be required. Cut one piece from Fig. 78, Supplement, and two pieces each from Figs. 79–82; in cutting from Fig. 82 the material must be taken double. Join the front with the back pieces each from 77 to 78 with a double back stitch seam, having previously set in the gores, and on the under side of the two back edges stitch a strip of the material an inch and a quarter wide. Face the top and bot-

SHIRT FOR BOY FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 58–64.

CORSETS FOR GIRL FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXII., Figs. 78–82.

UNDER-WAIST FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXI., Figs. 76 and 77.

CHEMISE FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 54 and 55.

CHEMISE FOR GIRL FROM 12 TO 14 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 50–53.

THE "WATERS" AT GASTEIN.

I MUST record, says a correspondent, one of the latest effects of the waters at Bad-Gastein; only it was an awkward application—an assault on the nerves. I have told you that we all live in the mid-channel of a great water-fall. Exhausted nature, in the wreck of the frame of a man about London, arrived here yesterday with his valet. He had traveled "through," which means about a week. He went to bed, and told his servant not to call him on any account. He slept like a top, and when he awoke, his shutters being closed, it was dark as Nox or Erebus, or a negro minstrel, and he said, "By Jupiter Pluvius!"—he is a youth of classical tastes—"it rains a hot 'un," and so dozed off again, no doubt dreaming of the past dissipations of the idle-busy hours of a departed season, of bad things which came on and good things which did not come off. He woke again. "Confound the weather, worse than ever!" and so, being on the debtor side of the books of Somnus & Co., he paid in another little sleep as an installment, and thus went on till dinner-time next day. "Will not monsieur get up today?" asked the valet. "Get up! No; why should I get up, when it pours? God knows, bed is scarce

NIGHT-SHIRT FOR BOY FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 65–70.

POPLIN CORSETS FOR STOUT LADIES.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 31–36.

COUTIL CORSETS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 37–44.

ENGLISH LEATHER CORSETS.
For pattern and description see Supplement. No. VII., Figs. 18–24.

COUTIL CORSETS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 25–30.

Digitized by Google

enough." "But, monsieur, it is the only really fine day that they have had this year." And so it was; our friend had kept his bed only because a water-fall was performing its set functions, and doing its duty in that state of life to which it had pleased a picturesque nature to call it. I confess that in this water-fall ville the first impulse when you wake is to put up your umbrella.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

B.—Get a cashmere wrap, either a polonaise, sacque, or mantle.

F. V. M.—Make your black alpaca by Marguerite Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 37, Vol. IV.

A COUNTRY COUSIN.—Gore the front and sides of your lemon-colored silk, trim with pleatings of white Swiss muslin, and wear beneath an over-skirt and basque of Swiss. The vivid color will be much softened.

ROXANA.—A basque, coat sleeves, and single skirt is a good model for your twilled plaid. Do not make a sailor collar and cuffs to your woolen pleated blouse. Put two bias folds on your poplin over-skirt. See New York Fashions of Bazar No. 38, Vol. IV., for cloth for sacque. A white alpaca or cashmere pleated waist would be very pretty.

ADA.—R. S. V. P. on invitations means, Reply soon if you please, and requires that you should write, accepting or declining the invitation.

"43."—A black cashmere polonaise made by the Marguerite Polonaise pattern in Bazar No. 37, Vol. IV., or the same stuff in a box-pleated waist and an over-skirt, would answer with your silk.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIBER.—Make your lovely lavender silk with basque, upper skirt, and demi-train. Trim with darker velvet folds corded with white.—Select your piece of silver at the shop, have the bride's and groom's initials combined in a monogram and engraved upon it, and let the jeweler send it to the bride's house with your card the day before the wedding. About an inscription inside the case the jeweler will advise you.

R. A. R.—Make your black silk with Marguerite Polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 37, Vol. IV.

WHITE NETS.—Satines will be worn this winter. Your proposed combination of gray and brown will be stylish. Black silk with muslin pleatings is suitable for a carriage and house dress, but was also worn in the streets during the summer. Your silk is well enough trimmed as it is. Do not make your velvet garment until the styles are more decided. Put gray folds on your brown ruffle. Grecian twist with braids around it and the chatelaine braids are both in fashion.

MRS. R. J. A.—Make white Victoria lawn waists in the pleated blouse style described in Bazar Nos. 26 and 28, Vol. IV., and wear with your summer double skirt dresses.

CHARLEY.—You are at liberty to use the convenient self-sealing envelopes in writing to a lady, though sealing-wax is more in accordance with the strict requirements of etiquette.

Q. R. V. ETIQUETTE.—A lady who has given a gentleman just cause of offense should undoubtedly apologize without waiting for him to insist on it. Twenty-two is the correct expression.—A steel and black suit, trimmed with the same, would be suitable for a widow after the first mourning is over. Make from the pattern of the Marguerite polonaise.

ALPHONSINE.—We regard all gift enterprises as doubtful, and advise you to save your money by letting them alone.—The gored wrapper pattern was duly sent you, and if not received was lost in the mails, for which we are not responsible.

MAINE.—Many novelists have made the Maid of Orleans the theme of story, but Bulwer was not one of them.

HARRIET.—Your parents ought to be better judges than we as to whether your lover will make a good husband, and we can only advise you to give heed to their counsel.

IOWA.—You need no special invitation to call on your friend while she has a visitor. Of course you are not expected to call on the latter unless she is likewise your acquaintance.

ST. LOUIS.—Three grown persons with three children might live comfortably in some of the small German towns on a thousand dollars a year. We can not tell you what the traveling expense would be. This would depend on the route you chose.

M. D.—Address all communications respecting MSS. to Harper & Brothers. We can not answer inquiries on this subject through the paper.

SLEEPING MADE EASY.

SIR WALTER SCOTT, a good authority, says that a bed of heather is one of the greatest luxuries of nature. The writer goes into rhapsodies over its velvety softness, tells us how cool it is with a gusto which almost makes us wish we were mountaineers, and unctuously describes a night he himself had spent on a couch of nature's providing. Nature is surely a most indulgent mother, and no doubt the novelist was right when he said that it is a great luxury to stretch one's self at full length on the fragrant heath, with the whole world for a bedchamber and the sky for a spangled canopy to one's couch. But, unfortunately, we live in unromantic times, and most of us are compelled to invite "nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep," on those unpoetical arrangements called "bedsteads." Much, then, as we respect the opinion of the above gifted author, it must be confessed that he has only made us envy the favored individuals who have no trouble of mind as to what they shall sleep on; but as we are condemned to seek a substitute for this, the cheapest of all luxuries, the question naturally arises, where are we to find the next best thing on which to rest our wearied limbs? New England ingenuity answers this question to a nicety. Not even an open-air bed of heather affords the luxurious repose enjoyed by the use of the Woven Wire Mattress patented by the Woven Wire Mattress Co., of Hartford, Conn. It is the happy result of long-continued efforts to combine every element of luxury and utility, and is at once cool, invigorating, and luxurious. Being made of tempered wires interwoven, it is absolutely indestructible, and will last a lifetime. When we remember that cleanliness is the most important [illegible] an article of furniture of this kind, [illegible] n be cleaner than a Woven Wire [illegible] a long-desired result has be[illegible] py invention. The Indep[illegible] is life to all of us, and be the only wonder is that so many poor articles in this line are sold as long as a Wire Mattress can be procured. And, rather than not have one, we should prefer to economize in something else, and pay the slight additional expense of so perfect an article. But the Company need make no apology for the price; for, although the first cost is somewhat more than a common spring, these beds are worth the money, and much of the extra expense can be saved in the thin covering necessary. Then, too, they are warranted to be entirely exempt from repairs for five years. We certainly can not give our readers any better advice than to send to the Company for a bed, or buy one through their regular dealers."

THOSE of our readers who desire their hair to take the same color as when young should use Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer.—[Com.]

BLONDE.—By dampening the face with cold water, after the first application of the SPRAY, and again rubbing dry with a towel, detection is absolutely defied.—[Com.]

WHITCOMB'S ASTHMA REMEDY.—"Nothing so successful."—THEO. METCALF, Apothecary, Boston.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES, and Tan, use Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists everywhere. Depot, 49 Bond St., New York.

E. RIMMEL,

PERFUMER,

PARIS, LONDON, BRUSSELS.

THE AMERICUS CLUB BOUQUET,
The Perfume of the Season.
JOCKEY CLUB,
WHITE ROSE,
MUSK,
IHLANG IHLANG,
&c., &c., &c., &c.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
Special Representatives for United States,
EDWARDES & RUSSELL, 38 Vesey St., N. Y.

It has the delicate and refreshing fragrance of genuine Farina Cologne Water, and is indispensable to the Toilet of every Lady or Gentleman. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in PERFUMERY.

COLGATE'S EAU-DE-COLOGNE TOILET SOAP.

STRASBURGER & PFEIFFER,

(Successors to Strasburger, Fritz, & Pfeiffer),
IMPORTERS OF GERMAN, FRENCH, AND ENGLISH

TOYS,
China & Fancy Goods,

BOHEMIAN GLASS and LAVA WARES,
MUSIC BOXES, ACCORDEONS, HARMONICAS, CONCERTINAS, &c., &c.,

394 Broadway, near Canal St., N.Y.

Parlor Ornaments, latest novelties in Toys, Fancy and Ornamental Goods constantly arriving to supply the general demand.

DENSLOW & BUSH'S "SAFETY" OIL

Will not explode! Safest and purest oil ever produced! Stands over 150° fire test! We take regular Kerosene oil and by our new process expel all impurities and explosive elements. The Fire Underwriters of N. Y. urgently recommend our oil as a protection to life and property. A lighted lamp may be upset and broken without fear of explosion or fire. For sale by all grocers, druggists, &c., in the U. S. Extra inducements to dealers. Address DENSLOW & BUSH, 180 Maiden Lane, N. Y.; 8 Custom H. St., Boston, Mass.; 34 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.; 51 S. Water St., Chicago, Ill.; or Cleveland, O.

$10 from 50 cts.

12 Samples sent (postage free) for Fifty Cents that retail readily for Ten Dollars.
R. L. WOLCOTT, 181 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Excelsior Waterproof Cage Mat
Keeps cages clean and free from vermin. 5 Packages sent on receipt of $1 00 and inside dimensions of cage (12 Mats in a Package). J. BECKER & Co., 1140 Broadway. Send stamp for circular. SCHENCK & CO., 269½ Pearl St., New York.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS,

NOW ON EXHIBITION
AT THE
Fair of the American Institute,
Together with the original Oil Paintings.
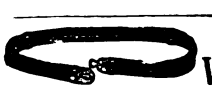
CALL AND SEE THEM!
☞ Illustrated Catalogues to be had gratis, at the fair, or on application to
L. PRANG & CO.,
BOSTON, MASS.



PATENT DUPLEX
Ventilated Garter,

This elegant Garter surpasses, in beauty and comfort, any thing of the kind ever worn. It is made of a double row of spiral spring wire, heavily plated with silver and gold, and so arranged as not to impede the free circulation of the blood, thus insuring warm feet, while it leaves the limbs unmarked. Samples mailed on receipt of 50c., $1 00, $1 25, or $1 50.
GEORGE BETTS, Sole Agent, 543 Broadway, N. Y.

$290 For first-class Pianos—Sent on trial—No Ag'ts. Address U. S. PIANO CO., 865 B'dway, N. Y.

NOTICE.—Buyers of Goods under the names of Wamsutta Prints, Checks, Lindseys, Cambrics, Ticks, and Stripes, are hereby informed that all such goods are not manufactured at the Wamsutta Mills. We limit our Name and the Wamsutta Ticket to our Bleached Shirtings and Sheetings. We have, in addition to our former Trade-Mark, adopted the following, which will in all cases appear with this notice.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., June 1st, 1867.
Thos. J. Bennett Jr. Agent Wamsutta Mills.

OFFICE OF WAMSUTTA MILLS, NEW BEDFORD, September 1st, 1871.

It has been the constant endeavor of our Company for more than twenty years to improve the quality of the goods of our manufacture; so that our fabrics are fully equal to any in the market. We have just completed a New Mill, supplied with machinery of the most approved kinds, and have also added to the machinery in the mills previously built all the latest improvements; so that we are now making our goods finer, heavier, and handsomer than ever before.

The goods are of the full width represented, and not on a basis of 35 inches for a yard.

All the Standard Goods bear our Ticket and the above Trade-Mark, and may be relied on for quality and quantity, and as of our manufacture.

The Agents for the sale of our goods to Jobbers and Wholesale Dealers are ALMY & COMPANY, New York, 65 Leonard Street, cor. Church.

" " Boston, 38 Franklin Street.
CADBURY, THOMAS, & CO., Philadelphia, 221 Chestnut Street.
CHASE, STEWART, & CO., Baltimore, 27 German Street.

JOSEPH GRINNELL, President.
ANDREW G. PIERCE, Treasurer. THOS. BENNETT, Jr., Agent.

WHAT SHALL WE SLEEP ON?

The attention of every reader who values "Life, Health, and Happiness" is called to the ANSWER to the important question as found in the wonderful and beautiful

WOVEN WIRE MATTRESS,

Patented June 16, 1868; Nov. 23 and 30, 1869; Nov. 22, 1870; April 11, 1871.
MANUFACTURED BY THE WOVEN WIRE MATTRESS COMPANY, of Hartford, Conn.
SOLE PATENTEES AND MANUFACTURERS.

For Perfect Cleanliness, Perfect Comfort, and Perfect Durability,

The Company claims that this Perfect Spring Bed without Springs has no rival.

The Mattress consists of 8000 feet of 18½ wire, made into perfect coils, and at the same time interlocked by an ingenious process of Double Weaving, by which a fabric half an inch thick is formed, which, when it is stretched on its frame by machinery, forms a bed of remarkable elasticity and strength.

The Wire Mattress is a complete revolution of old ideas as to beds, being a Perfect Sleeping Arrangement in itself, with the addition of a blanket in warm weather. For ordinary use, however, a thin hair mattress is desirable; but this is the only covering necessary, and on this account the bed is the CHEAPEST ARTICLE IN MARKET.

All the vexing repairs usually necessary in almost every other bed are avoided, and they are guaranteed

NEVER TO LOSE THEIR SHAPE OR NEED A REPAIR.

This wire fabric is as Noiseless as India-Rubber Cloth, which is a strong recommendation to all nervous, restless sleepers. It is destined to be THE POPULAR BED of the country.

These beds can be found at nearly all the best Furniture Dealers in the country. When they are not, the Company will send direct, free of freight charges. Address, for Circular and Price-List,

GEO. C. PERKINS, Secretary,
HARTFORD, CONN.

G. B. HAWLEY, President.

For sale by WILCOX & CO., 59 Fourth Avenue, N. Y., and all City Dealers.

AMOR HILLBORN & CO., 44 North Tenth St., Philadelphia.
W. B. MOSES, Washington, D. C.
A. S. HERENDEN & CO., Cleveland, O.
JACOB FITROW, 109 Dearborn St., Chicago.
EMMONS CAMPFIELD, 418 Olive St., St. Louis.

And the Trade in all the large towns and cities in the Union.
Also by all first-class Dealers in BOSTON.

Ask for the WONDERFUL WOVEN WIRE MATTRESS, and take no other bed.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

A BLESSING INFINITELY MULTIPLIED.

The discovery of the Seltzer Spring has been a blessing to thousands; but the extension of its medicinal benefits to the whole civilized world through the medium of

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT

Is a boon which no form of words can adequately describe. It is as if millions upon millions of Seltzer Springs—branches of the parent fountain, and in all respects the same—had sprung up spontaneously every where, annihilating dyspepsia, strengthening the debilitated, curing biliousness, abating fever, purifying the blood, cheering despondency, and diffusing health and hope far and wide. Such are its happy effects.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

NICOL & DAVIDSON, 686 Broadway,

Are receiving Novelties from Paris and London in
REAL BRONZES, COMPOSITION BRONZES, BISQUE GOODS,
FRENCH CHINA DINNER, DESSERT, AND TEA SERVICES,
VASES, PARIAN STATUARY (from Minton), MANTEL SETS,
GLASSWARE (from Baccarat),
GLASS CHANDELIERS (from Osler), SHEFFIELD TABLE CUTLERY, &c., &c.
ALSO, OF OWN MANUFACTURE,
GAS FIXTURES and FINE SILVER-PLATED WARE

NEW YORK CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,

The oldest and best Music School in the country,
NOW OPEN FOR PRIVATE AND CLASS INSTRUCTION
In all branches of Vocal and Instrumental Music, Harmony and Composition, and the Modern Languages.
All Applications for Admission must be made at the
GENERAL CONSERVATORY OFFICES,
820 BROADWAY, near 13th St., over the Music Store.
(The branch at No. 82 Fifth Avenue removes up town.)
BROOKLYN BRANCH, 102, 104, & 106 COURT ST., near State.

Digitized by Google

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
have opened a large assortment
of
PARIS-MADE DRESSES,
consisting of
BLACK AND COLORED SILK AND WORSTED MATERIALS,
PURCHASED IN PARIS at about ONE-HALF their VALUE.
An entirely new stock
of
STRIPED POPLIN MOHAIR DRESSES.
PLAIN MOHAIR DRESSES.
SERGE AND ALPACA IN GREAT VARIETY.
The LATEST PARIS STYLES
in
EMPRESS CLOTH.
FRENCH AND IRISH POPLINS, together with an Elegant Lot
of
BLACK AND COLORED SILK DRESSES, elaborately made up,
EQUAL, if not superior in TASTE and STYLE to the VERY BEST PARIS-MADE,
To which they INVITE SPECIAL ATTENTION.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH & 10TH STS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

FALL, 1871, SILKS.
EXHIBITION AT RETAIL.
MEDIUM, RICH, AND EXTRA QUALITY PLAIN COLORED SILKS.
"CACHEMIRE SICILIEN," for Polonaise and Overskirts,
In all the various NEW TINTS, to match the Silks.
FANCY COLORED SILKS in great variety.
BLACK AND WHITE SILKS.
BLACK AND COLORED SATINS.
BLACK SILKS.
"PONSON'S," "BONNET," and "TAPISSIER," celebrated makes in all the various grades.
TRIMMING AND CLOAKING VELVETS, VELVET RIBBONS, VELVETEENS, &c., &c.
N. B.—Strangers visiting the city, and our customers, are respectfully invited to examine our stock.

RICH LACES.
We are now offering the finest selection of articles in this line ever before exhibited in this market, and at greatly reduced prices—some exclusive novelties.
REAL POINT and APPLIQUE BRIDAL TROUSSEAUX, complete.
REAL POINT and APPLIQUE SHAWLS AND FLOUNCINGS, BARBES, HANDKERCHIEFS, COLLARS, and SETS.
POINT and APPLIQUE TRIMMING LACES.
BLACK GUIPURE and REAL THREAD TRIMMING LACES.
WHITE and BLACK DUCHESSE TRIMMINGS.
COLORED GUIPURE LACES.
FRENCH EMB'D SETS, on double Linen, greatly below regular prices.
PARIS and HAMBURGH EMBROIDERIES, EMB'D LINEN BANDS and YOKES.
PLAIN, INITIAL, and EMB'D HANDKERCHIEFS, &c., &c.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street.

NOW OPENING,
a large stock of
LADIES' COSTUMES,
FANCY WOOLEN CLOAKS,
EMBROIDERED HOUSE JACKETS,
FUR SEAL JACKETS, FANCY FURS, &c.
All Imported Goods, and in elegant variety, to the Trade only.

THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO.,
391 Broadway, N. Y.

FOR
Hand and Machine Sewing.
J. & P. COATS'
BEST
SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,
From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.
FOR SALE BY
All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

Beautifies the complexion by removing Pimples and all other disagreeable disorders of the skin. Twenty-five cents per box.
JOHN F. HENRY, Sole Proprietor,
No. 8 College Place, New York.

C. WORCH, destroyer of
MOTHS IN FURNITURE.
The only reliable remedy for vermin of this kind.
110 Fourth Avenue, New York.

KEMLO'S Modern Watch Repairer's Guide. Price $1 25. A. WILLIAMS & Co., Publishers, Boston.

OFFICE OF
Grand Military Festival and Fête Champêtre
IN AID OF
The Union Home and School for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute and Orphan Children of Soldiers and Sailors.

TO THE PUBLIC.
We, the Officers and Managers of the Union Home and School, ask the assistance of all benevolently disposed persons in aid of the institution under our charge. Through the kindness of Major-General Alexander Shaler, Hon. John H. White, Col. E. B. Lansing, George H. Purser, Benj. W. Hitchcock, and others, a grand Military Festival and Fete Champetre has been arranged to be held in October next, and we earnestly invite the public to patronize and assist the undertaking.

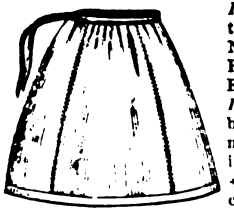
Mrs. CHARLES P. DALY, President.
Mrs. VIRGINIA L. FARRAGUT, Vice-President.
Mrs. ALEX. SHALER, Vice-President.
Mrs. DAVID HOYT, Secretary.
Mrs. C. M. LYDIG.
Mrs. J. C. FREMONT.
Mrs. GEORGE F. HOPPER.
Mrs. R. JOHNSON.
Mrs. J. J. VANDALSOM.
Mrs. L. H. ROWAN.

Subscriptions of one dollar each for single admission tickets, and ten dollars each for season tickets (twelve admissions), can be mailed to the undersigned.
With the kind letters of approval already received, the promoters of the Festival feel sanguine that the undertaking will not only prove a pecuniary success, but that, as a testimonial benefit from the public, it will enlist a widespread interest, and be one of the most enjoyable series of entertainments ever given in this country.
BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, General Manager,
STORE, 29 BEEKMAN STREET, N. Y.

BEAUTY
PERSIAN SPRAY, manufactured by Prof. DeVERNA at his laboratory, 37 John St., N. Y., restores the loveliness of youth by promoting healthy action of the skin. Its wonderful curative qualities have caused it to occupy the leading position among face preparations. Prepared from purely innocent vegetable compounds. Use none other. Sold by all Drug and Fancy Stores.

Dutch Bulbous Roots.
SMALL FRUITS.
Just published, our new AUTUMN CATALOGUE of the above, enlarged and improved, containing 60 pages of printed matter, and many new and beautiful engravings, including a large and finely colored lithograph of a GROUP OF HYACINTHS. Also a descriptive list of small fruits, among which are several new varieties of Strawberries never before offered to the public. A copy will be mailed to all applicants upon receipt of 10 cents. Regular customers supplied gratis. Address B. K. BLISS & SONS,
23 Park Place and 20 Murray St., New York.
(P. O. Box No. 5712.)

TRADE-MARK.
"RUSSIAN GORED KNIT UNDERSKIRT,"
A NEW ARTICLE,



Invented and manufactured exclusively by the NORFOLK & NEW BRUNSWICK HOSIERY CO., upon their Patented Knitting Looms, being superior to flannel, much lighter, perfect in shape, and will not shrink nor change in color from washing.
ALSO,
FULL-FASHIONED HOSIERY,
consisting of
Ladies', Gents', Misses', and Boys' Underwear, of every description, superior in quality and style to any goods made in this country, and fully equal to the best hand-loom imported goods, and at greatly reduced prices.
Full lines for sale, to the jobbing trade only, at H. J. LIBBY & CO.'S, 47 & 49 White St., N. Y.

WE SEND SINGLE
WALTHAM WATCHES
by Express to any part of the United States, and allow the purchaser to open the package and examine the watch before paying the bill. Send for our price-list, which gives full particulars, and please state that you saw this advertisement in Harper's Bazar.
HOWARD & CO.,
No. 865 Broadway, New York.
☞ All prices reduced since Feb. 1st.

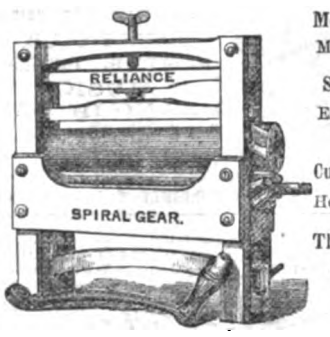
BLEES
NOISELESS,
LOCK-STITCH
SEWING MACHINE
Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion. Call and examine. Send for circular. Agents wanted.
MANUFACTURED BY
BLEES
Sewing Machine Co.,
623 Broadway, N. Y.

GETTING UP CLUBS.
Great Saving to Consumers.
Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

GLYCERINE CAKE.
RAWOLLE'S TOILET GLYCERINE CAKE is unequaled for Washing, Shaving, Shampooing, Tooth Soap, and Baby Wash; produces a clear, soft, white skin, and prevents pimples and chapping. Warranted over one-half pure Glycerine. For sale by druggists. MARX & RAWOLLE, Manufacturers of Glycerine, 179 William St., New York.

WICKES'
ECLECTIC OIL
Is Pure, Safe, Sweet, and Economical.
J. H. WICKES,
120 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

RELIANCE WRINGER,
PERFECTED 1871.



Moulton Rolls, Most Durable;
Spiral Cogs, Easiest Working;
Curved Clamp, Holds Firmest;
The Cheapest,
The Best,
TRY IT.
PROVIDENCE TOOL COMPANY,
11 Warren St., N. Y., and PROV., R. I.

Figures will not lie!
How Large Fortunes are made!
☞ FACTS FOR THE PEOPLE. ☜
☞ SEE the prices at which four of the leading Sewing Machines are sold in the UNITED STATES, and ENGLAND.

	Price in England.	In the U. S.
Wheeler & Wilson	$45.00	$85.00
New Singer - -	32.50	65.00
Elias Howe - -	35.00	65.00
Wilson Shuttle -	40.00	45.00

The above Prices are for exactly the same classes of machines as sold in both Countries. There is scarcely any difference in the cost of material and labor in any of the above named machines.
☞ AFFIDAVIT.—W. G. Wilson, President of the Wilson Sewing Machine Co., personally appeared before me, and made oath that the above prices are correct, and taken by him from Circulars published in the United States and England under the corporate names of the Companies manufacturing said machines. FRED. SMITH,
Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas of Cuyahoga Co., O.
The WILSON SEWING MACHINES are for Sale in most every County in the United States, and
No. 707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER
Has long been regarded as the best and cheapest Baking Powder in use. Perfectly pure and healthy. It makes, at short notice, delicious Biscuits, Rolls, &c. There need be no waste of food prepared with it, as it is always of the best quality. We would say to those who have never used it, that a very few trials will enable them to use it, not only with entire satisfaction, but with economy.
Put up FULL, NET weight, as represented.
Grocers and Dealers sell it.
DOOLEY & BROTHER, Proprietors,
69 NEW STREET,
NEW YORK CITY.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA,
with the Green-Tea Flavor. Warranted to suit all tastes. For sale every where. And for sale wholesale only by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 8 Church St., N. Y. P. O. Box 5506. Send for Thea-Nectar Circular.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

BUILDERS and all who contemplate building, supplied with descriptive circular of "Village Builder." Address A. J. BICKNELL & CO., Publishers, 27 Warren St., N. Y.

FREE Try samples of our great 8-page, $1 00, illustrated weekly—30 years established. Fine steel engravings free to subscribers. Agents make $5 a day. Send for The Saturday Gazette, Hallowell, Me.

$10 A DAY with Stencil Tools. Samples free. Address A. E. GRAHAM, Springfield, Vt.

LADY'S TROUSSEAU "A"
FOR $150.

3 Muslin Chemises	@ $2 00..	$6 00
3 Linen "	@ 4 75..	14 25
1 Bridal Set (3 pieces)		12 00
3 Pairs Muslin Drawers	@ 2 00..	6 00
3 " Linen "	@ 2 75..	8 25
3 Plain Cotton Skirts	@ 2 25..	6 75
3 Tucked " "	@ 3 00..	9 00
3 Muslin Night Dresses	@ 3 50..	10 50
3 Tucked Cambric Night Dresses	@ 5 00..	15 00
3 Embr'd " " "	@ 7 00..	21 00
1 Flannel Skirt		5 00
1 " " Embroidered		8 25
2 Corset Covers	@ 3 25..	6 50
2 Dressing Sacques	@ 3 50..	7 00
1 Robe de Chambre		14 50
		$150 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent, C. O. D., by Express. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials.
LORD & TAYLOR,
BROADWAY & TWENTIETH ST.,
NEW YORK.

RIFLES, Shot-Guns, Revolvers, Gun Material. Write for Price-List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents wanted.

$250 A Month easily made with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Secure Circular and Samples, free. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

Valuable New Books,
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.
☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for OCTOBER, 1871.

KINGSLEY'S WEST INDIES. At Last: a Christmas in the West Indies. By CHARLES KINGSLEY. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

BULWER'S KING ARTHUR. King Arthur. A Poem. By EARL LYTTON. 12mo, Cloth, Illuminated, $1 75.

BROUGHAM'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY. The Life and Times of HENRY, LORD BROUGHAM. Written by Himself. Vols. I. and II. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per vol. (To be completed in Three Volumes.)

NEW EDITIONS
OF BOOKS
PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

SMITH'S NEW CLASSICAL DICTIONARY. 8vo, Sheep, $5 00.

THE STUDENT'S HUME. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

LAMARTINE'S PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE OF THE REPUBLIC. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

JAMESON'S FEMALE SOVEREIGNS. Vol. II. 18mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE. By CHARLES READE. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

PEG WOFFINGTON. By CHARLES READE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WHITE LIES. By CHARLES READE. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

LOOMIS'S TREATISE ON ALGEBRA. 8vo, Sheep, $2 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Digitized by Google

FACETIÆ.

AN Irish gentleman, having a pair of new boots sent home to him, proceeded to try them on, but, after a great deal of labor and pulling and straining, till, from the blisters on his hands, he could no longer continue the violent exertion, he desisted, declaring that he perceived very clearly he should never get these boots on till he had worn them a day or two.

Are women nearer angels since they have worn high heels?

CHILDISH.—There is no happier season in life than that of childhood. A children's church has been established in Brooklyn under the auspices of a number of gentlemen. The services last about an hour, and are specially adapted for children and very young persons. One of our contributors, who "sits under" the Rev. Sicksti Minnits, says he wishes he were several young persons.

It is easier for a man to be engaged than to be engaging.

TRUE, O KING!—A paper says, "One of the prettiest sights the human eye ever rested upon is gold in its liquid state." The human eye in this vicinity would be satisfied if it could see any of the metal in a solid state.

Can a railway map be called a line engraving?

A girl, forced by her parents into a disagreeable match with an old man whom she detested, when the clergyman came to that part of the service where the bride is asked if she consents to take the bridegroom for her husband, said, with great simplicity, "Oh dear, no, Sir; but you are the first person who has asked my opinion about the matter!"

Women are born women; men are born boys, and have to grow up.

THAT DESOLATE LAD AGAIN.—The other day a town-crier not far from Manchester took in charge a lost child, and proceeded to hunt up its parents. On being asked by a lady what the matter was, he replied, "Here's an orphan child, madam, and I'm trying to find its parents."

AUTUMN FASHIONS.—Large checks are in demand for autumn toilettes. A check for $5000, presented to Miss Bunny-nags by her father, has been much admired.

It only takes four letters to make love. They should be returned, though, when it is over.

A most excellent old lady up town is much exercised in mind to know how it is that a little quicksilver in a glass tube can indicate such awful hot weather by just rising an inch or two.

SEA-SIDE HATS—THIS SEASON.

The Latest Style—very light and airy and convenient, and all that sort of thing. Wants a Face to suit it, though. Remember this is only a Fancy Sketch.

This isn't a Bad Style, though, for some people. Built somewhat on the Extinguisher plan. Great facilities for keeping one's eye on any one.

A very Gushing Style, this—"awfully fetching," on the Pier, when a gentle breeze is on.

Ought to be put down at once. How is her Mamma, if she's on the off side, to see whether the deceitful little thing is reading her book or fixing the Captain?

HER LAST PLACE.

A girl called at the residence of a gentleman to apply for a place. The lady of the house asked for her reference.

"I have lived five years at my last place," said the girl; "if you want to know any more about me, ask Father Hawley."

The lady was favorably impressed with a girl who had lived five years without changing her place; but she concluded to call on Father Hawley.

"Do you know a girl named So-and-so?"

"Yes."

"She lived five years at her last place?"

"Yes."

All correct so far; but as the lady turned to go Father Hawley inquired,

"Do you know where her last place was?"

"No; she did not mention that."

"It was in the State-prison!"

GENERAL COURT—Waiting on half a dozen girls at the same time.

The following knotty question claims the attention of one or all of our legal debating societies, "If a man has a tiger by the tail, which would be the best for his personal safety, to hold on or let go?"

IN EXTREMIS.—That man is indeed hard up who can not get credit even for good intentions.

He that can not eat any thing dressed in any way, at any time, out of any thing, and this under the sight of any dirt, the effect of any smell, the sound of any discord, and the feeling of any motion, had better not go to sea.

Why is there never any high tide on the French rivers?—Because the water is always l'eau.

An obituary goes thus: "Another stalwart tree fell last evening in its autumn prime in the person of Major J. W. Cullen, as unique and remarkable a character in his way as ever wrought out logarithmetically, and emarginated from the rugged latitudinarianism of the frontier."

Many people have something wrong with their hearts, and no wonder—how can your heart be right, if it's left?

A druggist has a tonic which he says will give its taker an appetite that will enable him to swallow an elephant. We will never swallow any of the tonic, because elephants are scarce hereabout, and we could not afford to buy one every week or two.

Why is a man who kicks out right and left like an ancient robber?—Because he's a freebooter.

If you should ever have the misfortune to "let the cat out of the bag," never try and stuff her back again. It is such a mistake! You only make—inevitably make—matters forty times worse.

...is, Mr. Tongs? You have not sent Home my Traveling Chignon yet!" ...n, Ma'am, I'm sure. But the Fact is, we have been so Busy makin' up our ...'Air."

WOMAN'S LOGIC.

"Because I'm in a hurry to-day, the gate of Union Square is shut."

"Because I particularly wanted it for the Fair, that provoking woman has not sent home my new bonnet."

"Because we've only cold mutton for dinner, Henry has chosen to bring a friend home with him."

"Because we've fixed to go and see the fire-works to-morrow, it's sure to rain."

"Because I wanted him to take me out for a walk, my husband was kept at that horrid office all the afternoon."

"Because I so wished to show him to Mrs. De Tankerville, baby has gone to sleep."

"Because I was 'a great figure,' and Mary cleaning the kitchen things and not fit to go to the door, the Fitz-Eustace Brownes called."

"Because Henry and I were all alone, and going to spend a cozy evening together, that dreadful bore, Joe Ramble, must drop in."

FISHES OUT OF WATER—Muscles in a lady's neck.

SOMETHING TO SHOOT.

"I say, boy, is there any thing to shoot around here?" inquired a sportsman of a boy he met.

"Well," replied the boy, "nothing just about here; but our school-master is just over the hill, cutting birch rods; you might walk up and pop him over."

QUERY.—Is the sea-board made of beech?

AN HEIR-LOOM.

MISTRESS. "That's a curious locket you have there, Jane."

JANE. "Yes, mim; it's a relict of my family."

MISTRESS. "A relict?"

JANE (with solemnity). "Yes, mim—a 'air-b'loon!"

A WAIST OF TIME—A stout old lady's.

"My dear," said a husband to his better half, after a quarrel, "you will never be permitted to go to heaven."

"Why not?"

"Because you will be wanted as a torment down below."

A SNUGGERY.

MOUNTAIN MISTS ARE PROVERBIALLY DISAGREEABLE, BUT MR. JENKINS DECLARES THEY ARE QUITE THE REVERSE.

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 41.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

LADIES' FALL TOILETTES.

Fig. 1.—VEST-BASQUE WALKING SUIT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). Fig. 2.—CRAPE AND SILK WALKING SUIT. Fig. 3.—SILK AND CASHMERE HOUSE DRESS.

[Cut Paper Patterns of the Vest-Basque Walking Suit, graded to fit any Figure, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches, Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Digitized by Google

will see the fields and way-sides illuminating the promise that seed-time and harvest shall not fail: trees festooned with apples, rosy or russet, pears hiving the sunshine, peaches blushing, plums gathering bloom and sweetness hour by hour, quinces betraying their neighborhood, and the full corn in the ear waving its ribbons.

And who does not hail the first blaze upon the hearth, and draw about it with a delightful sense of comfort, and watch it soaring up the chimney and sputtering over the back-log with as lively an interest as if it were the first fire ever kindled? and who is there but appreciates the cozy seclusion that descends with the early twilight, and calls for candles and drawn curtains at the tea-table, declining to invite all out-doors to the spectacle of homely happiness? The winds may threaten, the floods may clap their hands, the frosts may pinch and pucker, but are we not safe and well screened from harm beside our drift-wood fire and our drop-light? What charcoal sketches it affords! what half-remembered faces, met in our summer journeys, look out upon us! what mountain scenery flashes upon us and fades! And by-and-by the fierce autumnal gales swoop down upon the coast, strewing the beach with bits of wreck tangled among the sea-weed, stranding the five-fingers high and dry, while inland the leaves fall like rain before their might, and naked boughs tremble and sigh as if the dryads were bewailing their lost kingdom. There is a feeling of neighborliness growing upon one at this season; every body's "good-morning" is hearty and cordial; every body has returned from the beach or the mountains, and has a great deal to say, and is anxious to unravel her skein of small-talk; to relate how they washed their hands in the clouds at Mount Washington, and were moon-struck at Diana's Baths, and wondered that Nature permitted the existence of cascades, when every body knew that water-falls had gone out of fashion! Thenceforth shopping epidemics prevail, and toilettes catch hints from the autumn woods, and kindle into golden russets and scarlets: "In order to be in sympathy with the world," says Kate, who always looks at the bright side of things; "In order to 'make sunshine in a shady place,'" declares her sister, to whom autumn is a song in the minor key, a painting after REMBRANDT.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Haste and Speed.

MY DEAR HIRAM,—It seems as if I saw you only yesterday going up the side of the English steamer with what seemed a week's supply of clothing packed in your hand-bag, and here you are again with all Europe packed in your memory! When I met you yesterday, if I appeared to you to be unduly staring, it was only that as I looked into your eyes I remembered that since I had seen their good-humored twinkle they had looked upon Mont Blanc and the Staubbach and the dark horn of the Aar. It was because I thought they might be those fabled lakes in which the fascinated beholder sees the lost glory of a vanished world, and that I should trace in them the wonderful and lovely scenes which were visible to the eye of the traveler in the vanished world of my days of travel. This hand, I thought, as I took yours in mine, must have been laid upon the crumbling wall at the top of that tower in the Baths of Caracalla, near the walls of Rome, where we used to lie in the soft sunshine and look over the Campagna to the graceful outline of the Alban Mount; and have those very shoes, perhaps—for it seems from their appearance most probable—stumped along the Appian Way, and climbed to the Faulhorn and over the Gemmi?

But, my dear Hiram, it is only three months since you went away! You may have looked at many of these things, but have you seen them? You thought perhaps that the Black Forest was in Sicily, and that Lake Thrasymene was somewhere in Bavaria? No; not exactly. You have spent a great deal of money, but what have you bought? You can learn the geography of Europe at the district school at home; but to cross the ocean and travel about at enormous expense, and then return without even a correct geographical idea in your head—the more haste the worse speed. You have hurried insanely, but you have arrived nowhere. You are like a fellow-countryman whom long ago, when I made the grand tour, I met upon the Lake of Lucerne, and of whom you shall now hear the story.

I was loitering through Switzerland, and had been staying for several days at Lucerne, rambling among the mountains, paddling on the lake, and even passing three or four days upon the Righi. One morning I stepped upon the steamer to go to the other end of the lake, and, looking about among my fellow-passengers, I beheld at the bow of the boat a tall and rather thin gentleman smoking a cigar. He wore a black hat, a black satin waistcoat, black cravat, black trowsers, and patent-leather boots. I should have known him in Madagascar or in Greenland. It was my brother Jonathan. Stepping up to him, I said, "Good-morning!"

He turned, and looking both surprised and pleased, returned my salutation, and added, "But how did you know me?"

"How could I help knowing you?" I replied, but without directly answering.

Then he began, in the frankest manner, to tell me of his travels, smoking vehemently all the time. The steamer started, and he turned his back upon the scene, so interested was he in his own narration. "By George!" he said, "we left New York only five weeks ago, and we've done England, Ireland, and Scotland; run through France, and shot up into Denmark; and, of course, did Belgium and Holland; and have come up the Rhine, and been through Switzerland; and now we are putting for Italy over the Gothard. It's awful work, isn't it? Such lots of fleas, and such darned prices every where, and then the infernal lingo, and the money! By George! we whisk along at such a rate into a country and out of it that I don't have time to understand the currency; and I know we're horribly cheated, but I can't stop to find out and set things right; so I rush along, scolding and swearing—I vow I don't do any thing else—and my mind's all in a jumble. It has to be done, of course, but I shall be glad when it's all over."

I asked him where he should stop in Italy.

"Stop!" said he. "Gracious! we don't stop. We go."

"You'll see Florence and Venice, I suppose," added I; "and, of course, Rome?"

"Yes, I suppose Venice 'll have to be done, but," he said—and I thought with a brighter light in his eye, and an air of relief—"but not Rome."

"Not Rome!" I exclaimed.

"No; sha'n't have time. Must be home for the fall trade."

That thought apparently soothed him. He puffed musingly for a moment, and then said:

"No, I've reckoned it to a day; can't go to Rome."

The day was divine; the scene was Switzerland in its most romantic, historic, and beautiful region: but he looked at me instead of the mountains and the lake, puffed steadily, and seemed calmly to defy me to show him how he could possibly see Rome and be at home for the fall trade. I looked at the scene and said nothing. Suddenly he exclaimed, "My wife is aboard. I should like to introduce you, for she's dreadful lonely."

We rose and walked astern, and saw a lady clad in silk, with her eyes fixed listlessly upon the deck.

"Ma, this is a countryman of ours, and we've been talking together." Then, without inquiring my name or imparting his own, he comprehended his wife and me in a common nod, and said, looking at me, "My wife."

I bowed, and remarked that it was a beautiful day to be in so beautiful a spot. The lady raised a pair of weary eyes, and with evident utter carelessness of the scene, replied, "Yes; it's very pretty."

"And you're going to Italy?" I remarked, gayly, and with some enthusiasm.

"Yes, I suppose so," was the response, in a tone of resigned indifference.

"You find traveling a little fatiguing, do you not?" I asked. "If you will allow me to say so, you look a little tired."

"Tired?" exclaimed the lady, with sudden energy, "I should think I was. I am about tuckered out. He"—by which I understood her to mean my smoking companion—"he is driving the journey through, and he hasn't got much time; and so we drive and drive, and it's dreadful. I'm sleepy all the time. I've been asleep most of the way since we landed, because I can't be broke of my rest, and we have to travel nights."

"Do you travel in the night?" I asked.

"Oh yes. You see, he's got to be back in time for the fall trade, and if we don't put along we sha'n't see things."

All this was said with an unsmiling face, and a dry, weary voice, and without a glance at the great beauty of the scene around us. When she was not speaking she looked listlessly upon the deck, evidently in a highly drowsy state. Her whole aspect said so plainly,

"Leave, oh, leave me to repose," that I bowed and moved away with her husband.

"This is beautiful, isn't it?" said I to him.

He looked at the mountains and the water suspiciously, as he might look at the merchandise of a rival seeking to entrap him into an expression of preference; then, rubbing his nose, he replied, "It isn't so fine as Lake George."

"Lake George! Who is speaking of Lake George? That is a beautiful lake, certainly, but isn't this noble, grand?"

With the same wary look, as of a man who had named his very lowest price, from which under no circumstances would he recede, he merely repeated, "It isn't so fine as Lake George."

"But, my dear Sir," I said, "remember that this is Tell's country. There is the chapel; there he leaped ashore; and high up yonder is the mountain pasture, the alp, the field of Rütli, where the oath was sworn. We are in the very heart of the land of romantic tradition. It is for this that we come to Europe."

"Well, it isn't so fine as Lake George, and I don't see why a man should run down his own country only because he's abroad. The fact is, that I feel like standing up for it more than ever when I'm among foreigners. If they want to praise their own country, let 'em; but I sha'n't do it."

"But what did you come to Europe for?"

"Oh! every body has to do it. Every body comes, you know, and you don't want to have to keep saying you haven't been there. I want to see things as well as other folks, but I don't mean to own that they're better than ours at home."

He had lighted another cigar, and had the air of a man who was standing in the pass for his country, and would never yield. I had no thought of assailing his patriotism, and was sitting silently by him, when he said, slowly and inquiringly:

"Tell was the man—who—who—"

"Who shot the apple," said I.

"Oh yes—yes! Exactly! He shot the apple." And my friend shook his head with satisfaction, as if he had joined the broken thread of his reflections. Presently he resumed, colloquially:

"Exactly: Tell was the man who shot the apple—the apple; he shot the apple. Now it's queer, but I sort o' seem to forget about the apple."

I began, and, with the very scene of the tradition around us, I told the story. He listened, and looked several times toward the stern, where his wife was sitting. When the tale was ended he said that it all came back to him now, and if Ma hadn't been asleep he should have asked her to come and listen. "But she's awful tired, poor thing! and she'd better sleep," he compassionately added.

We drew in to the narrow part of the lake, from which the road ascends to the pass of the St. Gothard and over the Alps to Italy. What a land it is! What a perspective of delights and surprises! What a passing from glory to glory! There was the bustle upon the steamer that precedes landing. My friend went to awaken Ma, and to secure his bags and bundles. The boat stopped, and it was time to part.

"It's very lucky I met you," said my new friend, politely. "Good-by, and if ever you come home again, when you are in New York be sure to call. Good-by."

The weary-eyed lady gave me a flabby hand, and to my hope that she would not fatigue herself replied that she should be asleep as soon as they were in the diligence, but that she did not expect to be really rested until she reached home. We shook hands. "I hope you'll be in time for the fall trade," said I to the husband, as we parted. I watched them busily making way through the throng. At last they disappeared, and I never saw them again.

Yet is that true? Have I really never seen them again? My dear Hiram, they are my inseparable fellow-travelers. Upon all the seats around me I see the travelers who are making fierce haste, but without speed. They fly from Dan to Beersheba, but they sleep and scold and fret: they float in the shadow of Pilatus, and see the Alpine field of the men of Rütli and the chapel of William Tell; but they are suspiciously of opinion that Lake George is finer. Their object is not to see Rome or Naples—it is to get home in time for the fall trade. They make haste, but they do not get abroad. My dear Hiram, if you have but half an hour to read, don't begin Gibbon; and if you must be at home for the fall trade, don't try to run over the whole of Europe.

Yours,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE VEST-BASQUE COSTUME.

THE Vest-Basque costume, illustrated on our first page, is a stylish suit for the present demi-season, and, with an additional wrap, will be worn in midwinter. The simple drapery of the over-skirt renders this design as suitable for poplins and velours as for softer fabrics. The novelty of the basque is its jacket front with revers disclosing a vest with rounded front. The basque meets over the vest at the throat, slopes away gracefully, and at the waist is turned up to form a triangular revers. A collar pointed somewhat in the Shakspeare style is made of velvet or silk of the color of the trimming. The vest, fitted by darts, covers the entire front of the body, and is sewed in at the shoulders, arm-holes, and under the arms, holding the back of the corsage in position. It is buttoned from the throat to the point, but is often worn open below the waist. It is not sharply pointed, but curves to a point. The back of the basque has a seam down the centre; postilion pleats give added fullness under this seam and under that of the side form.

Digitized by Google

The graceful over-skirt is of medium length, with a gored front breadth, a side gore, and one or more straight breadths, according to the wearer's preference for straight or bouffant skirts. Tapes under the belt are tied to others on the skirt below, and catch up the skirt in the simple drapery shown in the engraving. The back of the skirt is left open at the bottom about a third of its length, and trimmed around the opening. The lower skirt is of comfortable walking length, which to our taste is just escaping the floor.

The trimming is a gathered flounce of the same and braiding in narrow soutache (plain silk braid), either of the same or a darker shade than the dress, or else black. Ladies' cloth, velours, poplin, empress cloth, merino, and delaine suits are made after this model. The subdued gray called London smoke is braided with black; sailor blue and cypress green also look well with black; brown requires a darker shade of brown.

BONNETS.

The display of bonnets at the leading milliners' confirms suggestions gathered at the wholesale houses. The shapes are the high empire gypsy, and a closer cottage shape coming down longer at the sides. They are larger than last season's bonnets, have very large crowns, broad head band, and a rolling front to display full face trimming. The effect, viewed from the sides and front, is very high; the back is drooping, finished by loops of ribbon that fall to the shoulders. The materials, a mixture of velvet, royale, and faille, cover the frame plainly; bindings, cords, or tiny folds define the outlines; two tones of a color, or else two materials of the same shade, appear in many bonnets, while others have charming contrasts, to be mentioned hereafter. Faille ribbon, either No. 12 or 16, is twisted around the head piece, falls in two loops behind, and forms strings over a yard long to tie under the chin.

The feature of the season in trimming is short ostrich feathers, two, and often three, being placed rampant on the crown; occasionally pompons, aigrettes, and ostrich tufts appear. Lace and flowers are no longer used in profusion, at least two-thirds of the bonnets depending upon feathers and ribbons alone for trimming. Ribbon is twisted, laid in folds, or made into rosettes, the latter taking the place of bows.

It remains a law of costumes that the bonnet must match the dress in color, or else be of black velvet, with feathers and faille trimmings of the shade of the dress. This brings colored velvets into vogue again. Black velvet, however, is still the midwinter bonnet. For elderly ladies jet diamonds of many carved facets, feathers, and pompons trim black velvet; for young faces it is made very lovely by association with faille facings and ostrich tips of palest becoming tints; for instance, one called the Louise is of black velvet, with palest pink faille quilled on the rolling front, and pink revers on the side, fastened back to a rosette on the crown. Two little pink ostrich tips complete the bonnet. Long black strings. Another youthful-looking bonnet of black velvet has delicate Nile green cording, hanging loops, and feathers. One of Virot's black velvets for an older lady has the velvet plain on the frame, with faille cords on every seam, faille ribbon folded around the head piece, roses with trailing buds behind, jet facets in front, black tulle ruche over the forehead, and the lace draperies at the side that passée faces can not well dispense with. Another black bonnet, the most costly of the season, marked $90, has for face trimming a band of finest black ostrich feathers, a rosette of black faille being placed on the right side amidst the soft feathers. The material is plain velvet; the trimming three pale pink tips and an aigrette. A long scarf of lace passes around the neck.

Among dark bonnets to match suits is a French model of olive brown. The soft crown, large enough for high-dressed hair to go inside it comfortably, is of olive faille: the smooth front is darker brown velvet; a faille scarf is carelessly folded around the head piece; brown ostrich feather with a dark-shaded wing at the side. Velvet strings. A cypress green velvet called the Peru has a soft pleated crown of Nile green faille: price $35. A plum-colored velvet from Virot's has pale blue strings, and blue ribbons knotted carelessly around the crown.

All bonnets for street and church are of the dark or black shades just mentioned. Dress bonnets for receptions, ceremonious visiting, and for opera are of the palest tints possible. Loveliest among these is a velvet of the new salmon pink, almost covered by a long ostrich feather, salmon shaded to brown: price $55. Royale bonnets of palish paon green, sky blue, and rose are shown, with faille ribbons and ostrich feathers of the same shade. A marvelously beautiful gypsy marked $85 is of pale rose velours, with a ruche of Malines (old-fashioned thread lace) around the crown, and a white marabout feather across the front.

Though contrary to the established rule of the season, some of the most distinguished-looking bonnets show contrasts in color. One of these colors must be that of the costume; the other, a gayer hue, matches the jewelry worn or the tie at the throat. Daintiest among these is the Edith, a soft shape, made like a baby's bonnet, without a frame. It is pale Indienne blue royale, with a ruche of Valenciennes lace on the front, and two ostrich feathers, one blue, the other faintest pink, on the crown. This is for receptions, to be worn with blue silk, or black velvet, with pink coral ornaments. The bonnet costs $50. A rose-colored velours veiled in rose tulle has loops of darkest leaf brown faille ribbon, with rose and brown tips. A pale ciel blue has merely a few brown leaves and tips for trimming. Indeed, brown is found in contrast with almost every shade. Red plum and blue plum are both found with blue facings, the lightest blue making prettiest contrast. The newest contrasts are pale blue with scarabee; garnet with lavender; chair, or flesh-color, a soft yellow-pink, with gray; dark green with Indienne blue; pink with brown; rose and plum color; cuir and violet.

ROUND HATS.

Regulation round hats have high, broad crowns, with rolled turban brim, or else pointed back and front, with only the sides rolled. A single broad band of bias velvet passes straight around the crown, and hangs behind; the brim is faced with velvet; ostrich tips nod over the crown from behind, or else a long plume, with the wing or shaded throat of a bird, ornaments the left side.

More dressy round hats are among the novelties brought out at the late openings. First is the Torreador, a high, soft-crowned turban, with closely rolled brim, and a large rosette on the left side, above which plumes nod over the crown. Most striking among these is one of Indienne blue velvet, with flesh-colored ribbon around the crown, and ostrich tips of the two colors: price $30. A most picturesque hat, called the Robespierre, attracts attention next. It is of black velvet, with a round crown, while the brim, much wider in front than behind, rolls upward above the forehead. A crimson rose-bud and leaves peer out from beneath the brim, and long cock's plumes ornament the left side. Price $60. Next this wicked-looking chapeau is the softest puffed-crown turban of black velvet, with a tiny rolled brim covered with pale blue plush; an ostrich band surrounds the crown. A similar shape, of cypress green velvet, has a band of peacock's feathers, with the eye of each feather showing; a rose-colored velvet turban has darkest brown cock's feathers; a cuir-colored velvet has facings of violet faille.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co., LORD & TAYLOR; and JAMES M'CREERY & Co.

LADIES' FALL TOILETTES.

See Illustration on first page.

Fig. 1.—VEST-BASQUE WALKING SUIT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). This graceful French walking suit is of steel blue cashmere, prettily braided with black soutache, and trimmed with a ruffle and folds of the material. The pattern is furnished in nine sizes, even numbers, from 30 to 46 inches bust measure. The size is taken by passing a tape measure entirely around the body, under the arms, across the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the bust.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises three articles, viz.: vest-basque, over-skirt, and six-gored walking skirt.

VEST-BASQUE.—This pattern is in six pieces—front, side piece, back, vest front, sleeve, and collar. The vest is sewed with the front of the basque into the seams on the shoulder and under the arm, and is closely fitted with cross basque seams, and two darts at each side of the middle of the front. The lower edge is sloped from each seam under the arm at the waist line to a round point in front, and the basque is turned back on each side to form revers. The vest is closed the entire length with buttons and button-holes. The basque has one dart on each side in front, side backs, and a seam in the middle of the back. The side backs are cut with extra fullness at the waist line, and are laid in four small pleats on the under side. The neck is finished with a collar, as shown in the illustration, and closed at the throat with a bow. The half-flowing sleeve is sewed plainly into the armhole, and is left open at the bottom on the outer seam to the notch. Put the pattern together by the notches. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulder and under the arms, and the cross basque seams, and where to take up the darts in the front of the vest and basque, to turn back the skirt of the basque to form revers, and to cut out the under part of the sleeve. All seams are allowed, an outlet of an inch being given for the seams on the shoulder and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all other seams. Baste up, and try on wrong side out before sewing.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 4 yards.
Extra for trimming, 1½ yards.
Buttons, 10.

OVER-SKIRT.—This elegant apron-front over-skirt is remarkable for the gracefulness of its shape and drapery. The pattern is in three pieces—half of front, side gore, and half of back. The front is laid in one side pleat on each side of the middle, turning toward the back. The side gores and back breadths are gathered and sewed to the belt. Three tapes tacked to the belt—one in the middle, and two about two inches back of the seams of the side gores—and fastened to the perforations in the skirt, drape the garment gracefully. The middle tape is thirteen inches, and the side tapes each eight inches long. The back breadth is left open at the middle. Put the pattern together by the notches.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 4½ yards.
Extra for trimming, 2½ yards.

SIX-GORED WALKING SKIRT. This pattern is cut with a front gore, two side gores, and a straight breadth for the back. Only half the pattern is given. Gather the back and one side gore and sew to the belt. Put the pattern together by the notches.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7 yards.
Extra for trimming, 4 yards.

Fig. 2.—CRAPE AND SILK WALKING SUIT. This elegant combination is one of the kind lately described by Madame Emmeline Raymond as so much in vogue in Paris. Under-skirt of black silk, trimmed with folds and pleated ruches of black crape. Over-skirt of black crape, trimmed with two folds and a ruche of the same material, and draped at the back and sides. High waist, with long sleeves of black silk, covered with black crape, and trimmed with crape folds and ruches.

Fig. 3.—SILK AND CASHMERE HOUSE DRESS. Under-skirt of black silk, trimmed with folds of the material. Over-skirt and basque of light gray cashmere, trimmed with black silk folds and white lace covered with black lace.

PERSONAL.

MR. CYRUS H. M'CORMICK, the MOWING-machine man, after having given $75,000 to the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of Chicago, has within a few days past endowed the "C. H. M'Cormick Theological Chair" with $45,000, and added $15,000 to the three other chairs. May he reap a thousandfold the reward due to deeds so liberal!

—Mrs. A. D. RICHARDSON, dissociating books from stationery, has adopted the sale of the latter, in Chicago, as a means by which to obtain those necessaries and comforts of life which seem to be desiderated by the American female.

—Useless for the American belle to cast wistful glances at the coming Grand Duke. That young man is engaged to the Prussian Princess MARY ELIZABETH, daughter of Prince FREDERICK CHARLES, nephew of the Emperor of Germany. That matter is settled.

—The TICHBORNE claimant is lion of largest mane in England, with long tail of followers wherever he goes. Managers of theatres invite him to accept boxes. Traders run him down; but it doesn't seem to trouble him. His face is fat and ruddy, and he is in continual good-humor. No restraint is placed upon his movements, but private detectives watch him as ye cat watcheth ye little mouse

—Mr. SMALLEY writes from London to the Tribune about the great strike, that it still continues, and that "it is useless to fight against the trades unions."

—ARISTARCHUS CHAMPION, of Rochester, died a few days since in that city at the age of ninety. Forty years ago he started a line of stages from Buffalo to Albany, called the "Pioneer Line." It was run in the interests of the temperance cause. Teetotal drivers were employed, and stops for refreshment were only made at temperance hotels. After a vigorous and partially successful opposition to the "Old Line," the project was abandoned; but the "Old Line" was soon jostled off by the locomotive.

—That man and poet, JOHN G. SAXE, has just commenced his annual parade before the lyceums of what is conventionally understood to be the West, having sixty engagements in that region. Sixty at $100 is $6000.

—Dr. PATTON, of Utica, at the recent anniversary of the Oneida Baptist Association, did this: A minister old enough to be gray, but with raven locks and beard, offered several resolutions touching questions of reform. Dr. PATTON saw no objection to them, but he wished the one on the use of tobacco might be followed by one deprecating the use of hair-dye.

—Persons of position, pecuniary as well as intellectual, have taken to the lathe. Rev. Dr. TODD, of Pittsfield, Massachusetts, has attained eminence as a turner, and we learn from one of "Barry Gray's" compositions that Mr. WILLIAM H. ASPINWALL, distinguished in the mercantile world, also emulates the fame of the Pittsfield divine.

—Mr. CORCORAN, of Washington, has added $100,000 more to the munificent gifts which are to carry his name to posterity in Washington. He sells a square of ground to the city for that sum, and then gives the money to the Art Gallery.

—HENRY YOUNG, Esq., of Sing Sing, has carried into execution a beautiful idea of his—that of endowing a professorship in the Union Theological Seminary at Hampden Sidney, Virginia, by the gift of $30,000.

—Long JOHN WENTWORTH, of Chicago, received a visit of sympathy a few days since from a reporter of that city. He was found to be suffering from several feet of lumbago.

—THIERS has dictated most of his works to a German named JACOB GROSCH, who has been his amanuensis for forty years.

—Elder EVANS, the Shaker, who is just now shaking up the curiosity-loving people of London, on being asked the other day which were the qualities most appreciated in the females at Lebanon, replied, "The woman who maketh a good pudding is always more valued by us than she who maketh a tart reply."

—The Bishop of Manchester, England, is a prelate whom we can approve to all lady readers of the Bazar. At a tea-party lately given to the employés of a railway at Bolton he concluded a speech as follows: "Might he venture to say, in all seriousness, one simple word to sweethearts? Let him ask them to make their sweethearting consistent with Christian purity here; do let him say, in the second place, girls, don't you take up with any young fellow just because he has a sprightly tongue or a dashing manner. If you don't think he is likely to make you a good husband, don't have him. Before you take to a young man, see that he is worth taking to. And he would say to the young men, don't be caught by the prettiest face or the smartest dress. Look out for a lass who will make you happy at home, and who, if she can not make the calico to sew on to the buttons, will know how to make a shirt and stitch the buttons on." (Applause.)

—LOUIS NAPOLEON'S horses, sixteen in number, have recently been sold at auction, and brought prices which Mr. BONNER, or Commodore VANDERBILT, or Mr. JEROME, or scores of men who air themselves on Harlem Lane, would regard as contemptible for a tolerable roadster. The whole lot brought only $7808—an average of $488. The best animal brought only $810. The French papers consider these as excellent prices. With us they would be regarded as the minimum.

—The gentlemen conspicuous for wealth in this city are becoming somewhat conspicuous for age, though all continue in the active pursuit of gold-getting. Mr. WILLIAM B. ASTOR is nearly seventy-eight; Mr. ALEXANDER T. STEWART, seventy; Mr. VANDERBILT, seventy-eight; DANIEL DREW, seventy-one; PETER COOPER, seventy-nine; GEORGE LAW, seventy-three. Acting upon the sound physiological maxim that agreeable occupation is promotive of longevity, they propose to wear out rather than rust out.

—Madame RISTORI, having few worlds left to conquer, proposes soon to delight the eyes of the people who dwell in the Danubian Principalities—Bucharest, Galatz, Odessa, and such. She continues in full force.

—Mr. CHARLES THOMAS, organist of a parish church in Rye, England, for sixty years, has been absent from his post only two Sundays in all that time.

—W. H. CUYLER HOSMER, one of the truest poets of Western New York, and one of the best men, has been appointed by Governor HOFFMAN county clerk in Livingston County, to fill a vacancy.

—Prince HUMBERT, heir to the throne of Italy, is traveling in Spain in incognito of the most comical sort. Recently when the train on which he was traveling reached Villalba the persons who expected him, among them his brother, naturally approached the first-class carriages; but instead of finding him here, the prince, in a striped shirt and sooty face and hands, stepped lightly from the locomotive, and threw himself upon the bosom of the King of Spain. The manœuvre was regarded in the light of un grande chose.

—Hon. JAMES BROOKS is writing to the Express very pleasant letters from Japan. A lady of his party, who was fortunate enough to gain admission to the boudoir of a Japanese lady, took stock of it as follows: Little or no furniture, no chairs, no bedstead—nothing but mats to sleep on. A toilette-box was on the floor, near the wall—about the only article of furniture in the room. In this box there were five drawers and two lacquer basins on top. In the top drawer of this box there was a metallic mirror, like our hand-glasses. In the second drawer she kept her powder, paint, wax, brush, tooth-powder and brush. Two little drawers came next; in one she had her false hair, and in the other fancy pins, gilt paper, and other fixings for her hair. In the lower drawer was her pillow, which is placed under the neck when sleeping on the mats, so as to prevent the hair from being rumpled. It is made of wood, and covered with paper on the top. The powder looks like starch, and when they use it they mix a little water with it, and rub it in like paste; and they have two brushes that they use to rub it off with. The paint looks green, and turns red when put on the lips and cheeks.

—Something more about BISMARCK, by a gentleman who has had the fortune to inspect his dwelling-place. The house is only one story high, and with only twelve windows, without shutters, on the street. Not the smallest architectural ornament is visible, and the whole front is whitewashed, which gives it a poor and indigent appearance. BISMARCK'S study is on the ground-floor—a square, low room, with a square table near the window, and a square elbow-chair of dark stamped leather before it. "I observed," he says, "that although the leather was well worn at the sides and elbows, the back was bright and new, showing plainly that it is not the owner's custom to lounge or lean his head against it. A deep mahogany book-case stands against the wall. I had the curiosity to run my eye along the shelves, and among the German books there placed, found HEPWORTH DIXON'S 'Young America,' and LECKEY'S 'Rationalism,' besides one or two English works of lesser note. Montaigne was there, one volume missing. A cheap Leyden edition of Rabelais, and, Heaven save the mark! four thin volumes in half-binding of Paul de Kock. Who would have thought it? the work of all others, 'La Pucelle de Belleville.' A square carpet lies under the square table, bearing evidence of being much rubbed by square-toed boots. There are no muslin curtains to the windows. The servant says that BISMARCK'S constant habit, when writing on serious matters, is to start suddenly up from the table, and, pen in hand, walk to the window, where he will stand and watch the passers-by, and even laugh outright at any comical figure that may pass in the street, then quietly return to the table and continue writing. It is thought that this habit is owing to sudden dimness of sight, but he has never owned to suffering from his eyes."

—Of Count BEUST, the premier of Austria, a biographer tells the following curious story: The father of the chancellor was so pleased at the birth of his child that he presented the nurse with a dozen bottles of the oldest Rhine wine in his cellar. The woman, who was an ignorant peasant, not knowing the proper use of the beverage, concluded it was for washing the infant. She accordingly used it for that purpose, and he almost died in consequence of the treatment; but when the nurse learned of the misunderstanding she at once predicted for her charge a great future. For a long time the little BEUST had to contend against great irritability of temper, produced by the bath.

—Sir WALTER SCOTT is said to have composed at Abbotsford in 1828, for a young clerical friend, two sermons, and now the Rev. ROBERT THOMPSON, an English clergyman, proposes shortly to preach those sermons, which are now very scarce—nearly out of print.

—VICTOR HUGO proposes again to satirize the French people in a book entitled "L'Armée Terrible," in which the work of the French army with the Germans, and its crowning glory with the Commune, are to be ridiculed and exposed.

—It is the common remark of persons who are familiar with court talk abroad that the Count de Paris is admitted to be the dullest by far of the Orleans princes. His favorite occupation is smoking strong cigars, drinking ale, and reading novels; he has no powers whatever as a conversationalist, and it is difficult for strangers to get more than "yes" and "no" out of him. His uncles, except old Nemours, who is not a brilliant man either, are thoroughly disgusted with him, and already, previous to the death of old Queen AMÉLIE, they were said to entertain very seriously the idea of forcing the count to abandon his claims as head of the Orleans dynasty. At all events, some time ago the Count de Paris was deprived by his relatives of his functions as administrator of the funds jointly belonging to the family. The leading Orleanists in France, too, well aware, as they are, that the count is an indolent and dull man, would by far prefer to see the Duke d'Aumale on the throne of France.

Digitized by Google

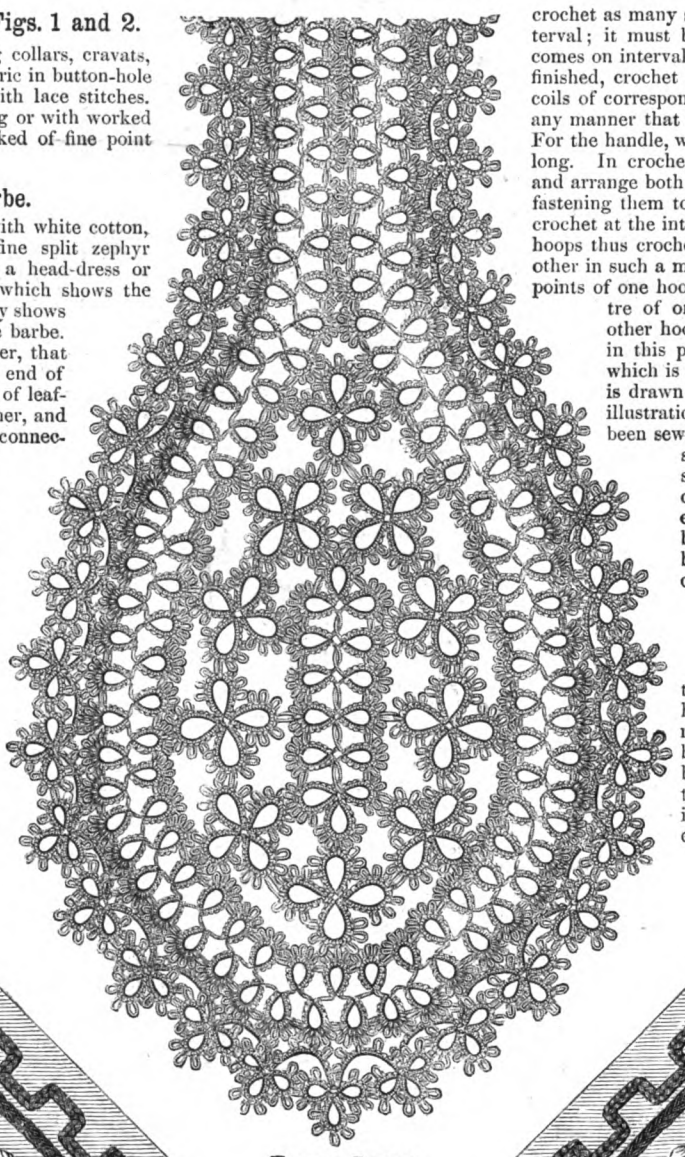
Tatted, Needle-work, and Point Lace Rosettes, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE pretty rosettes are especially adapted for trimming collars, cravats, etc. Work the rosette, Fig. 1, on fine Swiss muslin or cambric in button-hole and half-polka stitch, and fill the inner open-work parts with lace stitches. Edge the circle in the centre and the outer edge with tatting or with worked button-hole stitches and picots. The rosette, Fig. 2, is worked of fine point lace braid with button-hole and lace stitches.

Fig. 1.—NEEDLE-WORK AND TATTED ROSETTE.

Tatted Barbe.

THIS barbe is worked with white cotton, black saddler's silk, or fine split zephyr worsted, and is used for a head-dress or cravat. The illustration, which shows the lower end in full size, plainly shows the manner of working the barbe. It is to be observed, however, that for the middle part of the end of the barbe the oblong band of leaflets turned toward each other, and the four-leaved figures in connection with this, must be worked first. To make the band, first work the leaflets on one side with one shuttle as usual, and for the leaflets on the other wind the thread on a short netting needle, in order to ble to slip it through the joining thread of the finished ts, as shown by the illustration. The border of the , consisting of scallops and three-leaved figures, is d with two threads.



TATTED BARBE.

rner of Border for Table-Covers, Cashmere carfs, etc.—Application and Satin Stitch Embroidery.

THIS border is worked with bright colors on light f a t this n satin ustration;

point Russe or and with a silk. The latter titch edging of the res, and for the inner worked in darker col-of these figures apply a a contrasting color. The manner of executing the re-

CORNER OF BORDER FOR TABLE-COVERS, CASHMERE SCARFS, ETC.—APPLICATION AND SATIN STITCH EMBROIDERY.

Work-Basket.

ion on page 645.

y designed for fancy-work or small toid with a brush and soap and water. It gle crochet and picots on a foundation of of the basket are worked in connection.
and work in coil windings, which must ow wider gradually, so that the basket is e work is formed by the picots; the lat-fasten the coils to each other. Crochet and work one single crochet on each of the next winding. The design formed illustration. As the design in the bot-ve corners, five picots must, of course, beginning of the work also; each of gle crochet. In the course of the work crochet as many single crochet between the picots as are necessary to fill the interval; it must be observed, however, that the same number of stitches also comes on intervals of the same size. When the crochet-work for the basket is finished, crochet in a similar manner for the stand of the latter on three cane coils of corresponding width, transposing the picots required for the joining in any manner that may be desired. Sew this stand to the bottom of the basket. For the handle, work in single crochet on two cane hoops each forty-eight inches long. In crocheting on the second half of each hoop bend it together in half, and arrange both halves in waved windings, fastening them together by means of single crochet at the intersecting points. The two hoops thus crocheted are then laid on each other in such a manner that the intersecting points of one hoop always come in the centre of one of the windings of the other hoop; in order to keep them in this position a blue silk ribbon, which is sewed to the first winding, is drawn through, as shown by the illustration. When the handle has been sewed to the basket, cover the seam with two bows of blue silk ribbon, and set a ruche of the same on the outer edge of the basket as shown by the illustration. The basket may also be bronzed, or covered with red varnish.

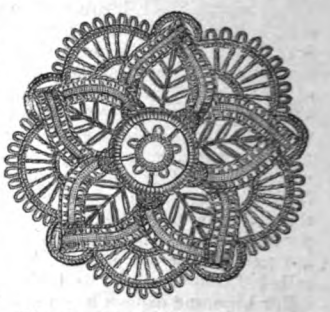

Fig. 2.—NEEDLE-WORK AND POINT LACE ROSETTE.

Corner of Border in Guipure Embroidery.

See illustration on page 645.

THIS border may be used for ornamenting handkerchiefs, tidies, etc. It is worked on cambric or Swiss muslin in button-hole and lace stitch in the manner that is familiar to our readers. Work the button-hole stitch bars before button-hole stitching the outer edges.

Poplin Walking Suit, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 645.

WALKING-suit of heavy Irish poplin in two shades of gray. A wide gathered flounce, cut in points, is set on the skirt, and the seam made by doing this is covered by two wide overlapping folds. The over-skirt, which is draped at the sides and the back, and the tight-fitting paletot with heart-shaped neck, are trimmed with plain bias strips cut in points, and folds, as shown by the illustration. The bias strips and folds are of a darker shade of the material. The front of the paletot is finished with trimming of the darker shade.

HOW MARRIAGES ARE MANAGED IN GERMANY.

THE trousseau, furnished by the bride's parents, consists chiefly of linen, both household and body linen, generally sufficient to last a lifetime, and adapted to the rank and means of the bride. Thus the rich mother buys what is best and finest in the shops, the less rich one buys up gradually, years before the occasion, good, strong, household linen, carefully kept in lavender, and cut up and sewed by the girl herself when her marriage is settled. The poorer classes do the same, beginning almost at the birth of the girl, and the peasant woman grows or buys her flax, spins it herself, and lays by a provision of strong linen, durable as sail-cloth, for her daughter, as her mother and grandmother did before her. Next the jewelry. This is invariably the present of the bridegroom. He presents to his betrothed the ornaments suited to the rank and station he intends to place her in. It is, therefore, always appropriate. The rich man presents his pearls and diamonds, the less rich one his pretty gold ornaments, the simple artisan his plain gold brooch with a lock of his hair at the back, to be worn by his loving wife solemnly on grand occasions to the end of her days, and at the end bequeathed affectionately to some loved individual as her best treasure. The wedding dress is likewise properly graduated. From the serviceable black silk of the artisan's wife it ascends through all shades of usefulness—brown, dark blue, gray, light gray, to the simple white taffetas, and the costly white moiré antique. This constitutes no class difference; every woman chooses naturally the sort of gown which her friends and relations have chosen in their turn, and the wedding gown, like the one chosen by the Vicar of Wakefield's wife, is as useful as any other article of the trousseau. Besides this, the prudent "middle-class" mother carefully puts into a little purse the pieces of gold provided by the "governor" for another pretty gown, and gives it to the bride for by-and-by, when it is wanted, when the wedding clothes are soiled, and the young matron does not wish to wear the old-fashioned things of her trousseau. Now for the wedding gifts. I confess I have heard many a sigh and a grumble about them. The first principle is that the gifts are for the "young household," not for the young lady. Accordingly they are invariably adapted to the rank, station, and means of the young couple, and arranged on a preconcerted plan, so that duplicates are impossible, yet every giver's means and individual tastes are duly regarded. Thus, if the two grandpapas give the splendid silver urn and magnificent table ornament, Uncle John presents his massive silver knives and forks and spoons; Uncle Ferdinand Albert his filigree fruit-basket; other uncles, aunts, cousins the indispensable silver tea-pot, sugar-basin, cream-jug; the poor relation the pretty little silver salt-cellars. The result is that, as all is well considered and well fitted together, the young people start in life with a well-fitted house, prettier and more valuable than would be the case if provided by themselves alone, and ready to answer in their turn the call upon them in the course of time for the grand tea-pot or silver salt-cellar. Thus it is in all grades. The Uncle John of less rich families presents his simpler silver plate, and Uncle Ferdinand Albert his pretty but useful lamp or gilt-edged tea or dinner service; humbler and humbler still, the articles are still less showy, but always useful and durable, for, from the richest to the poorest household, the wedding gifts are ever preserved, valued, and exhibited, from pride, or vanity, or affection; and no giver objects to see his gift treasured for life as the wedding gift which is to last a life. Indeed, in a country where the washing-day comes but twice a year, we may imagine that a very large stock of linen is needed. In compensation for the rare occurrence of this family festival, it stretches over a period of a fortnight. The Germans disdain people who wash every week, and think that they must be sadly straitened for clothing.

Digitized by Google

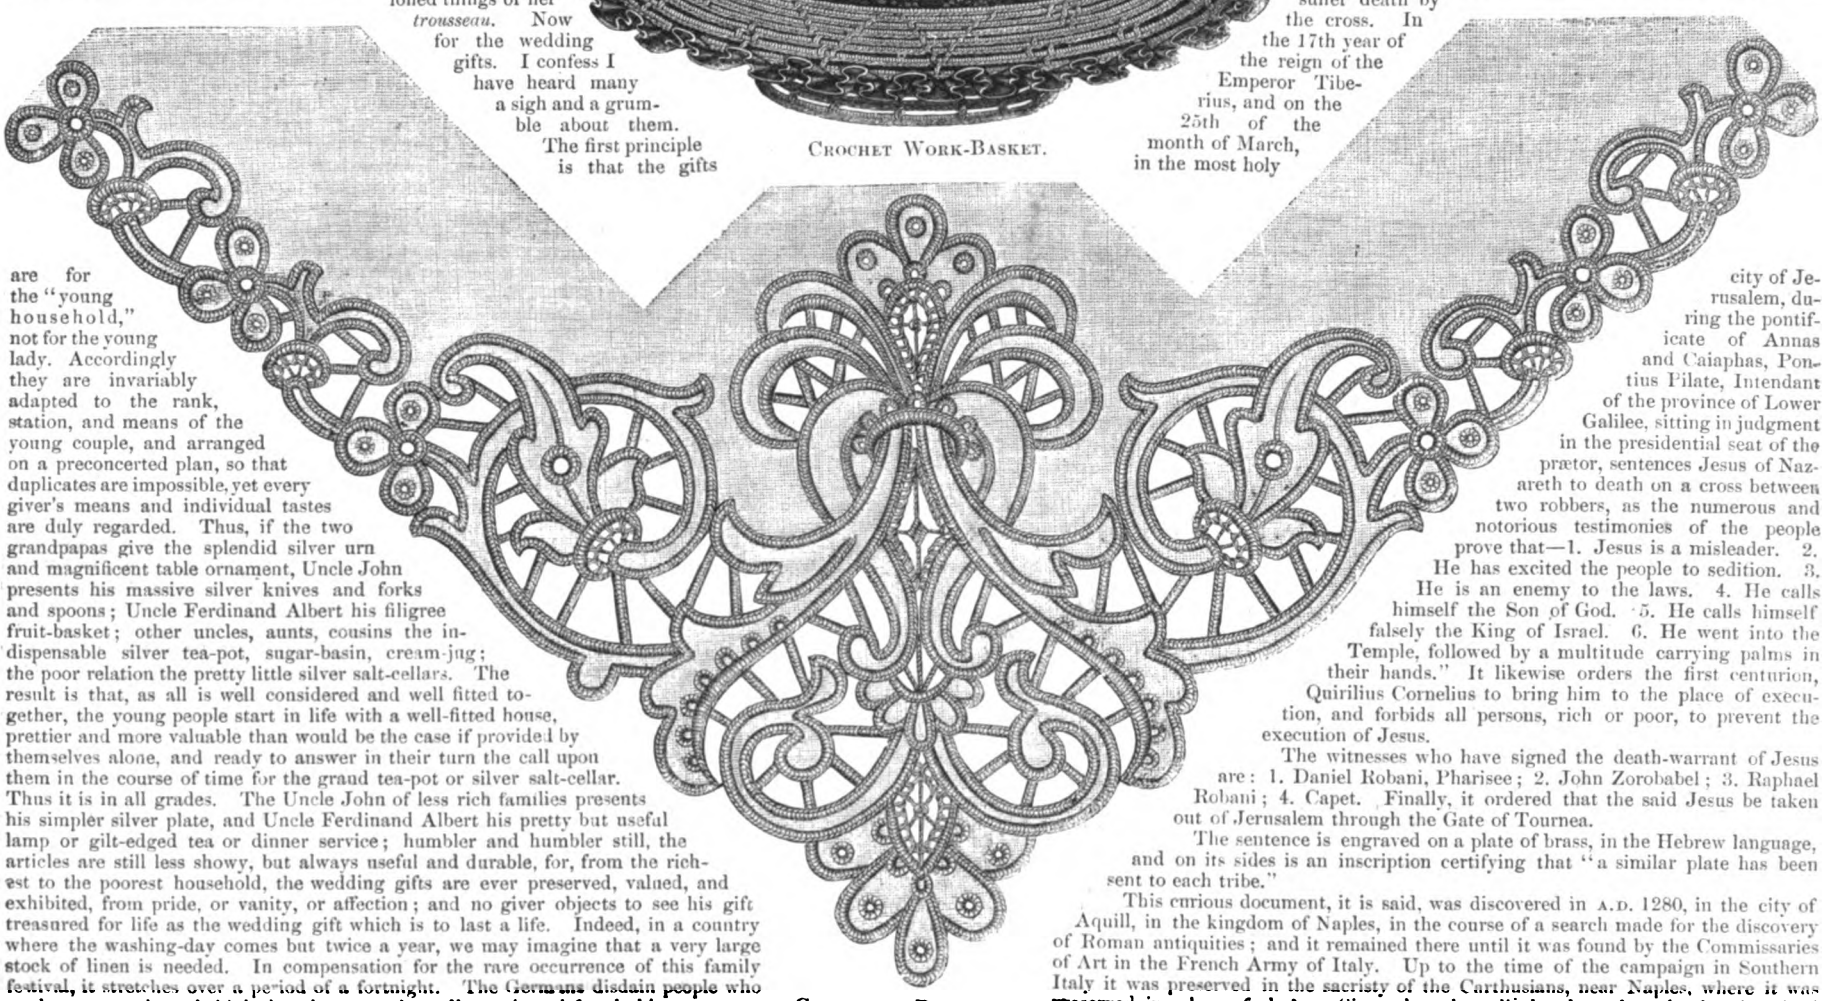
CROCHET WORK-BASKET.



CORNER OF BORDER IN GUIPURE EMBROIDERY.

THE SENTENCE OF PONTIUS PILATE.

WE have lately had submitted to us a newspaper paragraph, of uncertain date, headed, "A Curious Relic," and giving what ought, if genuine, to be a document of great and surpassing interest to every member of Christendom, recording, as it does, the actual sentence of death which was passed by Pontius Pilate, as the Roman Governor of Judæa, upon the Saviour of mankind. The cutting states that it is a "correct transcript of the most memorable judicial sentence which has ever been uttered by judicial lips in the annals of the world." It has appeared in the Kolnische Zeitung; but, apart from German papers, we do not know that it has ever appeared in an English form.

The sentence itself runs as follows:

"Sentence pronounced by Pontius Pilate, Intendant of the province of Lower Galilee, that Jesus of Nazareth shall suffer death by the cross. In the 17th year of the reign of the Emperor Tiberius, and on the 25th of the month of March, in the most holy city of Jerusalem, during the pontificate of Annas and Caiaphas, Pontius Pilate, Intendant of the province of Lower Galilee, sitting in judgment in the presidential seat of the prætor, sentences Jesus of Nazareth to death on a cross between two robbers, as the numerous and notorious testimonies of the people prove that—1. Jesus is a misleader. 2. He has excited the people to sedition. 3. He is an enemy to the laws. 4. He calls himself the Son of God. 5. He calls himself falsely the King of Israel. 6. He went into the Temple, followed by a multitude carrying palms in their hands." It likewise orders the first centurion, Quirilius Cornelius to bring him to the place of execution, and forbids all persons, rich or poor, to prevent the execution of Jesus.

The witnesses who have signed the death-warrant of Jesus are: 1. Daniel Robani, Pharisee; 2. John Zorobabel; 3. Raphael Robani; 4. Capet. Finally, it ordered that the said Jesus be taken out of Jerusalem through the Gate of Tournea.

The sentence is engraved on a plate of brass, in the Hebrew language, and on its sides is an inscription certifying that "a similar plate has been sent to each tribe."

This curious document, it is said, was discovered in A.D. 1280, in the city of Aquill, in the kingdom of Naples, in the course of a search made for the discovery of Roman antiquities; and it remained there until it was found by the Commissaries of Art in the French Army of Italy. Up to the time of the campaign in Southern Italy it was preserved in the sacristy of the Carthusians, near Naples, where it was preserved in a box of ebony. Since then the relic has been kept in the chapel of Caserta. The Carthusians obtained, by petition, leave that the plate might be kept by them, as an acknowledgment of the sacrifices which they made for the French army. The French translation was made literally by members of the Commission of

Fig. 1.—POPLIN WALKING DRESS.—FRONT.

Fig. 2.—POPLIN WALKING DRESS.—BACK.

Digitized by Google

ɜ end, on
There to the ɔvious ɔe cor-ɜ Gosworth ɔe that ɜ genu-

stream,

ɜn meet,
part.

ɜams
Love,
ɜ!

n; but I—ɪeed?

ove

ped a note:
more.

hare,
sive throb ir.

e, glory throws
ys.

F ARDEN.

ɔON,
S SECRET," ETC.

XIX.

ARDEN.

ɔther—a long letter,
ss, with loving mesɪven for the wife who
She enclosed three emained to her of a
oh, how bitterly she travagances that had so low a condition!
er she came to a stand-stin to write to her, to himself, his hopes, his
; when it came to the tter from him she was day of her married life showing all her letters
, just as she had shown had very rarely taken ɜm, by-the-way. But d his wife's letters, and ld be submitted to him.
to reserve from him any me to her in the common ugh not given to secrecy, n to be secret. After con-she told her brother to er to her maid, Jane Tar-
The girl seemed a good,
Granger believed that she Arden a day or two after-nger returned with rapture nander-in-chief of the mod-rtinet ever struck more ter-of rank and file than did this the simple minds of her prize e-stricken by the knowledge ad flourished and tin tea-keting her absence. There was complaint, however, when she ote of warning had been sound-of the Court, and there had ɜrubbing and cleaning in the Arden—that particular Arden ger had built for himself, and ereof ought to have been stamp-and titles, as in the case of Neb-of Nabopolassar, King of Bab-ɜk before Miss Granger's coming he sound of the splashing of inof water, and the scrubbing of ɔing-brushes; windows had been highest degree of transparency; ad been sand-papered until they er; there had been quite a run ɜe chandler for mottled soap and rigorous inspection, Miss Granger express her approval—not an un-ɔval, by any means. Too much have demoralized the Ardenites, ɪe standard of perfection.

ɜe able to say that my papa's village
t village in England," she said;
e cleanest, but the cleanest. Why ɪed the back of that tea-kettle to . Binks? I'm afraid it's smoky.

Now there never need be a smoky kettle. Your place looks very nice, Mrs. Binks; but from the strong smell of soap, I fancy it must have been cleaned very lately. I hope you have not been neglecting things while I've been away. That sort of thing would militate against your obtaining my prize for domestic cleanliness next Christmas."

Mrs. Binks did not know what "militate" meant, unless it might be something in connection with the church militant, of which she had heard a great deal; but she was not a mild-tempered woman, and she grew very red in the face at this reproof.

"Well, miss, if to toil and scrub early and late, with a husband and five children to do for, and to keep the place pretty much as you see it now, though I don't say as it ain't a little extry, perhaps, in honor of your coming back—if that ain't hard work and cleanliness, and don't deserve a prize of two pound at the year's end, I don't know what do. It's hard-earned money, Miss Granger, when all's said and done."

Sophia turned the eyes of reproof upon Mrs. Binks.

"I did not think it was the money you cared for," she said; "I thought it was the honor you valued most."

She pointed to a card framed and glazed over the mantel-piece—a card upon which, with many flourishes and fat initial letters in red ink, the model school-master had recorded the fact that Mrs. Binks, at the preceding Christmas distributions, had obtained Miss Granger's annual reward for domestic cleanliness.

"Well, of course, miss, I set store by the card. It's nice to see one's name wrote out like that, and any strangers as chance to come in the summer-time, they takes notice; but to a hard-working man's wife two pound is a consideration. I'm sure I beg your parding humbly, miss, if I spoke a bit short just now; but it is trying, when one has worked hard, to have one's work found fault with."

"I am not aware that I found fault with your work, Mrs. Binks," Sophia replied, with supreme dignity; "I merely remarked that it appeared to have been done hastily. I don't approve of spasmodic industry."

And with this last crushing remark Miss Granger sailed out of the cottage, leaving the luckless Mrs. Binks to repent her presumption at leisure, and to feel that she had hazarded her hopes of Christmas bounties, and enhanced the chances of her detested rival of three doors off, Mrs. Trotter, a sanctimonious widow, with three superhuman children, who never had so much as a spot on their pinafores, and were far in advance of the young Binkses in Kings and Chronicles: indeed, the youngest Trotter had been familiar with all the works of Hezekiah before the eldest Binks had grasped the abstract idea of Saul.

For Clarissa the change to Arden Court was a pleasant one. That incessant succession of London gayeties had wearied her beyond measure. Here, for a little time before her visitors began to arrive, she lived her own life, dreaming away a morning over her sketch-book, or reading some newly published volume in a favorite thicket in the park. There was a good deal of time, of course, that she was obliged to devote to her husband, walking or driving or riding with him, in rather a ceremonial manner, almost as she might have done had she belonged to that charmed circle whose smallest walk or drive is recorded by obsequious chroniclers in every journal in the United Kingdom. Then came six brilliant weeks in July and August, when Arden Court was filled with visitors, and Clarissa began to feel how onerous are the duties of a châtelaine. She had not Lady Laura Armstrong's delight in managing a great house. She was sincerely anxious that her guests might be pleased, but a little overburdened by the responsibility of pleasing them. It was only after some experience that she found there was very little to be done, after all. With a skillful combination of elements, the result was sure to be agreeable. Morning after morning the cheerful faces gathered round the breakfast-table; and morning after morning vast supplies of dried salmon, fresh trout, grilled fowl, and raised pie—to say nothing of lighter provender in the way of omelets, new-laid eggs, hot buttered cakes of various descriptions, huge wedges of honey-comb, and jars of that Scotch marmalade so dear to the hearts of boating men—vanished like smoke before a whirlwind. Whatever troubles these nomads may have had were hidden in their hearts for the time being. A wise custom prevailed in Mr. Granger's establishment with regard to the morning letters, which were dealt out to each guest with his or her early cup of tea, and not kept back for public distribution, to the confusion of some luckless recipient, who feels it difficult to maintain an agreeable smirk upon his countenance while he reads that unless such or such an account is settled immediately, proceedings will be taken without delay.

Lady Laura came, as she had promised, and gave her dearest Clarissa lessons in the art of presiding over a large establishment, and did her utmost to oust Miss Granger from her position of authority in the giving out of stores and the ordering of grocery. This, however, was impossible. Sophia clung to her grocer's book as some unpopular monarch, tottering on his insecure throne, might cling to his sceptre. If she could not sit in the post of honor at her father's dinner-table, as she had sat so long, it was something to reign supreme in the store-room; if she found herself a secondary person in the drawing-room, and that unpunctilious callers were apt to forget the particular card due to her, she could at least hold on by the keys of those closets in which the superfine china services for Mr. Granger's great dinners were stored away, with chamois leather between all the plates and dishes. She had still the whip-hand of the housekeeper, and could ordain how many French plums and how many muscatel raisins were to be consumed in a given period. She could bring her powers of arithmetic to bear upon wax-candles, and torment the soul of the housekeeper by the precision of her calculations. She had an eye to the preserves; and if awakened suddenly in the dead of the night could have told, to a jar, how many pots of strawberry and raspberry and currant and greengage were ranged on the capacious shelves of that stronghold of her power, the store-room.

Even Lady Laura's diplomacy failed here. The genius of a Talleyrand would not have dislodged Miss Granger.

"I like to feel that I am of some use to papa," she remarked very often, with the air of a household Antigone. "He has new outlets for his money now, and it is more than ever my duty as a daughter to protect him from the wastefulness of servants. With all my care there are some things in my housekeeper's management which I don't understand. I'm sure what becomes of all the preserved ginger and crystallized apricots that I give out is a mystery that no one could fathom. Who ever eats preserved ginger? I have taken particular notice, and could never see any one doing it. The things are not eaten; they disappear."

Lady Laura suggested that, with such a fortune as Mr. Granger's, a little waste more or less was hardly worth thinking of.

"I can not admit that," Miss Granger replied, solemnly. "It is the abstract sinfulness of waste which I think of. An under-butler who begins by wasting preserved ginger may end by stealing his master's plate."

The summer went by. Picnics and boating parties, archery meetings and flower shows, and all the familiar round of country pleasures repeated themselves just as they had done at Hale Castle two years ago; and Clarissa wondered at the difference in her own mind which made these things so different. It was not that all capacity for enjoyment was dead in her. Youth is too bright a thing to be killed so easily. She could still delight in a lovely landscape, in exquisite flowers, in that art which she had loved from her childhood—she could still enjoy good music and pleasant society; but that keen sense of happiness which she had felt at Hale, that ardent appreciation of small pleasures, that eager looking forward to the future—these were gone. She lived in the present. To look back to the past was to recall the image of George Fairfax, who seemed somehow interwoven with all her girlhood; to look forward to the future was to set her face toward a land hidden in clouds and darkness. She had positively nothing to hope for.

Mr. Granger took life very calmly. He knew that his wife did not love him; and he was too proud a man to lay himself out to win her love, even if he had known how to set about a task so incongruous with the experience of his life. He was angry with himself for having ever been weak enough to think that this girlish creature—between whom and himself there stretched a gulf of thirty years—could by any possibility be beguiled into loving him. Of course she had married him for his money. There was not one among his guests who would not have thought him a fool for supposing that it could be otherwise, or for expecting more from her than a graceful fulfillment of the duties of her position.

He had little ground for complaint. She was gentle and obedient, deferential in her manner to him before society, amiable always; he only knew that she did not love him—that was all. But Daniel Granger was a proud man, and this knowledge was a bitter thing to him. There were hours in his life when he sat alone in his own room—that plainly furnished chamber which was half study, half dressing-room—withdrawing himself from his guests under pretense of having business letters to write to his people at Bradford and Leeds; sat with his open desk before him, and made no attempt to write; sat brooding over thoughts of his young wife, and regretting the folly of his marriage.

Was it true that she had never cared for any one else? He had her father's word for that; but he knew that Marmaduke Lovel was a selfish man, who would be likely enough to say any thing that would conduce to his own advantage. Had her heart been really true and pure when he won her for his wife? He remembered those sketches of George Fairfax in the port-folio; and one day when he was waiting for Clarissa in her morning-room he took the trouble to look over her drawings. There were many that he recollected having seen that day at Mill Cottage, but the portraits of Mr. Fairfax were all gone. He looked through the portfolio very carefully, but found none of those careless yet life-like sketches which had attracted the attention of Sophia Granger.

"She has destroyed them, I suppose," he said to himself; and the notion of her having done so annoyed him a little. He did not care to question her about them. There would have been an absurdity in that, he thought; as if it could matter to him whose face she chose for her unstudied sketches—mere vagabondage of the pencil.

Upon rare occasions Marmaduke Lovel consented to take a languid share in the festivities at Arden. But although he was very well pleased that his daughter should be mistress of the house that he had lost, he did not relish a secondary position in the halls of his forefathers; nor had the gayeties of the place any charm for him. He was glad to slip away quietly at the beginning of August, and to go back to Spa, where the waters agreed with his rheumatism—that convenient rheumatism which was an excuse for any thing he might choose to do.

As for his daughter, he washed his hands of all responsibility in connection with her. He felt as if he had provided for her in a most meritorious manner by the diplomacy which had brought about her marriage. Whether she was happy in her new life was a question which he had never asked himself; but if any one else had propounded such a question he would have replied unhesitatingly in the affirmative. Of course Clarissa was happy. Had she not secured for herself all the things that women most value? Could she not run riot in the pleasures for which women will imperil their souls? He remembered his own wife's extravagance, and he argued with himself that if she could have had a perennial supply of fine dresses and a perpetual round of amusement, she would speedily have forgotten Colonel Fairfax. It was the dullness of her life and the dismal oppressive atmosphere of poverty that had made her false.

So he went back to Spa, secure in the thought that he could make his home at Arden whenever he pleased. Perhaps at some remote period of old age, when his senses were growing dim, he might like to inhabit the familiar rooms, and feel no sting in the thought that he was a guest, and not the master. It would be rather pleasant to be carried to his grave from Arden Court, if any thing about a man's burial could be pleasant. He went back to Spa and led his own life, and in a considerable measure forgot that he had ever had a son and a daughter.

With September and October there came guests for the shooting, but George Fairfax was not among them. Mr. Granger had not renewed that careless invitation of his in Clarges Street. After supervising Clarissa's existence for two or three weeks, Lady Laura had returned to Hale, there to reign in all her glory. Mr. and Mrs. Granger dined at the Castle twice in the course of the autumn, and Clarissa saw Lady Geraldine for the first time since that fatal wedding-day.

There was little alteration in the fair, placid face. Geraldine Challoner was not a woman to wear the willow in any obvious manner. She was still coldly brilliant, with just a shade more bitterness, perhaps, in those little flashes of irony and cynicism which passed for wit. She talked rather more than of old, Clarissa thought; she was dressed more elaborately than in the days of her engagement to George Fairfax, and had altogether the air of a woman who means to shine in society. To Mrs. Granger she was polite, but as cold as was consistent with civility.

After a fortnight's slaughter of the pheasants there was a lull in the dissipations of Arden Court. Visitors departed, leaving Mr. Granger's gamekeepers with a plethora of sovereigns and half-sovereigns in their corduroy pockets, and serious thoughts of the Holborough Savings-bank, and Mr. Granger's chief butler with views that soared as high as Consols. All the twitter and cheerful confusion of many voices in the rooms and corridors of the grand old house dwindled and died away, until Mr. Granger was left alone with his wife and daughter. He was not sorry to see his visitors depart, though he was a man who, after his own fashion, was fond of society. But before the winter was over an event was to happen at Arden which rendered quiet indispensable.

Late in December, while the villagers were eating Mr. Granger's beef, and warming themselves before Mr. Granger's coals, and reaping the fruit of laborious days in the shape of Miss Granger's various premiums for humble virtue—while the park and woodland were wrapped in snow, and the Christmas bells were still ringing in the clear crisp air—God gave Clarissa a son: the first thing she had ever held in her arms which she could and might love with all her heart.

It was like some strange dream to her, this holy mystery of motherhood. She had not looked forward to the child's coming with any supreme pleasure, or supposed that her life would be altered by his advent. But from the moment she held him in her arms, a frail, helpless morsel of humanity, hardly visible to the uninitiated amidst his voluminous draperies of muslin, she felt herself on the threshold of a new existence. With him was born her future—it was a most complete realization of those sweet, wise words of the poet,

> "A child, more than all other gifts
> That earth can offer to declining man,
> Brings hope with it, and forward-looking thoughts."

Mr. Granger was enraptured. For him, too, even more than for his wife, this baby represented the future. Often and often, after some brilliant stroke of business which swelled the figures upon the left side of his bank-book to an abnormal amount, he had felt a dismal sense of the extinction that must befall his glory by-and-by. There was no one but Sophia. She would inherit a fortune thrice as large as any woman need desire, and would in all likelihood marry, and give her wealth to fill the coffers of a stranger, whose name should wipe out the name of Granger—or preserve it in a half-and-half way in some inane compound, such as Granger-Smith, or Jones-Granger, extended afterward into Jones-Granger-Jones, or Granger-Smith-Granger.

Perhaps those wintry days that began the new year were the purest, happiest of Daniel Granger's life. He forgot that his wife did not love him. She seemed so much more his wife, seated opposite to him beside that quiet hearth, with her baby in her arms. She made such a lovely picture, bending over the child in her unconscious beauty. To sit and watch the two was an all-sufficient delight for him—sometimes withdrawing his mind from the present to weave the web of his boy's future.

"I shall send him to Westminster, Clary," he said—it was a long time, by-the-way, since he had called his wife Clary, though she herself was hardly aware of the fact. "I shall certainly send him to Westminster. A provincial public school is all very well—my father sent me to one—but it's not quite up to the mark. I should like him to be a good classical scholar, which I never was, though I was a decent mathematician. I used to do my Virgil with a crib—a translation, you know—and I never could get on with Greek. I managed to struggle through the New Testament, but stuck in the first book of Thucydides. What dreary work it was! I was glad when it was all over, and my father let me come into his office. But with this fellow it will be different. He will have no occasion to soil his hands with trade. He will be a country gentleman, and may distinguish himself in the House of Commons. Yes, Clary, there may be the material for a great man in him," Mr. Granger concluded, with an almost triumphant air, as he touched the soft little cheek, and peered curiously into the bright blue eyes. They were something like his own eyes, he thought; Clarissa's were hazel.

Digitized by Google

The mother drew the soft mass of muslin a little nearer to her heart. She did not care to think of her baby as a man, addressing a noisy constituency in Holborough market-place, nor even as a Westminster boy, intent upon Virgil and cricket, Euclid and foot-ball. She liked to think of him as he was now, and as he would be for the next few years—something soft and warm and loving that she could hold in her arms; beside whose bed she could watch and pray at night. Her future was bounded by the years of her son's childhood. She thought already, with a vague pang, of the time when he should go out into the world, and she be no longer necessary to him.

The day came when she looked back to that interval of perfect quiet—the dimly lighted rooms, the low wood fire, and her husband's figure seated by the hearth—with a bitter sense of regret. Daniel Granger was so good to her in those days—so entirely devoted, in a quiet, unobtrusive way—and she was so selfishly absorbed by the baby as to be almost unconscious of his goodness at the time. She was inclined to forget that the child belonged to any one but herself; indeed, had the question been brought home to her, she would have hardly liked to admit his father's claim upon him. He was her own—her treasure beyond all price—given to her by Heaven for her comfort and consolation.

Not the least among the tranquil pleasures of that period of retirement—which Clarissa spun out until the spring flowers were blooming in the meadows about Arden—was a comparative immunity from the society of Miss Granger. That young lady made a dutiful call upon her stepmother every morning, and offered a chilling forefinger—rather a strong-minded forefinger, with a considerable development of bone—to the infant. On the child not receiving this advance with rapture, Miss Granger was wont to observe that he was not so forward in taking notice as some of her model children; at which the young mother flamed up in defense of her darling, declaring that he did take notice, and that it was a shame to compare him to "nasty village children."

"The 'nasty village children' have immortal souls," Sophia replied, severely.

"So they may; but they don't take notice sooner than my baby. I would never believe that. He knows me, the precious darling;" and the little soft warm thing in voluminous muslin was kissed and squeezed almost to extinction.

Miss Granger was great upon the management of infancy, and was never tired of expounding her ideas to Clarissa. They were of a Spartan character, not calculated to make the period of babyhood a pleasant time to experience or to look back upon. Cold water and nauseous medicines formed a conspicuous part of the system, and where an ordinary nurse would have approached infancy with a sponge, Miss Granger suggested a flesh-brush. The hardest, most impracticable biscuits, the huskiest rusks, constituted Miss Granger's notion of infant food. She would have excluded milk as bilious, and would have forbidden sugar as a creator of acidity; and then, when the little victim was about one and a half, she would have seated it before the most dry-as-dust edition of the alphabet, and driven it triumphantly upon the first stage on the high-road to Kings and Chronicles.

Among the model villagers Miss Granger had ample opportunity of offering advice of this kind, and fondly believed that her counsel was acted upon. Obsequious matrons, with an eye to Christmas benefactions, pretended to profit by her wisdom; but it is doubtful whether the model infants were allowed to suffer from a practical exposition of her Spartan theories.

Clarissa had her own ideas about the heir of the Grangers. Not a crumpled rose leaf—had rose leaves been flying about just then—must roughen her darling's bed. The softest lawn, the downiest, most delicate woolens, were hardly good enough to wrap her treasure. She had solemn interviews with a regiment of nurses before she could discover a woman who seemed worthy to be guardian of this infant demigod; and Mr. Granger showed himself scarcely less weak. It almost seemed as if this boy was his first child. He had been a busy man when Sophia was born, too entirely occupied by the grave considerations of commerce to enter into the details of the nursery, and the sex of the child had been something of a disappointment to him. He was rich enough even then to desire an heir to his wealth. During the few remaining years of his first wife's life he had hoped for the coming of a son, but no son had been given to him. It was now, in his sober middle age, that the thing he had longed for was granted to him, and it seemed all the more precious because of the delay. So Daniel Granger was wont to sit and stare at the infant as if it had been something above the common clay of which infancy is made. He would gaze at it for an hour together, in a dumb rapture, fully believing it to be the most perfect object in creation; and about this child there sprung up between his wife and himself a sympathy that had never been before. Only deep in Clarissa's heart there was a vague jealousy. She would have liked her baby to be hers alone. The thought of his father's claim frightened her. In the time to come her child might grow to love his father better than her.

Finding her counsel rejected, Miss Granger would ask, in a meek voice, if she might be permitted to kiss the baby, and having chilled his young blood by the cool and healthy condition of her complexion, would depart with an air of long-suffering; and this morning visit being over, Clarissa was free of her for the rest of the day. Miss Granger had her "duties." She devoted her mornings to the regulation of the household, her afternoons to the drilling of the model villagers. In the evening she presided at her father's dinner, which seemed rather a chilling repast to Mr. Granger in the absence of that one beloved face. He would have liked to dine off a boiled fowl in his wife's room, or to have gone dinnerless, and shared Clarissa's tea and toast, and heard the latest wonders performed by the baby, but he was ashamed to betray so much weakness. So he dined in state with Sophia, and found it hard work to keep up a little commonplace conversation with her during the solemn meal—his heart being elsewhere all the time.

That phase of gloom and despondency through which his mind had passed during the summer that was gone had given place to brighter thoughts. A new dawn of hope had come for him with the birth of his child. He told himself again, as he had so often told himself in the past, that his wife would grow to love him—that time would bring him the fruition of his desires. In the mean while he was almost entirely happy in the possession of this new blessing. All his life was colored by the existence of this infant. He had a new zest in the dryest details of his position as the master of a great estate. He had bought some two thousand acres of neighboring land at different times since his purchase of Arden Court, and the estate, swollen by these large additions, was fast becoming one of the finest in the county. There was not a tree he planted in the beginning of this new year which he did not consider with reference to his boy; and he made extensive plantations on purpose that he might be able to point to them by-and-by and say, "These trees were planted the year my son was born." When he went round his stables he made a special survey of one particularly commodious loose-box which would do for his boy's pony. He fancied the little fellow trotting by his side across farms and moorlands, or deep into the woods to see the newly felled timber or to plan a fresh clearing.

It was a pleasant day-dream.

INDIAN SUMMER.

THAT short, delicious season between the frosts of October and the ice of late November is a feature peculiar to the climate of our country north of the thirty-ninth parallel, and especially in New England and the region around the great lakes. It was noticed by the early settlers in New England, in letters written to their friends at home. They were charmed by the strange, gorgeous beauty of the American forests, when the trees seemed shrouded in trailing banners dyed in the glories of Iris, that ushered in that delightsome season of warm, balmy air, which seemed to bless all nature with a soothing dreaminess and repose after the labor of producing and garnering earth's treasures had ceased. It is a season when the storms of the autumnal equinox are over; and sometimes two or three weeks of uninterrupted fine weather give quiet delight before the bitter cold and the rough blasts of winter come on.

This is the season which the Indians in the middle regions of the continent looked forward to with pleasure, for during its continuance they gathered in their winter store of fully ripened maize (which we call Indian corn), and their chief supply of flesh for use in the dreary months of deep snows. Then the lakes, small and great, are placid. Sometimes for days not a wavelet appears upon their bosoms, and navigation over long distances in bark canoes was and is perfectly safe.

The savages regarded this season as a gift of one of their most honored deities—the southwest wind personified—to whose sunny and fruitful land these more northerly tribes believed their souls would go after death. This was the Indian's real harvest-time, and for that reason the early settlers called it the Indian's summer.

So runs a legend of the Narragansets:

From Kontontowit's bright savannas,
Through which yellow streams are flowing,
Whence the southwest wind comes laden
With the scent of April blossoms,
Came the crow, as black as midnight,
With a grain of corn in one ear
And a bean borne in the other
(Of the two we make suc-co'-tash),
And with wisdom quickly taught us
How to plant the seeds, and gather
Harvests from them in the autumn,
After frosts had slain the flowers—
Golden-rod and sparkling aster.
In that most delicious season,
Warm, and bright, and all auspicious
For the fisherman and hunter,
All our winter's store is garnered:
'Tis our beauteous Autumn-Summer.

Decay is slow combustion. With this fact in hand, philosophers have plausibly accounted for the warmth of the Indian summer time on the borders of winter by assuming that the heat then evolved in the process of the decay of the forest leaves and other vegetation is produced by that decay.

In Europe a corresponding recurrence of summer weather in late autumn is styled St. Martin's Summer, from Martinmas, or St. Martin's Day, which falls on the 11th of November, and which is marked by the eating of roast goose in England, while in France it is kept as a kind of carnival.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE re-establishment of the household in the fall, after the return from the country, is attended with almost as many miseries as moving. The dust and dirt that accumulate in a house shut up, the number of articles broken and lost, the repairs that must be made before the domestic machinery can move on without friction, are things amazing. Then there are carpets to be replaced, new furniture wanted, and most likely the promised servants have failed to make an appearance. With such help as can be temporarily obtained it is difficult to get up breakfast, and dinner is an impossibility. The water-pipes leak, the range is broken, the supply of coal has not been put into the cellar. The household washing accumulates fearfully, and how is it to be done? The plumber does not keep his appointment, a mistake is made in the carpets, and the wrong furniture is sent home. "When will order come out of confusion?" thinks the weary housewife, as night finds her morning hopes frustrated through unfortunate circumstances and the delinquencies of others. No light task is hers, to rearrange and systematize the household in the face of combined misfortunes, and plenty of patience is requisite. A little of the same grace, also, will not come amiss to the husband; and he will find opportunity for the exercise of forbearance and consideration, until, all traces of summer absences having been obliterated, the breakfast-bell rings promptly, and the dinner is tastefully served.

Artists are returning to their studios with well-filled port-folios. The coming art season promises to be peculiarly attractive. Those who have a natural love of art, and those who desire to become more appreciative in regard to paintings of real excellence, will find pleasure and profit in making systematic examination of the artistic treasures which our city contains.

Mooschillock, in New Hampshire, and Mount Ascutney, in Vermont, are to be sites of scientific research during the coming winter. These sister elevations will doubtless enjoy comparing notes with Mount Washington.

Meteorological changes of many kinds have been noted in Kansas by those who have resided there several years. For example: ten or fifteen years ago few people kept umbrellas in Kansas, because "when it rained it poured," and the wind blew with such force that an umbrella could hardly be carried. The rains were indeed storms—severe but short, a heavy fall of rain occurring in a few hours. Now it is the universal testimony of all who have been there ten or more years that the rain-storms are less severe, and the rainy days more frequent, than of old.

Chicago has propounded a scheme of devoting all the fines imposed for criminal offenses to the establishment of a public library. If this is carried out, never was there such an extensive and valuable collection as Chicago will possess!

Medical men advise M. Thiers to take some repose; they assure him that it is indispensable. He has an affection in one eye, the result of continuous labor, especially by lamp-light. He is ordered to give up all night-work.

An imaginary catalogue of "treasures" about to be disinterred from the bed of the Tiber is given by Punch for the benefit of the curious of all countries. With eager eyes and bated breath the devotees of science and literature will examine these objects of historic interest—when, by careful dredging of the river's bed, they are brought to light. Among these valuables a prophetic eye sees one of the bucklers with which Tarpeia was crushed to death, to the inexpressible grief of her surviving relatives; the razor with which Tarquin (Tarquinius Priscus) cut through the whetstone; the foot-stool (much discolored by time and mud) thrown by Tullia at the head of her coachman, whom she was fined for assaulting; the stone chest containing the Sibylline books (the binding is in pretty good order, and the mystic characters have been deciphered—it will be a relief to the public mind to know that they appear to be nothing more than simple family recipes, culinary and medicinal); Lucretia's spinning-wheel (one or two of the spindles missing), and the poniard with which she committed suicide; Cincinnatus's plow; the beautifully carved ivory manger out of which Caligula's favorite hunter was in the habit of feeding, with some of the gilt oats still adhering to the bottom; Nero's fiddle (the strings gone); the Emperor Domitian's bodkin (the first chemists of Europe, after a most careful analysis, are strongly of opinion that the dark-colored stain is the blood of an enormous blue-bottle); Cornelia's jewels; jewelry supposed to have been worn by the Vestal Virgins; and the jaw-bone and teeth of a wolf (believed to have been the identical animal which nourished Romulus and Remus in the dawn of life).

The Court Journal remarks that it is just twelve months since a scheme was inaugurated for the completion of St. Paul's Cathedral, in accordance with the designs of its great architect. Subscriptions have been made to the amount of £37,000, but only £23,900 are at present available, and this is totally inadequate to the work to be done. Upon a rough estimate it is thought that £250,000 may be spent before the whole building can be called thoroughly complete. The committee propose at once to undertake the decoration of the roof and walls of the choir and apse, and to fill the dome with mosaic in the place of Thornhill's grisaille pictures. The cost of this work will be £35,000.

One of the recent additions to the Scott Exhibition in London is an original article on "Tales of a Landlord," contributed to the Quarterly Review. It is in the handwriting of Sir Walter Scott, and has been lent by Mr. Murray. The following are the opening sentences: "These tales belong obviously to a class of novels which we have already had occasion repeatedly to notice, and which have attracted the attention of the public in no common degree—we mean 'Waverley,' 'Guy Mannering,' 'The Antiquary;' and we have little hesitation to pronounce them either entirely or in a great measure the work of the same author. Why he should industriously endeavor to elude observation, by taking leave of us in one character and then suddenly popping out upon us in another, we can not pretend the cause, without knowing more of his personal reasons for preserving so strict an incognito than has hitherto come to our knowledge."

London has had a famous cat show; but now that the fashion is started, it may not stop short of New York. At any rate, Edinburgh has announced that a cat show will be held in that city next November.

It is stated that the Emperor of the French is in search of an autumn residence in Scotland, and that if he can find a suitable place in Perthshire or Inverness-shire, he will go north when the rest of "society" removes from London.

The Parisians are accused of changing the names of their streets every week—and the charge is not groundless.

A correspondent from Sault de St. Marie gives an amusing account of the ferry-boat accommodations in that rather primitive region. He says: "Our ferry-boats are all sail-boats, and the passengers consequently have no fear of patched boilers or unskillful engineers. Oh!—but I forgot one: I beg its pardon. A new line has commenced running within a few days. A little propeller, about the size of a ship's yawl, crosses the river whenever she can get a passenger, which is not often. The citizens seem suspicious of steam ferry-boats since the Westfield disaster, and prefer to patronize the old line of sail-boats. The engine takes up the largest part of the boat, and the cabin accommodations are very meagre. At the stern she carries a large British flag, and in front is a broad pennant, bearing the uncommon name of Annie Smith. I judge that she is not supplied with many of the recent improvements in machinery, from the fact that they run the bow of the boat up on the shore, while the propeller continues to revolve in the water until the steam is exhausted or the fire goes out. The whole thing reminds me of the steamboats which the Ravels used to hastily improvise on the stage, with coffee-kettles for boilers, old boots for smoke-stacks, and rudders of any thing else lying around which could be made available. I presume there is no danger of explosion at present, as the Annie Smith has just commenced running on this line."

The American Institute proposes at no distant day to erect a new industrial palace, which will take the place of the Rink, and be much more adequate for the exhibitions.

American dairymen and women are gaining experience and skill which will materially increase the amount of money brought into the country. During the month of August 263,600 boxes of American cheese were imported into England. It is sold cheaper than English cheese, and is considered equal to it in flavor and quality.

Supposed remedies for the ills of life abound, but many of them have never been sufficiently tested to be really valuable. A lady writes to the Bazar: "I wish 'Before the Doctor Comes' knew how excellent for a 'skin felon' the yolk of an egg is. I had one about three years ago which was intensely painful. I broke off the end of the egg-shell, pouring out a little of the white, and dipped my finger in what was left. Every six hours I changed for a fresh egg, the other one becoming unpleasant. In twenty-four hours the felon discharged: my finger is as straight as it ever was, and I can use it as before." An application so simple, which has proved efficacious, is certainly worthy of trial.

The latest rat story comes from an Illinois farmer, who was going out to his corn-crib the other morning, when he saw a large rat, with head erect, carrying a full-sized ear of corn in his mouth, while at the same time his tail was wrapped around another large ear, which he was dragging behind him.

Can you pronounce it? Here it is—Shonkyonhwenjenawcie—the name of a chief of the Six Nations.

The American chaplain at Paris, Rev. Mr. Lamson, has been made Chevalier of the Legion of Honor by the government of France. During the entire siege and the subsequent insurrection Mr. Lamson remained in Paris, and, with one English clergyman, faithfully discharged the pressing and multiform duties which the times made necessary to a Christian man and a clergyman in his position.

Correspondents from Paris say that every thing possible is being done to hide the wounds of the city. Of course in many cases this is impossible. No one can bring back the old Hôtel de Ville or the Tuileries, or replace at present—if at all—the broken column on its pedestal; but in the mean time the stone-masons and plasterers have been doing wonders. Hundreds of houses that a short time ago were pitted all over with marks of balls are smooth and even again. In the Place Vendôme scaffoldings are erected every where. The capitals of the pilasters have suffered much, but fresh stones are being put in. In the Place de la Concorde an army of workmen are employed at the fountain nearest the river, and along the whole line of the terrace of the Tuileries, where scarcely a stone of the balustrade was left standing. The obelisk of Luxor is standing in the midst of the damage unscathed. Some long vistas of ruins present a terrible appearance; others, like the Palais du Conseil d'Etat, look vast, grand, and calm, as if they were ruins a thousand years old.

From Persia come heart-sickening details. Famine and pestilence still rage; in Ispahan alone there have been 27,000 victims; the crops have been destroyed, and one-third of the population is annihilated.

It is estimated that in this great city there are seldom less than 10,000, and at certain seasons of the year as many as 15,000, unemployed persons. This number does not include the criminal class, but only those unfortunates who would labor honestly if they could find the opportunity.

Digitized by Google

Dresses.

'H DOUBLE with a wide rrow ruffle l also with side, simu- the under ie material. e sides and and back, rial, which the waist. on bow for

RL FROM 2 formed of

The over-skirt is trimmed on the outer edge with a wide bias strip of the material of a darker shade, on both sides of which is set a row of narrow black guipure lace. Violet silk buttons, and silk cord trimming of the same color, simulating button loops, complete the trimming of the over-skirt. Neapolitan hat, trimmed with violet ribbon and feathers.

Fig. 5.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD. Skirt of blue cashmere, trimmed with a wide side-pleated ruffle, and folds of black gros grain. Over-skirt and peasant waist of black and white striped silk, trimmed with folds of black gros grain. Belt with bow of the same. Tucked Swiss muslin under-waist. Florentine straw hat, trimmed with a spray of flowers and black silk ribbon.

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S FALL DRESSES.

rial, and nee- d sleeves are nuslin ruffle. bon.

SUIT. The with narrow over-skirt is The square- tucked Swiss material trim hat, trimmed d lace veil.

DRESS WITH ss is trimmed rial, and with larker shade. rf edged with to the scarf.

BRUISED REEDS.

AS none of us are perfect, all of us are in the habit of doing wrong; and some of us, at least, know what it is to feel remorse, though Darwin says we do not show it save in melodramas and novels. Others, unhappily, have consciences of such tough fibre they know nothing of either shame or repentance, but dance along the broad way of evil with as light a heart and as assured a step as if there was no such duty as repentance, no such possibility as breaking away from bad habits, and no such dangers as the quagmires and pitfalls into which they are continually falling head-foremost. But we have nothing to do at this time with the hardened sinners—only with those poor suffering souls, those bruised reeds, who have done wrong and who know it, who evil; willing to do right, and as certainly ending by doing wrong.

Now these are the people whom it is the most needful to forgive, and the most difficult. Though there are certain hard, rasping natures who never "get over" a fault, as they say, and who are continually twitting the wrong-doer with his past disgrace, yet, as a rule, people do forgive where there is repentance—at least the smaller faults; as for the larger, we do not make much provision for them in our reserve fund of mercy. Yet—within bounds, be it understood—society itself, that awful Rhadamanthus, becomes generous and mellowed by time, and lets the offender against its laws go through that curious process called "living down" the first bitter consequence of his fault; that is, if he lives it down in "a proper spirit," and makes it manifest by his future uprightness that he has risen erect and steady from his former condition of prostrate morality. But society understands nothing of remorse united with a weak resolve. Society can not read the heart; it can only translate the action—and for the most part it makes a mess at that, and repeats its lesson badly. All that large class of unwilling sinners, if we may use the term—people who do wrong by impulse or weakness, without mentally wishing or planning for it—sinners who have their sane and cleanly moments, when they abhor themselves, and only desire grace for an assured repentance, who make good resolutions, which they will only break under a stronger temptation, and to whom temptation is always stronger than their resolution—of them, poor feeble-minded beings, it has not a good word to say, not an indulgent motive to assign, not a kindly excuse to allege. It shakes its head and turns its back on them with disdain; they are incorrigible, it says, severely: it really must consider them as pitch, and refuse to soil its hands by touching them. They are bruised reeds, if you like; but, observes society, with its perfumed handkerchief to its nose nicely displayed, they are reeds which have a decidedly unpleasant odor, and, for its own part, it prefers patchouly. So the poor, weak, backsliding, or sinful souls are abandoned to themselves; and a mournful experience has shown us that this is just the worst guardianship into which the frail can lapse.

Patience is perhaps the rarest of all the virtues, and patience, with continually recurring moral obliquity, is the most difficult form of a difficult grace. Besides, people give things wrong names; they think they are careful for godliness when they are impatient with weakness, and that they palter with evil when they are merciful to sinners. A large section of pious people have taught themselves that to smite the sinful hip and thigh is a more praiseworthy action than to lift them up tenderly, and do what they can to cleanse and heal them. They are more zealous for the law than for love, and are not disinclined to offer up living sacrifices still. Again, we are more angry with the sins which hurt ourselves than with those which hurt only the sinner's own soul. A sin which brings social disgrace on the family is a more heinous offense than one which leaves the law of man intact, and simply breaks the law of God. A man—or worse, a woman—may drink, say, and so shame his or her house and name; straightway he or she is discarded from all piety, all pity, all love; but they who discard her may be false, mean, slanderous, selfish, careless whether they destroy any one's happiness or repute, living in a self-made nest of lies and cruelty, yet, because the world knows nothing, the sin counts for nothing, and the sinner loses no caste; while the poor, weak-headed, diseased disgracer is regarded as a moral Caliban, for whom an honest death would be too honorable a boon. But the whole difference lies between the known and the unknown, the world and God: the one is an offense unpardonable, shameful, and the offender is cast out as an unclean thing; the other—well, the Bible tells us to be merciful; and, after all, his fault does not dishonor his family.

Digitized by Google

The question of forgiveness is a grave one in a home. Children are often told that "a fault confessed is a fault half pardoned," and exhorted to make full and frank confession of all they do amiss. But though they are assured they shall not be punished, they are rarely allowed to go scot-free. They may not be put into the corner, cut off their cake, or denied any pleasures on hand; but they are rendered desperately uncomfortable all the same. At the best they have "made mamma so sorry," which saddens them, poor little creatures, and makes them feel that, if not punished in one way, they are in another. Now this is not saying that they should not be made to feel that they have done wrong when they have done so; but we can scarcely wonder if, with unconscious calculation, they risk the chance of detection and punishment against confession and being put under moral disgrace. If mamma were perhaps to explain to them why they had done so and so, and show them, if a mechanical offense, such as breaking the windows, etc., how it came about—if a moral sin, how mean and small and unnecessary it was—it would be better than that dreadful punishment to a sensitive child of "making mamma sorry," which is simply moral disgrace under another name. So, too, is it never wise to hurt the self-respect of a sinner, child or other. Self-respect is a grand antiseptic, and when that is gone all is gone. We once knew of a little child who had stolen a couple of figs off the dessert dish on the day of a dinner-party. The theft was discovered, and her father made her wear the figs on a string round her neck the whole evening, with full explanations why. We heard the story when the child had grown up to be a woman, and from her own lips; and she said that to this hour she suffered from the shame of that evening; it was burned into her, and made a wound ineffaceable for life. It was a tremendous punishment for the fault: the fault itself being in so young a child as she was—five years old only—one that might have been punished and reformed by milder measures. It seems to have been a mistake, judging from the bitterness with which the father's character was spoken of—she said she ceased to love him from that day; and, from the stern and loveless nature of the woman herself, it seemed to have cast out all softness from her. And though, to be sure, she stole no more figs, yet she had learned her lesson of keeping her fingers from wandering into the region of forbidden dainties at too severe cost. The policy of humiliation is a dangerous one at all times and on all occasions, and far more souls have been crushed by this than sins have been confirmed by overleniency. To destroy all self-respect is to destroy all healing power, and to prevent all possibility of a rebound. In dealing with the faulty, however hard we may be on the sin, we ought always to reserve a way of restoration to the sinner. We ought not to shut him out from the light of love, of pity, of human generosity, of friendly forgiveness. An outcast is a wild beast—no better; and the object of punishment is to reform. It is but a sorry exercise of strength to break the bruised reed: for our own part, we would rather bind it together, and strive to plant its roots deeper in the good soil. Loving virtue, we should also love humanity; hating sin, we should also be pitiful and very tender to the sinner; and our punishments should be made the means of reformation, and the mode by which health and virtue should be restored—never merely retributive or revengeful.

BRIDAL TOILETTE.

BRIDAL TOILETTE.

THIS artistic and graceful wedding toilette will afford valuable suggestions, now that the autumn bridal season is at its height. The under-skirt is of heavy white faille, trimmed on the bottom with two rows of deep silk fringe, set on in festoons, and surmounted with thick white silk cord, which forms a three-leaved figure at the top of each scallop. Court train of the same faille, edged with a single row of fringe and cord heading. High basque-waist, with a bow at the back, and flowing sleeves, trimmed likewise with cord and fringe. Long illusion veil, enveloping the whole figure, and set on with a wreath of orange blossoms. Bouquet of orange blossoms in the corsage.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE fashionable world of Paris is still out of town, at the baths and watering-places. The most brilliant of the former this season is Deauville, where the Queen of Spain is staying with all her suite. At Dieppe, which is usually the fashion, there are few notable personages; the only ones specially worthy our mention are the Countess Walewska and the lovely Countess de Béchardt, who was one of the stars last season at London, and whose magnificent equipage excited attention even in England—that land of splendid horses. At the Princess of Wales's receptions she, with Madame Emile de Girardin, was the most admired of the French belles.

Apropos of London, one of the chief topics of the day is the passion with which a beautiful American lady has inspired an English prince. Unhappily, the lady is married, and the prince as well, so that the attachment must be a platonic one.

There is less talk just now about the Orleans princes than there was at the time of their arrival in France. The Duke de Nemours is at the baths at Aix, with his two charming daughters, the princesses Blanche and Marguerite of Orleans. An amusing anecdote, which is really authentic, is told concerning the Duke de Chartres. The young prince served in the Army of the Loire during the war under the name of Lefort. He entered as a captain, and was afterward promoted to the rank of chief of squadron, and preserved his incognito so well that many of the young officers are ignorant to this day that they were the comrades of a prince of Orleans. The other day, at Versailles, the Duke de Chartres met the Count d'Imécourt, one of our young fashionables, and a rabid Legitimist. The count had just come from his château. "Hallo! is it you, Lefort?" cried he. "What are you doing here, you rascal? Come and take breakfast with me?" "With pleasure," answered the duke. They went down the street, arm in arm, chatting merrily together, till, on passing the door of a club-house, they saw a number of deputies, who rose hastily to bow to the duke.

"What! are you acquainted with those people?" said D'Imécourt. "Don't you know that they belong to the Orleanist crowd? If they are friends of yours, we may as well part."

"Oh! I know that they don't amount to much," rejoined the duke, "but one must be polite. They bowed to me, and I could do nothing else than return their salutes."

At this moment Edward Bocher, the great friend of the Orleans family, came up, hat in hand, with two young men.

"Monseigneur—" he began.

"What do you mean with your monseigneurs?" said D'Imécourt, laughing.

"Excuse me, count; I was not speaking to you, but to Monseigneur the Duke de Chartres."

The face of the Count d'Imécourt may be imagined. He was covered with confusion, and stammered out apologies. "Monseigneur, I did not know; I ask a thousand pardons!" "Tut! tut!" said the duke; "have done with all this ceremony, and let us go and eat our breakfast."

The marriage is announced of a young American lady, a great favorite in Parisian society, Miss Alice Filié. She is the sister of the Marquise Chasseloup-Laubat, and is to marry M. Hirsch, a rich Bavarian banker.

The most striking toilettes seen at Trouville and Deauville are composed of marquise gauze and striped linen, trimmed with ruches of the material. A toilette worn by the Countess de C—— at Trouville has a skirt of apricot faille, with festooned flounces of white silk, over-skirt of marquise gauze, forming four large points, edged with a ruching of gauze and white silk fringe. Corsage of apricot faille, covered with a basque-waist of marquise gauze, trimmed with white fringe and ruching. Broad apricot faille sash with white fringe.

The daughter of the Marquis San Gregorio, maid of honor to the Queen of Spain, wore a skirt of white taffetas under a demi-trained skirt of white striped linen. This over-skirt was trimmed with three pleated flounces, separated by ruches, and edged with narrow Valenciennes. Low corsage of white taffetas. Redingote of maroon taffetas. A ruche, interspersed with maroon bows, extended down the entire front. Wide ribbon sash, with alternate stripes of white silk and maroon velvet. Parabère toque, turned up behind, with a bow of maroon velvet, and a rose at the side. We must not forget a maroon velvet bow which was fixed on the left side of the corsage as a Watteau bow, and held in place by a diamond fleur-de-lis, the distinctive emblem of the partisans of the Prince of the Asturias. The same fleur-de-lis is also ostentatiously displayed by our French chàtelaines and young men of fashion, for it is reckoned in good taste, just now, to be a Legitimist.

The other day at the circus the cry was raised, "Vive la République." A young fashionable, the Count de V——, cried "Vive le Roi," whereupon General Niel, who stood close by, gave him a assumed its war-paint, and vowed that Molly should gain nothing by the invitation so skillfully angled for. Had she lived fifty-one years in a wicked world to be conquered now by a pretty-faced, slipshod puss, without habits, without "faculty," without any of the virtues requisite in Jim's future wife—a girl whose gloves ran to holes; whose collars, generally soiled about the bindings, were always pinned on crooked; whose hooks, eyes, buttons, shoe-strings, were all "which way;" whose top drawer was a caution to beholders; who couldn't sew, hated to dust, didn't care for flowers; who might as well have been born in San Domingo as New England, as far as the ideas in her silly head went; and—crowning sin of all—who "came of a bad stock," inheriting "slackness" and indolence from a long line of shiftless ancestors? No! if Aunt Mary could help it, "Jim Child wasn't going to marry a Pomfret."

Digitized by Google

This big, handsome, sweet-tempered Jim was, in truth, the very idol of his bright, breezy, old-maid aunt. He came into the world at a time, now long past, when the storm which shipwrecked her girlhood, and threw it high and dry on the rocks of spinsterdom, was at its height. No human help was so much to her in those days as the touch of the soft, unconscious baby fingers; and, with the passionate affection of a woman who feels herself doomed to be childless for evermore, she attached herself to her little nephew.

From that day to this he and his affairs had been the predominant interest of her life. She made his kites, covered his balls, knit his stockings. It was to Aunt Mary's ear that all his youthful sorrows and secrets were confided, and that kind safety-valve was still his refuge when the mighty cares of twenty-one required an outlet. "Her boy," she called him. To her mind he was not only beautiful, but "virtuousest, discreetest, best." And here was this prince, this paragon, this "entire and perfect chrysolite," proving himself mere man, after the stupid fashion of his sex, by slipping into the toils of a girl not worthy to darn his stockings, even if she had known how, which, considering her antecedents, seemed improbable! It should not be! Aunt Mary arrayed herself to the rescue.

Her first move was to "borrow" Grace Goodenow, the girl whom, with that infallible instinct which leads us to see the rights and wrongs of other people's love affairs more clearly than they do themselves, she had long ago selected as the wife Jim ought to want. But to "borrow" Grace was not an easy matter, Dr. Goodenow being strongly opposed to parties of pleasure and all that savored of frivolity and "philandering," against which vague and anomalous iniquity he was wont to frequently and strongly inveigh. A long morning of argument was the price paid for his concession. Aunt Mary had to face much discussion and reprobation; had to hear that the longing for salt-water, which she had incautiously alluded to as "natural," was an instinct shared with brute beasts, prairie wolves, savage bisons, who gallop miles to reach a "lick" and satisfy their appetites; she had to listen to a vast and erudite body of objection drawn from natural history and "Scripter," and, finally, only carried her point by stringent reference to Grace's thinness, paleness, want of appetite, and adroit allusion to an Aunt Esther, dead some twenty years before of consumption, and a rather hypothetical "Uncle Zack," who "kind of wasted away, and went out like the snuff of a candle." When the dominie, on mention of this worthy, began to hitch uneasily in his chair, she knew her cause was won; for, in spite of his big bow-wow manner, the good man was exceedingly sensitive and anxious about his only girl. So, seizing the moment with a woman's quickness, Aunt Mary began to dilate on the exceeding steadiness of the party, which she made out to be a sort of cross between a water-cure and a camp-meeting.

"I'm sure if you'd been with us last year, doctor, you would have felt gratified, as I did—really gratified—at all that went on. None of the boys ever went fishing or any thing till after prayers, which we had every morning regularly, with the reading of the Scriptures. It did really seem like an influence for good over the young, and I for one considered it a privilege to be there."

"Well, well," said the convinced dominie, "the child shall go. Perhaps she is not looking altogether as well as usual, and, as you say, the saline breezes may be beneficial to her health. Grace, you will be discreet and obedient, I am sure."

"I'll see that she is," cried Miss Child, elate with victory. "She shall sleep next me in the tent, and I'll keep as sharp an eye on her as if she were my own. Hey, Gracie, you'll behave yourself, and not fret even if I do speak severely at times?"

Grace laughed. The prospect did not seem very formidable to her. Every one knew "Aunt Mary," so called by half the girls in Dusenberry, and all young people at least loved her.

The intuitions of unselfish and genuine affection may generally be trusted. Grace was really the wife Jim Child needed, the Heaven-meant woman, the complement to his nature. But though his aunt divined this, though Grace, half unconscious, responded already to the instinctive attraction, the idea had not yet dawned upon Jim himself. The delicate, flower-like girl struck him as dim and colorless. Molly Pomfret, with her shallow prettiness and flighty little airs and graces, caught his eye and immature fancy a thousand times more. Not that he was in love with her; but he had begun to think himself so—a most dangerous first step. Now, for the first time, the two girls were to be contrasted side by side, and Aunt Mary's hopeful spirit prophesied good results. "Men are blind enough," she thought; "but nothing less than a born idiot could see my Grace and that Pomfret girl together for ten days and not find out the difference. If Jim really is such a goose, he deserves his fate."

So now this long-desired "salting-party" was really begun. There were the white tents, two for sleeping and one for cooking; there was the long, broad dining-table roofed with boughs, and the bough hut which sheltered the wagons; there, below the little knoll crowned with pine and cedar, loveliest of spots for encampment, lay the smooth beach, with its fringe of yeast-white foam, from which far away stretched the expanse of ineffable ocean blue. Long bars of pink cloud still lay on the horizon; eastward the fair, solemn moon slowly climbed the sky. It was the very scene on the thought of which Grace for a month past had smiled herself to sleep; but somehow, now that it was there visible, tangible, lying about her, the sense of disappointment came with it. A faint chill crept over her bright imaginings. "Something beautiful had vanished." Could it be because of that comfortable group below—Jim, Molly, and the mutual blanket shawl?

"It's pretty cool to-night, isn't it?" said jolly Mr. Child, emerging from the men's tent, where he had been helping his wife spread the beds. "You'd better wrap up, Gracie. Where are all the boys and girls?"

"Not far off, any of them," responded his sister. "Suppose you get them all together and have a good sing here on the knoll, James."

"A first-rate idea, Mary. Here, mother"—raising his voice—"tell the children to come out; we're going to sing."

Mrs. Child came at the call—a placid, happy woman, with sleepy, kitten-like eyes.

"Yes, pa, certainly. Sadie! Ann Eliza! Tom! Your pa wants you. You can quit the dishes; they'll do very well for to-night as they are. Squire Vose!—ah, here he is, with Esther and Mr. Grey. But where's Addie and Charley Hale? and where's Jim?"

"We are here, Mrs. Child," said Addie Vose's pleasant voice from a little way down the bank, where she was sitting with her lover. "We came a little further to see the sunset better."

"But where's Jim?"

"He's down there on the beach with Molly."

"Jim!" shouted his father.

"Ahoy!" came the answer.

"Come up; we are going to sing."

With infinite satisfaction Aunt Mary watched the distant bundle unroll, restore itself into component parts, approach. Jim and Molly came walking slowly, and carrying the shawl.

"What made you pick out such a damp corner to sit in?" asked that inconvenient little Tom.

"Well, I don't know," answered Jim, innocently. "Molly chose it. It was dampish, though."

At which speech his aunt Mary hugged herself.

Every body sang that night—Jim in hearty bass, his friend Charley Grey in tenor, Squire Vose with well-intentioned tones which resembled nothing so much as the squeaking of a rusty hinge, the girls in silvery treble—every body but Molly Pomfret. Molly was a little put out. "Two is company—more, trumpery," was emphatically her motto, and she by no means relished the interruption of the tête-à-tête beneath the blanket shawl. Aunt Mary noted the vexation in her face, and hugged herself again.

"That's right, dear," she thought. "Go on just so. Give Jim a taste of the pleasant look that will await your husband whenever any thing crosses your fancy. It's a very good lesson for him, and I hope he's taking notice."

So, by way of making sure he should, she leaned forward, and said, pleasantly, "What's the matter, Molly? Any thing gone wrong?"

"Nothing much," was the reply, with a pout. Jim caught the look, but, bless you! he didn't regard it as a pout. To his eyes it was merely an accident of the moonlight, or because Molly was catching cold; and he seized the offending shawl and wrapped it round his charmer with such devoted eagerness that his aunt could gladly have boxed his ears. Luckily, Molly was in the mood to take offense; so she shook the shawl off, and said, sharply,

"Don't! I don't want it! You're mussing me all up;" and Jim shrank back, rebuked.

"Row, brothers, row," "Tranquidillo," "Those evening Bells," and other time-honored favorites composed the répertoire of the Child family, and were heartily enjoyed and encored till a late hour. The concert wound up with "Coronation," that delight of all country church-goers. And it was then that Grace, left out in the more secular music, began to sing, and her clear, bird-like notes astonished every body who had never happened to sit near the parson's old pew on Sunday.

"Why, Grace, what a beautiful voice you've got!" said Jim, leaning forward to look at her.

She blushed with pleasure. "Do you think so?" she said, and smiled. The moonlight was upon her face, and brought out, as moonlight often does, a certain subtile inward beauty not so visible by day. She looked inexpressibly fair, sweet, and womanly just then. Something pathetic, too, blended in the expression. For the first time Jim thought to himself, "What a pretty girl Grace is growing to be!"

Aunt Mary meantime was regarding Molly. That dreadful moonlight! In the light of its revealing beams, half gleam, half shadow, the face of Jim's charmer altered almost to plainness. Certain hard lines became visible—the coquettish black eyes looked shallow and beady. Aunt Mary believed in moonlight, and nodded her head to some secret thought. "Yes, yes," she said; "I knew it. Pomfret all over, for all her pretty looks. Well, when I'm a man I'll pick my wife out in the evening!"

Molly's sulkiness had not quite melted next morning, and she woke in an ill humor. Her bed had been hard; she hated washing her face in a tin basin; the tiny looking-glass made her appear like a fright; and she couldn't do her hair. To her easy indolence these little discomforts were great and real; the pleasure-party wasn't pleasant; she was sorry she came, she declared. Sadie laughed at her, and that made it worse. Carelessly and crossly she slipped into her clothes, and emerged, pouting and untidy, with hair half brushed, to find Jim and his sister deep in the preparation of breakfast, the Vose girls fishing, and Grace, in fresh, dainty print and white apron, setting the table. The early dip in the sea, with which all the girls except sleep-loving Molly had indulged themselves, had tinged Grace's usually pale cheek with delicate pink. Her light brown hair shone in its glossy braids, her eyes were bright with exercise and pleasure; for to the quiet, shaded life of the old parsonage this first "outing" of Grace's was as Champagne after weak tea. Certainly the contrast between the two girls was not to her disadvantage. More than one marked it; and Aunt Mary said to herself, "Grace'll be a beauty one day, if the Lord ever lets the sun into her life—and so much the better for Jim."

"Come and help," shouted that young gentleman, delighted at the appearance of his charmer.

But Molly wouldn't. She hated cooking; she "didn't know where things were;" the dishes were hot; the pail hurt her wrist. She shrugged her little shoulders, and walked off under the trees alone. Jim looked after her, amazed.

"What's the matter?" he whispered to his sister as she passed him.

"Matter? Oh, with Molly, you mean? Nothing at all, I guess. She is almost always cross when she first wakes up," replied the plain-spoken Ann Eliza.

Disenchantment the first! Could this glum, dingy vision be the radiant little witch of last week? It seemed hardly possible.

Girls, take this advice: be as pretty as you can, or as ugly as you must; but, whatever else you are, be neat. There is nothing on the visible earth more unlovely than a slatternly woman. She does violence to nature. A tumbled, dishevelled rose-bud is no less an affront to the eye, while simple freshness and delicacy of appointment can of themselves almost beautify a plain person.

It had been easy enough for pretty Molly to run up stairs just as Jim swung the gate of afternoons, tumble off her soiled wrapper, twitch the curl-papers from her hair, and descend after half an hour's delay renovated, fluffed, smoothed to a presentable extent, with some rose or ribbon tucked bewitchingly into just the effective spot, and a smile and a twinkle which made all discrepancies of toilette invisible. The little points where ineradicable untidiness made itself visible to an experienced eye escaped Jim's notice completely, and but for this "salting-party" might have continued to escape it until the time when, too late for repentance, Mrs. Jim should have seated herself—a disreputable vision—opposite her astonished husband at his own breakfast-table. But meeting thus, day after day, and all day long, the habits of her life were too much for poor Molly. "What does it signify?"—that customary excuse—was uttered once and again over tumbled dress, soiled collar, tattered stockings, till even Jim's glamoured eyes became observant.

"Auntie," he said one day, as in a moment of confidence he leaned his handsome head on Miss Child's knee, "I thought the Pomfrets were well off."

"Well?" interrogatively.

"Well, they can't be, you know, for Molly don't seem to have nice things like the other girls. Don't you think they must have pretty hard times at home?"

"Jim," said Aunt Mary, solemnly, "I happen to know what Molly has to spend on her dress, and if you'll keep it a sacred secret, I will breathe it to you. Will you promise?"

"Yes."

"She spends exactly four hundred dollars a year."

"Is that a good deal?" asked ignorant Jim.

"And Grace Goodenow, Jim—Grace has exactly a hundred and fifty!"

Just then the girls passed slowly, side by side, bearing a freshly gathered basket of blueberries, Grace in simple, well-fitting gown of gray, a knot of blue under the white collar, a blue ribbon looping a shady hat over the burnished, perfectly braided hair; the other in mussy, tumbled white piqué, half the buttons off her boots, a crushed pink rose surmounting curls much in want of brushing, and soiled kid gloves! The contrast could hardly have been more marked even to an inexperienced eye.

"Whew!" said Jim.

From that day, as she in after-years declared, Aunt Mary dated her triumph. Not that Jim transferred his affections then and there to Grace. No! It was many months later that the event happened which filled all Dusenberry with excitement, and Dr. Goodenow's mind with unspeakable wonder that "that child" should be grown up enough to entertain the idea of such a thing for a moment. But from that time the spell of Jim's untidy little enchantress was broken. In vain did Molly seek to lure him back, even combing her curls for three days running. He would not return, comb she never so wisely. "Salting-parties were horrid," she from that time and forever after declared. She "never wanted to go to one again."

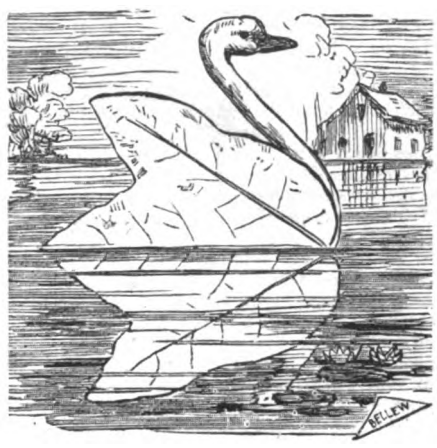
"And so they are," agreed Aunt Mary Child, "horrid for sham and slipshod. But if a young fellow wants to find out what a girl really has got in her, and how she does the little every-day things that are going to make his life comfortable or uncomfortable, and how she's going to look in the morning, or at times when she isn't fixed up just to catch his eye, I advise him to pick up a wife where my Jim found his—down at salt."

Which sensible advice we commend to all whom it may concern.

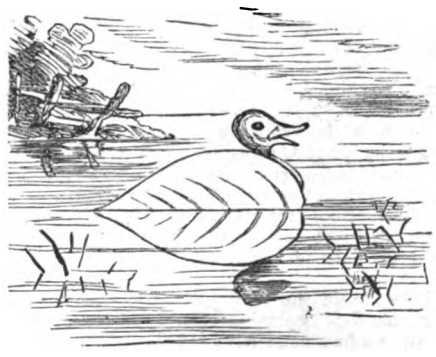
Digitized by Google

LEAF PICTURES.

LAST summer we were at the Wachusett Mountain, and there we met two ladies—one with blue eyes and the other with blue spectacles—mother and daughter. They were great hunters of ferns and fringed gentians, and such like game; but when the fall came round they turned their sporting powers to the bright red and yellow leaves of the forest trees, with which they did very many wondrous things: among others, they made pictures of birds, fishes, quadrupeds, and what not. One day we surprised the ladies in an autumnal confusion of dappled leaves. On the table were some sheets of Bristol-board, a bottle of gum-arabic, some iron paper-weights, a pen and ink, a box of water-colors, and a pair of scissors; of course no true woman could ever do any thing without the aid of a pair of scissors. Well, they were making the pictures, and this is the way they did it. One of the ladies took a leaf, wetted it on one side with a little gum, then laid it on a piece of Bristol-board, placed a weight upon it, and left it to dry. (We will assume the leaf to be a maple, and the object to be represented a swan floating on the water.) The leaf being dry and firmly gummed to the card-board, one of the ladies (the blue eyes, if we remember rightly, attended to the artistic part of the manufacture) ruled a clear pen-and-ink line straight through the leaf from stalk to apex, continuing the line on each side beyond the leaf some distance on to the card-board; this formed the line of the water. The artist then sketched in the neck and head of the swan, a few lines to represent water, a little landscape in the distance—and the maple leaf was transformed into a glowing swan with a glowing reflection. The whole thing, however, will be better understood by referring to the annexed cut. Indeed, the cut almost explains itself, and we half feel that we have been wasting words in making any explanation at all. So we will now proceed to enumerate some of the objects represented by our friends in leaf pictures.

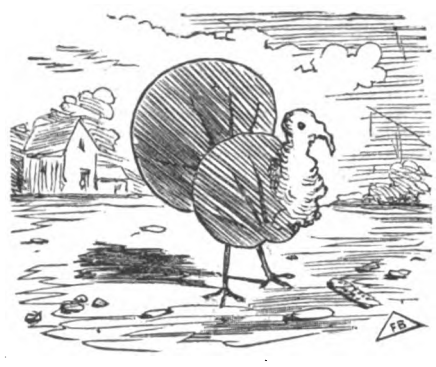


A swan, made from the leaf of the flower of the rose.

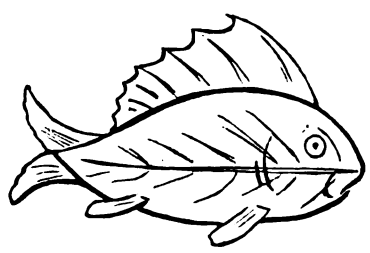


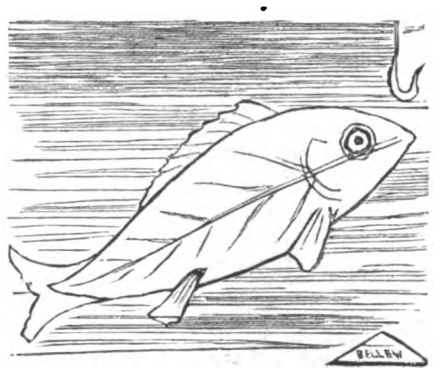
Duck, made from honeysuckle or rose leaf.

A duck of a woman, made from any oval leaf. In this case the features of the face are marked with pen and ink, or with color, on the leaf.

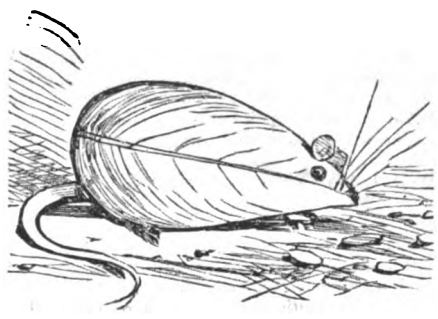


Turkey made of two clover leaves.





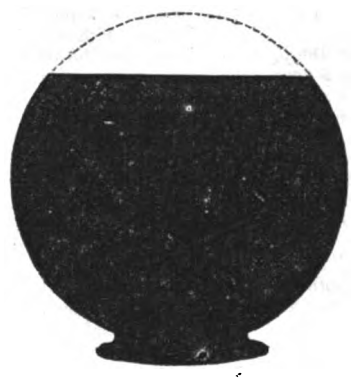
Two fishes made of sumac leaves.



Rat made of any small leaf of appropriate form.

We have spoken here merely of pen and ink being used to complete the form or fill in the accessories of the pictures, but many of the works of our friends were elaborately finished in water-color; in the case of the turkey, for example, its neck was touched in with bright crimson; in other cases the sky and water were painted blue and the trees green, and so on.

One of the prettiest of these ladies' productions represented a bowl of gold-fish, and was made in this wise. They first procured a piece of black paper, and cut from it a piece in this form, which they gummed on to a sheet of gray card-board, and with the aid of a little flake-white and a little Indian ink, filled out to the form of a fish-bowl—as may be seen in the annexed cut; on this they gummed a couple of gold-fish, made in the same way as those previously represented, and the picture was complete.



ARISTOLOGY.

ARISTOLOGY may be briefly defined as the science which provides for man his best meal in the best way. Now the very first question which occurs is, what time should this meal be eaten? Our ancestors dined at eleven, and there are still primitive folk in remote districts who dine at twelve. One has, however, become the recognized hour of laboring men and shop-keepers, and the like. But at such a time of day it can by no possibility be the noble meal which it ought to be; and my cordial wish for the man who is compelled to dine at one o'clock is that he may have a cozy supper at eight or nine. Civilization insists upon the late dinner, for reasons which have been put with eloquent logic by De Quincey in his essay on the "Casuistry of Roman Meals." "When business," he writes, "was moderate, dinner was allowed to divide and bisect it. When it swelled into that vast strife and agony, as one may call it, that boils along the tortured streets of modern London or other capitals, men began to see the necessity of an adequate counter-force to push against this overwhelming torrent, and thus maintain the equilibrium. Were it not for the soft relief of a six-o'clock dinner, the gentle demeanor succeeding to the boisterous hubbub of the day, the soft glowing lights, the wine, the intellectual conversation, life in London is now come to such a pass that in two years all nerves would sink before it. But for this periodic reaction, the modern business, which draws so cruelly on the brain and so little on the hands, would overthrow that organ in all but those of coarse organization. Dinner it is—meaning by dinner the whole complexity of attendant circumstances—which saves the modern brain-working man from going mad." Six o'clock was late when De Quincey wrote; it is now an early hour. But his theory is right. After a hard day's work, political, financial, literary, a man reaches that absolute sanctum, his dressing-room. He shuts out critics, opponents, bulls, and bears; he washes care away with his bath; he arrays himself in snowy linen, with mayhap a diamond or two on its surface, and possibly a floral gem in the lapel of his coat. The day's turmoil is forgotten in the atmosphere of the dining-room. White cloth, delicate porcelain, bright glass and silver, a glow of flowers, a ruddy tinge of wine, above all the well-contented looks of his friends, make him cheerful at once. He is ready to dine. The meal, if properly conceived and arranged, comes upon him with the gradual beauty of a symphony, each step leading easily to the next, and the end being perfection. Such a dinner demands the artistic accompaniment of charming conversation. In that colloquy there must be no argument; no politics, theology, Darwinism: only the play of intellect, the easy sparkle of wit, the best-natured gossip, the briefest anecdote, is permissible. Of course the ladies present are lovely and lively, and understand that most delightful of arts, scientific flirtation. This being so, dinner will fulfill its mission—to recuperate the exhausted brain, and make a man ready, after a reasonable amount of sleep, to do his next day's battle with the world. If he be wise, after a pleasant half hour amidst the music and flowers of the drawing-room, he will eschew billiards, cigars, and cognac, and find his way to bed before midnight. The best "night-cap," save in the coldest weather, is something effervescent—say a pint of dry Champagne.

Extremes meet; here is the bill of fare of a little dinner supposed to have been given by Alcibiades to Aristophanes and a few other gentlemen of Athens. If any body objects that the author of "The Birds" cut up Alcibiades rather savagely, and so they were unlikely to dine together, I can only ask him whether he has never dined with his bitterest enemy. But here is the menu, carefully translated from the choice Attic of the period:

Hors-d'œuvres. Tunny with cucumber, Aphritis anchovy with olives.

Poisson. Mullet of Hymettus.

Entrée. A young puppy.

Relevés. Wild boar stuffed with thrushes, beccaficoes, oysters, and periwinkles; a two-livered Bisaltian hare.

Rôts. Birds of the river Phasio; a porphyrion that has hanged itself; attagen.

Entremêts. Cheese-cake of milk, honey, and sesame; asafetida salad; Cydonian apples.

I regret to say there is no account of the wine.

And did those refined Athenians in the days of Pericles eat puppies? They did, and liked them. I suspect there are a good many edible things which we unwisely neglect. What can be more delicious than the hind-legs of frogs? With a glass of Chablis, what a nice light nutritive luncheon they would make on those hot midsummer days, when eating seems scarcely practicable! In the long green walls of Silchester, or any other ruined Roman city, you may find lots of the big snails that the domini terrarum imported when they occupied this out-of-the-way island. Why does nobody eat them now?

However, as I have said, extremes meet: here is the bill of fare of a December dîner de siége given by the Paris Jockey Club:

Hors-d'œuvres. Radishes, herring mariné, onions à la Provençale, slightly salt butter, gherkins, and olives.

First course. Soup of slightly salted horse, with vegetables; ass-flesh cutlets, with carrots; mule's liver sauté aux champignons; horse's lights, with white sauce; carp à la matelot; fried gudgeons; celery heads, with seasoning.

Second course. Quarter of a dog braised; leg of dog roasted; rats cooked upon the ashes; rat pie, with mushrooms; eel à la broche; salad of celery and small salad.

Dessert. Dutch cheese, apples, pears, marmalade au Kirsch, gâteau d'Italie au fromage de Chester.

This menu was composed by that renowned epicure, Baron Brisse, who, in days before the war, was wont to publish one daily in the Liberté for the guidance of gourmets. The erudite baron was wont to maintain that people who dined as he taught would never be in difficulties, but have as good an appetite on rent-days as on any other day in the year. Certes, it is something in favor of gastronomy that, amidst the supreme peril of Paris, Baron Brisse and his friends could cheerfully dine upon horse and dog and rat in the Chaussé d'Antin. It is an aristological triumph.

The Romans, as all men know, dined in their later days on a stupendous scale, and defied all the rules of aristology by their abominable excesses. When Cæsar visited Cicero at his villa the great orator writes to Atticus thus: "Post horam viii. in balneum; tunc audivit de Mamurra; vultum non mutavit; unctus est; accubuit; ἐμετικὴν agebat." Mamurra was Cæsar's general of engineers, and also his master's chief associate in dissipation; and what he heard about him without change of countenance is supposed to have been the severe attack made upon him by the poet Catullus. The story is that Cæsar, instead of revenging himself on the poet, asked him to dinner. Modern autocrats are not always so forgiving. However, the important point in the extract is that Cæsar, in order to do justice to Cicero's dinner, took an emetic.

Still, they were moderate men in those days when compared with their successors; epicurism had not entirely degenerated into gluttony. Under the emperors Rome became the centre of all conceivable vices: all the rest of the world was taxed that its citizens, the fœx Romuli, might be idlers in the land. When Hadrian first saw Alexandria, a city of business, in which every body worked for his living, the spectacle amazed him. Alexandria and a myriad other cities worked that Rome might laze. The Roman's sole duty was to vote; he was made comfortable in order to secure his voting as the emperor desired. This is the natural issue of Cæsarism.

Poetry and aristology were never more pleasantly combined than at the Shakspeare dinner given in New York ten years ago. The bill of fare was perfect in both ways. Thus, after oysters on the half shell was underwritten,

"Sends
This treasure of an oyster;"

and this hint as to the appropriate beverage,

"Set a deep glass of Rhenish wine;"

Bermuda potatoes were ushered in with

"Let the sky rain potatoes....
From the still-vexed Bermoothes;"

veal sweet-breads,

"Veal, quoth the Dutchman—is not veal a calf?"

asparagus,

"Who comes so fast in silence of the night?"

boar's head,

"Like a full-acorned boar, a German one;"

tutti frutti ice-cream,

"Tut, tut, thou art all ice—thy kindness freezes;"

and the dessert most aptly terminates with

"Some aqua-vitæ, ho!"

The art of aristology approaches perfection when it thus combines with poetry and wit. I care less for the style of menu contrived for the dinner of the Paleontographic Society last April. What say you to having to choose between "Arnocopti herbei," "Pulluli sitotrephagroicicences," and "Anaticulæ pisochumizenses?" Apart from the difficulty of recognizing, thus disguised, lamb cutlets, spring chicken, ducks, and green pease, the Greek and Latin terms were barbarously mixed—an offense to the scholar as great as that to the gourmet if you mixed his port and sherry in one decanter. Moreover they called their menu "Scheda Prandii;" whereas prandium is not dinner at all, but a light matutinal snack.

I have already said a word or two as to the difficult art of dinner talk: reverting thereto, I may remark that aristological anecdote may fairly be introduced now and then. Nor, surely, is it infra dignitate to talk of wines and their culture, or to quote the gastronomic fancies of poets and humorists—Thackeray on bouillebaisse, Sala on caviar, Father Prout on eggs. You may relate how Baron Brisse indignantly rebuked the ignorant person who declared that mayonnaise was spelled with yen, observing that he talked of two distinct sauces—as in a mayennaise there is velouté, which does not occur in a mayonnaise. You may recall the palatal delicacy of the Count du Broussin, who could taste the mule's hoof in an omelette aux champignons. Mushrooms, be it known, are only perfect when crushed by the foot of a mule. You may tell of the terror of an Italian prince crossing the Alps, with his people, when a mule and its rider fell over a precipice. "The cook!" he exclaimed. "Holy Virgin! is it the cook?" "It is Don Prosdocimo, your excellency." "Only the chaplain: ah, the saints be praised!" If you are pathetic, there is the melancholy suicide of Vatel to narrate; if aphoristic, the aristologists of old have many a lucid laconism at your service. Here is one: "It is a popular error to say that where there is dinner for two, there is dinner enough for three; it ought to be, Where there is dinner for three, there is perhaps enough for two." With which wise saying I end my desultory paper, wishing the courteous reader good dinners and a healthy appetite thereto.

"Un poëme jamais ne valut un dîner:"

how much less an essay!

Digitized by Google

MARRIAGE SUPERSTITIONS.

Of course, in the matter of marriage, we are all superstitious. Nearly everybody has a horseshoe or a bit of rabbit's foot about him, and would rather walk under a ladder than under the canopy of the marriage altar. Even the most skeptical of us, when we are about to be married, feel persuaded in our hearts that there is something in the old saying, "Marry in May, rue the day;" and during the past holiday season, for fear of the worst, we have all been careful to hide away our brooms, that not being the way to secure a happy married life.

But while we offer to the fates these trifling sacrifices, we are apt to forget the more important ones which they require of us. Thus, for instance, we are careful to have a thousand dollars in our pockets when we start for church, but we are apt to forget that the fates require that we should have a thousand dollars in our hearts when we start for home. Now, this is a superstition which we would like to see more generally observed. Of course, we do not mean that the thousand dollars in the heart should be in the form of bank-notes, or gold, or silver, or even of greenbacks, but that it should be in the form of love, and sympathy, and kindness, and forbearance, and all those other qualities which are worth more than money, and which, if they are not found in the heart of the husband, will make the home a very unhappy one for the wife. Of course, we do not mean that the husband should be the only one who is required to have a thousand dollars in his heart. The wife should have it there also, and should be careful to keep it there. Indeed, it is quite as important that she should have it there as that he should, for it is she who is the more likely to forget it. Many a man has had his heart broken by finding that his wife had left her thousand dollars at home, when she went out to spend the day with her mother, or to make a visit to her friends silke and thread; the best edged with a small gold lace or twist, which being folded up in foure crosse foldes, so as the middle might be seene, gentlemen and others did usually weare them in their hats as favours of their loves and mistresses. Some cost sixpence apiece, some twelvepence, and the richest sixteenpence."

A gay procession formed a part of the humbler marriages. The bride was led to church between two boys, wearing bride-laces and rosemary tied about their silken sleeves; and before her was carried a silver cup filled with wine, in which was a branch of gilded rosemary hung about with silk ribbons of all colors. Next came the musicians, and then the bride-maids, some bearing great bride-cakes, others garlands of gilded wheat; and thus they marched to church amidst the shouts and benedictions of the spectators.

The next old customs are those which are observed on the bride's departure from home. It was said to be in virtue of a Highland fashion that a new broom was thrown after Princess Louise as she left the Castle on her wedding-day; but otherwise it seems to me a very uncomplimentary proceeding to sweep the bridal couple away.

Rice and sugar I have myself often seen showered down on the "happy united" as emblems of abundance; but, unless done dexterously, the proud husband's brand-new coat and hat will have a dowry witness to his happiness not quite desirable.

The origin of throwing the old shoe is still enshrouded with mystery. Throwing the shoe in Kent is differently conducted from the general way. When the carriage starts with the "happy pair" the bride-maids are drawn up in a row, and the groomsmen in another. The old shoe is then thrown as far as possible, and the bride-maids run for it, the successful one being supposed to be the first to get married; the lucky one then throws the shoe at the groomsmen, the one who is hit by it also being supposed to be the first who will enter the bonds of wedlock. Urquhart, in "Pillars of Hercules," thinks that the custom of throwing the shoe arose from the usage in the East of bearing a slipper before the couple in token of the bride's subjection to her husband. If this be it, the brides of the period will grow restive, and refuse the salutation of the usual avalanche of old white satin shoes, as they don't mind loving, but they don't care for the subjection or obeying. Among the nobles in Germany it was formerly the custom for the bride, when she was conducted to the bride-chamber, to take off her shoe and throw it among the by-standers, which every one strove to catch, and whoever got it thought it an omen that they themselves would shortly be married.

It is rather remarkable that in Prussia, and perhaps in other parts of Central Europe, the throwing of broken crockery at doors is a regular practice at marriages. Lord Malmesbury, who in 1791 married a princess of that country as proxy for the Duke of York, tells us that the morning after the ceremonies a great heap of such rubbish was found at her royal highness's doors.

In Worcestershire there is a marriage-bell custom. Late in the evening on the day a marriage has been celebrated the ringers go to the church, and foretell on the great bell the number of children with which the marriage is to be blessed; and as many times as the clapper smites the bell, so many children will fill their quiver.

At Hope Church, in Derbyshire, it is the custom for the clerk to call aloud, while the couple are standing at the altar rails, "God speed the couple well!" and also at the publication of the bans.

At Cranbrook, in Kent, it is customary, instead of strewing the newly married couple's path with flowers, to strew it with emblems of the bridegroom's calling. Carpenters walk on shavings, butchers on skins of slaughtered sheep, the followers of St. Crispin are honored with leather parings, paper-hangers with slips of paper, blacksmiths with old iron, rusty nails, etc.

In some parts of Monmouthshire there is a most peculiar custom. The bride pays "the lads of the village" to meet her, after the sacred rite has been performed, with chains of hay and straw at the church-yard gate, and the happy pair are "then and there enchained."

In Scotland they used always to wash the bridegroom's feet before the marriage day, but this is now obsolete.

There is a Norfolk saying, "Be sure when you go to get married that you don't go in at one door and out at another, or you will always be unlucky." In Yorkshire the bride-cake is cut into little square pieces and thrown over the heads of the bridal pair, and the pieces picked up and drawn through the ring. Sometimes, though, the pieces are left for the crowd to scramble for.

The pieces of cake drawn through the ring should be done so nine times, and then rolled up in little packets and put under all the single ones' pillows at night, when they will be sure to dream of their future helpmates. In Scotland it is customary for the mother or nearest female relative of the bridegroom to attend at his house to receive the newly married pair. She is expected to meet them at the door with a currant bun, which she is to break over the head of the newly made wife before entering the house. It is considered very unlucky should the bun be broken by mistake over the head of any person but that of the bride.

FORBIDDEN FRUIT.

FORBIDDEN FRUIT.

WE do not precisely know which of the actors in this pretty picture the artist means to designate as eating the forbidden fruit—the policeman who, neglectful of his duty, is talking to the pretty nurse-maid, or the nurse-maid who has quite forgotten her charge in listening to the tender words of her lover, or the goat that is attempting to munch the grasses and berries in baby's hat. The only one clearly free from blame is baby herself, whose eyes are distended with terror, and whose screams, let us hope, will soon call the maid to the rescue. It is evident that a critical moment has arrived, and that the victim in the cradle is about to make a sturdy resistance, which will have the effect of sending all the delinquents about their legitimate business.

Digitized by Google

BLOWER T.—Biscuit may be used singly as a collective noun or in the plural form.

ROSA ESPIMOOIA.—You will be strangely lacking in courtesy if you do not thank the gentleman for the plant he has sent you, no matter how slight may be the acquaintance.

J. C. B.—The Worth basque is for street as well as house dress. The skirt of that costume is longer, however, than the Bazar ever commends for the street. You will want about nine yards of silk. Put velvet folds instead of the satin trimming on your skirt.

HALL'S Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer is an excellent dressing and tonic for the hair, and makes the hair grow thick.—[Com.]

BRUNETTE.—By dampening the face with cold water, after the first application of PERSIAN SPRAY, and again rubbing dry with a towel, detection is absolutely defied.—[Com.]

LUXURY, Health, Economy insured by using Dooley's Yeast Powder. Elegant light Rolls, Biscuits, etc., prepared in ten minutes. Depôt, 69 New St., N.Y.—[Com.]

ROSE COLD AND HAY FEVER disappear by the use of Jonas Whitcomb's Asthma Remedy.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PATENT

Eider-Down Corsets.

WORN BY

QUEEN VICTORIA & PRINCESS OF WALES.

Newest French shapes. Support and add grace to the figure. Warm, light, and elegant. Prevent chills and preserve health. Maintain agreeable warmth, comfort, and equal temperature.

Eider-Down—Lightest, Warmest, and Softest of Downs.

Material in Scarlet, Bismarck, Dove, and White.

The Eider-Down Corsets are alike excellent in principle and practice. They guard against undue temperature, either hot or cold, most efficiently, and, in addition, they are soft, very light, and flexible. I believe them, therefore, to be infinitely superior to the form of Corset in ordinary use.—W. TINDAL ROBERTSON, M.D.

Sole Agents, ERSKINE & CO.,
St. Nicholas Hotel, 523 Broadway, N. Y.

It has the delicate and refreshing fragrance of genuine Farina Cologne Water, and is indispensable to

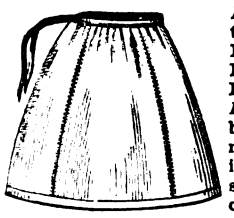
COLGATE'S EAU-DE-COLOGNE TOILET SOAP.

the Toilet of every Lady or Gentleman. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in PERFUMERY.

TRADE-MARK.

'RUSSIAN GORED KNIT UNDERSKIRT,"

A NEW ARTICLE,



Invented and manufactured exclusively by the NORFOLK & NEW BRUNSWICK HOSIERY CO., upon their Patented Knitting Looms, being superior to flannel, much lighter, perfect in shape, and will not shrink nor change in color from washing.

ALSO,

FULL-FASHIONED HOSIERY,

consisting of

adies', Gents', Misses', and Boys' Underwear, of every description, superior in quality and style to any oods made in this country, and fully equal to the best and-loom imported goods, and at greatly reduced rices.

Full lines for sale, to the jobbing trade only, at H. J. IBBY & CO.'S, 47 & 49 White St., N. Y.

Excelsior Waterproof Cage Mat

Keeps cages clean and free from vermin. 5 Packages sent on receipt of $1 00 and inside dimensions of cage (12 Mats in a Package). J. BECKER & Co., 1140 Broadway. Send stamp for circular. SCHENCK & CO., 969½ Pearl St., New York.

1 Great Offer.— HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., ill dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and RGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS ONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in onthly or quarterly installments.

E. RIMMEL,

PERFUMER,

PARIS, LONDON, BRUSSELS.

THE AMERICUS CLUB BOUQUET,

The Perfume of the Season.

JOCKEY CLUB,
WHITE ROSE,
MUSK,
IHLANG IHLANG,
&c., &c., &c., &c.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Special Representatives for United States,
EDWARDES & RUSSELL, 88 Vesey St., N. Y.

STRASBURGER & PFEIFFER,

(Successors to Strasburger, Fritz, & Pfeiffer),

IMPORTERS OF GERMAN, FRENCH, AND ENGLISH

TOYS,

China & Fancy Goods,

BOHEMIAN GLASS and LAVA WARES,

MUSIC BOXES, ACCORDEONS, HARMONICAS, CONCERTINAS, &c., &c.,

394 Broadway, near Canal St., N.Y.

Parlor Ornaments, latest novelties in Toys, Fancy and Ornamental Goods constantly arriving to supply the general demand.

GLYCERINE CAKE.

RAWOLLE'S TOILET GLYCERINE CAKE is unequaled for Washing, Shaving, Shampooing, Tooth Soap, and Baby Wash; produces a clear, soft, white skin, and prevents pimples and chapping. Warranted over one-half pure Glycerine. For sale by druggists. MARX & RAWOLLE, Manufacturers of Glycerine, 179 William St., New York.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS,

NOW ON EXHIBITION

AT THE

Fair of the American Institute,

Together with the original Oil Paintings.

CALL AND SEE THEM!

☞ Illustrated Catalogues to be had gratis, at the fair, or on application to

L. PRANG & CO.,
BOSTON, MASS.

$250 A Month easily made with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Secure Circular and Samples, free. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
have nearly ready:

THE RISE AND FALL

OF THE

PARIS COMMUNE.

WITH A FULL ACCOUNT OF

THE BOMBARDMENT, CAPTURE, & BURNING OF THE CITY.

By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE,

An Eye-Witness of the Events described,
Editor of "Harper's Hand-Book of European Travel," "Harper's Phrase-Book," &c.

WITH A MAP OF PARIS AND PORTRAITS FROM ORIGINAL PHOTOGRAPHS.

Large 12mo, 516 pages, Cloth, price $2.

Mr. Fetridge remained in Paris during the eventful and perilous period of which he has become the faithful historian. Nothing seems to have escaped his eye, and every page of his thrilling narrative shows with what intelligent scrutiny he has seized upon the salient incidents of a chronicle that constitutes one of the most memorable chapters in modern history.

His book contains the sayings and doings of the Commune during the seventy-three days of its reign; its principal official documents; and a narrative of the circumstances incident to the origin of its power and its final defeat. The work is illustrated with splendid portraits, including those of Marshal McMahon and his principal generals, of Thiers, of Rochefort, and of the leading members of the Commune.

This remarkable history embraces an account of the Coup d'Etat of March 18, followed almost immediately by the surrender of Paris; the Investment and Bombardment of the City by the Government Forces; the Massacre of March 22 in the Rue de la Paix; the Schism in the Order of Free-Masons—one Party placing its Banners on the Ramparts, the other Protesting; the Dismantling of the Churches; the Destruction of the Column Vendôme; the Horrible Explosions in the City; the Ruinous Bombardment; the Entrance of the Government Troops; the Despair of the Commune, ushering in a Reign of Blood and Fire; the Assassination of the incarcerated Hostages, including the Archbishop of Paris and the Curé of the Madelaine; the Burning of the Tuileries and of other Palaces and Public Buildings; the Desperate Struggle of the Insurgents behind the Barricades; the Final Conflict in the Cemetery of Pere la Chaise; the Summary Vengeance of the Versailles Government, with all the detailed horrors of the Seven Days of Murders and Executions.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $2 00.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

have made

Large Additions

of

ELEGANT NOVELTIES

just received

in

LADIES' READY-MADE SUITS,

LACES, EMBROIDERIES, SHAWLS,

DRESS GOODS, HOSIERY.

ALEXANDRE'S CELEBRATED KID GLOVES,

MEN'S FURNISHING GOODS,

LADIES', MISSES', AND CHILDREN'S UNDERWEAR.

CARPETS, CURTAIN MATERIALS, DAMASKS, and a large variety of every description

of

HOUSE-KEEPING AND HOUSE-FURNISHING GOODS.

PLEASE CALL AND EXAMINE.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH & 10TH STS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,

Broadway and Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

FALL AND WINTER DRESS FABRICS.
All the newest colorings in
SATIN DE CHINES, BRILLIANTINES,
BARATHEAS, CREPE DE PARIS.
SERGES OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS.
SCOTCH WOOL PLAIDS AND WATERPROOFS.
An elegant assortment of new designs in
"ROBES DE CHAMBRE."
SILK AND WOOL POPLINS, &c., &c.
We are now offering
300 pieces PURPLE FRENCH POPLINS AND EPINGLINES, all Silk and Wool, new and desirable goods, at 75 cents per yard, worth $1 25.
200 pieces at $1 00 per yard, worth $1 50.

HOUSE AND HOTEL FURNISHING.
FAMILY, TABLE, AND BED LINENS.
TABLE DAMASKS, CLOTHS, AND NAPKINS.
TOWELS and TOWELINGS, LUNCH CLOTHS, and FRUIT DOYLIES.
Every description of WHITE GOODS.
BLANKETS, QUILTS, COMFORTABLES, FLANNELS, &c., &c.

LADIES', GENTLEMEN'S, YOUTHS', AND CHILDREN'S FURNISHING GOODS DEPARTMENT, complete in every detail,
AT REASONABLE PRICES.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street.

NOW OPENING,

a large stock of

LADIES' COSTUMES,

FANCY WOOLEN CLOAKS,

EMBROIDERED HOUSE JACKETS,

FUR SEAL JACKETS, FANCY FURS, &c.

All Imported Goods, and in elegant variety, to the Trade only.

THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO.,
391 Broadway, N. Y.

Figures will not lie!

How Large Fortunes are made!

☞ FACTS FOR THE PEOPLE. ☜

☞ SEE the prices at which four of the leading Sewing Machines are sold in the UNITED STATES, and ENGLAND.

	Price in England.	In the U. S.
Wheeler & Wilson	$45.00	$85.00
New Singer - -	32.50	65.00
Elias Howe - -	35.00	65.00
Wilson Shuttle -	40.00	45.00

The above Prices are for exactly the same classes of machines as sold in both Countries. There is scarcely any difference in the cost of material and labor in any of the above named machines.

☞ AFFIDAVIT.—W. G. Wilson, President of the Wilson Sewing Machine Co., personally appeared before me, and made oath that the above prices are correct, and taken by him from Circulars published in the United States and England under the corporate names of the Companies manufacturing said machines. FRED. SMITH,
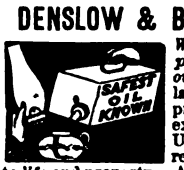
Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas of Cuyahoga Co., O.

The WILSON SEWING MACHINES are for Sale in most every County in the United States, and
No. 707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

DENSLOW & BUSH'S "SAFETY" OIL



Will not explode! Safest and purest oil ever produced! Stands over 150° fire test! We take regular Kerosene oil and by our new process expel all impurities and explosive elements. The Fire Underwriters of N. Y. urgently recommend our oil as a protection to life and property. A lighted lamp may be upset and broken without fear of explosion or fire. For sale by all grocers, druggists, &c., in the U. S. Extra inducements to dealers. Address DENSLOW & BUSH, 130 Maiden Lane, N. Y.; 8 Custom H. St., Boston, Mass.; 34 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.; 51 S. Water St., Chicago, Ill.; or Cleveland, O.

FREE Try samples of our great 8-page, $1 00, illustrated weekly—30 years established. Fine steel engravings free to subscribers. Agents make $5 a day. Send for The Saturday Gazette, Hallowell, Me.

Ladies!! USE PERSIAN SPRAY WHICH MELTS The Complexion BEAUTIFUL.

NICOL & DAVIDSON, 686 Broadway,

Are receiving Novelties from Paris and London in

EAL BRONZES, COMPOSITION BRONZES, BISQUE GOODS,
FRENCH CHINA DINNER, DESSERT, AND TEA SERVICES,
VASES, PARIAN STATUARY (from Minton), MANTEL SETS,
GLASSWARE (from Baccarat),
GLASS CHANDELIERS (from Osler), SHEFFIELD TABLE CUTLERY, &c., &c.
ALSO, OF OWN MANUFACTURE,
GAS FIXTURES and FINE SILVER-PLATED WARE.

Digitized by Google

THE BEAVER BRAND.

TRADE MARK REG'D.

SILK-FINISHED

BLACK PURE MOHAIRS.

These GOODS are finished alike on both sides, and are distinguished for their silky appearance, brilliant lustre, and pure shade of fast Black. Being made of the very finest material, they positively excel all other Mohairs ever sold in the United States.

These splendid Goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

☞ Purchasers will know these Goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Beaver, precisely like the above.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 & 429 Broadway, New York,
Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

INFANT'S WARDROBE "B"

FOR $100.

2 Flannel Bands	@	$0 50	$1 00
2 Barrie Coats	@	2 00	4 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@	3 00	6 00
3 Cambric "	@	1 50	4 50
3 " " Tucked	@	2 00	6 00
6 Linen Shirts	@	1 00	6 00
6 Night Dresses	@	2 25	13 50
6 Slips	@	2 50	15 00
1 Calico Wrapper			1 50
2 Day Dresses	@	4 00	8 00
1 Robe			9 00
1 Basket, furnished			6 50
6 Pairs Knitted Socks	@	62½	3 75
1 Embroidered Merino Shawl			5 50
1 "Eureka" Diaper			1 00
A Set of Linen Diapers			2 50
1 Rubber Bib			50
2 Quilted Bibs	@	50	1 00
1 Lace Cap			4 75
			$100 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent, C. O. D., by Express. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials.

LORD & TAYLOR,

BROADWAY & TWENTIETH ST.,

NEW YORK.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

Dutch Bulbous Roots.

SMALL FRUITS.

Just published, our new AUTUMN CATALOGUE of the above, enlarged and improved, containing 60 pages of printed matter, and many new and beautiful engravings, including a large and finely colored lithograph of a GROUP OF HYACINTHS. Also a descriptive list of small fruits, among which are several new varieties of Strawberries never before offered to the public. A copy will be mailed to all applicants upon receipt of 10 cents. Regular customers supplied gratis. Address B. K. BLISS & SONS,
23 Park Place and 20 Murray St., New York.
(P. O. Box No. 5712.)

C. WORCH, destroyer of
MOTHS IN FURNITURE.
The only reliable remedy for vermin of this kind.
110 Fourth Avenue, New York.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA,
with the Green-Tea Flavor. Warranted to suit all tastes. For sale everywhere. And for sale wholesale only by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 8 Church St., N.Y. P.O. Box 5506.
Send for Thea-Nectar Circular.

RIFLES, Shot-Guns, Revolvers, Gun Material. Write for Price-List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents wanted.

$290 For first-class Pianos—Sent on trial—No Ag'ts. Address U. S. PIANO CO., 865 B'dway, N. Y.

ESTB. 1809.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO

For General Household Purposes,
BETTER & CHEAPER THAN SOAP.

Cleans windows, scours knives and table ware, removes stains and rust, and is the very best thing ever used for general house cleaning. For sale by all good Grocery and Drug Stores. Wholesale, 211 Washington St., N. Y.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

DYSPEPSIA MET AND CONQUERED.

Pain has its uses. It indicates the seat of disease and its nature. If the locality, progress, and intensity of a disorder were not manifested by the torture it occasions, the victim would be surprised by death before he was conscious of danger. The indescribable tortures which accompany Dyspepsia preclude all doubt as to the character of the malady. Combat the enemy promptly with

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT.

This pleasant specific meets the disease at all points—in the weakened stomach, the torpid liver, the constipated bowels, the shattered nerves—and by restoring all these organs to their natural condition, effects a radical cure.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

NEW YORK CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,

The oldest and best Music School in the country,
NOW OPEN FOR PRIVATE AND CLASS INSTRUCTION
In all branches of Vocal and Instrumental Music, Harmony and Composition, and the Modern Languages.
All Applications for Admission must be made at the
GENERAL CONSERVATORY OFFICES,
820 BROADWAY, near 13th St., over the Music Store.
(The branch at No. 82 Fifth Avenue removes up town.)
BROOKLYN BRANCH, 102, 104, & 106 COURT ST., near State.

JOAQUIN MILLER'S POEMS.

SONGS OF THE SIERRAS.

"With a few exceptions, the book is the most original of the generation. Even his blemishes are gilded by his genius."—Harriet Prescott Spofford in "Old and New."

"In some respects the most remarkable book of the year, or of the decade, and, as introducing a new style of American poetry, it fully deserves all the notice that the English literary journals have given it."—Springfield Republican.

One Elegant 16mo Volume. Price $1 50.

Sold every where. Mailed, postpaid, by the publishers,

ROBERTS BROS., Boston.

WE SEND SINGLE

WALTHAM WATCHES

by Express to any part of the United States, and allow the purchaser to open the package and examine the watch before paying the bill. Send for our price-list, which gives full particulars, and please state that you saw this advertisement in Harper's Bazar.

HOWARD & CO.,
No. 865 Broadway, New York.
☞ All prices reduced since Feb. 1st.

WICKES' ECLECTIC OIL
Is Pure, Safe, Sweet, and Economical.
J. H. WICKES,
120 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	No.	26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	"	30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	"	38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	"	40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	"	46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	"	48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	"	1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	"	5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	"	11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	13
POSTILION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	15
SHORT-SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	17
LADY'S TRAVELING SUIT	"	21
MISS'S POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 7 to 15 years old)	"	23
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)	"	25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)	"	27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)	"	29
BOY'S BLOUSE, SHIRT-WAIST, and KNICKERBOCKERS (for Boy from 4 to 9 years old)	"	31
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)	"	33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt)	"	35
MARGUERITE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	37
LOUIS XIV. POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	39
VEST-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	41

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

BUILDERS and all who contemplate building, supplied with descriptive circular of "Village Builder." Address A. J. BICKNELL & CO., Publishers, 27 Warren St., N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

FOUR MONTHS FOR ONE DOLLAR.

"Poor Miss Finch,"

A new and beautifully illustrated serial story, by

WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "The Moonstone," &c., has just commenced in Harper's Weekly.

New Subscribers will be supplied with the WEEKLY from No. 766 [for September 2], in which Number this story began, to the close of the year, four months, for ONE DOLLAR.

HARPER'S WEEKLY contains ONE-THIRD more reading-matter, a larger number of Illustrations, and is conspicuously better Edited and Printed than any other Illustrated Newspaper. Its circulation is four times that of any similar publication.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

CARBOLIC HEALING COMPOUND C.S. SALVE

Beautifies the complexion by removing Pimples and all other disagreeable disorders of the skin. Twenty-five cents per box.

JOHN F. HENRY, Sole Proprietor,
No. 8 College Place, New York.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

The subscriber is desirous of securing the services of many more competent Agents, of both sexes. He knows well how to anticipate the feelings of that class of benefactors known as Book Agents, and can confidently assure such persons that the books he is now selling through that channel are works that an Agent may feel a pleasure in offering to the public. Another advantage that his Agents possess is that his books are all published by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS, a house without a rival in the character and variety of their publications, and in their facilities to produce them. Intelligent, energetic, and persevering Agents are realizing liberal salaries from the commissions paid. Those desiring to engage in this vocation, and meaning business, are requested to make application to

AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for OCTOBER, 1871.

KINGSLEY'S WEST INDIES. At Last: a Christmas in the West Indies. By CHARLES KINGSLEY. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE TEMPEST. Edited, with Notes, by WM. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High-School, Cambridge, Mass., and Editor of "The Merchant of Venice." Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

BULWER'S KING ARTHUR. King Arthur. A Poem. By EARL LYTTON. 12mo, Cloth, Illuminated, $1 75.

BROUGHAM'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY. The Life and Times of HENRY, LORD BROUGHAM. Written by Himself. Vols. I. and II. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per vol. (To be completed in Three Volumes.)

THE COUSIN FROM INDIA. A Book for Girls. By GEORGIANA M. CRAIK, Author of "Mildred," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

LITTLE SUNSHINE'S HOLIDAY: a Picture from Life. A Book for Girls. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." With Illustrations by Frölich. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

ABBOTT'S FREDERICK THE GREAT. The History of Frederick the Second, called Frederick the Great. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. Elegantly Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

JEFFERSON'S DOMESTIC LIFE. The Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson: compiled from Family Letters and Reminiscences by his Great-Granddaughter, SARAH N. RANDOLPH. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Illuminated Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

LYELL'S STUDENT'S GEOLOGY. The Student's Elements of Geology. By Sir CHARLES LYELL, Bart., F.R.S., Author of "The Principles of Geology," "The Antiquity of Man," &c. With more than 600 Illustrations on Wood. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

REINDEER, DOGS, AND SNOW-SHOES. A Journal of Siberian Travel and Explorations made in the Years 1865-'67. By RICHARD J. BUSH, late of the Russo-American Telegraph Expedition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

ANNE FURNESS. By the Author of "Mabel's Progress," "The Sacristan's Household," "Veronica," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

A DAUGHTER OF HETH. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "Kilmeny," "In Silk Attire," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

NEW LIBRARY EDITIONS by the Author of "John Halifax:"

OLIVE.—OGILVIES.—THE HEAD OF THE FAMILY.—JOHN HALIFAX.—AGATHA'S HUSBAND. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per volume.

A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Put Yourself in His Place," "Griffith Gaunt," "Hard Cash," "White Lies," "Foul Play," &c. With many Original Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

FOR LACK OF GOLD. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "Robin Gray." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE ISLAND NEIGHBORS. A Novel of American Life. By Mrs. A. B. BLACKWELL. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

NEW EDITIONS

OF BOOKS

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

READE'S LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

COMFORT'S GERMAN COURSE. 12mo, Half Leather, $2 00.

THE DODGE CLUB. By JAMES DE MILLE. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

CORD AND CREESE. By JAMES DE MILLE. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

WADDELL'S LATIN GRAMMAR. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

WILLSON'S FIRST READER. 12mo, 40 cents.

ABBOTTS' ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES: Josephine.—Margaret of Anjou.—Charles I. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20 per vol.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

$10 A DAY with Stencil Tools. Samples free. Address A. E. GRAHAM, Springfield, Vt.

Digitized by Google

MODERN LEISURE.

"YES, FRED HAS ONLY GOT SIX WEEKS' LEAVE: SO WE'RE GOING TO ITALY AND SWITZERLAND, AND MEAN TO TRY HOW MANY PLACES WE CAN 'DO' IN THE TIME."

THE LIGHT FANTASTIC TOE.

BRITISH YOUTH. "But you don't mean to say your Countrymen are better Dancers than we are?"
AMERICAN BELLE. "Wa'al, no! You're spry enough at Hopping; but I guess you don't 'Bunch!'"

[Which, interpreted, means that Englishmen are sufficiently irreproachable as far as Dancing is concerned, but that they are not in the habit of giving Bouquets to their Partners.

S NOT COME DRESSED TO THE OPERA.

THE LADY WHO HAS!

DISCRETION IS THE BETTER PART OF VALOR.

Tom and Arthur have been rude to their Mamma. Mamma has complained to Papa, who is heard coming up stairs.

ARTHUR. "I say, Tom, here comes Papa—I shall pretend to be Asleep."
TOM. "I sha'n't—I shall get up and put Something On."

THE TABLES TURNED.

A youth in Iowa, who has a turn for practical joking, recently tried to impose upon an honest lager-beer vendor by leading a mule into his saloon, and taking him up to the bar as if for a drink. Mein Herr looked steadily at the pair for a few moments, as if collecting his stray wits, and then broke out as follows:

"See here, Vynce, I know vat dis is here—your own brudder—but he be one you call a minor. He ish too much young to drink his glass lager; it is not for the law in no place, nor not mit my saloon. He look like you; you may be one family, as you call it; but if you ever bring dat young brudder here again, I vill shust tell you old fadder jackass of you both. Now you shust go along mit yourself."

The young man and the mule went along, weeping as they went.

Facts should be put down in black and white; in another colored ink they might appear ink-red-ible.

UNREASONABLE.—A man whom we know is so keen in money matters that positively he refused to conclude the purchase of a house for 999 years because he could not have the odd year thrown in.

THE HAPPIEST PAIR.—Eve was the only woman who never threatened to go and live with mamma; and Adam was the only man who never tantalized his wife about "the way mother used to cook."

It is unreasonable to complain because your clock stops—it can not get on without a weight.

A young married woman in the country says she wishes she had a magic mirror to see how her husband amuses himself in her absence.

A soldier can not be even half a soldier if he is in quarters.

A CRACK SHOT.

DUFFERTON (who is a good shot). "Well, I could have sworn I hit the 'bull' that time."

OFFICER IN CHARGE (Arching a look through his glass). "No, but very near; you have killed the cow in the field to the left."

It does not follow because you bail a friend out that you need treat him like water.

A COOL HAND.

ACCOMMODATING CREDITOR. "How often must I climb three pairs of stairs before I get the amount of this little account?"

DEBTOR. "Do you think I am going to rent a place on the first floor to accommodate my creditors?"

It is a funny thing about a dentist that the more he stops the faster he gets on.

If three feet will make a yard, how many hands need you employ to build a washhouse in it?

A QUIET RETREAT.—One of the happiest places in the world must be Stornoway, the regular postal communication with that favored spot being but once a year. What a paradise it would be for those who are liable to twelve deliveries a day of letters, circulars, etc.

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 42.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THE accompanying illustration gives back and front views of this graceful and elegant wrapper. The first is shown of violet cashmere, trimmed with a wide box-pleated flounce of the material on the bottom, and a graduated pleating around the neck, simulating a collar, which is surmounted by a muslin frill. In the second figure, which gives a front view of the wrapper, it is made of black and white plaid flannel, closed all the way down the front with black velvet buttons, which also trim the half-flowing sleeves. A graduated scalloped strip of the material, bound with black velvet, is set with a black velvet strip on each side of the buttons, and extends around the neck. The pattern gives the wrapper without a flounce, and with perforations to show where to put on this trimming. The wrapper is cut in the princesse shape, with the waist and skirt in one piece, and has a double Watteau pleat behind, extending to the bottom, and loosely confined by a belt on the inside. It may be made of any material. The bust measure is taken in the usual manner, by passing a tape entirely around the body, across the largest part of the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern is in six pieces—front, side piece, half of back, sleeve, cuff, and piece for trimming. Only half of the pattern is given. The fronts are cut with one dart on each side. The back is cut with side forms, and is laid in a double Watteau pleat in the middle. The trimming piece is sewed on each side of the buttons that close the wrapper from the bottom to the line of perforations on the waist, whence it passes over the shoulder and across the top of the Watteau pleat in the back, forming a small round collar. The half-flowing sleeve has a square cuff, trimmed to match the front. Cut the back with the straight edge of the pattern laid on the fold of the cloth, to avoid making a seam. Sew in the line of six perforations from the neck to the waist line, then open the pleat, and bring the five lines of three perforations evenly together, thus forming the double Watteau pleat. Cut the bias strip for trimming four inches wide at the bottom, and graduate the width, making it two inches wide at the middle of the back of the neck. The piece of trimming given in the pattern shows the width of the bottom scallops. The pattern is notched to prevent mistakes in putting it together. The perforations show where to baste the seams, to take up the darts, and to sew on the trimming from the waist, and how to lay the pleats.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 10 yards.
Extra for trimming, 1 yard.
Buttons, 24. Velvet, 24 yards.

LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER.—BACK AND FRONT.

[Cut Paper Patterns of the Watteau Wrapper, graded to fit any Figure, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches, Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

FISH-SCALE FLOWERS.

SOME time ago the writer was present in a large Roman Catholic church on the occasion of some special festival. There were, as usual, grand floral decorations; and besides a profusion of natural flowers, there were also some very choice artificial specimens. Around the edge of the altar was seen an exquisite wreath of pure white glistening flowers, which seemed to be composed of mother-of-pearl, they were so brilliant and lustrous.

Upon drawing near to examine them at the close of the service, the secret of their manufacture was discovered, and a Sister of Charity, intrusted with the care of the altar, very civilly explained to me the method of producing such gorgeous ornaments out of such cheap and common articles as the scales of fish.—This wreath, she said, was made in a convent in France, where the art had been brought to such perfection that large prices were readily obtained for even a small wreath. She herself had learned to make them, and for a consideration the process was explained to me.

The fish scales (those of shad are best for the purpose) are to be spread out to dry without much washing, as that would remove the pearly lustre, and when dry they are to be lined with thin muslin gummed on to the under side; next wire each scale, which will form a flower petal, taking fine white covered wire, such as is used for wax-work. The stamens are made of white wax and waxed spool cotton, which are fastened to a lump of the same substance placed on the end of a stiff wire, just as heating rather than take the trouble to rebuke iniquity and require justice. We lament sometimes the growing power and deprecate the intolerable tyranny of railroad monopolies; but public opinion is all-powerful. Before an awakened public sentiment, an aroused public resolution, the railroad corporation bows down its head like a bulrush. When the Swampscot committee of five waited upon the president of the Eastern Railroad with a draft of suggestions and requests covering the most obvious dangers which now beset railway travel, the president gave his unqualified assent, and pledged immediate action on nearly all, and regarding the remainder promised the earliest practicable compliance. If the same committee, appointed by the same assembly of citizens, men of substance and influence, had waited upon the president a year ago and requested him to provide seats for all passengers, modern brakes, guards at the station and on the curves, and to banish kerosene and camphene from the cars, would he have failed to assent? But these defects existed long before the Pullman engine plunged into the fated car. We saw them and felt them, and went our way. Not till thirty-two human beings had been crushed to death before our eyes would we take the trouble to exercise the power we possessed just as surely, if not just as directly, as did engineers and directors. We are verily guilty concerning our brethren.

Digitized by Google

In all the suggestions for future safety I regret to see none regarding the means of heating cars. The winter is coming, and before long those little black imps which we call stoves will be set up, and turn into glowing, glowering red-hot fiends waiting to devour us. I never see one in a heated, poisonous coach but the shimmering thing seems to be sentient and savage, eager and gloating over the woe and death he holds in waiting for us. What do we gain by banishing kerosene for a few hours in the day, while all day and all night we carry a reservoir of fire which in five seconds can wrap us in flaming death, or in a horror for which death is the only outlet? Must it be so? Can not the ingenious American mind invent some way by which the trains shall be warmed by steam generated or water heated on the engine? Our stoves are abominable even when they are not diabolic. They produce an atmosphere unequal and intolerable. The feet are benumbed with cold and the head throbs with heat. Hot-water pipes, covered with rugs, running along the floor, make an equable and agreeable temperature, and, if their source could be securely lodged, would add nothing to the dangers of a collision; and yet through the whole country the wild train will go swaying,

"With hell in its heart and death in its hand, Daring the doom of the Unknown Land."

How many railroad coaches must become chariots of fire, how many human beings must suffer the tortures of the Inquisition, without the moral support of dying for a cause, before we shall contrive a way out of the jaws of death?

We ought to strike while the iron is hot—if possible before it gets hot. Railroad managers no more wish harm to their passengers than do the passengers themselves. They are as good citizens, as upright, as well-meaning, as tender-hearted as we. But the price of safety is eternal vigilance. We have all been apathetic together. Now that we are aroused to a sense of past remissness and ever-present responsibility, now that those in authority are peculiarly open to suggestion and desirous of improvement, let us not demand, but devise and secure, every possible change that promises immunity, not to say comfort; and for one thing, let every stove be sunk forty fathoms deep rather than lift its horrid front in a railway carriage.

And let us all—men and women alike—remember that the safety and the morals of the community are the monopoly of no corporation, but are given in trust to every member of the community; and that where, out of regard to his own ease, he permits neglect or transgression to go unnoticed, he becomes a partner in the crime, and helps to demoralize the society which it is his duty to uplift.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Points of View.

MY DEAR LEONARD,—Coming into town by an early train the other morning, I admired for some time what I supposed to be a pretty little Gothic chapel upon one of the fine estates that skirt the river; and as I thought how charming a temple it was in which, as the old phrase was, to perform your devotions, and imagined with satisfaction the fervor of piety which consecrated it every week—or, indeed, every day (for the English nobility have prayers every day, and why not ours?)—I suddenly perceived that the pretty little temple was not a chapel, but an ice-house. The point of view was changed by the rapid movement of the train, and that explained the misapprehension. If I had turned away before the point of view changed, I should always have honestly believed the building to be a chapel, and there would have been a great many people who would have asked whether I were a fool or a knave that I could not distinguish a church from an ice-house. It would seldom occur to them that I was, after all, honest enough, but that the point of view explained the apparent mystery or folly.

I have always had a great deal of sympathy with Polonius, who is usually made half a clown upon the stage. The humorsome Hamlet calls his attention to a cloud that's almost in shape like a camel. The good old gentleman peers a moment, and agrees, by the mass, and 'tis like a camel, indeed. But what so fickle in form as a cloud? It changes while they gaze; and when the sad prince thinks it like a weasel, the sympathetic Mentor, with willing eyes, perceives that it is backed like a weasel. And as it visibly transforms itself, "like a whale," says young royalty, "very like a whale," echoes perceptive loyalty. My lord Polonius is censured as a time-serving old flatterer and fool because he sees in a cloud just what the prince sees. But what can not be seen in a cloud? 'Tis what the observer thinks it is. It is now a camel, and now a weasel, and now a whale, because the point of view constantly changes by the change of the cloud itself. The point of view offered is now a camel, and now a whale. At this moment it seems to be a pretty little Gothic chapel, the next moment it is an ice-house.

This is certainly one of the first lessons we learn in the story of the gold and silver shield. Sir Guy comes riding up, and swears the shield is gold. Sir Bevis will go to the death that it is silver. But just as they cross swords for God, their ladies, and the truth, each looks, and sees himself to be mistaken. Both are right, and both wrong. They fall upon each other's necks, not swords, and swear eternal friendship. Neither sulked; neither muttered under his breath, "It was gold," or "It was silver;" but both exclaimed, "Bee mee halidome! it was the point of view!" Those worthy knights were right. They had very nearly done each other to death for a difference of points of view. And the world in every direction is full of gallant gentlemen charging valiantly and tumbling each other in the dust, not for any real cause, but merely because of a difference in the point of view. "A neat Gothic chapel, if I die for it!" solemnly shouts one traveler. "Any fool can see it's an ice-house," courteously rejoins his opponent, as he lays his lance in rest; and they join in deadly battle, only to see, as both fall exhausted in wind and temper, that both are right and both wrong, and that it is only the point of view which has deceived them.

I think that we should save ourselves a good deal of friction, my dear Leonard, if upon our journey we constantly remembered how vital a difference may be produced by this little cause. If you are loitering down Fulton Street some bright autumn morning, you may see hanging in a shop window a portrait of General Sherman; and as you move leisurely along, it melts marvelously into a likeness of General Washington; and as you gaze, bewildered, it changes under your eyes into a picture of General Grant. To a curious traveler from Patagonia it would be as miraculous a picture as any that hangs in an Italian chapel. He would reverence the maker of such a marvel as divine. But the explanation is simple enough to us. It is, in a word, the point of view. If the old satyr had known that key of miracles, he would not have been wroth with the traveler who blew his hot soup to make it cool, and blew his cold hands to make them warm. The intelligent satyr would merely have remarked that it did not surprise him, because he understood the theory of points of view.

It is a theory, my dear Leonard, which would be very serviceable as a constant spring of charity, if we would always cherish it. Nothing, I know, is more exasperating than to remark the perversity of men. We see the thing correctly; why don't other people? Every sane man will admit that a chapel is a chapel, and an ice-house an ice-house. Why should any body be so obstinate or blind as not to see and own the difference? Then we fall into speculations upon the reason of such depravity. We invent and attribute a thousand evil motives. We explain the obstinacy by a theory which is fatal to honesty, and our generous minds are poisoned by corroding suspicion. But if our minds were a little more generous, they would not suspect. It is a very general habit, if we can not at once see a man's motive to be good, to suspect it to be bad. Even generosity, if we do not immediately comprehend it, we are very willing to sully with mean doubts. In an enemy's country every stranger is to be suspected; and we regard the world as the country of the enemy. Even the justice of Aristides irritates us. I don't know about so much justice, we loftily say: it looks suspicious; and we clap a black bean in the box.

I thought of this the other day when I was talking with a young friend about an old one. Senex is one of the men whom every body instinctively trusts and loves, and in whom it is not easy to find those flaws of weakness which are not infrequent in some other quarters that we might all name. Indeed, he is one of the men who justify human nature; and the failure of the rest may be forgiven to fate since he is so satisfactory. And yet, said Juvenis, as we spoke of him, he has a fatal weakness, which is painful in such a man. I was curious to know what it could be, and when I asked, Juvenis, to my dismay, replied that it was the weakness of all old and silly women! When I pressed him further he said that Senex was unwilling to tell his age. And is it not amazing, he added, that a man who seems in every other way to command our respect so absolutely, should be the victim of such a wretched weakness? I asked him if he were quite sure that it was a weakness, and he asked me in turn, and with astonishment, what else it could be. Juvenis was as sure that he saw a chapel as Sir Guy that he saw a golden shield. He would have sworn that the picture was a portrait of General Washington, and could not possibly be either General Grant or General Sherman.

I was very glad, therefore, to be able to tell him that if he would change his point of view, he would see something very different; and that if what he saw closely resembled a chapel, yet it was really an ice-house. For I told him that I had dined with Senex upon his birthday, only a week before, and that, as we sat talking at table, he smiled and said that he was always reluctant to tell his age—not because of any vanity of youth, which his gray hairs corrected, but because he felt how little he had to show for all the years he had lived. "Indeed," he said, "I feel like that unprofitable servant who hid his talent in the napkin—

'My hasting days fly on with full career,
But my late spring no bud or blossom show'th.'

I come out of the harvest field bearing no full, rich sheaf. I am ashamed to show so little for so much." Juvenis looked amazed and pained. "You see, my young friend," I said to him, "what you thought sheer vanity is pure humility. It is the difference of the point of view." And I continued, as if I had been his uncle, to warn him against insisting that the ice-house must be a chapel because it first seemed to him so.

Or why should we all feel that Methuselah wears a wig from low motives? There is unquestionably a prejudice against it. If the Right Reverend the Bishop should ascend the pulpit and reverently bow his head upon the desk enveloped in a margin of lawn, and the head should be covered with a wig—and we all knew it to be a wig—I fear that the emotions of the respectable congregation at St. Rainbow's would not be wholly reverent. Or if the great statesman and orator of our party should rise in Congress and proceed to shake a carefully adjusted wig at the crimes and fallacies of the opposition, I am afraid that the boys in the gallery would laugh. And whenever the statesman does rise to address his fellow-members I hope that he reflects what an enormous crowd of boys in the gallery is watching him closely, and how rudely they will laugh if he tries to pass off his curly wig for real hair.

There is certainly this prejudice against wigs. I wish the little ladies who are so fond of wearing them could understand it, and feel how the zeal and devotion with which they are worn make the wearers very ridiculous in the eyes of those whose respect they would gladly have. It is not difficult to understand the prejudice; for a wig is, from a very obvious point of view, a lie. It is a pretense of hair where there is only baldness; and there is a deep sense of injury when you discover that what you respected as a friend's natural crown is the clipping of somebody else's. There is wounded vanity in it, for who is not ashamed to be deceived by a wig? And what can it be but vanity upon the part of the wearer? If he has lost his hair, why should he be ashamed of it? Does he repine at the touch of nature or of time? Would he seem younger than he is—and for what dark purpose? Does he think that eyes of love can effectively languish from under a wig? Does he think that a wiggy lover can recite impassioned lines without ridicule? Would he leave with Dulcinea a lock of his wig at his departure?

Yes, a wig is vanity and deception from one point of view, but comfort and health from another. The old gentleman whom I remember in my youth, and who, to my infinite delight, used to leave his glove upon the top of his head during service in church, at last put on a wig, and was comfortable.

Digitized by Google

its appearance forbade any suspicion of vanity, and he said, with profound contentment, "Why did I never think of a wig before?" It kept him comfortable, and saved him many a cold. The wig, my dear Leonard, was an ice-house upon the statesman's head, but it was a chapel upon the old gentleman's. The difference was the point of view. And it seems to me always wise and humane to inquire, whenever we are inclined to ridicule or suspect a motive, whether there may not be another point of view. How furiously we Christians rage together about doctrines, for instance; but it is the old contest of the gold and silver shield. In old times we burned each other, in the new times we revile each other—merely for a difference in the point of view. Hereafter, when I hear a man insist that his view is orthodox and my view heterodox, I shall remember that I mistook an ice-house for a religious temple, and be patient. Yours always,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE WATTEAU WRAPPER.

THE Watteau wrapper is the fashionable morning dress. It is a simple Gabrielle with a double box-pleat behind sewed closely to the waist, while a belt from beneath the pleat holds the sides and front in position. Cashmere, merino, and fine empress cloth are the fabrics for dressy wrappers, solid colors being preferred to stripes or figures; pressed flannel in broken plaids is selected for useful dressing-gowns. French gray, violet, white, and black cashmere wrappers are among the importations. The front widths are usually lined with soft, thin silk, the sides and back with paper muslin; if greater warmth is required, the entire garment is lined with merino of some dark, rich color. The lightest qualities of cashmere, costing $1 75 a yard, and the merinoes for $1 25, are purchased for these garments. Braiding in close patterns to resemble embroidery is the fashionable trimming. White is braided in a single bright color, crimson or pale blue being most admired; colored cashmeres are ornamented with braid of a darker shade; black is braided with white, or white and black mixed, or with gold, or in gay India colors. The front breadths, the sleeves, a collar, and pockets are often covered with braiding. A simple and stylish design is a pleated flounce like that in the engraving on the first page, headed by a bias band of cashmere an inch and a half wide, prettily braided. Most elaborate patterns are wrought on these bands, but they will look very pretty with merely three straight rows of soutache, with a curled row on each side of the straight rows. These bands should be lined with stiff foundation muslin. The appropriate trimming for flannel wrappers is that shown in the engraving, a bias piece scalloped on each edge and bound with braid. The buttons used are large moulds covered with the stuff of the dress, or with silk or velvet the shade of the trimming.

COSTUMES.

The French modistes have returned from Paris, and fastidious people who await the "openings" at these exclusive establishments are now able to decide upon winter costumes. Absolute novelties are few. The over-skirt and tight basque remain in vogue; and the polonaise, a combination of these two, is the rival over dress. A loose paletot, or the more stylish mantle, of velvet, cashmere, or cloth, is added for warmth.

BASQUES.

Basques of costumes show most capricious shapes, those with coat fronts being most prevalent. Sometimes the front of the basque is very long, and the back short to disclose the puffed over-skirt, while again the front is short, and long coat tails are formed behind. This garment is always short under the arms. We have already said that shoulder seams are exceedingly short; that dress fronts have two, or even three, short darts taken deeply to make a full bust; and that backs are usually provided with two side bodies, as in our Worth basque pattern. Sleeves are easy coat shape for the house; half-flowing, or the wide Oriental shape, for street garments.

OVER-SKIRTS.

The newest over-skirts are not so simply cut as were the straight skirts of last season. Fanciful revers are added on the sides, and the back breadths stand out like bats' wings. Apron fronts prevail, and these are in many cases exceedingly short. All over-skirts from Worth's and Pingat's have very long back breadths, short fronts, and are caught up high on the sides. Heavy cords and tassels, bows, buttons, and passementerie ornaments have much to do with the draping and trimming of new over-skirts. By adding these, and placing the side pleats of drapery further back, as in the Marguerite polonaise, our readers can modernize last year's dresses.

LOWER SKIRTS.

The dress skirt proper retains its former shape, with the fullness massed behind, the front absolutely plain, and the sides slightly gathered. Very handsome carriage dresses of rich silk and velvet drag on the floor four or five inches; but these dresses are not to be seen on the street, except as the wearer passes from her carriage to the house. Grace as well as decency requires that skirts of street suits should escape the ground. One deep straight flounce about twelve inches wide, edged with two or three narrow bias ruffles alternately of the dress goods and that of the trimming, is the prevaleut style on French dresses. The attempt to abolish flounces is again a failure. Ruches also remain in favor, and are especially pretty when made of straight silk laid in side pleats, and raveled on each edge. Fringe appears on every costume, no matter what other trimmings are used besides. The frail chenille fringe is much used on velvet.

POLONAISES.

The polonaises shown among the latest importations at the best houses are the Marguerite and the Louis XIV. polonaise with vest, as represented among our illustrations. A third style that meets especial favor is a combination of these. The front of this garment has the Louis XIV. vest rather longer than our model, and the back is the Marguerite, with the skirt caught up by two bows instead of three. The waist and sleeves of many polonaises are slightly wadded and quilted; others, again, are worn over quilted waists of thin black silk. Thus slenderness, it will be observed, is not stylish; all lacing is abandoned, and en bon point is really the fashion. Sloping shoulders, a long waist well rounded, and full hips are necessary items of the stylish figure of to-day.

CARRIAGE COSTUMES.

The most elegant costumes shown for visiting and carriage wear generally are partly velvet, partly faille, in the dark fashionable shades, such as olive brown, peacock green, plum-color, and finally black. Some of these suits have a velvet basque and skirt, with faille over-skirt, and alternate kilt pleats of velvet and faille on the lower skirt; others again have basque and skirt of faille, with vest, cuffs, bows, and ruffles of velvet. Worn with these are velvet paletots with immense sleeves, and similar jackets are also added to polonaise costumes. Wide passementerie and fringe, especially chenille fringe, are the trimmings. On black faille and velvet garments Alaska sable is fashionably used. An olive brown faille suit has a wide straight flounce with two narrow velvet ruffles on its lower edge, and standing ruffles above. The over-skirt, long behind, with apron fronts, has also a wide flounce cut in deep Gothic points, with wide netted fringe tied in the points. Faille basque, with velvet collar and cuffs, and a velvet paletot. A suit of peacock green has peacock's feathers down the front of the polonaise. Two shades of the faille appear in folds, and in lengthwise loops held by a ring of cord for trimming the skirt. Such costumes cost from $300 to $600 each; and as few ladies can afford more than one such dress a season, and that one soon becomes conspicuous on account of its color, careful purchasers still confine themselves to black costumes. These are extremely elegant this season by reason of the rich passementeries, velvet, lace, and fringe that ornament them. Among the handsomest is a blue-black faille skirt with narrow velvet side pleats on the edge, while overlapping these is a deep kilt pleating of faille, held down in two places by richest passementerie. The Louis XIV. polonaise of velvet has folds of the faille around the vest, rich fringe on the edge, passementerie ornaments loop the Marguerite back, and a wide Watteau bow and ends of faille is in the back.

EVENING AND DINNER DRESSES.

High basques, with Pompadour squares or heart-shaped necks, deep points in front, postilion backs, and half-long sleeves, are made up in faille and China crape for evening and dinner dresses. Décolletée waists are reserved for the thin fabrics of ball costumes. Folds of tulle and lace fill up the square or pointed openings at the throat. A Marie Antoinette collar of China crape the color of the dress, or else the most fanciful fichus or neckerchiefs of China crape with wide fringe, ornament the basques of such dresses. Crape bows are up the front of the corsage, on the sleeves, and sometimes behind; but these have no sash ends. Pointed fronts are not invariable, as many dresses with basque backs have round fronts finished with a belt of four folds and a bow. This belt is in front only, beginning at the seam under the arms. The back of such basques is formed of six pieces, two side forms on each side, and the centre piece is also divided. The antique sleeve is of simplest shape—straight, like a coat sleeve, cut off just above the elbow. The edge is then pointed, or scalloped, and bound, and a bow is placed at the elbow. There are no ruffles of silk, but two or three box-pleatings of tulle doubled and of lace are placed below. Over-skirts are of the faille of the dress, or of a thin China crape very slightly crinkled, or else a new gauze, half transparent, with square meshes like grenadine. When of crape they are the precise shade of the dress, and are trimmed with hand-made fringe, with wide netted heading made on the fabric like that seen in old-fashioned crape shawls; gauze over-skirts are the color of the dress, or else white delicately embroidered. In shape they are shorter in front and longer behind than upper skirts of street dresses, and when made of faille like the dress the back widths of the upper skirt become the back of the train also, as in court trains, four straight widths and one on each side turned back en revers being the number required. The under-skirt has then merely a front breadth and side gores. The last style is especially used for bridal dresses. Demi-trains half a yard longer than walking skirts are made by our best French modistes, but many imported dresses lie on the floor at least three-quarters of a yard. A wide flounce with narrow ruffles and ruches on the edge, or else cut in leaf shape and fringed, is the trimming for trains. A new feature on Worth's dresses represents appliqué trimming. The edge of silk upper skirts and of bands for heading flounces is cut in elaborate open designs; a fine chenille cord, either white or the color of the dress, outlines the figure, and thin white gauze fills up the opening.

These failles are of palest tints, only one shade appearing in the dress and its garniture, unless white gauze or lace is employed. Tea-rose, in its loveliest pink-yellow tinge, is the favorite. One such dress had a trained over-skirt, with wide revers untrimmed, two short aprons, much wrinkled across the front, and finished with fringe; a basque with antique sleeves, and tea-roses in front of the corsage. Another of the same shade has wide appliqué-work, with dark brown chenille cord outlining the figures; large tea-roses, deeply browned with trailing sprays of brown foliage—the sprays more than half a yard long—loop the left side, and hang like a sash behind. A Nile green silk has a fichu and over-skirt of China crape fringed. A ciel blue silk has three deep flounces and basque, with appliqué trimming. A rose-colored silk has pleated flounces edged with feathery blonde lace, and a white gauze over-skirt embroidered in colors. A lavender silk has gauze over dress and neckerchief of the same shade. A bridal dress has the front breadth covered with flounces ornamented in the new appliqué style, and a trained over-skirt forming a court train three yards long, with revers at the side; a bouquet and sprays of orange buds and blossoms is placed on the back of the postilion-basque, another is on the front of the corsage, a third forms a coronet over the veil, while smaller sprays trim the elbows of the antique sleeves, and catch up the veil at intervals. But one dress showed contrasting colors—a pale drab, with cherry-colored facings on bows and ruffles. A lovely tulle over dress, appropriate for bride-maids, is white, with rose petals scattered all over the dress, and the sides draped with roses and foliage.

For information received thanks are due Madame DIEDEN; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and JAMES M'CREERY & Co.

PERSONAL.

SENATOR WILSON heard SPURGEON, when in London, and came to the conclusion that his oratory was not remarkable, but that he was a rugged, strong man, of generous sympathies, trusting God, and was a power in the world, but not to be compared with BEECHER. Most of the preaching the Senator heard was poor stuff. He did not hear an oath in Ireland; was four days in Scotland, and not an oath heard there. "They are a very religious and a very hard-drinking people. They read a long chapter from the Bible, make a long prayer, take a stiff drink of whisky all around—father, mother, children, and babies—and then go to bed. There's a great deal of drunkenness in Scotland."

—The pecuniary value of the New York Herald may perhaps be estimated by a rumor in circulation, to the effect that Mr. MURAT HALSTED, a newspaper man of Cincinnati, has offered a fabulous sum for it, and that in 1866 a company of eleven gentlemen offered Mr. BENNETT $2,125,000 for the establishment, which was rejected. A million was offered and refused for the Times.

—The will of the late ARISTARCHUS CHAMPION, of Rochester, has been filed with the surrogate. The estate is valued at over a million. One-half of the whole estate is given to the American Bible Society (not the Baptist). The remainder, excepting a bequest of $1000, is given to the Presbyterian Society for Foreign Missions. The will is to be contested.

—Count ANDRASSY, Prime Minister of Hungary, while in exile in London supported himself by giving lessons on the guitar, and was often so poor as to suffer from hunger.

—Hon. CLARKSON N. POTTER, member of Congress from the Westchester district, is said to have received the largest legal fee ever paid in this country—$100,000—for settling a long and strong controversy in relation to the bonds of a railroad corporation.

—General BRICE, the Haytien minister to France, has been twice hanged by the neck and twice the rope slipped. In three sieges he is said to have lived comfortably by eating the soles of his boots. (Fried sole.)

—Mrs. ELIZA B. BURNS, the editor and proprietor of the American Journal of Phonography, contends that the art of short-hand writing is admirably adapted for women, and that, with ordinary intelligence, it can be made available after eight months' study. Stenographic amanuenses of fair talent can easily earn from $600 to $1000 a year.

—Earl Spencer has presented the Marquis of Lorne with a Celtic vase of Irish manufacture, modeled by a Dublin silversmith after an antique cup found at Ardagh. The piece of workmanship is as purely Hibernian as may be—Irish wolf-dogs are interlaced on the lid, and Irish amethysts set round the body of the vessel. The inscription is in old Irish text, and the plinth is of Irish bog-oak.

—When Dr. GUTHRIE preached recently at Inverary Castle the Marquis of Lorne and wife were among the auditors. When they entered the church the congregation rose in a body. Thereupon the Weekly Review administers to them a severe rebuke for flunkyism.

—Commissioner DOUGLASS, of the Internal Revenue, has appointed a lady for his private secretary. Ditto the Controller of the Currency. No followers permitted.

—General ALFRED PLEASONTON has been elected president of the Terre Haute and Cincinnati Railway Company. The place is A Pleasantone, and the pay better than that of Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

—Pleasant neighbors has Mr. JAY COOKE at his country place near Philadelphia: among them RUSSELL SMITH and the venerable THOMAS SULLY, artists; LUCRETIA MOTT, FANNY KEMBLE, Rev. ROBERT BUCHANAN (brother of the late President), and Mrs. E. M. STANTON. Mr. COOKE has much fine stock (quadrupedal). His cows always give rich milk. He raises a few "bulls" for the "market," but no "bears."

—NAST'S new Comic Almanac, soon to be published by HARPER & BROTHERS, will contain about one hundred and fifty illustrations. Among the contributions are: Ye Gambolier, by JOHN HAY; Jane Bludsoe, of Natchez, by FRANK BELLEW; Aunt Jerusha, by S. S. CONANT; Ye True Story of Little Red Riding-Hood, by ALFRED MILLS; My Mother, by G. P. WEBSTER.

—General BIXIO, the ablest of GARIBALDI'S generals, except, perhaps, his own son RICCIOTTI, has surrendered his rank in the Italian army and his seat in the Senate, returned to his old career as a merchant-ship captain, and intends at fifty to commence a career in China and Japan. He takes a ship of his own.

—Miss CUSHMAN, who made her appearance at Booth's Theatre on Monday evening, September 25, commenced her public career in Boston on the 25th of March, 1830, at a concert. Under the superintendence of Mr. MAEDER she appeared as Countess Almaviva in the "Marriage of Figaro," at the Tremont Theatre, Boston, in April, 1835. Losing her voice, she determined upon tragedy, and in 1836 appeared as Lady Macbeth in the Bowery Theatre, thence to the Park Theatre as leading actress, and afterward as a "star" in the principal cities in the United States and Great Britain. For twenty years past she has resided mostly in Italy.

—LISZT asseverates upon his honor that he will go no more to Rome. The Pope fell asleep while the abbé was playing his latest fantasia to him.

—Mr. MARSHALL, the discoverer of gold in California, reaped no substantial reward for that which has given hundreds of millions to the world. He is now eking out a subsistence by lecturing on his life and adventures.

—A medallion of WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT, executed by MARGARET FOLEY, the American sculptress at Rome, is about to be placed in one of the recitation-rooms at Amherst College. Presented by an alumnus.

—MARIO, after that tremendous yet touching farewell forever from the operatic boards in London, where royalty and nobles assembled to do him honor, has concluded to sign an engagement for next year!

—The Rev. Mr. FINNEY has his view of the way some things should be done, and practices it. He has been settled over (not under) a congregation for thirty years, during which time he has neither asked nor received a cent of salary, living at his own expense, and independent of donations.

—The Count de Paris is one of the most inveterate letter-writers in Europe—at it all the while. A correspondent also of two or three journals in this country.

—Mr. P. S. GILMORE writes home that his interviews with the authorities in England lead him to believe that the government will acquiesce in his request that one of the best military bands may be permitted to come over and take part in GILMORE'S grand jubilation. The press approve.

—The successor of the lamented Professor MAHAN at West Point is Colonel PETER S. MICHIE, now Professor of Philosophy at the Academy. He graduated with honor eight years ago, and is a gentleman of superior abilities and culture.

—Mr. WATTERSON, of the Louisville Courier-Journal, expresses the opinion that the stealing of nearly a million of dollars by J. LEDYARD HODGE doesn't amount to much. It is only a little piece of Ledyard-demain.

—PATTI has been in Hombourg, singing before and at the especial request of the Emperor of Germany, who is a very great admirer of that small parcel of concentrated talents of all kinds—wit, sense, singing, languages, dancing, and conversation—which is called on the stage PATTI, among friends ADELINA, and in the beau monde La Marquise de Caux.

—The Rev. WILLIAM SHELTON, D.D., of Buffalo, has preached his forty-second anniversary sermon in St. Paul's Church. He went to Buffalo when it was a village. Now it is one of the largest cities in the Union. He has been longer continuously in one parish than any clergyman of Western New York.

—"Grace Greenwood," who is writing letters from the very far West to the Times, happened to meet Mr. and Mrs. S. S. COX. She says that every body out there seems to like every body, and Mr. COX says it reminds him of a friendly innkeeper at Alcantara, who, on hearing he was from New York, said, with generous effusion, "Ah, señor, I feel acquainted with you! I have a friend in Brazil!"

—ROCHEFORT goes into banishment, but probably not for long. France can hardly be considered as a permanent republic, and a new government would promptly seek the éclat of permitting his return.

—Miss HARRIET W. TERRY, a sister of Major-General TERRY, has been appointed lady principal of Vassar College. For many years she has had charge of a ladies' seminary in New Haven.

—The Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN, after a few years' service in the Episcopal Church, has rejoined the Methodist Church, and been readmitted to its ministry.

—Mr. ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE has finished, and is about to publish, the "prelude" to his unfinished poem, "Tristan and Iseult," itself a poem of some power, and several hundred lines long.

—At the funeral of Professor MAHAN, at West Point, were Secretary FISH, GOUVERNEUR KEMBLE, Professors WEIR, KENDRICK, and MICHIE, ROBERT P. PARROTT, and Generals RUGER and REID.

—Miss JOSIE MITCHELL is a courageous creature. Her relatives are rich. She, wishing to be rich, resolved to start out on her own account, and accordingly became a telegraph-operator, which supported her; but in two years an opulent kinsman faded away, and left her a legacy of $200,000.

—How is this? It is reported that King CHARLES of Sweden is about to marry a daughter of the King of Denmark. If so, there will be a new genealogical puzzle, for the King of Sweden's daughter is already married to the King of Denmark's son. The new bridegroom will therefore become his own daughter's brother-in-law, and the Danish Crown Prince will be the son-in-law of his own sister.

—Professor BENTLEY, recently deceased in England, was a noted botanist, a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, one of the editors of the Pharmaceutical Journal, and sole proprietor and editor of Temple Bar magazine.

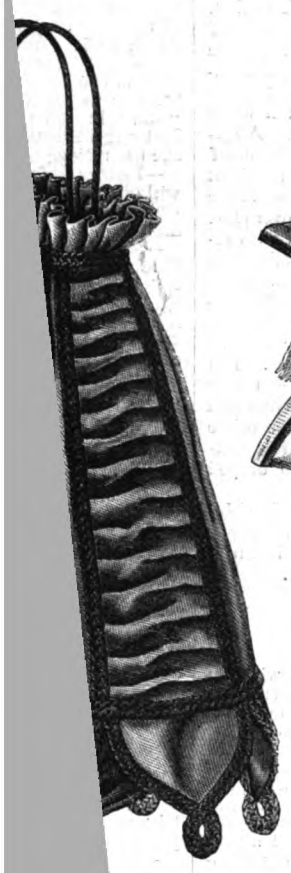
—A sister of the late EDWARD EVERETT and a cousin of JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE are said to be living as Sisters of Charity in New Orleans.

Digitized by Google

dered Cover, Figs. 1–3.

rown oak, with the back richly order, which ornaments the chair n, is worked in plush stitch on darker shades of brown worsted, ; this stitch is worked on round rder to work the plush stitch on is is basted on the cloth, and in dle is always passed through the ishing the embroidery, spread he under side; then draw the in the manner shown by Fig. 2. f the plush embroidery on cloth y in the work and partly drawn

Fig. 1.—CHAIR WITH EMBROIDERED COVER.



N BAG.

Brown Linen Clothes-pin Bag.

THIS clothes-pin bag is made of brown linen, and trimmed with a narrow braiding of red worsted cord. It is composed of eight separate oblong pieces and the bottom; the seam made by setting aterial. The separate pieces of the The plain pieces are eleven inches nd three-quarters wide at the bot- the other pieces are cut each of four inches and three-quarters sloped off toward the top like s at both sides of the plain onsisting of a smooth round uarters in diameter, and the material thirty-three ches and a quarter wide, ely gathered at one side. red by a rosette of braid. wing on the bottom are alf wide and two inches erlap each other a quar- sew a hemmed strip an egular pleats. Fasten inside; through these the cut side ten inches long, and bind the bias edge so formed with a flannel strip an inch and a quarter wide. Work the edges in herring-bone or button-hole stitch with colored wool. Work the button-holes and sew on the buttons. Button according to the corresponding letters on the illustration.

GROS GRAIN APRON.

rings pass two pieces of red worsted cord in opposite directions to close the bag. The braiding which trims the bag is made of four medium-sized pieces of red woolen cord.

Gros Grain Apron.

THIS pretty gored apron is trimmed along the sides of the middle breadth and on the bottom with narrow black velvet in the manner shown by the illustration. A hook and eye close the belt at the back.

Infant's Protector, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS protector is made of white flannel of the shape given by Fig. 2. It is buttoned in the manner shown by Fig. 1. Take a piece of flannel twenty-two inches square, cut off one corner in such a manner as to leave

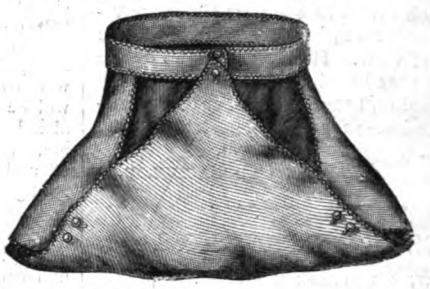

Fig. 1.—INFANT'S PROTECTOR.—BUTTONED.

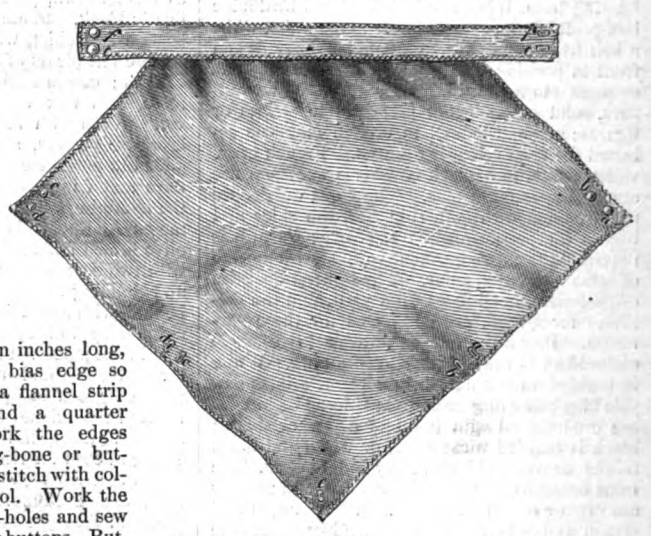

Fig. 2.—INFANT'S PROTECTOR.—OPENED.

FAULT-FINDING.

BY fault-finding we mean the habit of mind which sees faults only. Many people have a keen eye for blemishes, whether moral or physical, and are not careful to conceal their unfavorable impressions; but if they have at the same time as keen an eye for beauty and merit, and equal alacrity in acknowledging them when they see them, they are critically observant, but they are not fault-finders; for the fault-finder never observes when things go well, or look well, or are well done. A room may be furnished in perfect taste; but he only notices that a picture is hung a hair's breadth awry. A garden may be a blaze of colors; he contents himself with pointing out that such and such choice varieties are wanting. The gift of seeing beauty of any sort is not his. Order, harmony, propriety, take no conscious hold on certain perceptions. They pass them over as things of course, as the rule of nature. It is only when the rule is reversed that attention is stimulated and the judgment called into exercise. Thus dull people are often fault-finders. The judgment must have some field for expression; few people pass through life neither praising nor blaming; but dullness must be exceptionally amiable when it spends itself on undiscerning praise, the most unambitious of all mental operations. There is a certain sharpness, however, which still more strongly stimulates to fault-finding—sharpness as opposed to imagination. The habit of picking holes is a great quickener of the lower intellect. Imagination is prone to the weakness of exaggerated praise, which no eloquence can save from humiliating retribution. But there is an impunity in fault-finding which imparts facility and daring; and as

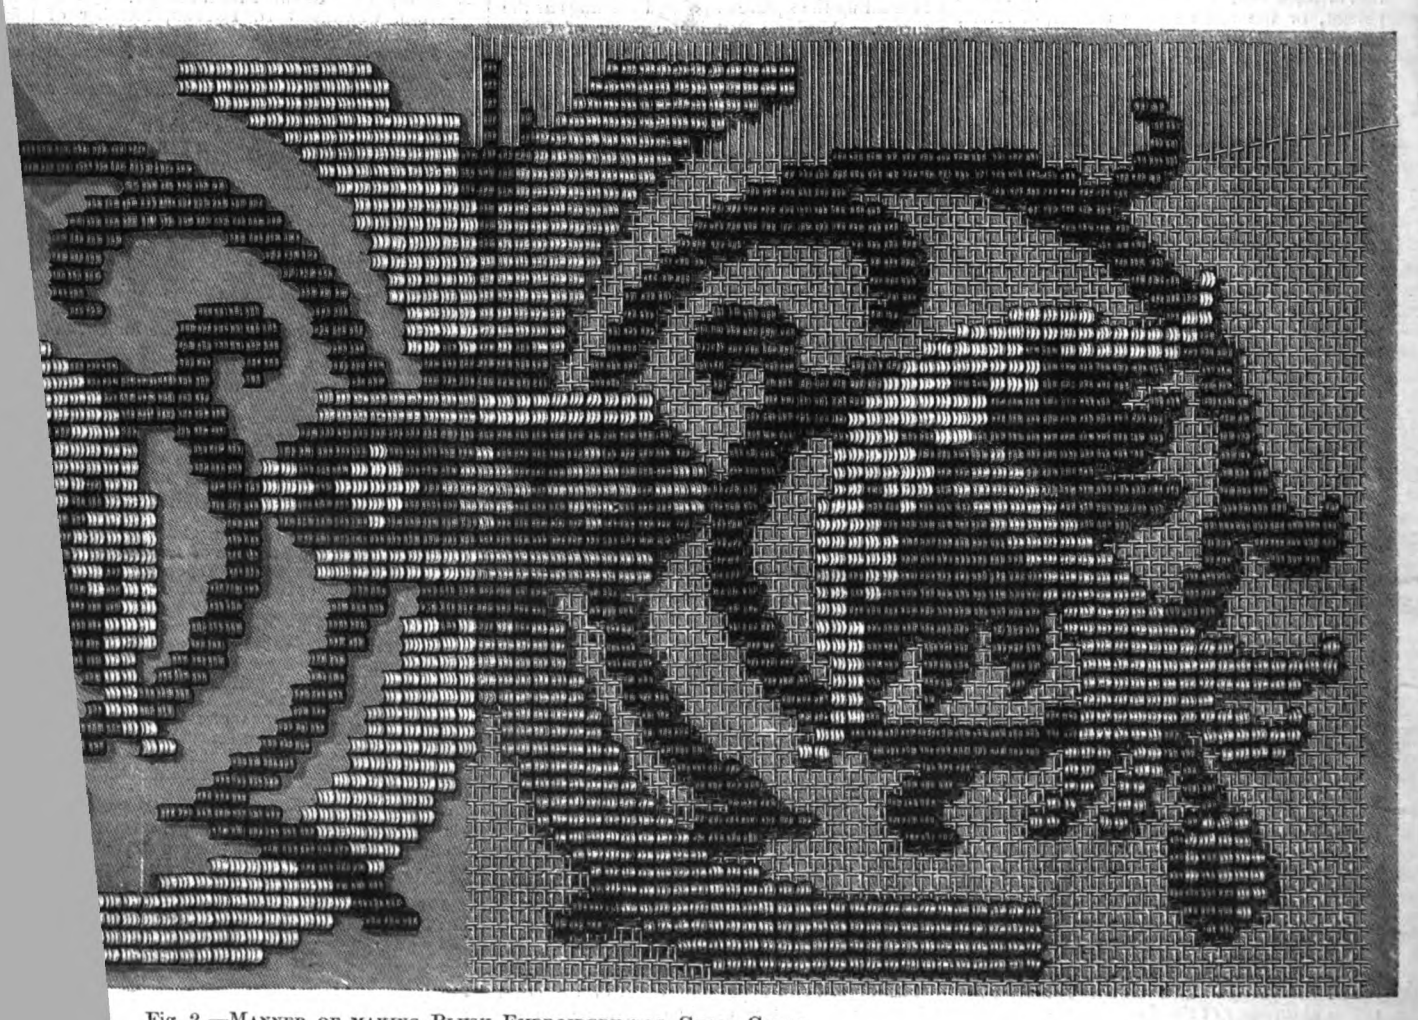

Fig. 2.—MANNER OF MAKING PLUSH EMBROIDERY FOR CHAIR COVER.

Digitized by Google

> Whoever thinks a faultless piece to see,
> Thinks what ne'er was, nor is, nor e'er shall be, the practiced hand searches for what he knows is there, if he is only clever enough to find it. The true fault-finder is necessarily an egotist; he views and judges things in relation to himself, as is the case with all defective sympathies, and, therefore, with the intelligences of a lower creation. There is no more persistent fault-finder than a clever house-dog. His life is one continual act of reprehension; he watches for some infringement of his manorial rights with a perky, pleased vigilance which is perfectly typical of humanity, and flies into a fury of protests on the smallest excuse—an approaching step, a distant bark, any remote sound or movement—with an abandonment which reminds us not seldom of the air and attitude of some Christian acquaintance. For the real fault-finder is as lost as Fido if there is nothing to bark at, and never looks so light or alert as when carping at some victim. This is the use to some old ladies of a companion, as keeping them alive and in vigor. It is not merely temper which instigates to a cruelty; it is an intellectual appetite craving its indulgence.

It is a notable characteristic of the fault-finder to treat every chance slip as a habitual practice, to treat the awkward exception as our rule. We like to think of our little errors as accidental; the fault-finder suspects a habit on the first perpetration, and holds it confirmed at the second, because he has not noticed and takes no count of the intermediate correctness and propriety which show the blunder to have been an accident. Nothing is more irritating to young people, or, indeed, to all of us so long as there is any body privileged to expose our weaknesses, than the conversion of a single offense into a noun of multitude by the accusation, "You have a way, a trick, a habit," "That is a very foolish trick of yours," when all that we are inclined to own to, and all of which the critic has distinct cognizance, is a solitary instance. Reproof has ten times the influence for good if the action is reprobated without reference to antecedents, not treated as a sample of the ordinary habit of life—unless, of course, it is the habit which is the distinct grievance. All this bears on the feeble and more feminine exhibitions of the fault-finding temper, where it is indulged rather as a cherished privilege than with any ulterior thought of effecting a change in the object of it. A decent woman of the poorer classes thinks she is showing her consciousness of the occasion and commending herself to her clergyman by keeping up in his presence a loud remonstrance with her children for every thing they are doing or not doing. It is evident by their demeanor that her words have no weight with them, but she has faith in the respectability of fault-finding quite apart from reliance on its efficacy. What the same class think of it when applied against them is not difficult to learn. Captious particularity is of all qualities most unpopular in superiors. What the negroes call curiss in master or mistress is rendered by nasty in some kitchen vocabularies; and in this sense the moderate, guarded commendation bestowed by a waiting damsel on the family she was quitting, that "the ladies was noways nasty," was estimated by its objects as a very flattering tribute to their amiability.

Fault-finders are of three temperaments—the peevish, the plaintive, and the unsympathizing; the peevish lavishing their discontent most willingly on the people about them, as thereby diffusing some share of their own annoyance; the plaintive exhaling in fretfulness against circumstances. In both cases lack of interests and employment is either at the bottom of the disease or largely contributes to it. Enjoyment of any sort, the recognition of good fortune, the detection of beauty, any kind of appreciation, demands an elasticity of spirits and intellectual activity of which they are not capable. "Take a fine lady," says an old writer, "who is of delicate frame, and you may observe, from the hour she rises, a certain weariness of all that passes about her. They are sick of such strange, frightful people that they meet; one is so awkward and another so disagreeable that it looks a penance to breathe the same air with them." It is, in fact, an inevitable consequence of languor, however caught or instilled, to find fault with something as the cause of one's uneasiness. And not only fine ladies, but fine gentlemen—and for the same cause, a pampered apathy which forbids all effort to get out of themselves—exercise all their ingenuity in finding fault. It is a fruitless undertaking, said Swift, "to write for men of a nice and foppish gusto whom it is impossible to please." All this is languor and satiety, real or affected. Sprightly fault-finding in man or woman is a more distinct mark of defective sympathy—defective either from nature, or ignorance, or interest in the subject handled. Literary criticism used to be unmitigated fault-finding. Nothing else was looked for by the common run of readers. All cleverness was expended, as a matter of course, in disparagement, savage or neatly turned, according to the critic's genius, and designed to gall the irritable nerves of the author, and so to impart pleasure to the reader, who was thus made fault-finder at second-hand. It answered a demand at a time when tenderness to an author was no more dreamed of than tenderness to bulls, or bears, or other baited animals; and ignorant readers enjoyed the spite of scarcely less ignorant writers with a general vague sense that they rose in the scale of wit when the wits by profession were detected in inaccuracy of trivial fact, defective rhyme, or the blunder, as in Tasso's case, of making an episode too interesting. A more generous style is now tolerated. Fulsome eulogy, indeed, is often substituted for it; but I fear that captious, carping criticism will never be out of vogue so long as there are readers—and there are many—who judge of the cleverness of a writer and critic solely by the keenness of his eye for slips and blemishes.

Among the fault-finders we must not fail to enumerate the people who take a great interest in their own faults, and a lively pleasure in discussing them. It might be assumed that, distasteful as the practice is to the world in general, like thus meeting with like, there would ensue a happy fusion. But experience does not find it so; in fact the repulsion is as great here as elsewhere, and the glib self-disparager gets out of the way of the fault-finder with as sharp an alacrity as the rest. The thing breaks down for want of a mutual understanding. The self-accuser invites inquiry into his faults, but the other party shows himself so utterly without perception when he attempts to name them that the subject loses its interest and becomes disagreeable. "I like to hear you express your sense of my defects," writes Margaret Fuller to a friend whom she had importuned to be faithful. "The word arrogance does not appear to me to be just, probably because I do not understand what you mean. But in due time I doubtless shall; for so repeatedly have you used it that it must stand for something real in my large, rich, yet irregular and unclarified nature. But though I like to hear you, as I say by myself, I return to my native bias, and feel as if there was plenty of room in the universe for my faults, and as if I could not spend time in thinking of them when so many things interest me more." This hits the nail on the head. The fault-finder has an unwilling audience, because each hearer has things that interest him more than the inevitable subject-matter of his communications. It is uniformity that makes him dull, even when enlarging to us on the faults of our neighbors; he is dull, whatever his natural gifts —for there are quick wits that swamp themselves in this captious quagmire of universal disparagement—dull because he sees the dull side of things, and because he falls into a monotony of tone in treating them. Mere vituperation does not bring about this flatness. It does not "stop on picking work to dwell," but flames and goes out, and now and then praises if only for the sake of contrast. Hence we do not class Walter Savage Landor, the greatest vituperator of his age, among the fault-finders. His mere vivacity separates him from the fraternity.

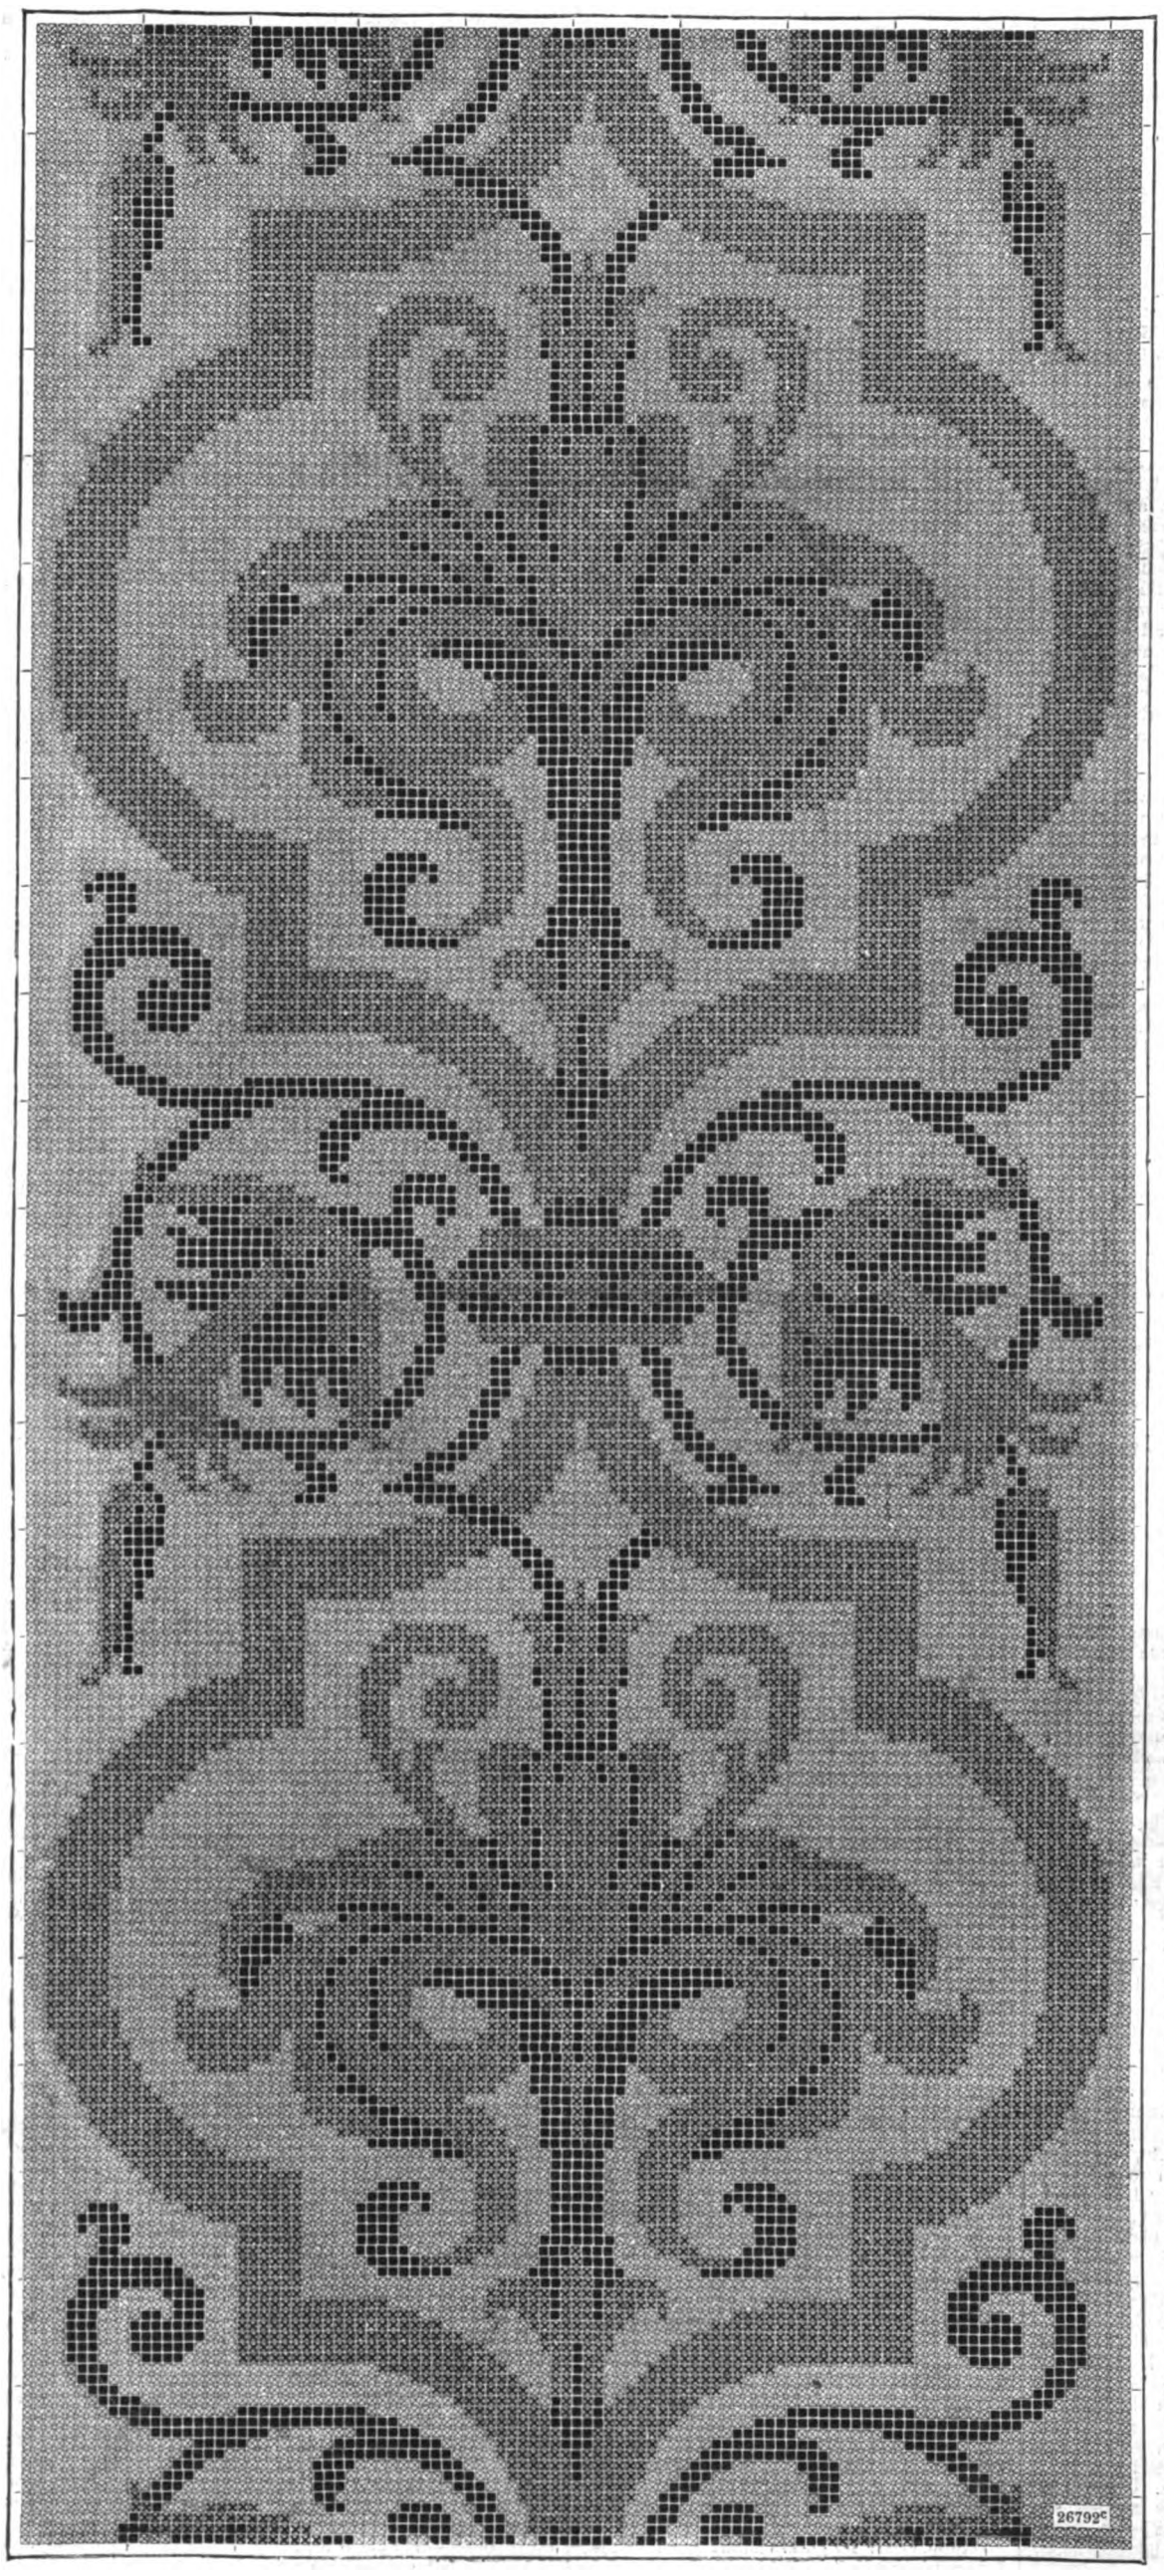

Fig. 3.—TAPESTRY DESIGN FOR CHAIR.

Description of Symbols: ■ 1st (darkest), ■ 2d, ⊠ 3d (lightest), Fawn.

Digitized by Google

OTTO OF ROSES.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

A PICTURESQUE old country house has a roomy, shady veranda, upon which the drawing-room windows open, overlooking a great, beautiful garden, full of flowers, shrubs, bushes, trees, and quiet little paths gliding about hither and thither: one of these runs nearly through the centre from end to end, passing by a quaint summer-house, half-way, and finally bringing you to the gate at the further extremity. In the summer evenings, sitting in the summer-house or on the wide veranda, a gentle, powerful fragrance rises and floats and is wafted here and there, until one is ready to believe that the soul has forsaken all her other senses, and centred herself in the nose. It is certainly true that some of the profoundest and most ineffaceable impressions received by our minds and hearts are implanted through the medium of the olfactories. After a long absence one might forget, in thinking of the garden, whether the hollyhocks were planted to the right or left, or the paths bordered with box or grass; but the marvelous fragrance, never!

No one appreciated the garden more than a young lady who once sat on the veranda with the last of a May day's sunshine falling brokenly through the leaves on her fantastic Nice hat and white dress delicately striped with green. To complete the picture with the touch of romance, a young man stood near her, though more completely in the shadow. One might easily imagine, at a little distance, that the young lady was ravishingly beautiful, and her companion superbly handsome, and both violently in love with one another. In reality, however, such was not precisely the case. The lady was not pretty, though one could not look in her gray eyes, with their Proserpine-like drowsiness of expression, and not experience a warm and kindly feeling for her. There was an air of innocence and inexperience—a certain child-like manner—observable in the working of her rosy and rather full lips, and in the piquant conformation of her eyebrows, always on the verge of becoming pathetic or appealing. This child-likeness was the more striking from the contrast of her womanly and beautifully moulded figure, and plump and tapering arms and fingers. Her hands were exquisitely formed, and soft as a petal of the sweetest flower in her garden. Her eyes seldom opened fully, but that only made them the more fascinating; and when they did come quite out from behind the lids, one always felt complimented, as on receiving a marked favor.

The young gentleman had little about him which could be called prepossessing. He was neither tall, nor especially well formed. His features were plain, and not very expressive, and his complexion was clouded by ill health. His friends spoke of him as a nice, quiet, good-hearted fellow, but apt to be slow and uninteresting. It was much better when he smiled: there was then something singularly beautiful in his expression. Unfortunately he smiled but seldom, and as soon as the smile had vanished, so also did the memory of its transient beauty, and one only observed that poor Otto now looked plainer than ever.

He held in his hands some sprouts of what appeared to be a species of brier, and this formed, at present, the subject of conversation.

"I thought, perhaps, you'd like it," said he, in his awkward way. "It is an Eastern rose, very beautiful and sweet: so I thought you ought to have it, you know." Having delivered himself thus far, he blushed in his own peculiar fashion—that is, his nose, which was rather large, became very red, and his eyes looked excessively ashamed of themselves. Why Otto blushed was always a problem to his acquaintances; perhaps in this particular instance, he felt guilty of some blundering attempt at a compliment. It is useless to conjecture, however: Nora always declared he was the most incomprehensible creature!

"Thank you ever so much, Otto," said she, letting her head fall languidly on to the back of her chair, thereby bringing her half-closed, dreamy eyes to bear upon the poor young man's nose. "I'll tell the gardener to plant it right under the window of the summer-house, so I can always smell it;" and she smiled compassionately at him, and thought, with a little self-admiring thrill, "How good I am to the old thing!"

The old thing thought so too. He was now terribly embarrassed and happy. He could not decide which leg it were better to stand on, and forgot whether he were putting on his gloves or removing them. He looked so distressed in his happiness that Nora observed it, and, after a moment's pathetic rumination, asked him if he wouldn't sit down and stay to tea. Instead of replying, he inquired incoherently whether she would think of him when she smelled it. And when, after a moment's comical bewilderment, she got the clew to his meaning, and assured him, with one of her distracting little blossoms of laughter, that of course she would, Otto dropped so suddenly into a chair that Nora gave a tiny scream, under the impression that he must have met with some dreadful accident. But it was only the fullness of the poor fellow's heart which had overbalanced his centre of gravity. He had been fiercely in love with Nora for ever so long, and in proportion as his love for her increased, so also did his awe. It is debatable whether he would not have died of fright had Nora accepted him; though this is premature, for she had not, as yet, been asked. But her unusual and unexpected graciousness this evening had not only floored the unfortunate Otto, as we have seen, but had inspired him with a wild hope and a desperate purpose, which blanched his cheek and made his hands and voice shake, but to which, with a short-sighted obstinacy peculiar to such creatures, he nevertheless clung. Before he departed that night he would confess his love, and ask her own in return. That was the purpose; and the hope—well, that was perhaps even wilder than Otto himself imagined.

It is but justice to Nora to say that she was totally unconscious of the impending catastrophe. She had known Otto so long that, although he had always been to her an ungraceful enigma, half amusing, half painful, she yet imagined that she knew him thoroughly, and was familiar with his every phase and development. And she felt so secure in being well acquainted with the enigma that she never dreamed of solving it. It is doubtful whether, under present conditions, she ever could have done so. But it was generally as great a stretch of virtue as she could make to avoid snubbing him, and patting herself on the back when she succeeded. Why unnecessarily torment herself about him?

She, on the other hand, was equally a riddle to Otto: with this difference, that in so far as she was a riddle, she was of Otto's own manufacture. For when a man asks himself how it is possible such a perfection as So-and-so should exist on earth, it is reasonable to conclude that the mystery is of his raising; the real question being not Why is she so? but Why do I think she is? So Nora was very far from being a mystery, other than as every young lady is one; but she was very lovable, and Otto wondered and worshiped, and became hot, uncomfortable, and ecstatic whenever they met.

The dreadful trial of supper was over at last, and the young people were again upon the veranda—Nora with a soft white cloud about her head in place of the Nice hat. George sat glowering at the gardener, who was digging over the predestined flower bed under the summer-house window in preparation for the morrow's planting. Then the late May darkness descended, the gardener drove his spade deep into the loam, and retired, leaving it there sticking upright, in mute protest at such neglect: it did not know what an important part it was to play presently. And Otto, fearing lest Nora should hear his heart beat if he kept quiet, turned upon her, and floundered into conversation.

"Miss Nora, do you know I'm going away to-morrow?"

Nora, for some time past, had been engaged in listening for Jerrold's step up the garden path, and wondering when Otto would leave. The real meaning of the latter's words did not at first strike her: she only received a general impression that he would remain where he was until the next day, and she therefore looked up at him with an irresistibly appealing, dismayed expression, and a bewitching droop of the corners of her mouth, all of which poor Otto instantly and lamentably misinterpreted. He believed it to be regret at his proposed departure for foreign parts, and hastened to modify, as follows:

"I meant, that is, if you don't care—no, if you do care, I needn't—I won't—I'll stay; but" —he gathered himself up for a tremendous effort —"I thought I'd go away, you know, if you didn't mind whether I went or not."

This was sufficiently involved, but Nora, with a young woman's instinct, began to divine the meaning from the very fact of the obscurity. Her predominant sensation was alarm, and a desire to put an end to the danger before it occurred. This is how she did it.

Leaning forward, she put her soft little hand on his arm, upturning to Otto's her face, with wide-open eyes, beautiful in the gloom, with the surrounding frame of soft cloud; and in this position proceeded so far in her remonstrance as to falter out in low, broken tones,

"Oh, Otto!"

That was sufficient: it was too much. Every thing, even the awkwardness and bashfulness of the man, was overmastered by the impetuous bursting forth of his passionate love. It raised him up upon its lofty waves, and he spoke in a kind of exalted delirium which, coming from him, had something almost of grandeur in it, as Nora long afterward remembered, but did not remark at the moment.

"Oh, Nora, is it true—can it be? Do you love me, my darling—my own darling? I've loved you so long, so tenderly—so tenderly and truly, my Nora! And I thought you never could love me—such a thing as I. You're so sweet and wonderful—so heavenly, darling!" Nora felt the ground slipping from beneath her feet: another moment and she would be carried away beyond reprieve. Otto's voice was so deep, and thrilling with the vibrations of his own heart, that Nora's was shaken too in her own despite. He had seized her hand, and was pressing it so that he hurt her, and she forced herself to be angry with him for that, knowing all the time he would have died any death to save her a moment's pain. But she felt the necessity of stemming the current at once, if ever, and with whatever came first to hand.

"Stop, Otto! let go my hand! you hurt me! I do not love you!"

It was done; but, after all, was it well done? Is it not possible that, had she yielded, she might have found a rich and unexpected happiness—an elixir of life instead of a poison? Her first impulse, a blind one, had been to resist, and with blind desperation she had carried it out; but it was the very force and rush of Otto's passion which had raised the barrier against itself. Had Nora been stronger, or Otto's power less—had she not felt herself subjected to a strength superior to her own, leaving her no choice between utter self-surrender and violent and irrational resistance—the result might have been far different and happier. Be that as it may, the time was past forever now.

For some minutes neither spoke, but Nora was panting and exhausted, while Otto was singularly quiet and calm. A battle of mighty import had been fought and lost; but though there was a loser, there was no winner: nay, to look at the two, it was the loser who bore the aspect of authority and command. The fierce thunder-storm of passion had cleared away, for a time at least, the clouds of false shame and awkwardness. The man appeared in his full height and dignity while the brief illumination lasted. When he spoke again he was master, and both felt it.

"I see how it was now. You will forgive me for my mistake; I never thought to have made such a one."

He paused, but Nora could not answer him, though she perhaps tried to. She only gazed dumbly at him with wide eyes.

"One favor I want to ask—that you will forget the clumsy, awkward creature that you have always associated with the thought of me. But if you have ever felt that underneath there might be another I, with something in it not unworthy even of you, or to love you, think of that once in a while, and in time perhaps you may come to believe the inner is the only real Otto, just as you would remember the perfume of a rose rather than the fading petals."

He waited a moment longer, then arose, descended the steps of the veranda, and the darkness obliterated him: a waft of sweet fragrance swept up from the place where he had vanished. Nora was strangely weak and faint; she felt as if a support had suddenly been withdrawn. She raised herself, in a sort of stound, and walked dizzily through the low, open window into the drawing-room. There she sank down on a sofa and cried bitterly. Jerrold was quite forgotten.

Otto walked down the long path, through the sweet-smelling flowers, toward the gate, but before he had reached the summer-house he heard a quick, active step approaching, and in another moment was face to face with a lithe, erect figure, which he knew at once was Jerrold. Otto had no reason to be attached to Jerrold, who always made fun of him, and this evening he was less than usually inclined to be annoyed. So he was proceeding to pass him without a word, but the latter caught him by the arm.

"That you, Otto? How do, old chap? Where 're you going in such a hurry?" questioned he, in his rapid, bantering way.

"I am going to leave the country," replied Otto. "Good-by!"

"Hullo! what's up? That's rather sudden, ain't it?"

"Well, what if it is?" said persecuted Otto, beginning to writhe in the misery of a slow wit fallen under the power of a quick one.

Jerrold stooped down and peered into Otto's shrinking face; then he cast a quick, comprehensive glance at the light in the drawing-room window. "Hanged if I don't believe you've been and done it!" he ejaculated. "Why, you little goose, you might have known she'd have jilted you, even if she hadn't been engaged to me. Besides, the girl hasn't such a thing as a heart about her, and never had."

These tremendous assertions silenced Otto for some moments. But the first announcement, bitter as it was, produced not such an impression upon him as the last.

"Why did she engage herself to you if she has no heart?" asked the poor, simple fellow; "and how can you love her if you believe that?"

At this exquisitely humorous speech (for so Mr. Jerrold considered it) he could not refrain from indulging in one of his peculiar silent contortions of merriment. Recovering himself promptly, as was his wont, a feeling of profound compassion for the dense ignorance of his friend came over him. He would enlighten him, by Jove! if such a blockhead were capable of receiving enlightenment.

"Well, see here, old fellow: seeing it's you, and that you're going to leave the country, I don't mind putting you up to a point or two. You take a young girl, with none too much brains, plenty of romantic notions, and money sufficient, and introduce her to a handsome young fellow, with lots of brass, a gift of the gab, and a hankering after cash, and you'll see it won't be long before they'll come to an understanding. D' you twig? Well, that's my case. She likes my looks, and the way I have of talking to her; and I'm sweet on her real estate and securities. So, you see, it's a deuced even thing. But as to love, and hearts, and all that," concluded Mr. Jerrold, airily, "pish!"

He had made this explanation to the benighted Otto in perfect sincerity and good faith, and with a laudable desire to initiate him into some of the facts (as he considered) of female human nature. But Otto was not appreciative. He even went so far as to be incredulous, and something more. Had Mr. Jerrold been enabled to see the expression of his face he probably would not have assumed so negligently graceful an attitude.

"You mean to say, then," said Otto, speaking slowly, and, by powerful effort, in a low tone, "that you're going to marry Nora for her money, caring nothing about her?"

Jerrold felt a justifiable pride in his pupil's progress. He clapped him on the shoulder. "Right for you, old chap!" cried he.

Otto paused a moment to gather strength and breath.

"You miserable, mercenary scoundrel, do you dare to pollute an angel like her with the association of any thing so false and degraded as you are?" and, rushing with clinched teeth at the young athlete, this puny lunatic struck him so furiously in the face that he staggered back on to a freshly dug flower bed under the summer-house window.

Jerrold had been so completely overcome by astonishment at Otto's unprecedented outburst that he had been quite unable to so much as endeavor to ward off his attack. But when he felt the sting of the blow he came to himself at once. The devil within him, never very far down in such men, was fully aroused. As he collected himself to strike Otto to the earth his foot came into contact with something hard and metallic, sticking upright in the ground. He put down his hand and felt the handle of a spade. The devil was jubilant then. The spade was snatched up, whirled aloft in the air, and then it came down, and struck with a sickening crash. Something fell darkly down in a loose heap. Jerrold now stood alone in the garden by the summer-house window. The triumphant devil, having performed his office, became invisible once more. But an immortal horror had taken its place.

There was no time to indulge in nervousness at present. There was something to be gotten rid of first: an ugly, loutish, senseless thing—not so very much of a thing; and yet, was the whole earth big enough to hide it? Singular what a difference a soul made! A few minutes ago, when this possessed one, how despised, insignificant, contemptible, it had appeared! Now, how awful it had become! how despotic, absolute, and tyrannical! Then, it might not cross his thoughts as often as once a year; now, it must dwell with him continually by day and by night, his closest, most secret companion, unforgetable and unavoidable. How strange! really it was quite funny.....Ah! who was that laughing? Come, come, my friend, let's to work, or you'll be nervous. A little exercise will be a good thing for you. How lucky the spade happened to be here! Pshaw! you fool, can't you talk straight? You meant to say, Lucky there's this nice, soft loam to bury him in: one can work so much quicker, and no chance of finding him.

How quiet every thing is! There, that's deep enough. In with it! How heavy, how still it lies! So it will lie across my soul forever. And yet, only a few minutes ago— My face is smarting still. Cover it up! cover it up!

Nora received no call that evening, nor did she miss it. Next morning, when the gardener came yawning to his work, there stood the spade stuck upright in the flower bed. The earth seemed in excellent condition, so he planted the sprouts of the Eastern rose, and prophesied they would flourish. And so they did, beyond all expectation. That bed under the summer-house window was the most fertile spot in the garden.

Jerrold and Nora were to be married in June. Nora had been unwell ever since the evening of her parting with Otto, and the day before her wedding she walked out for the first time into the garden, leaning on Jerrold's arm. She was more grave and thoughtful than her wont; but Jerrold seemed in better spirits than he had been of late. He laughed and rattled away with unwearіable gayety. The ethereal incense of the flowers floated all around them.

"Let us go into the summer-house and sit down," said Nora.

"No, no!" exclaimed Jerrold. "What! sit down in that damp place in your delicate condition? Nonsense! Come back into the house."

But Nora, when she took a whim, could be very obstinate. She declared she would go, damp or not. "I promised Otto when he went away that I'd sit at the window there and smell his roses. Poor fellow! I wonder where he is now?"

Jerrold laughed, but his face looked very much drawn and unnatural. He felt it was rather awkward. They entered the summer-house, sat down in the window, and looked out. There bloomed the rose-bush; but how glorious it was! Never had been seen so magnificent a shrub. The little sprout of brier in the brief time it had been in the earth had expanded and multiplied and sent forth leaves and twigs innumerable, and had, moreover, covered itself with the most wonderful roses. They danced and swayed gracefully on the topmost branches; they nestled and glowed lovingly among the green leaves below; they peeped rosily forth from every opening and interstice; they seemed to be continually bursting out into new life and beauty as you looked, and each fresh rose to condense into itself all the richness of its predecessors. And then the perfume! Ah! that was marvelous indeed. Nora leaned over the window-sill and inhaled it thirstily, as though it were the very breath of life. And as she did so the color flowed back to her pale cheeks, and her dreamy eyes opened and shone with a brilliancy quite unusual. Jerrold thought she had never been any thing like so fair before. For the first time he felt a new and strange movement in his heart, which he could not understand. No wonder: it was love.

"How sweet!" murmured Nora. "Poor Otto! I didn't deserve he should be so good to me. If he were here now, I'd thank him. Somehow it almost seems as if he were here. What an exquisite perfume! It makes me feel all well and strong again. I think there must be a human heart and soul in those roses."

"What stuff you're talking, Nora!" grumbled Jerrold, who had grown quite pale and restless during her rhapsody. "The smell seems to me very rank and unwholesome. I feel quite sick already."

Nora looked at him rather contemptuously. "It's because you're too earthy to appreciate it, then," she replied, coldly. Jerrold winced, and stared at her. It was the first time she ever had addressed him in that manner, but it was also the first time he would have minded whether she did or not.

Digitized by Google

"Go around and pluck me some of those buds," said Nora, after a while. "I'll wear them to-morrow. I never shall be able to get along without them, now that I know how sweet they are."

Jerrold dared not refuse; but as he stood by the rose-bush, and the powerful aroma enveloped him, he became faint, his head reeled, and he almost fell. "How clumsy you are!" pouted Nora. Then he mastered himself, and tore off some of the buds, and the blood fell from his fingers and dropped on his white coat. He started, and gave a cry of dismay, for it seemed to him the blood came from the broken stems of the roses. Nonsense. He had only pricked himself with a thorn. He gave the buds to Nora, who placed them in her bosom, and they walked back to the house; but she did not ask him for his arm, and somehow he did not venture to offer it to her. Yet she had loved him when he cared nothing for her.

The next afternoon was the wedding. Nora stood before her glass, whitely dressed, and looking strangely lovely. Certainly there was a beauty about her which had not been hers a month before. She was more delicate and refined; there was a faint, subdued seriousness in her manner; her eyes seemed deeper and more thoughtful.

"And now my roses!" said she. One she put in her hair, another in her bosom; but the third, most beautiful one, she held in her hand, continually inhaling the subtile fragrance. Thus adorned and fortified, she went down and stood with Jerrold before a minister. But it was whispered afterward that she did not seem to notice the bridegroom. When she made her vows she was looking down into the gloomy heart of the rose, as if it were to that she was pledging herself. As for Jerrold, his mood was singularly unequal and incoherent. Now, there would be an expression of almost feverish love and eagerness in his face; then, all at once, he would seem to blanch and quaver as if under the influence of some pestilential breath. Yet the only perfume perceptible in the room was the insidious sweetness exhaled by Nora's roses. Those who knew Jerrold best stared and shook their heads. A few weeks had worked much change in him.

The wedding being over, the young people were left to enjoy themselves in private with their roses. It was astonishing what an important element in affairs the latter had become. They were a part of every thing. In the daytime they met the eye at every turn, peeping from vases and baskets on the mantel-pieces and tables within-doors, and, stepping out on to the veranda, there was the great rose-bush down the garden, in a luxury of gorgeous blossoms; and at night, when the flowers were invisible, the aroma—trenchant yet delicate, penetrating yet impalpable—seemed to float on every breath of wind, or hang palpitating on the still air. Nora spent hours daily in the summer-house, gazing into the depths of the great roses, as if communing with some beloved spirit. Far down, amidst the thousand soft petals, lay a beautiful golden heart, from which the fragrance came. But the fascination seemed to Nora to lie deeper yet.

In her musings by the window the thought of Otto often came to her. The light promise she had made that the scent of the roses should recall him to her received a deep fulfillment. Involuntarily, also, was the parting favor he had asked her granted. His memory became more and more enveloped in a glorious, rose-colored halo, transfiguring him, and making him seem noble and beautiful. How clumsy and awkward, how homely, slow, and tiresome he had been, was forgotten. But she thought of his voice on that last night, when his outward imperfections had been concealed by the darkness, and she thrilled once more as the expressions of his mighty love recurred to her. What other human being had ever so loved or so spoken to her? She shivered as if a cold hand had grasped her heart; and then the tears rolled slowly down her cheeks, and dropped one by one into the rose she held: and straightway it offered up even a sweeter incense than before. Nora rested her head upon her arms on the window-sill, and closed her eyes. The roses seemed to turn toward her and watch her tenderly, and send forth their sweetness to encircle her as with a protecting arm. As the perception of outward things gradually faded, there grew upon her sleeping senses, in the place of the rose-bush, the semblance of a form she knew, and yet had never known. What had seemed the perfume of the flowers was the sweetness of his true and loving heart; and the petals symbolized the gentle, shrinking, delicately beautiful nature, through whose rough and ill-favored exterior her dim, narrow vision had never penetrated. She now saw clearly how slight and immaterial had been the veil, and bitterly lamented blindness, because the awakening had come too late. But at this a most beautiful smile dawned in Otto's eyes, and he regarded her with such a glance of love and happiness and assured hope that Nora awoke in a flutter of joy, and, raising her head, saw a figure, indistinct in the twilight, standing behind the rose-bush, looking at her.

"Otto?" she whispered; but it was Jerrold. She drew back, blushing, for he was her husband, and she had forgotten him.

"Otto is dead!" said Jerrold, sullenly. In another moment, perhaps, he would have confessed his crime; but Nora interrupted him, and the opportunity passed.

"Thank God for that!" said she. "I understand now the meaning of his smile." She never thought to question the fact of Otto's death, or Jerrold's knowledge of it; and he, when the momentary impulse was gone, trembled to think of the precipice over which he had so nearly fallen. Yet still he hovered about it.

"Why do you think of him?" he asked. "You never cared for him."

"Not while he lived, for then I never knew him. But he left these roses, and I recognize his spirit in them. They seem to spring from his very heart, and draw nourishment out of it. When I die, bury me beneath that bush."

Jerrold was horror-stricken at the ghastly meaning which her unconscious words bore to his conscious guilt. But he tried to laugh it off.

"When you die! Don't talk of dying yet. Why, we're hardly married yet. Do you care nothing about me?"

Nora hid her face in her hands. "God knows I loved you once; but it was when I loved only what I saw. There is a love which does not come through the eyes, and you can not get so near me but that will be nearer still."

Jerrold ground his teeth. "It is these cursed roses!" cried he. "You, whom I worship, and whose presence is my heaven, are so filled and impregnated with their deadly perfume that, spite of my love, to touch you is an agony almost too great to bear. Let me destroy them at once." And he stretched forth his hand to tear the bush from the ground, fancying thus to subvert the eternal laws of humanity. But Nora's pale, sad face and low voice arrested him. "They are more to me than my life," said she. "Tear them up if you will; but I can not long survive them." So Jerrold forbore, cursing himself and them.

But by-and-by cold winds began to sweep through the garden, and the roses shuddered, for their warm petals were shaken from them. Then a hope began to grow for Jerrold. Was it not possible that as winter came on, and the flowers gradually died out, Nora would imperceptibly become accustomed to their absence, and thus be gradually won to a renewed affection for him? So he watched them greedily as one after another fell. He did not realize that Nora was drooping likewise. She looked at him sometimes with a sad, pitying smile, as if understanding his vain hope. One day while thus observing him a sudden light came into her eyes, as of a new thought and purpose. From that time forward she began, though slowly, to recover. Her face often wore now an expression absolutely angelic.

Jerrold never knew how, when he was away, Nora stole down to the garden and gathered up the fallen rose leaves, and shook down those which were ready to fall, and, carrying them to her room, put them safely away together, intending when a sufficient quantity was accumulated to have the essence expressed, and keep it through the lonely winter, when the roses themselves were gone. Thus she hoped to linger through the dreary months which must elapse before the flowers could bloom again.

Accordingly, when the last of the roses had disappeared, Nora wore a little phial around her neck, in which was a single drop of aromatic liquid the color of gold. Around the phial a little label was affixed, on which was written in Nora's handwriting the sad, half-fanciful inscription, "Otto of Roses." A hundred times a day did she draw the precious little bottle from her bosom and inhale its fragrance; but never when Jerrold's eyes were upon her. He knew nothing of her treasure, but was ever and anon aware of something pervading the atmosphere which struck a sickening pain through his soul, and revived the memory of the fatal rose-bush. However, he saw the bare briers in the garden, and took courage. The roses were gone, and Nora, albeit delicate and fragile, was at least alive, and apparently independent of that influence which she had declared to be essential to her existence. Soon, Jerrold thought, would her normal health, strength, and light-heartedness return, fresh as of old, and a new life would begin for them, imbued with all the happiness of that love which he had never realized till now was vitally essential to the human heart.

But we can never erect an edifice of happiness upon a foundation of crime: the very effort to do so proves its own futility. Crime which looks forward to happiness is impenitent and blind to the only true means of deliverance. Never, while that nameless grave contained its awful secret, could Jerrold have cast its burden from his soul. Perhaps he deemed the education and refinement wrought in him by mental suffering and fear to be signs of a chastened spirit and loftier character. But there is a refinement which has nothing to do with what is good and pure, though it may bear strong traits of resemblance. And the coarsest and commonest brutality is safer and more wholesome than refinement such as that.

Jerrold was not allowed to prove this sad truth by the slow test of time. Coming one day unexpectedly into Nora's chamber he saw her lying on the couch, holding fast in her thin white hand a tiny phial, the fragrance of which she inhaled as she slept. He stooped down to examine it, read the writing on the label, and comprehended the whole affair at once. A lowering, evil expression settled upon Jerrold's face; he took hold of the phial to extricate it from his wife's grasp. Her eyes opened instantly, almost terrifying Jerrold with their stern regard. She clutched the phial as convulsively as if it indeed contained the elixir of her life. Then was the slumbering devil in Jerrold's soul once more aroused. It gleamed from his eyes, and hissed beneath his set teeth. He seized Nora's hand violently, and, wrenching it forcibly open, snatched the phial from her, dashed it to the floor, and ground it to atoms beneath his heel. As he did so an involuntary spasm shot through Nora's heart; the air was filled with the pungent and ethereal odor of the thousand roses which had united to form that single precious drop. Nora sank back upon the couch and fixed her eyes, grave and compassionate, yet with a deeper underlying joy, upon her husband. The burst of his fury was now gone, leaving him quaking and appalled. To recall the last few moments he would have given his life, he thought; but the devil, hidden within him, laughed secretly to itself, remembering to have heard a similar tale not so many months ago.

"My poor Jerrold," said Nora, "you have destroyed not me, but yourself. I should have gone with my roses; but feeling that I was your wife, and, as such, pledged to make your welfare my duty, I resolved to live if it were possible, and, as far as I could, to lighten and ennoble your life. To preserve my own I used this, the only efficient means. You, in your blind fury, have defeated my purpose and your own salvation."

Perhaps some mysterious poison had been embodied in the magic fragrance which had permeated Nora's being, and, owing either to its gradual effect, or perchance to her sudden deprivation of it, the life which had hung so long upon a thread received its final blow. Jerrold fell upon his knees and watched her in silent agony. Possibly, had he even at that last moment had courage or true repentance enough to confess the sin which dogged him, he might in a single instant have experienced happiness sufficient to recompense him for years of misery. But the moment—and with it the last opportunity—passed forever. Scarcely had the perfume of the roses vanished quite away from the chamber than Nora also had escaped, and gone to seek its source in the abiding place of every fragrant life that has existed since time began.

The poor unfortunate who could never follow her took the little that remained to him, and laid it beneath the rose-bush in the garden. He could do no more. No one is there now to tell whether the roses still bloom or not.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE admirers of Charles Dickens can not easily lose their interest in the fragmentary work whose conclusion was left, by the sudden death of the author, to the fanciful conjectures of each reader. While some bold hands have penned a finale deemed appropriate, there are few who would not prefer to receive the unfinished story as Dickens left it. It is pleasant to know, however, that the author had communicated some general outlines of the scheme of "Edwin Drood" to his son-in-law, Mr. Charles Collins, by whom the design of the illustrated title-page was made. Mr. Collins has revealed the sequel, so far as he knew it, to Mr. Daly, who has undertaken to dramatize the tale. It appears that Edwin Drood was never to reappear, he having been murdered by Jasper. Rosa, not having been really attached to Edwin, was not to lament his loss very long, and was to admit the sailor, Mr. Tartar, to supply his place. It was intended that Jasper himself should urge on the search after Edwin Drood, and the pursuit of his murderer, thus endeavoring to direct suspicion from himself to young Landless. This is indicated in the design on the right side of the cover, of the figures hurrying up the spiral staircase, emblematical of a pursuit. They are led on by Jasper, who points unconsciously to his own figure in the drawing at the head of the title. The female figure at the left of the cover reading the placard "Lost," is only intended to illustrate the doubt entertained by Rosa as to the fate of her lover, Drood. The group beneath it indicates the acceptance of another suitor. As to any thing further, it must be purely conjectural.

Rumors of a great "tidal wave," which early in October was to visit the coast of Virginia and the Carolinas, has filled the residents with consternation. Many fled to the interior when they first heard of the prophecy, which was said to have been made by Professor Agassiz. Even when assured that Agassiz never expressed any such opinion, their fright was not allayed. The "prophecy" was doubtless a newspaper invention.

Among the eminent naturalists of the day was Madame Jeannette Power, who recently died in France. She was known as the discoverer of the secret of the manner in which the shell of the nautilus is formed, and her experiments upon the subject are among the most curious of the age. It is to Madame Power that we owe, likewise, the invention of the aquarium. She was much esteemed in the scientific world, a member of most of the European academies of science, and held a grade of high distinction at the Academy of Brussels, and, withal, was so truly feminine and simple-hearted that all this honor and glory was freely given.

Compare the growth of public libraries in Italy with their increase in the United States. In 1870 Italy had twenty-eight public libraries, five of which are in Naples and three in Florence. During the last year the sum total of books added to all the libraries of Italy was but 11,706 volumes. Three American libraries—the New York Mercantile, the Boston Public, and the Library of Congress at Washington—have each added a larger number of books during the same time.

What is fame? A New Orleans paper speaks of Miss Olcott's "Little Men," and again in the same issue alludes to the books of Louisa McAlcott.

The real name of Walter Montgomery was Richard Tomlinson. He was born in Brooklyn, but educated in England, and made his first appearance on the stage in that country. He was noted for eccentric actions, and spent large sums of money in unwise charities. Since his death his friends have entertained many doubts as to his sanity.

It is now known that the art gems of the Louvre collection were removed for safety to Brest before the civil war. On the whole, but little injury has been done to the museums, and lovers of art have had much needless anxiety.

It is pleasant in these days which abound in novels merely sensational, or of positively injurious tendency, to meet with one both good and brilliant. "Eirene," by Mrs. Mary Clemmer Ames, is peculiarly vivid and graphic from the fact that the experiences of the civil war contained in it were wholly her own. She was the only Northern woman under fire at the battle of Harper's Ferry, or who witnessed the surrender of Maryland Heights. One chapter—the eighteenth—was originally written as a letter for the Evening Post, and appeared afterward in the London Athenæum under the title of "The Battle of Harper's Ferry, as a Woman saw it." It is easy to perceive that the author has interwoven in this story the real experiences of heart and soul.

About a year ago a wealthy lady residing near the Central Park made a voyage to China and Japan to see if the tea trade could not be so organized as to engage the mercantile ambition of American women. She has recently returned, bringing various reminiscences of her travels. Moreover, she has cargoes of tea on the way hither, and has it in mind to make a practical experiment when they arrive.

The Empress at the time of the declaration of war was engaged in the formation of a society to supply work at home for women, especially for young girls, who had been obliged to work on account of reverses of fortune. This work, rendered more necessary than ever after the disasters of France, is about to be recommenced, and the Empress, though in exile, has willingly become patroness of the society.

The English are complaining that they can not get "a good cup of tea." They accuse Russia and America of appropriating all the finest grades of tea, not leaving any for them.

A delightful mingling of graceful humor and touching pathos is found in "A Daughter of Heth," the latest work of William Black, who bears a high reputation as a novelist both in this country and in England, and is undoubtedly the best living delineator of Scottish scenery and character. This novel has already reached its sixth edition in London, and is there esteemed the most popular story since "Lothair." The scene is laid in the Lowlands of Scotland, and the pictures of life are drawn with a bold and artistic touch.

"L'Armée Terrible" is a new work in which Victor Hugo will describe the misfortunes of France. It is strange, by-the-way, that although Victor Hugo has realized a fortune of £80,000, he is haunted by the dread of poverty.

Cutting tunnels through high mountains is thought nothing of nowadays. Mont Cenis Tunnel having been successfully completed, a French engineer says that there is nothing to hinder a railway being made from Paris to Pekin.

Roseneath Castle is to be made by the Duke of Argyle the Scotch residence of her Royal Highness the Princess Louise. She took a great fancy to it during her sojourn in Scotland. The Princess, by-the-way, is rapidly winning favor with her husband's people. Her charming manners place every one at ease in her presence. At a recent ball given by the Duke of Argyle to his tenants, the Princess danced the Scotch reel with a small farmer, the oldest man on the estate, who conducted his genial and merry partner through the wonderful eccentricities of the Highland dance with the dignity and manners of a Lord Chesterfield.

A remarkable "haul" was that at Greenpoint the other day, when Captain Briggs, while drawing his net in the bay, inclosed thirty sharks. The largest one measured fourteen feet, and the smallest six feet. They were not at all docile, but tore the net terribly.

Liquor dealers in Ohio are forced to take some measures to protect themselves from prosecution under the State law giving damages to the wives of men who buy spirits. The Chilicothe Register contains a notice to the wives of intemperate men, asking them to leave the names of their husbands with the secretary of the Liquor Dealers' Association, and promising that no liquor shall be sold to those thus reported.

An English journal contains the following brisk advertisement: "Notice.—If my husband, who left Bristol four years ago, does not return within three months to his wife from this date, she intends to get married."

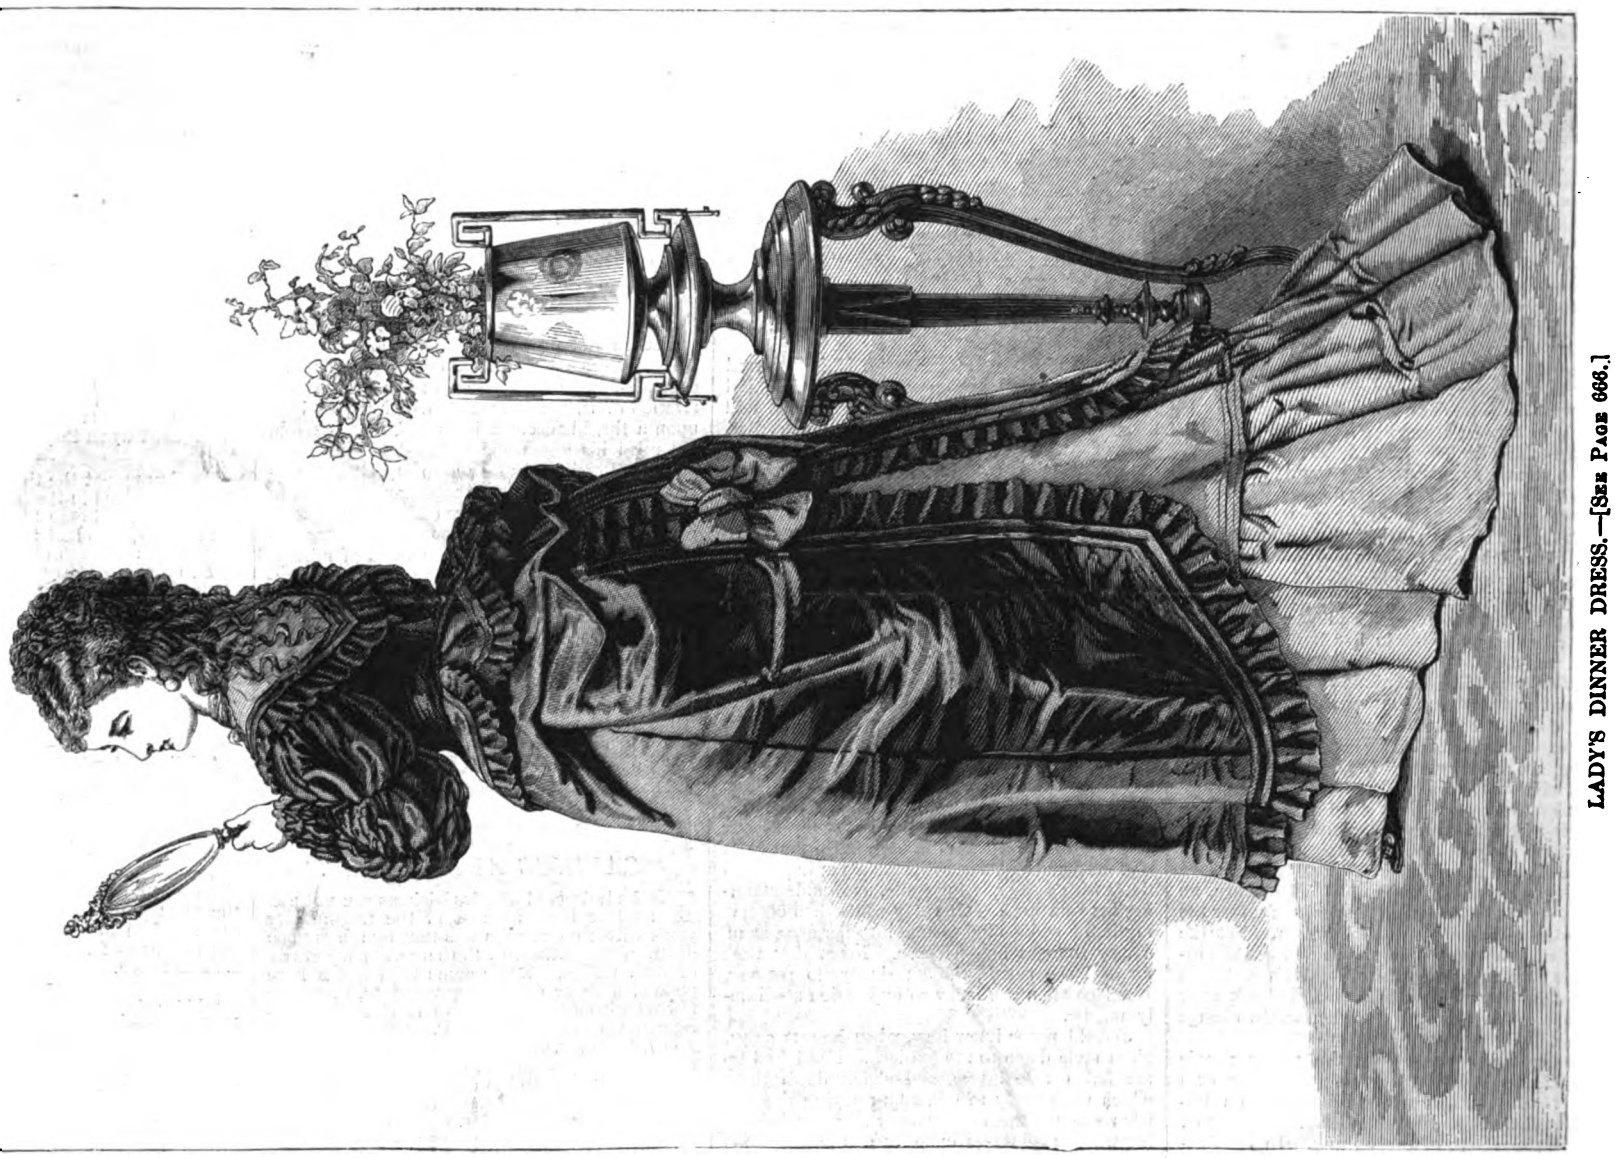
A story is told concerning a daughter of Sir Walter Scott to this effect: Sir Walter offered her the choice between a dowry of 100,000 francs or "Quentin Durward." She asked to read the MS., took it surreptitiously to a publisher, found that he would give her 120,000 francs, and dutifully and meekly told her father that she would rather have the MS. than the money. Sir Walter was deeply touched by this mark of filial devotion.

Gray's Peak—so named from Professor Gray, of Cambridge—one of the highest of the Rocky range, has really two peaks, one being 14,500 and the other 14,300 feet high. At the height of 11,500 feet the growth of trees stops with singular abruptness. Travelers who climb these mountains will enjoy the fun of struggling through snow-banks, even though it be midsummer.

"I hold," remarks a physician, "that thirty minutes should be spent at each meal, and spent, too, in chewing the food a good portion of the time, and not in continued putting in and swallowing; and in pleasant chat and laugh, instead of the continuance of the intense nervous pressure of the office or library. If you lay out to spend thirty minutes in this way at your meals, you may rest assured you will not eat too much, and what you do eat will be in the best condition for appropriation to the needs of your system."

A sensible old soldier is that who lives near Louisville. Whenever a quarrel with his wife is impending, he takes his tent and frying-pan and some provisions, and camps out until his wife hunts him up and effects a reconciliation.

Digitized by Google



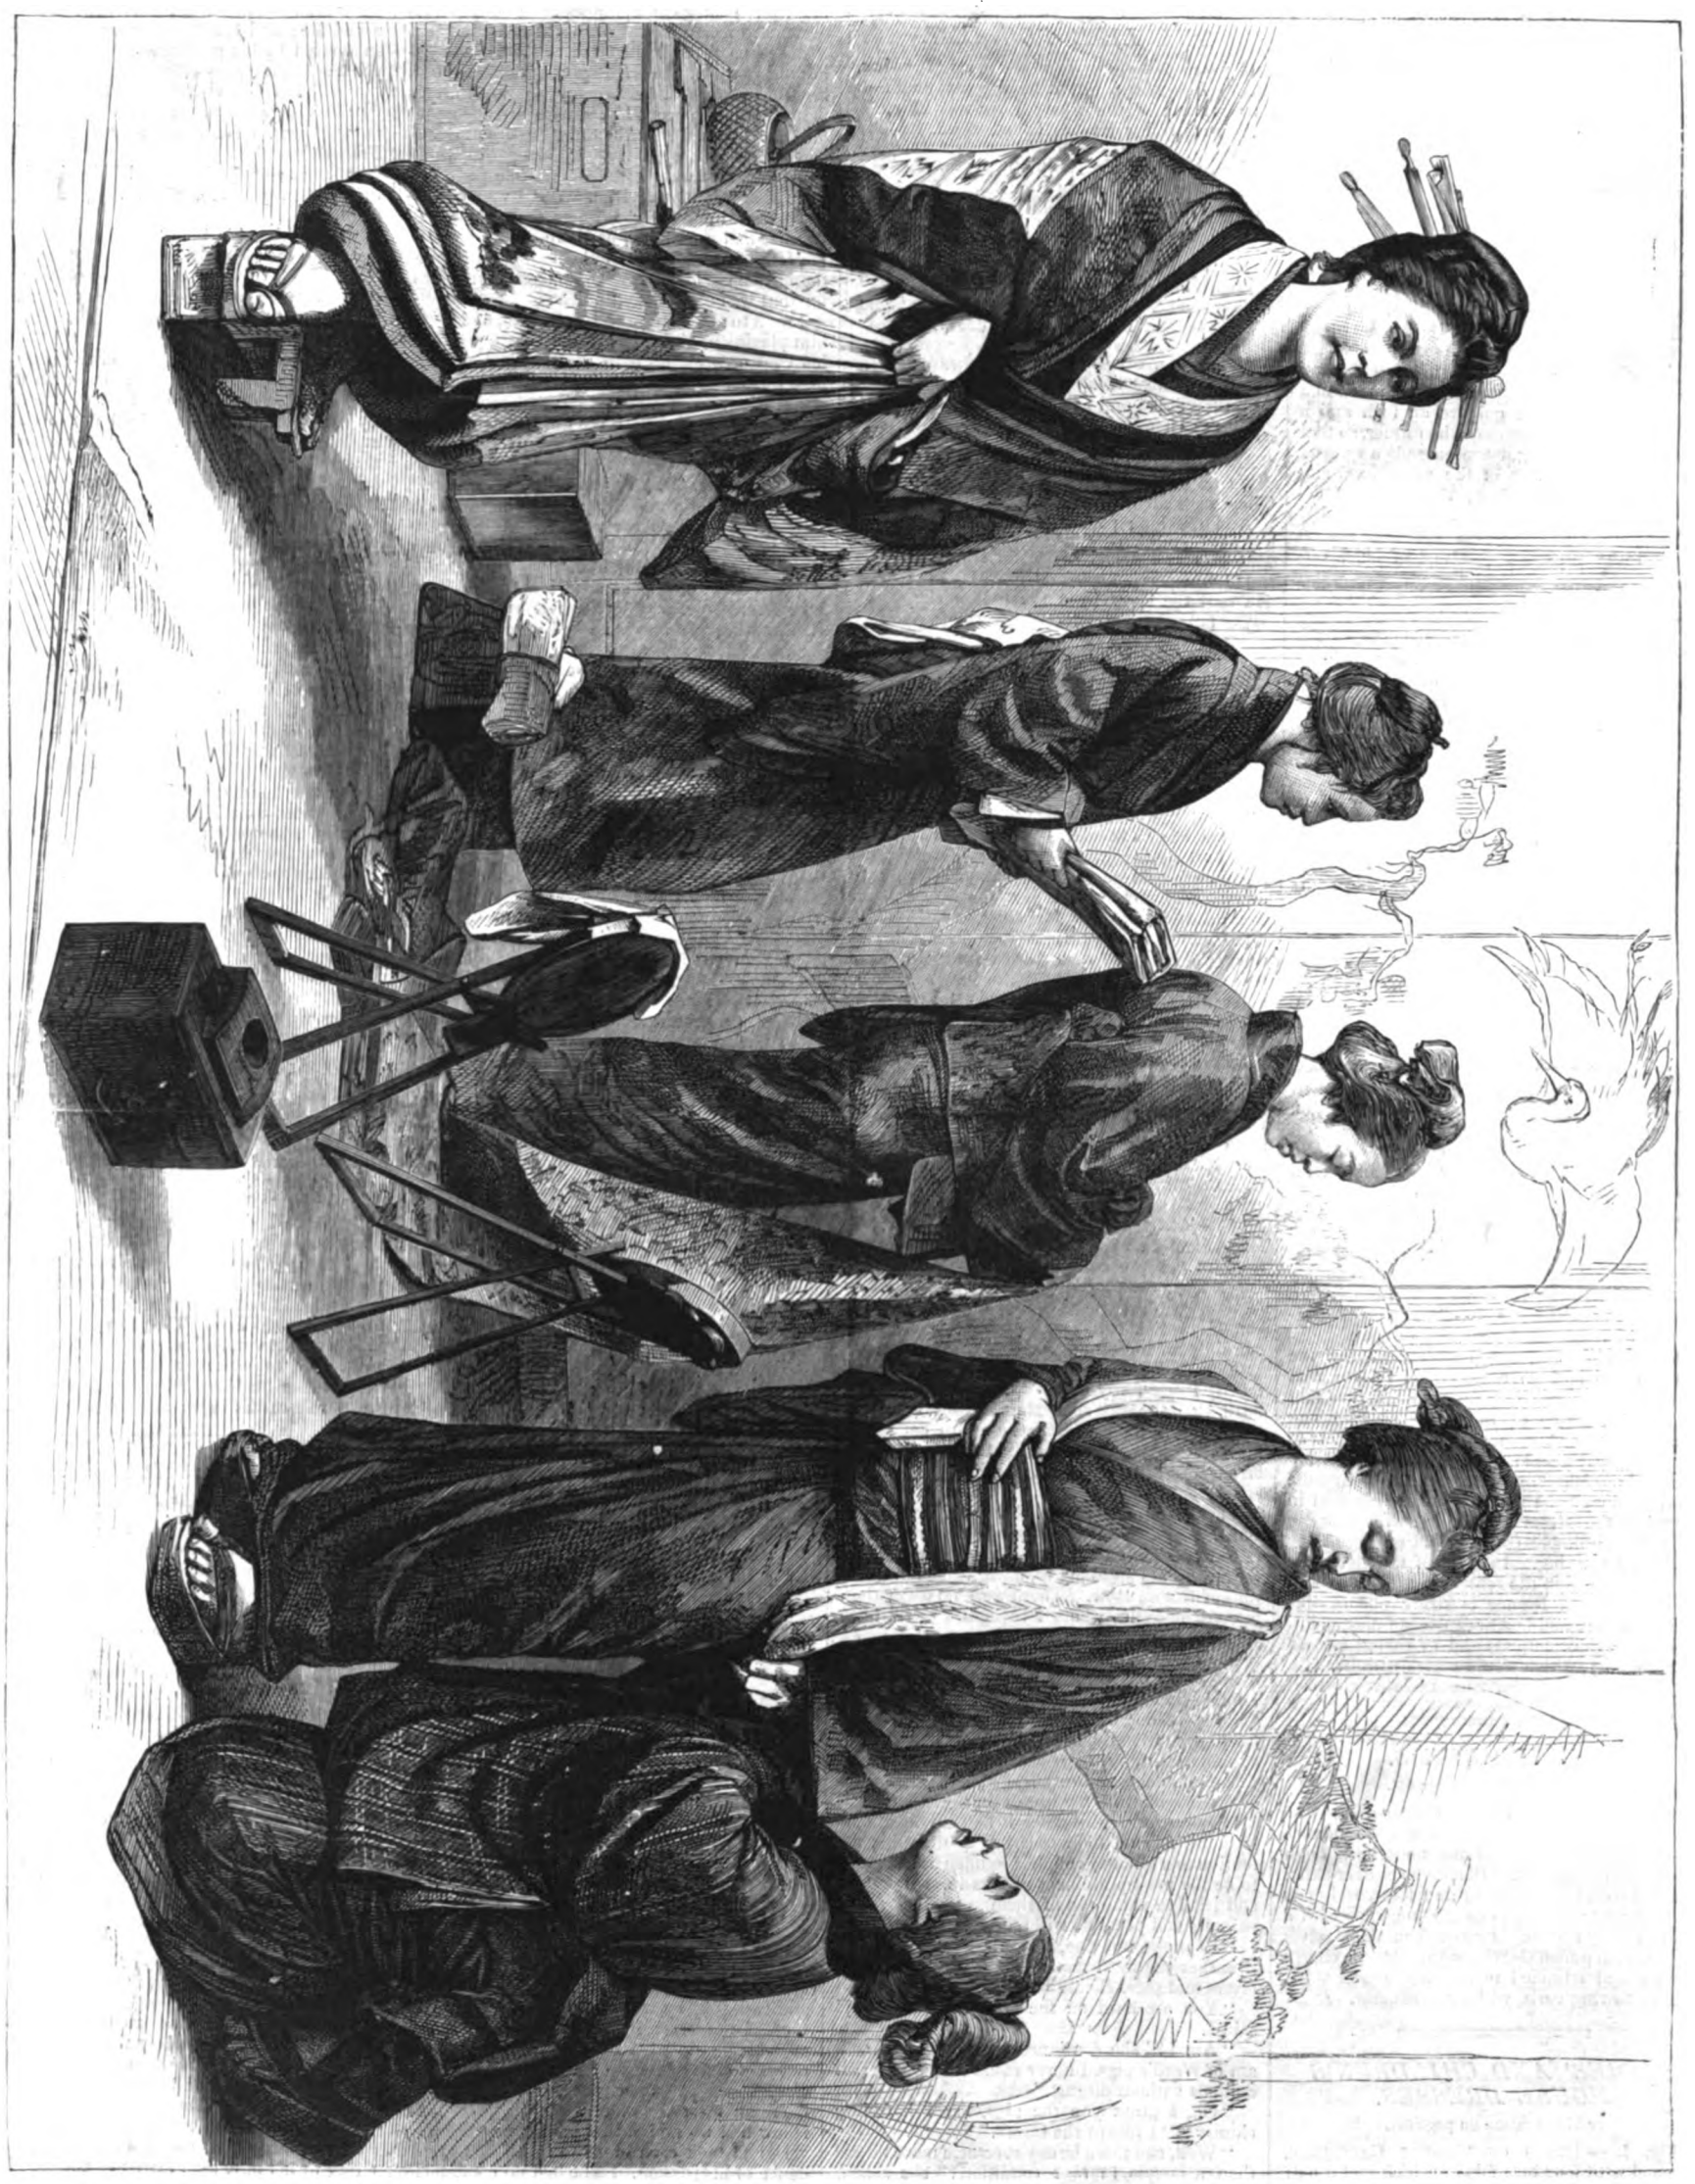
LADY'S DINNER DRESS.—[SEE PAGE 666.]

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S HOUSE DRESSES.—[SEE PAGE 666.]

Digitized by Google

JAPANESE LADIES AT THEIR TOILETTE.

JAPANESE ladies at their toilette are not so very different from their European sisters. Fashion has of late years, either consciously or unconsciously, borrowed some of its ideas from the Land of the Rising Sun, as the Japanese fondly style their native country. The arrangement of the hair especially has a familiar aspect, and made of silken fabric, varying from the gauze for summer wear to the wadded quilts that can withstand the cutting blasts of winter. The women's dress is confined to their waists by a colored wrapper, also of silk, and long enough to wind in perhaps a dozen folds round their bodies. The reader will take note of the convenient mirrors on stands, and the toilette-box, well stocked with cosmetics, for artificial bloom is not unknown in Japan.



JAPANESE LADIES AT THEIR TOILETTE.

though we never saw any European fair one, even on the banks of the Rhine, who stuck so many big pins through her back tresses as the Japanese belle at the extreme left of the picture, it is quite possible that such an arrangement may ere long become the mode. With regard to the dress of the Japanese, a recent writer observes that the loose trowsers and "chimonos" —an outer garment like the mantle of the Jews —of the men and the robes of the women are

PARIS MODES.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

NEVER were fashion and politics more closely connected than in our times. Let the latter be disturbed, and the former instantly languishes, suspends its inventions, loses its originality, and sinks to a dead level. But let political affairs assume a settled aspect, and fashion at once resumes its activity, and seeks to rival its past triumphs by new creations. No sooner, therefore, had the proposition been adopted to intrust the power to M. Thiers, and thus insure to the country some stability of government, than the impulse felt in all the workshops of Paris extended to our modistes, who set to work with quickened zeal to devise costumes for the future season.

We know now definitely that dresses with three straight skirts will be worn next winter; but though we chronicle this fashion, we by no means approve of it. It is much less graceful than the draped tunics; in fact, a dress with three straight skirts is like a house with three stories, or a bureau with three drawers; a cumbrous piece of furniture, but not an airy and graceful toilette. In the laudable attempt to banish extravagance we hope that our reformers will not exclude grace; and certainly three-decked dresses can not be regarded as a reform in any direction. In this country of universal suffrage women are free, if not to vote, at least to modify the empire of fashion, and when there is one that seems ungraceful we shall exercise the right of voting against it.

By way of contrast we will describe an elegant costume which we saw the other day at the château of the Marquise de M——, and which was designed for fall receptions.

Skirt of black satin, neither short nor trained, but trailing a little in the back, and trimmed with a satin flounce, arranged in groups of three pleats, each group being separated from the following one by a tab of black velvet. With this skirt was worn a redingote of black cloth. Corsage pointed in front, and with pleated basques behind; above the basques was set a large bow of black velvet. Black velvet revers on the high waist. Sleeves almost tight, with black velvet cuffs. The skirt of the redingote was of black cloth, folded back on the hips, and thrown backward; the skirt was consequently entirely open in front, and long enough behind to reach the upper edge of the flounce of the satin skirt. The part of the cloth skirt that was folded back was faced with black velvet; the rest of the edge of the redingote was bordered with a narrow black velvet bias fold. The whole effect was plain almost to severity, but extremely elegant.

Digitized by Google

In general, the fashion this winter will take a stand between the two extremes. Dresses, with few exceptions, will neither be very short nor with very long trains; bonnets will neither be ridiculously small nor enormously large; wrappings will neither be extremely short nor excessively long, neither quite tight-fitting nor wholly loose. Almost all the cloth wrappings are braided with soutache; and the combination most preferred is color upon color, as we say in Paris; brown soutache on brown cloth, black on black, and so on.

Another pretty costume was composed of a skirt of deep blue faille, with a large redingote of black and white striped taffetas, cut with the waist and skirt in one, the waist being open halfway down, disclosing a blue plastron, and very full sleeves, worn over almost tight sleeves of blue faille. This redingote was open in front, and was trimmed on the edge in the following manner: Take black guipure edging an inch and a half wide, and white guipure an inch and a quarter wide; lay the latter on the former, so that the edge of the black guipure extends a quarter of an inch beyond that of the white lace, and gather them both together; then form of the whole a coquillée ruche—that is, set on spirally. The seam made by setting on this ruche is covered with a very narrow bias fold of black taffetas.

Among all the reforms for which we are striving, and which we hope to attain—which is not always the same thing—is one which is on the high-road to accomplishment, and at which all should rejoice. I mean the abolition of the hideous fashion called maquillage in the time of the empire. The people of that time were very logical. All had something to conceal; so, to cover up the truth, they painted their faces. This has wholly disappeared. Rouge and pearl powder for the complexion, blue pigment for the veins, and black for encircling the eyes—all this is abandoned to old fools who wear powder, believing that it will fill up and efface their wrinkles. Women show themselves to-day with the complexion that nature has given them—that is, with the only complexion that is in harmony with the color of their eyes and hair; and this hair is no longer dyed blonde or red, as in days of yore. These are not petty reforms, and should not be disdained as such. If they do not reach the height of those which win a world-wide fame, they are interesting signs of the times, and should not be overlooked by acute observers. Where deception prevails in trifles it will be found to rule in greater things; and where extravagance is the mainspring of fashion there is lack of judgment in politics, and ruin is not far off. We chronicle with pleasure the abandonment of all paints and the disgrace of all dyes.

If ennui is fatal to France, its health must be perfect. It has not time to take breath amidst the startling events that follow each other in quick succession, and anniversaries as dangerous to double as Cape Horn—the 15th of August, the 4th of September, the Communist trials, and other occasions when violent demonstrations were predicted by our alarmists, who, nevertheless, saw the epochs come and go quietly. It is true that there was a general feeling of indignation that the representatives of the wretches who had burned Paris and caused the slaughter of so many innocent people should have been let off so cheaply. But Paris is beginning to breathe anew. Though the whole population is clad in mourning, the streets are bustling with activity, and the indomitable courage and energy of the people are reviving. In spite of the Germans, the Commune, and the sentences pronounced on the Communists, France is rising phenix-like from her ashes, and is still capable of disappointing evil prognostications, and of saving herself and humanity, which would perish with her fall.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

DINNER DRESS.

See Illustration on page 664.

THE skirt of this elegant dinner dress is of cherry silk, trimmed with a deep flounce and two narrow folds of the material. High corsage of cherry silk. Black velvet over-skirt, trimmed with satin pleating and folds, and open in the back, where it is caught together with a bow of cherry ribbon. Low-necked black velvet basque, with puffed sleeves, worn over the cherry corsage, and trimmed to match the over-skirt. Hair in flowing curls, without ornament.

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S HOUSE DRESSES.

See Illustration on page 664.

Fig. 1.—DRESS OF GARNET CASHMERE, trimmed with four bias folds an inch and a half wide, each ornamented with a fold of garnet satin. Over-skirt of the same cashmere, trimmed with a pleated flounce surmounted by three bias folds. This trimming is repeated higher up, and simulates a second over-skirt. Bows of black velvet drape the over-skirt on each side. Cashmere basque-waist with flowing sleeves, trimmed with ribbons and bows of black velvet. Three narrow folds and a ruche simulate a pointed collar.

Fig. 2.—DRESS FOR GIRL 7 YEARS OLD. Pleated skirt of blue cashmere. Over-skirt of striped blue and white poplin, trimmed with blue cashmere folds and bows.

Fig. 3.—SUIT OF OLIVE BROWN CASHMERE. Skirt trimmed with six bias folds of cashmere of the same color, but a darker shade, bound on each side with white. Over-skirt trimmed with two similar folds and woolen fringe. Basque-waist and flowing sleeves, trimmed with narrower folds and fringe. The same trimming simulates a sailor collar.

THE LIFE BOUQUET.

THE young flowers woke in the arms of Spring,
And Life knit a bright band round them—
Its woof was woven where Love was king,
And softly his meshes bound them.

And sweetly and fairly did they glow,
In spirit and seeming kin;
Alike as safe from the chill of woe
As the canker blight of sin.

So dreamed the hope: but the Summer came,
With his daring, passionate breath;
Withered and scorched in the beautiful flame,
Some bright buds shrank to death.

And Autumn came, with his cold gray eves,
His mornings bleak and dreary;
And they faded and fell, some more soft leaves,
Of the changing seasons weary.

"Alas, for my lovely flowers!" sighed Life,
As he gazed on the few remaining:
They were all unmeet for the toil and strife,
And the long path's lonely paining.

But Winter listened his bitter sigh;
He whispered hope and cheering;
He sent the snow from the hollow sky,
To fall where the leaves lay searing.

And under its covering, cold and sad,
The broken bands united;
And the flowers of Life new birthday had
In the land no death-winds blighted.

MY BIG BLUNDER.

AT the age of twenty-five the life of a London bachelor is seductive to a heathen imagination, but afterward it grows less pleasant to contemplate. One gets selfish, and a selfish man deteriorates rapidly. So it was a shock to me to brush a gray hair one morning out of my celibate whiskers. Abnormal? No: a careful investigation showed that there were more where that came from. I sat down, a brush in either hand, and contemplated. When I rose to complete my toilette I had determined to marry Sarah Hervy as soon as possible.

Sarah was a superior girl, there can be no doubt about that; men called her strong-minded, eccentric, and were rather afraid of her, not but what there were plenty of them ready to brave any danger there might be. She preferred historical, biographical, and even philosophical books to novels. She had found out a simple style of dress which suited her, and kept to it, only allowing such modifications as were necessary to avoid an appearance of affected indifference to the prevailing fashions. The instinct was a true one, for her principal beauty lay in a certain classical grace, a soft dignity, which I can not attempt to describe, but which would certainly have been marred by florid dressing.

Though I knew that other men had tried and failed, I felt fairly confident. "She has more head than heart," said Maurice, for example, "and it will take a clever fellow to get round her." Exactly; but I was a clever fellow (reader gasps)—in my own estimation. ("Oh, that is different!")

Very different, indeed, I have found it out since. But, to confess the truth, a more conceited coxcomb than your humble servant, at the time I am speaking of, never leaned over the rails of Rotten Row. There were no fewer than five young ladies whom I thought I could have for the asking, and Sarah Hervy was one of them. I was on very intimate terms with her, it was true; but directly I tried positive flirtation I found that she would not drop into my mouth quite so readily as I had anticipated. She was intelligent, friendly, lively, confidential even to a certain extent, but most difficult to make love to. For example, we were engaged one day in art criticism, counting the leaves on a Pre-Raphaelite ivy-bush to see whether it had a realistic allowance, when I took occasion to draw her attention to a spooney couple, intended by the artist to be the most prominent objects in the picture, and tried to make use of them. "What would painters and poets do without love?" I began.

"I can not imagine," said she: "how strange it is that the most unpleasant things in nature, lovers and pigs, should be so pleasing in art!"

"You are hard on the poor things, surely," said I.

"Am I?" she continued. "Well, fond as I am of Ward's pigs, I never could look at the real animals without disgust."

"Oh, I grant you the pigs," said I, feeling clumsy; "I meant the lovers."

"Well, can there be any spectacle more idiotic than a couple in that condition?" she asked, pointing to the picture.

"The question sounds cruel, coming from one so calculated to reduce a man to it."

"There!" she said, with a frown, and a petulant tapping of the foot; "that is the worst of being a girl; one can not talk freely without being suspected of fishing for compliments."

Of course I knew that Miss Sarah's sentiments would become modified when the right man turned up; but I was evidently not the right man—at present, at all events. She was not to be carried by assault, as I had hoped. I must attack according to the rules. Love must be disguised as friendship; flattery must be implied rather than expressed. Above all, I must maintain the opinion which I knew she had of my abilities; for she quite worshiped talent.

I learned the Athenæum by heart every Sunday. I did. My memory was wonderful in those days. And Miss Hervy, who did not see that journal, credited me with having read all the books, heard all the music, formed an independent judgment on the plays and pictures, mastered the astronomical, geological, philosophical discoveries chronicled in its pages from week to week.

My plans were disconcerted by the Hervys going out of town. Mr. Hervy was a director of a hundred boards; Mrs. Hervey was not Sarah's mother, but the second wife, with a tendency to bronchitis, which sent the family to a house they had near Ventnor when spring returned with all its sweets, east wind included, and the period of migration had now arrived. But I was not utterly checkmated, for I knew that my friend Freshet had a castle somewhere at the back of the Isle of Wight, and would be too glad to go there if he could get any fellow to stay with him, for that was his constant object.

I went to the club we both belong to, and found him playing at billiards, and smoking a pipe with his coat of arms on it in alt-relief. I said the pipe was coloring; I praised his game; I spoke of yachting, which he lived for, and promised to take a cruise with him. We dined together, and spoke of the castle, which turned out to be within a couple of miles of the Hervys' place. He asked me to go down there with him. I agreed. He said he would make up a party, and wrote to the housekeeper to get rooms ready that very evening. You might do any thing with Freshet if you knew how to play him.

I had known him at school and at college, poor fellow—yet why "poor fellow?" He was rich and happy; and if he had a vague, uneasy semi-consciousness at times that people were laughing at him, it did not seriously damage his self-complacency or his digestion. But one always says "poor fellow" of a good-natured man who is below the average in wits, and Freshet was certainly that. Three men besides myself agreed to be Freshet's guests, and I was somewhat annoyed to find that they were all admirers of the girl I had calculated on monopolizing. The reason was simple: Freshet had gone about asking all the men he knew, and only those who were attracted by the knowledge that the fair Sarah was in the neighborhood accepted the invitation. It was a case of natural selection. It did not promise to be a very cordial group. However, I flattered myself that my presence was much more injurious to their chances than theirs was to mine; and as each of them had probably arrived at a similar conclusion in his own favor, and as, moreover, we were all men of the world, and not Arcadians, we rubbed along very well together. We never alluded to the secret attraction which had drawn us individually to the castle, but pretended intense interest in the place and neighborhood. Were those cottagers Freshet's tenants? Was there really once a ditch and a draw-bridge? Was that pig-sty part of the old keep?

Chorus. "By Jove!"

On the morning after our arrival some one proposed a stroll over to Ventnor; some one else said, "By-the-bye, were not the Hervys at home?" It was then averred that Hervy was a "rattling good fellow" (which I take to mean one who has jingling materials in his pockets), and that it was a moral duty to look him up. So we called, and a queer game of courtship was started. Four competitors and only one prize, and no younger or elder sisters or other spinsters to divide our attentions and make things less awkward. What a pretty tournament we might have got up, if such things had not gone out of fashion!

And as if four lovers were not enough for one girl, our host took the Sarah fever very badly, to our great amusement; for when we were at home, and not occupied with whist or pool, we amused ourselves by mystifying Freshet; and his present passion, which seemed to us outrageous, formed a new subject for the exercise of our wits.

The fact was that I found myself a great deal less alone with Miss Hervy than I had been in London even, and my weekly cram of Athenæum was for the most part lost labor. Indeed, two of my old rivals showed country accomplishments which threw me somewhat in the background. One rode, and the other croqueted in a very superior manner; and though I did not fear lest such frivolities should make any real impression on so lofty an intelligence as Sarah's, I did not quite like the opportunities thus afforded to men who were undeniably among the cleverest of the fops who dangled about her. Prudence suggested that it would be well to spoil their little games when possible, even if I could not at the moment profit directly by the manœuvre; for, of course, I could not often interrupt a rival's tête-à-tête personally without a row. So, whenever Martingale's riding-lesson or Mallet's instruction in croquet appeared to be growing dangerously confidential, I set Freshet at them. The honest fellow had no notion that his guests were his rivals, and took each of us in turn into the confidence of his passion. So he had no compunction whatever in falling in with my views whenever I suggested that he should constitute himself an odious third. "It was nothing to Martingale or Mallet, but he was spoons in that quarter," he reasoned.

The others did not perceive my manœuvre or make reprisals, and as Freshet never took the initiative, I was left in peace when I managed in my turn to secure the ear of the fair Sarah.

"Why do you all laugh at Mr. Freshet?" she inquired on one of these occasions.

"I don't know. People always have," I answered. "He was the only child I ever heard of who practically attempted to catch birds by sprinkling salt on their tails."

"Did you see him?"

"No; the first time I ever witnessed his naïveté was later, when we were school-boys together, and watching the sale of a horse. The purchaser, after having stroked his legs down, etc., secundum artem, went to his mouth. 'Rising seven,' said the would-be seller.

"'Ay, all that,' replied the other.

"'How did he know the horse's age?' Freshet asked me; and I, being a country-bred lad, was so amused by his greenness that I replied, 'Did you not see the gray hairs about his nose?'

"'Oh!' said Freshet, quite contented.

"Presently afterward we met a gray.

"'What an old horse that must be!' cried Freshet."

"It was a perfectly natural deduction from the information you had given him," said Sarah, smiling.

"Perfectly; his blunders always are. That is what gives them their piquancy."

"I see," said she; "his nature is so trusting that no amount of experience can break him of placing confidence in his fellow-creatures. Well, perhaps he deserves to be laughed at."

It was evident that Sarah's kind heart did not approve of the flippant manner in which we were in the habit of treating the man whose hospitality we enjoyed, and I resolved not to quiz him again in her presence. And indeed, when I thought about it, I was ashamed of making a butt of him at all, and determined to discontinue the practice. And yet, so powerful is custom, I put the most cruel hoax possible upon him the very next day; for, bored by his praises of an object I could appreciate so much better, and irritated by professions of a love which seemed to burlesque my own, I told him that it was wonderful he was so blind as not to see his passion was returned.

As usual, he put implicit faith in my words; the idea of irony or "chaff" never occurred to him. "I should never have dreamed it!" he cried, grasping my hand. "What a thing it is to have a friend!"

He hurried off to the stables, and in five minutes I heard him cantering along the road. My heart smote me; I had no idea he would be so prompt. It was eleven o'clock in the morning, and presently Martingale and Mallet, who were always late, came down to breakfast. "Where's Freshet?" asked Mallet.

"Gone to propose to Miss Hervy," said I, and they roared. Freshet, of all blockheads, to rush in where—hum—ha!—really intellectual beings feared to offer! We waited his reappearance as a gourmand watches the twisting of the Champagne wire. At lunch-time he arrived—his horse in a foam, his neck-tie twisted. He grasped my hand: I felt very guilty.

"Don't be excited, old fellow," I stammered; "I had no idea that you would rush off like that. If I was mistaken—"

"I'm your debtor for life! Congratulate me, you others: I have offered to Miss Hervy, and been accepted."

Chorus. "Accepted!"

"Yes. I should never have dared ask if it had not been for Penyolin."

I thought there must be a mistake, but there was not; and they were married in the June following, I acting as Freshet's best man. That was ten years ago. They are the happiest couple I ever knew, and so grateful to me! If ever you want to get any thing out of Mrs. Freshet, talk to her husband, and pretend to show deference to what he says: she will subscribe, safe.

EXTREMITIES.

THE HEAD AND HANDS.

MOTHER NATURE is continually turning out into the world specimens of her admirable workmanship complete in every part—astonishing little machines, with a resistless motive power beating inside, and five senses to keep watch and ward over the delicate mechanism, in comparison with which the most perfect steam-engine ever elaborated by man is mere child's play. These minute creations no sooner appear than they are ignominiously swathed in flannel, jealously guarded from the light of day, and buried beneath layers of blankets, as though their appearance was a disgrace tolerated from necessity, but at the same time rigorously concealed from the public gaze. As the months pass, existence demands air, and slowly the layers are removed, until the solemn little face is exposed, and two small mottled fists are allowed to escape from the bandages. But here indulgence stops, and through the long years of its pilgrimage upon earth the human animal is doomed to wear its wrappings as the beast wears its skin, with this difference only, that the beast peacefully enjoys his one unchangeable suit, while civilized man is obliged to dress and undress himself seven hundred and thirty times in the year, to say nothing of extra laws imposed by fashion, which swell the number up into the thousands, and fully explain the suicide of the Frenchman who shot himself because he was so tired of taking off and putting on his stockings. Submitting to his fate, man learns to endure his straitjacket, and defines himself as a clothes-bearing animal for the rest of his days. Grateful for the freedom of two of his extremities—his head and hands—he even wears his boots with resignation, plodding along his weary way, and occasionally relieving the monotony of his existence by investigations into the hidden mysteries of that dominant extremity, his brain.

The head, then, has been an object of interest since the earliest ages. It has been described, dissected, and generally extolled until man almost forgets that he has other extremities in the investigation of the laws of phrenology, physiognomy, facial æsthetics, or scalpel analysis, according to his varying taste. Four of the senses are lodged in the head, and undoubtedly it is an important portion of the human frame, as any one will find who tries to get along without it. But, by way of variety, can nothing be said of the humbler members, the hands and feet—those faithful servants who obey so implicitly the mandates of their ruler? Where would the civil engineer be if his hands mutinied under him? what would the general do if his foot-soldiers deserted the camp?

Digitized by Google

The hands, then, come first in order; and let us begin with a good, hearty hand-shake, the well-known sign of American nationality, and in itself an amusing test of character. Who ever saw a mean, niggardly man grasp his neighbor's hand, and shake it heartily with open good-will? No; with his dry fingers he doles out a miserly little clutch, clawing your skin with his nails, as though he hoped to hook some advantage out of you before letting go. A timid man hastily puts out his hand and just touches your fingers, nervously retreating as soon as possible, in evident relief. An irresolute man slowly slides his hand into yours, and just as you are expecting a firmer clasp the limp fingers drop away, and your hand closes on nothing. A nervous man, if he shakes hands at all, will squeeze your fingers like a vise: and a hypocrite, with his clammy palm, betrays his double purpose in his uncomfortably loose but at the same time tenacious hold, in which your hand can not find a firm abiding-place, but slips around in the dampness most unpleasantly.

In the matter of hand-shaking between the sexes, there is at times a subtile magnetism which accounts for many of the sudden fancies that take possession of our gentle sisters, to the bewilderment of their slow, prosaic relatives. A timid, irresolute, bashful way of shaking hands is secretly despised by these little hypocrites, whose sense of touch is delicately keen; and as they withdraw their slender palms they mentally consign the unfortunate stranger to the regions of pitying contempt, along with other worthy young men, who, for various equally trivial reasons, are riddled with ridicule through and through, and never know it. These fine distinctions in the science of palmistry are seldom applicable on the opposite side, because ladies are in the habit of shaking hands by rule in a conventional fashion, with no personality about it whatever; and so general is this practice that a young widow of our acquaintance once became a belle from no other quality than her way of shaking hands. Whether intentionally or not remains a secret, but, instead of standing off at arms-length and stiffly extending the tips of inanimate fingers, this dark-eyed little woman would walk up to a visitor, giving no sign of extending her arm until she was close upon him, and then, when only a few inches apart, the hand was graciously offered, and the frank, cordial grasp seemed to say, "I am sincerely glad to see you—you above all others!"

The hand is an index of the disposition; and although the pressure of outside circumstances may have modified the original characteristics, the hand shows what nature intended the person to be, and what he would be if left to take his own way. The artistic hand, for instance, with its extremely taper fingers and pink, almond-shaped nails, was never intended for work; and although you may find such hands toiling in the heaviest tasks, you may know that necessity or stern principle is forcing them along contrary to taste and inclination, and that if the outside pressure should cease they would instantly relax into happy indolence or a graceful trifling with æsthetics, such as painting flowers or cherub heads, playing fragments of dreamy music, turning the leaves of rare books, peeling a luscious peach, or holding up to the light a crystal glass with the red wine shining through the carved grape leaves on its border. Women with artistic fingers are apt to play with fancy-work, making little tableaux of their white hands and colored wool; but their normal condition is absolute indolence, sitting in an easy-chair arrayed in soft silken robes with their lovely helpless hands crossed upon their laps, perfect pictures of dolce far niente. Such women, if they have money, lead happy lives, generous in every thing but personal exertion, and generally considered models of amiability; if they are so unfortunate as to be poor, principle or affection may inspire them to work, but it will never come easily to them, and in spite of the best intentions they will remain inefficient to the last. The same may be said of men with extremely taper fingers: while rich they are charming members of society; but if poverty comes, woe to their wives! On them will fall all the burden and heat of the day.

Another variety is the plebeian hand, broad and short, with coarse large fingers, finished with stumpy ends, and round nails with no sign of the half-moon upon their thick white surface. These hands are made for work—not the skillful mechanism or deft manipulation of the higher crafts, but simply that active strength and indiscriminating energy that can wield a shovel or scrub a floor with unapproachable celerity, although they would pause helplessly before a cabinet-maker's tools or a sewing-machine. These are the hands that extend our railroads across the country, pile the bricks for our houses, and carry our mammoth trunks up into the fifth story of hotels; these are the hands that wash our clothes, scrub our floors, and build our fires; their hearty, good-natured, blundering owners are invaluable helpers in the land, and without their strength we should be but a puny nation. In democratic America the plebeian hand is often seen among the wealthy, but no amount of care is able to disguise its character. Pretty, rosy-cheeked girls, whose broad, plump hands have never been hardened by a moment's work, and whose short fingers sparkle with diamonds, may endeavor to appear elegantly languid like their taper-fingered companions, but in spite of themselves their true nature breaks out in a romp with their little brothers in the back-yard, or the zest with which, at a later day, they enter into a general house-cleaning. They are never so happy as when at work; and, to straighten out the tangles of the world, they ought to marry the taper-fingered men, for they have energy enough in their honest, good-natured souls to carry the graceful idlers along all the days of their life without a murmur or even a consciousness of the true state of the matrimonial team.

A third variety between the two already mentioned is what may be called the mechanical hand, large and well shaped, with firm, straight fingers and square, broad nails—the hand of the useful and successful worker in every department of life. When you see such a hand you know that it can do something; and although it may belong to the millionaire, you feel sure that if all his wealth should disappear in one night, by the next that hand would be successfully employed in some unaccustomed but naturally appropriate work; and if it should belong to a petted heiress, you know it could readily earn its living in some of the deft occupations of women, and enjoy it too right heartily. These are the hands of our best surgeons, who carry life and death in their fingers. These are the hands of our best artists; for although there are many fragmentary and spasmodic musicians and painters among the taper fingers, their genius is marred by their indolence, and the mechanical hand carries off their honors. These are the hands of the skillful craftsmen, the machinists and the engineers, who hold in their grasp the chained giant, and make him labor for the world. These are the hands of the practical man who, whatever may be his position or wealth, is not ashamed to mend a hinge, repair a clock, trim a church for Christmas, make a swing at a picnic, or even light a fire and cook the dinner if the servants have deserted and the wife is sick. Every nail such hands drive in holds, every parcel they tie up stays tied; in short, every thing they do they do it with their might, and therein lies the secret of their success.

Mixed in between these grand divisions are numerous composite hands partaking of the characteristics of all three, and denoting a mixture of the same qualities. Sometimes a family will preserve a particular mould for generation after generation, but usually a cross-breed alters the type, and the hands become conglomerate. The American hand, generally speaking, is small both in men and women, and, incased in a glove, presents quite a contrast by its delicacy to the English and Continental hand; but remove the glove, and the contrast is the other way—the imperfect shape and irregular fingers of the New World sinking into insignificance beside the statuesque outlines and shapely proportions of the Old World hand, large perhaps, but perfect enough for a sculptor's model. According to American ideas, the antique statues have hands too large for beauty, or, as a Manhattan belle once expressed it when looking at the Venus de Medici, "she must have worn sevens at least." The famous Venus of Milo is moulded on so majestic a scale that we can easily imagine the grand sweep of the noble arms and the rounded curve of the perfect hand in spite of the missing marble: a goddess, indeed! but where could she find a hand mighty enough to grasp hers? Certainly not among the men of the nineteenth century; her shapely fingers would crush their soft palms at the first grasp. The hand is a test of the artist, both sculptor and painter; he may succeed with the face, but in nine cases out of ten he puts in a conventional hand, as though it was a matter of no importance; whereas, in reality, every hand has an expression of its own as decided as that of the face, and should be as carefully copied. Why should the hand be idealized more than the face? and in portraits where truth is the object sought, why should all the hands be lies? To the eye of affection the hand is dear just as it is. A wife thinks the hand of her husband one of the dearest things on earth, hard-working though it be; and the lover cherishes for the fair little hand of his mistress a poetical tenderness worthy of the days of chivalry; he puts the ring on that slender third finger, and vows to love and protect his youthful bride; and although she grows old as time glides on, and the ring is worn to a mere thread, he still sees under the wrinkles that fair little hand that was laid so confidingly in his he is afraid to think how many years ago.

The ancient science of palmistry, although now out of fashion, has quite as much truth in its axioms as phrenology or physiognomy, and, to be just, quite as much nonsense. If the two lines which cross the palm horizontally run into each other on the thumb side, one is sure to be hanged, which it is a comfort to know; not that we have ever seen a hand where those two lines did run into each other, but we are still hopefully on the look-out. The line of life, too, is a versatile division, which changes its length with every change of gloves; and the line of poetry is entirely obliterated by harnessing a horse or sweeping a room. But, in spite of these discrepancies, there is something in the doctrine of the thumb. A large, long thumb denotes power, and all great men are said to have large thumbs, just as they are said to have large noses. If the thumb is long from the second joint to the end it denotes great obstinacy, or if you please, determination; and careful observation will show that this is generally true, as well as the converse proposition, that those who have this joint short are amiable and yielding. This buoy, showing the vicinity of the dreaded rock, may be useful to mariners about to launch their barks upon the unknown sea of matrimony. Stretch out your hands, ye gentle blondes; your thumbs betray you; for almost universally the second joint is long, and your innate obstinacy stands revealed. It is time the subject should be handled without gloves, and the truth proclaimed from the house-tops. Brunettes may blaze into fiery anger, and sparks may scintillate from their sharp speeches, but it is soon over; whereas, for steady, systematic, enduring obstinacy, give me a dove-eyed, low-voiced blonde. Grant is a blonde, and his famous saying, "I intend to fight it out on this line if it takes all summer," is but a characteristic utterance of the temperament to which he belongs. His obstinacy won his battles. But, after all, it is only in the feminine hand that the length of the thumb becomes an important question. Men have so much obstinacy, any way, that the exact quantity more or less is of small interest. What do we care whether the water is thirty or thirty-one feet over our heads, provided we are to be drowned in it all the same? As people grow old their hands seem to acquire a general expression of the general character. Misers' fingers look like clutching claws; epicures have fat, pulpy fingers, luxurious in every motion; nervous, vacillating people play with the table ornaments, scribble on book margins, break paper-cutters, trifle with pieces of string, or beat tattoos upon their chair arms until steady-going old gentlemen, vexed in the profoundest depths of their orderly souls, rise in sudden wrath and leave the room. As a point of etiquette it is quite an art to manage the hands and keep them in graceful repose; in short, the science of good manners may be summed up in these words—to know how to keep still. The size of the hand is a matter of taste, although common-sense dictates that a man's hand should be large and a woman's small. When we see a man with little, puny fingers placing the wedding-ring upon a hand twice as large as his own, we feel the incongruity, although, no doubt, the sturdy wife will take good care of him; and there is no law to prevent little men from marrying large women, as they so often do. A small hand is out of place on a man, and one is afraid that in an emergency it will be found wanting; and if, in addition, it is soft and white, we immediately associate it with ribbons and tapes, pomatum and gorgeous neck-ties—the inevitable sweet William behind the counter. Red hands accompany youth; young persons scarcely ever have white hands—one of the few beauties belonging to the afternoon of life. Active young blood rushes to the surface, and growing youths gaze with despair at their beet-colored hands. Time alone can remedy the difficulty, unless it is caused by a tight armhole or tight lacing, in which case the scissors are prescribed.

The wrist belongs to the hand, because it can scarcely ever be concealed, in spite of the well-starched cuffs of the gentlemen, or the broad bracelets of the ladies. A beautiful wrist is a rare beauty, an ugly wrist a common defect. On a man the wrist should be strong, smooth, and not disfigured by visible tendons or knobs; on a woman the wrist should be small, round, and delicately veined inside, gradually increasing in size above; for no matter how small the wrist may be, it is not beautiful if there is nothing but wrist all the way up.

Gloves are a sign of the wearer's taste, and it is said you can always tell a lady by her gloves. However that may be, the study of gloves is amusing, from the four-buttoned lavender of the belle down to the white cotton glove of the negro waiter. Gentlemen, as a rule, scorn to fasten their gloves, and having souls above buttons, they consider the gaping corners a masculine prerogative. Ladies are apt to wear gloves that are too small, cramping their hands into an unnatural shape that would wound the sensitive eye of a sculptor, who knows that no hand was ever intended to look like a block of wood, the same size from top to bottom. When you see a lady under forty years of age whose gloves are so long that the empty tips flap loosely far beyond the ends of her fingers, and so large that the wrinkled kid envelopes her hand in shapeless folds, you may know she is without hope in the world. She may be busily employed, she may be an advocate for female suffrage, she may be rich, but, all the same, she is a desolate creature, caring little as regards her own personality for the present, and expecting nothing from the future. Give that forlorn palm a hearty shake, ye chivalrous-hearted brothers, say a kind word to the cheerless face, for those gloves are a sign that the last gleam of hope has departed, feminine vanity is dead, and all is over!

A CHINESE FUNERAL IN SAN FRANCISCO.

THE deceased was the wife of a Chinese doctor, and the funereal feast was spread upon tables placed in the open street. These tables were covered with all sorts of edibles, including pyramids of fruit and whole cooked and uncooked hogs.

The rose-wood coffin was at one end of the principal table, and beside it stood a man muttering Chinese words, and making a hideous noise with clashing cymbals. Twelve women with white cloths wrapped about their heads and faces walked round about the coffin; one of these women carried an infant with its head also enveloped with a white cloth. This infant, we believe, was the child of the deceased. The balconies of the houses on both sides of the narrow street were crowded with women in their strange head-dresses, looking on with smiling and cheerful faces, without any appearance of sadness, for all were paid mourners. After the display had been well exhibited, amidst much shouting, noise, and confusion, the hack-drivers and express-men drove through the crowd, and took the corpse, mourners, and feast to the grave-yard. When they arrived there the tables were again spread, as an offering to the spirit of the deceased, the women kneeling round, howling and making a great noise, in which the baby also joined; but whether it did so from fright caused by the fearful noise, or in response to a severe pinching, we can not decide, although we are inclined to think that it did so from the latter cause.

At the last each person received a pair of chop-sticks, which he partially burned and then stuck in the ground, and to each was given from a bag a small piece of paper containing money. The body was placed in the receiving vault; the tables and edibles were reloaded on the wagons, and the funeral procession returned home.

The bodies of the deceased are placed in the receiving vault to await the annual shipment back to China; for once a year a mandarin sends a vessel to California for this purpose, all the resident Chinese uniting, Masonic fashion, in paying the expense.

It has been stated in some of the newspapers that the door of the receiving vault used by the Chinese is splashed with blood; but this is not so. The door is simply covered with unsightly splashes of red wax, coming from the tapers burned in front of it. These are placed on little sticks, like small rocket sticks, and left swealing in the wind until burned up or blown out, and splashing the door with the melted wax.

USEFUL RECIPES.

TO CLEANSE A BOTTLE OR CASTER CRUET THAT HAS CONTAINED SAUCE, ETC.—Any bottle, etc., can be cleaned by dropping in about a tea-spoonful of shot, and then putting in some warm suds, shaking up and down. Dry the shot for another time. If you have not shot on hand, a few small and smooth pebbles out of the garden alley will answer.

Bottles that have held rose-water should never be used for any flavoring extracts. The spirits are destroyed at once.

To remove the cork from a bottle when it has fallen in, take a strong piece of twine, passing it into the bottle double, holding the ends in your hand; slip it so that the string will be around the cork, which must be in a position to slip out. Draw the string gently, and the cork will come out with it.

In buying flour always look at the color. If it is white, with a slight straw-color tint in it, buy it; but refuse it if it is a bluish-white, or has small black specks in it. Then wet a little of it, and knead it between the fingers. If it works sticky, it is poor. Try it again by squeezing some of it in your hand. If it retains the shape given to it by the hand, it is a good sign.

TO RID A PLACE OF ANTS.—Have a large sponge; wash it well and squeeze dry, which will leave the cells wide open. Put it on a plate, and sprinkle some fine white sugar over it, not letting any go on the plate. The ants will soon collect upon the sponge. Dip it into scalding water, which will kill them at once. Squeeze out the water, and repeat until all are gone.

Peach kernels or rose leaves steeped in brandy make an agreeable flavor for puddings, cakes, etc.

APPLE FLOAT.—One pint of stewed apples; when cold, sweeten and flavor to taste. Just as you want to send to table, add the beaten whites of four eggs, lightly stirred into it. With cream this makes a nice dessert.

Apples stewed for sauce should be pared, cored, and put into cold water until they are ready to be cooked, to keep them from discoloring. Add a little water, putting them in a porcelain kettle or stew-pan. Cover them, and let them cook gently. Look at them often to see if they need more water, but do not stir them until they are done, or you will have them lumpy and rough; when soft, stir and mash, add a little butter, run through a colander, sweeten, and set away to get cold.

Make a nice crust, and line a bowl with it that has been well buttered; fill with sliced apples, and sugar enough to sweeten them, the peel and juice of one lemon. Cover with crust, pinch the edges together, flour a cloth and tie it around the top of the bowl very securely, so that it will not slip, and put into fast-boiling water; boil from one and a half to two hours, according to size, not letting it stop at all, and keeping it well covered with water. Eat with cream, or a sauce of butter and sugar.

APPLE SOUFFLET (very nice).—Stew the apples just as you do for sauce, adding a little lemon peel and juice, omitting the butter; lay them pretty high around the inside of a baking dish. Make a custard of the yolks of two eggs to one pint of milk; add a little cinnamon and sugar. Let it cool, and then pour it into the dish; beat the whites, and spread over the top, browning it a little in the oven. Sprinkle a small quantity of sugar over it: it will brown sooner. The apples should be about half an inch thick at the bottom and sides of the dish.

APPLE MERINGUE.—Pare, core, and stew ten apples in as little water as possible; season as sauce, putting in a very little butter. Put into a pudding-dish in a cool oven; add the beaten whites of four eggs as you would icing; sprinkle sugar on top, and brown. A little custard may be used, instead of apple, in cups, sweetening and flavoring it.

APPLE PUDDING (very good).—One quart of grated apples that have been pared but not cooked; add to it a quarter of a pound of melted butter, half a pound of white sugar, cinnamon or any spice that may be wished, yolks of eight eggs, beaten; then the beaten whites. Have the pie-dish lined with puff paste, fill up with the apple mixture, and bake as any other custard pie.

APPLE COBBLER WITHOUT CRUST.—Two pounds of pared, cored, and sliced apples. Put them into a pan that can be covered; add one pound white sugar, juice of three lemons, grated rind of half a lemon; cook two hours, put into a mould, and eat with cream. Delicious.

TAPIOCA PUDDING (delicious).—A quarter of a pound of tapioca; soak overnight; in the morning pour off, and put in one and a quarter quarts of boiling water; sweeten and flavor to taste. Take six or eight apples, tart ones, pare, core, and stand them in a baking dish; fill the middle with sugar and a little cinnamon, pour the tapioca over, and bake until the apples are done. Eat cold with cream. If preferred, the apples can be pared, cored, and cut smallish; put into the dish, and pour over the tapioca, baking until done. If you want to make it in a hurry, instead of soaking overnight, pour boiling water on in the morning, and stir until it looks like thin starch.

Digitized by Google

WILL IT PAY?

MY girl is not in the least like Edith Lisle, but she greatly admires Edith, and is only too ready to defer to her always. I think Edith's success with her, and with others, is owing chiefly to her inches; she is nearly six feet in height, and is an exceedingly stately young person. I am never sorry when Maud perceives that she has ground for differing from her in opinion, or for criticising her in action. I hope I am not quite dead to the delight mortals feel when they see for an instant their ideal personified; but this headlong worship of young people for each other, charming as it may be in some of its aspects, is also most painful. We all know what comes of it in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred.

We stay at Dr. Lisle's when we are in town. I do not refer to the Rev. Dr. Lisle, but his brother. The doctor was my father's friend, and when they bought their house they assigned a room to me, which I was glad to furnish. There are also boarders in the house who are not transient. I went there with Maud on the day we visited Rag Fair, and was amused to hear Mrs. Markham say to Miss Traver, after dinner, when we went into the parlor,

"Now, my dear, let us have your report of the day."

Miss Traver is accustomed to this kind of catechising, and likes it, and I felt quite certain that, as she was in her usual good spirits, we should have something like a lively argument, which would be as beneficial to my girl as a lecture on mental philosophy or moral science. Miss Traver is quite handsome, and a belle in her circle. In speech she is rather reckless, and so inspires, I am inclined to think, a sort of "pleasing fear." Nobody knows what she will say on any subject; it is only evident that she will say the thing that is uppermost in her mind, and it will please, pain, or offend as happens. I have sometimes felt, though, that destitute as she appears of reticence and tact, she has really a more than usual share of each.

Mrs. Markham is a lady who has been compelled to look after her own affairs, having met, since the death of her husband, as she tells me, nobody whom she felt she could rely upon as she could upon herself. Whether she has reason to trust herself you may judge. She was left with property valued at fifty thousand dollars, and has multiplied that sum by four, and the doctor says that her investments are considered as safe as any that are made.

Miss Traver answered this lady:

"Went shopping; bought a camel's-hair shawl for a doll; drove in the Park—drove, mind; lunched at Delmonico's; am going to the opera."

While this answer was being made I could see Maud's eyes fixing into a kind of stare, which makes her look sometimes as if she had a "vision." At such moments I fancy the mists which lie around the horizon lift, and reveal to her an expanse of which she had not dreamed. Sometimes I feel that it would be worth all I have to give to be able to penetrate to the secret of her thoughts in such moments. I might then discover that this business I have undertaken is really less fearful than I sometimes feel it to be.

Edith Lisle stood by the piano, with her hand on a parcel which had been brought in while we were at dinner. She had eagerly opened it, and after a glance of satisfaction had turned from it again. I noticed now that her hand moved over the package nervously, as if she wanted to say something about it, yet doubted the wisdom of doing so.

"Nonsense about the doll. I believe the rest, though," she said.

Maud looked relieved. This was, apparently, just what she had been thinking.

"The doll is the truest part of the account," said Miss Traver; "though the rest of it is true enough. I went shopping with Mrs. Drake. Florence is going away to boarding-school."

"Florence Drake!" exclaimed Mrs. Markham. "Why, how old is the child? It seems but the other day I had her in my arms, a baby."

"She is ten," said Miss Traver.

"And going to boarding-school!"

"With her doll," answered Miss Traver.

"And her doll's camel's-hair shawl," added Edith, slowly.

"Any thing, I suppose, to get rid of a responsibility," said Mrs. Markham. "First, it was housekeeping that was too much for Mrs. Drake, and now it's the care of her child. I wonder she can take the trouble to breathe. Girls, I know how that woman began. Every thing was a bore. A fine republic we shall have in two or three generations, with such mothers managing our homes for us! Think of shopping like that! I would sooner put my purse into the hands of an idiot. If she were the daughter of a king—a born princess—there might be some excuse for her ignorance of what she might see and hear, and can't be forgiven for not seeing and hearing, the instant she steps outside her door. Fifty dollars on a doll!"

"Look at this sacque," said Edith; and she now opened the package lying on the piano. "I bought this for fifteen dollars, and it is to cover the nakedness of a living being. Look at it; it is for a minister's daughter—a girl twelve years old. Her father commissioned me to buy a garment for her."

We all examined the sacque. Maud was all admiration, and expressed more than she would have been likely to do but for the embarrassment and consciousness she exhibited at the moment when Edith began to speak of the country minister. Mrs. Markham said nothing until Edith asked her opinion, whereupon she once more examined the sacque, inside and out, and then pronounced her judgment.

"My dear Edith, if you paid fifteen dollars for that garment, you allowed yourself to be imposed upon. The material could not have cost five dollars—the labor less than two. With Harper's Bazar, or any other good pattern, for a guide, you might have saved the minister a great deal of money."

Miss Traver said, laughing, "Impossible! How could Edith have made such a mistake?"

Edith paid no attention to that remark, but very seriously addressed herself to Mrs. Markham: "Even if it is so, and I do not dispute it, you might as well expect me— How could I ever find time to run about looking for cheap material and women to do the work?"

"I don't say it was possible for you to do it," answered Mrs. Markham, "but that the same result might have been arrived at, at a very trifling cost, by a person who had the time. If I had a girl to educate," she added, as if she were addressing a roomful, "she should learn how to shop. I mean, she should have some knowledge of the real value of things.—Miss Jones, what do you think?"

"I think," I said, reminded of my text of the morning, from which I had preached to Maud at Rag Fair—"I think that whatever is worth doing is worth doing well. Women are obliged to shop, and the most of them have no prejudice against the occupation. They ought, then, to understand the value of things. It would pay."

"Very true," said Mrs. Markham; "it pays in the long run, and in the short run too, to do what one must do well, perfectly well. When I think of young men I know of, who are working for a moderate salary, and are considered eligible matches, and see how they marry and put their hard-earned money into the hands of girls who are as ignorant as children of what it ought to command in the market, and of what they ought to spend it on, I can't wonder that the newspapers are filled, as they are, with accounts of dishonorable business transactions. They say that women will purify politics. I would like to see them doing what they might to purify trade."

"I shall never go about beating down the prices of dealers," said Edith, with spirit.

"No," said Mrs. Markham, "I hope not; but you will acknowledge that it would be worth while to know what a thing is worth before you give your money for it. Believe me, it will pay you to know how to shop."

She did not mitigate this remark by the addition of a word. Edith folded her sacque, and said nothing; but she looked not altogether pleased. After Miss Traver had left the parlor she went out and did not come back again until Mrs. Markham had gone to her own room. Then she returned and devoted herself to Maud.

But that was not the last of the sacque. In the morning Mrs. Markham told me that Edith had made her say what she thought the garment was really worth, and she had told her about eight dollars, but not ten cents above that.

"Then they shall have it at that price!" exclaimed Edith. "They have no money to throw away. They shall not be the losers by me. As you say, I might have had the thing made in the house or out of it."

"There is good stuff there," said Mrs. Markham. "She can be made to see a thing, and she isn't lazy or selfish."

On the whole I was glad that Maud had heard this talk, although I knew that the precious X. in her pocket-book had been depreciated by it, and that it would be a long time before she could see again, as she had seen the night before, and all day, indeed, that it was a small fortune.

PRINCESS JOHANNA VON BISMARCK.

OUR readers will be interested in the accompanying striking portrait of Princess Bismarck, the wife of the statesman whom recent events have placed at the head of the world's diplomatists.

Johanna Friedrike Charlotte Eleanore von Bismarck—for by this long array of names was our heroine baptized, after the German fashion—was born April 11, 1824, of a noble Pomeranian family. Her father, Heinrich Ernst Jacob von

PRINCESS JOHANNA VON BISMARCK.

Puttkamer, of Viarthem, belonged to the ancient family of lords of the manor, Von Schlawe, Von Rugenwalde, and Counts of Newenburg and Tauchel, who, since the fourteenth century, have ranked among the most powerful of the Pomeranian nobles. Their present name, Puttkamer, is a corruption of their Polish official title, Podkomorzy, or under-chamberlain. Her mother, Littegarde von Glasenapp, of Reinfeld, was descended from one of the great Pomeranian families who, as proprietors of castles, maintained a superiority over the petty nobility.

Prince Bismarck first made the acquaintance of his wife at the house of his friend Moritz von Blankenburg, a well-known leader of the conservative party in the Prussian House of Delegates and the Diet. Their acquaintance became more intimate while on a journey to the Hartz, on which both accompanied the Blankenburgs. It was no easy matter for the "mad Bismarck," as he was then called in Pomerania, to obtain the hand of his chosen bride, whose parents yielded with difficulty to his entreaties. Shortly after the first German diet in which he began to take a stand as a political leader, on the 28th of July, 1847, Deichhauptmann von Bismarck-Schönhausen married Fräulein Johanna von Puttkamer. They went to Italy on their wedding tour, and then set up housekeeping in the old quiet stone mansion of the Bismarcks at Schönhausen, in their old provincial home. Here, where Bismarck himself was born, his first child and only daughter, Marie Elizabeth Johanna, was born on the 21st of August, 1848. Of his two sons, the elder, Herbert Nicolaus Heinrich Ferdinand, was born at Berlin on the 29th of December, 1849; and the younger, Wilhelm Otto Albrecht, at Frankfort-on-the-Main on the 1st of August, 1852.

Madame Bismarck is a thoroughly domestic woman. She accompanies her husband wherever he is called by his duties, and creates for him the home life which the great statesman loves so well, and in which he finds repose and refreshment from his labors. She is universally esteemed and loved, and may be regarded as a fine specimen of a model German wife and mother.

MUSHROOM CULTURE.

ALMOST every body is fond of this delicious esculent, but the mystery and trouble attached to the old system of cultivating it have deterred all but the best gardeners from attempting it; of late years the French have greatly simplified it, and their practice can be easily adopted by any one having a warm, dry cellar.

The main supply for the Paris markets is grown in the quarries at Montrouge, Frépillon, Méry-sur-Ouse, Sous-Bicêtre, Moulin de la Roche, and at Bagneaux. These quarries, from whence are taken the blocks of stone used for building purposes, are not open at the top, but resemble great mines, being from twenty to one hundred and sixty feet below the surface, and entered by perpendicular shafts, the mushrooms being grown on the floors of the chambers, galleries, and headings. This cultivation is carried on to such an extent that some cultivators have from ten to twenty miles of mushroom beds in these strange places. Large quantities, however, are grown in ordinary cellars where the temperature can be kept at about 50° Fahr., and all light and draughts of cold air can be excluded.

In growing them in cellars three modes of arrangement of the beds are adopted, one forming long beds on the floor, the second on shelves, and the third in tubs. We will first proceed to give directions for preparing the manure, and then give the modes of using it in these various ways.

In any open shed, or place where it can be protected from heavy rains, ordinary fresh horse manure, entirely free from rubbish of any kind, is to be made up into beds about two feet thick, or a little more, pressing it down with the fork as it is laid up, and then treading it down firmly; after being thoroughly watered it is again trodden down and left to ferment for eight or ten days; then it should be turned over and made into a similar bed again, placing the manure that was on the outside of the first bed in the centre of the second bed. In ten days or a fortnight it will be ready for use.

In making beds on the floor of the cellar the manure, prepared as above directed, should be laid up in ridges, either angular or of a semicircular shape, about twenty-six inches wide at the base and the same height in the centre. The manure should be firmly and closely laid, and if at the end of ten or twelve days it should indicate a temperature of about 76° Fahr., it may then be spawned. A greater temperature than this will destroy the spawn.

The spawn, which comes in the form of bricks, and can be had of any of our leading seedsmen, should be broken in pieces about the size of a hen's egg, and inserted an inch and a quarter deep in the bed, commencing on a line about six inches from the base, the holes being from twelve to fourteen inches apart on the row. Sometimes two rows of spawn are used, about seven inches apart; in this case the holes for the spawn should alternate with each other. After the spawn is inserted the holes are closed with manure firmly pressed over it. After eight or ten days the bed should be examined, to ascertain whether the spawn has taken, which may be known by its developing little white, thread-like filaments. If some of it has not started, then fresh pieces should be inserted. The bed should be now covered with a covering about an inch or two thick of good, fresh soil, screened through a coarse sieve.

After a few days the mushrooms will show themselves. They should be gathered every other day, not using a knife for this purpose, but pulling them with a slight twist of the hand, breaking them off in the soil. Any holes that may be made in gathering them should be filled up with fresh soil.

Shelves about three feet apart may be made one above another against the cellar wall, upon which to grow them; in this case the shelves are first covered with a layer of fresh soil two or three inches thick before the manure is put upon them; the bed is then prepared and treated as in the first case, being laid up anglewise against the wall.

In growing them in tubs—and this is the mode we would recommend to our readers—take any common barrel and saw it in halves crosswise. Bore four or five holes in the bottoms, and fill them two or three inches deep with fresh soil; then add the manure until the tub is half full; then place six or seven pieces of spawn upon it, and fill the tub full of manure, pressing it well down, and rounding it off dome-shaped. At the end of ten days examine it, and if the spawn has taken, cover it with an inch or two of soil, as in the case of the other beds.

The two main points to be attended to are that the temperature of the bed is at its proper height when the spawn is inserted, and that it should not be covered with soil until the spawn is well developed. The temperature of the atmosphere in the cellar should be kept as near 50° as possible, and all draughts of air and light avoided. Should the beds become dry, they may be watered by gently sprinkling them with water at blood-heat, or about 100°.

Digitized by Google

If the proper temperature can be maintained, the beds can be made at any season of the year. They will yield a crop for three or four weeks, and a smaller second crop can be had by adding a dressing about half an inch thick of fresh soil, beating it down moderately with a spade, and watering it with blood-warm water.

This system differs from the old modes in growing them entirely in the dark, not using any soil mixed with the manure, and using the manure as it comes from the stable, merely shaking out the longest litter. By growing them in the dark we also get rid of the trouble of keeping the beds covered three or four inches thick with straw or long litter, as was required under the old systems.

BRETON WOMEN AT A PARDON.

THERE is no part of France so interesting to a traveler of antiquarian proclivities as Brittany. In this sea-girt corner of the kingdom, remote from Paris and its vanities, the quaint dress, customs, and even language of the ancient Celts have been preserved with more or less fidelity to the present time. Here are found the Druidical monuments of Carnac, the finest remains extant of that strange people, who bequeathed so much of their spirit to modern France; and here the country seems peopled with memories of Cæsar and his legions. It was in Brittany that the decisive battle was fought which gave Gaul to the Romans, and which ceased only with the total destruction of the Breton fleet in the bay of Morbihan. The Bretons are still distinguished for the stern integrity, headstrong willfulness, and indomitable courage that signalized their Armorican ancestors. Their language so closely resembles the ancient Gaelic that they and the Welsh can readily understand each other. They are a deeply religious people, and cling to the traditions and observances of their sires as tenaciously as to their dress and tongue. Among the yearly religious festivals which they celebrate with great fervor are the Pardons, as they are called, of St. Anne of Auray, and of Notre Dame de Bon Secours, at Guingamp. The former is continued throughout the summer from Whitsuntide, but is at its height on the saint's day—St. Anne's Day—most especially cherished in that town, of which she is regarded as the patroness. The Pardon of Guingamp takes place on the Saturday before the first Sunday in July. It is attended by as many as 10,000 people of all classes, whole families coming together—men, women, and children—whole villages sending up the congregation of the parish church, with the clergy at their head, bearing crucifixes, caskets of relics, banners, garlands, and wax-candles—the last-mentioned for votive offerings given by the faithful. The picturesque dress both of the men and women will be remarked. The men wear their long hair, broad hats with velvet streamers, large stand-up collars, short jackets, and tight breeches, with embroidered leather belts and wooden shoes, and carry as pilgrims long staves in their hands. The women and girls, in their singularly shaped white caps, bright-colored bodices, shawl handkerchiefs, and brocaded silk aprons, look not less quaint and old-fashioned, as they stand with their huge candles, or their chaplets of flowers, by the way-side, around the consecrated fountain, or at the doors of the church.

BRETON WOMEN AT A PARDON.

Digitized by Google

TRY THE TRIAL TRIP!

TAKE

THE GREAT ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY.

(NEW YORK CITY, AND ROCHESTER, N. Y.)

THE THIRTEEN NUMBERS of the Quarter from Oct. 1, 1871, to Jan. 1, 1872, will be sent, On Trial, for Only FIFTY CENTS! Try the TRIAL TRIP!

FROM

THE RURAL NEW-YORKER will be sent from Oct. 1, 1871, to Jan. 1, 1873,—FIFTEEN MONTHS (65 Nos.)—for $3; or two copies (to different post-offices, if desired,) the same time, for $5, which is giving TWENTY-SIX NUMBERS FREE!

TO

Moore's Rural New-Yorker,

The Great National Illustrated Weekly, is the STANDARD AUTHORITY on Agriculture, Horticulture, Etc., and a favorite Literary and Family Paper all over the Continent. It is Ably Edited, Finely Illustrated, and by far the Largest, Best and Cheapest Journal of its Class in the World! For over Twenty Years it has been the most Popular Weekly in its Sphere, but its Contents, Style and Reduced Price for 1872 will render it still more acceptable. Only $2.50 a Year; $2 in Clubs. Great Premiums to Club Agents. Specimens, &c., sent free. Drafts, P. O. Money Orders and Registered Letters at our risk. Address

D. D. T. MOORE, New York City.

G. SCHIRMER'S

New Circulating Music Library,

701 BROADWAY,

Containing over 40,000 numbers of Instrumental and Vocal Music. Subscribers residing in New York City and vicinity can have the music delivered at their residences. Send or call for Circulars.

It has the delicate and refreshing fragrance of genuine Farina Cologne Water, and is indispensable to the Toilet of every Lady or Gentleman. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in PERFUMERY.

COLGATE'S EAU-DE-COLOGNE TOILET SOAP.

STARR & MARCUS,

No. 22 JOHN ST.

(UP STAIRS), N. Y.,

MAKE A SPECIALTY OF THE

GORHAM M'F'G COMPANY'S

STERLING SILVER-WARE.

Especial attention is requested to the many new and elegant pieces manufactured expressly to our order the past year, and quite recently completed.

An unusually attractive assortment of novelties in fancy silver, cased for wedding gifts, of an inexpensive character.

The works of the Gorham Company are very extensive, enabling them to employ the most accomplished talent in designing, skill in produoing, and the best labor-saving machinery and method of manufacture, thus reducing the cost and bringing these beautiful wares within the reach of almost every purchaser.

The standard of this Silver is that of British Sterling, 925-1000.

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES NOW THE FASHION.

24 inches long, weight 2¼ oz., only $5.
28 inches long, weight 2½ oz., only $6.
30 inches long, weight 2¾ oz., only $7 50.
32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9.

Only importer who retails, CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., and 251 Grand St., corner Chrystie.

By mail on receipt of sample and price, or by express, C. O. D.

Excelsior Waterproof Cage Mat

Keeps cages clean and free from vermin. 2 Pkgs. to any address, 50 cts. (prepaid), 12 Mats in a Pkg. Send inside measurement of cage. Nothing upon these Mats to injure the birds' feet. M'f'rs' depots, 269¼ Pearl St., N. Y.; 414 Arch St., Philadelphia. J. BROKER & Co., 1140 Broadway. Send stamp for circular.

SCHENCK & CO., 269¼ Pearl St., New York.

$290 For first-class Pianos—Sent on trial—No Ag'ts. Address U. S. PIANO CO., 865 B'dway, N. Y.

NICOL & DAVIDSON, 686 Broadway,

Are receiving Novelties from Paris and London in

REAL BRONZES, COMPOSITION BRONZES, BISQUE GOODS,
FRENCH CHINA DINNER, DESSERT, AND TEA SERVICES,
VASES, PARIAN STATUARY (from Minton), MANTEL SETS,
GLASSWARE (from Baccarat),
GLASS CHANDELIERS (from Osler), SHEFFIELD TABLE CUTLERY, &c., &c.
ALSO, OF OWN MANUFACTURE,
GAS FIXTURES and FINE SILVER-PLATED WARE.

NOTICE.—Buyers of Goods under the names of Wamsutta Prints, Checks, Lindseys, Cambrics, Ticks, and Silesias, are hereby informed that all such goods are not manufactured at the Wamsutta Mills. We limit our Name and the Wamsutta Ticket to our Bleached Shirtings and Sheetings. We have, in addition to our former Trade-Mark, adopted the following, which will in all cases appear with this notice.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., June 1st, 1867.

Thos. Bennett Jr. Agent Wamsutta Mills.

OFFICE OF WAMSUTTA MILLS, NEW BEDFORD, September 1st, 1871.

It has been the constant endeavor of our Company for more than twenty years to improve the quality of the goods of our manufacture; so that our fabrics are fully equal to any in the market. We have just completed a New Mill, supplied with machinery of the most approved kinds, and have also added to the machinery in the mills previously built all the latest improvements; so that we are now making our goods finer, heavier, and handsomer than ever before.

The goods are of the full width represented, and not on a basis of 35 inches for a yard.

All the Standard Goods bear our Ticket and the above Trade-Mark, and may be relied on for quality and quantity, and as of our manufacture.

The Agents for the sale of our goods to Jobbers and Wholesale Dealers are ALMY & COMPANY, New York, 65 Leonard Street, cor. Church.

" " Boston, 38 Franklin Street.
CADBURY, THOMAS, & CO., Philadelphia, 221 Chestnut Street.
CHASE, STEWART, & CO., Baltimore, 27 German Street.

JOSEPH GRINNELL, President.

ANDREW G. PIERCE, Treasurer. THOS. BENNETT, JR., Agent.

E. RIMMEL,

PERFUMER,

PARIS, LONDON, BRUSSELS.

THE AMERICUS CLUB BOUQUET,

The Perfume of the Season.

JOCKEY CLUB,
WHITE ROSE,
MUSK,
IHLANG IHLANG,
&c., &c., &c., &c.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Special Representatives for United States, EDWARDES & RUSSELL, 38 Vesey St., N.Y.

REAL JET JEWELRY.

We have just imported from Whitby, England, a large assortment of new patterns of Real Jet Jewelry, consisting of Earrings at $2, $2 50, $3, $3 50, $4 per pair.

Brooches, $2, $2 50, $3, $4, $5 each.
Crosses, $2, $3, $4, $5 each.
Lockets, $2 50, $3, $4, $5 each.
Bracelets, $4, $5, $6, $8, $9, $10 per pair.
Sets of Brooch and Earrings, $4, $5, $6, $8 a set.
Necklaces (beads), $5, $6, $8, $10 each.
Necklaces with Pendants, $6, $8, $10, $12, $15, $18 each.

We will send any of these to any part of the United States by mail, postpaid, on receipt of the price; and if not satisfactory they can be returned in the same way, and the money will be promptly refunded. In ordering please state if a plain or ornamental pattern is desired.

HOWARD & CO.,

Jewelers, No. 865 Broadway, New York.

Also Agents for Waltham Watches.

STRASBURGER & PFEIFFER,

(Successors to Strasburger, Fritz, & Pfeiffer),

IMPORTERS OF GERMAN, FRENCH, AND ENGLISH

TOYS,

China & Fancy Goods,

BOHEMIAN GLASS and LAVA WARES,

MUSIC BOXES, ACCORDEONS, HARMONICAS, CONCERTINAS, &c., &c.,

394 Broadway, near Canal St., N.Y.

Parlor Ornaments, latest novelties in Toys, Fancy and Ornamental Goods constantly arriving to supply the general demand.

PARIS KID GLOVES.

UNION ADAMS & CO.,

No. 637 Broadway,

HAVE JUST OPENED A BEAUTIFUL AND ELEGANT VARIETY OF THE CELEBRATED

P. L. AUBERT'S

Kid & Dog Skin Gloves

FOR Ladies & Gentlemen.

DENSLOW & BUSH'S "SAFETY" OIL.

Will not explode! Safest and purest oil ever produced! Stands over 150° fire test! We take regular Kerosene oil and by our new process expel all impurities and explosive elements. The Fire Underwriters of N. Y. expressly recommend our oil as a protection to life and property. A lighted lamp may be upset or broken without fear of explosion or fire. For sale by all grocers, druggists, &c., in the U. S. Extra inducements to dealers. Address DENSLOW & BUSH, 120 Maiden Lane, N. Y.; 8 Custom H. St., Boston, Mass.; 104 Chevert St., Baltimore, Md.; 51 S. Water St., Chicago, Ill.; or Cleveland, O.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMO,

NOW ON EXHIBITION

AT THE

Fair of the American Institute,

Together with the original Oil Paintings

CALL AND SEE THEM!

☞ Illustrated Catalogues to be had gratis at the fair, or on application to

L. PRANG & CO.,
BOSTON, MASS.

THEA-NECTAR

IS A PURE

BLACK TEA,

with the Green-Tea Flavor. Warranted to suit all tastes. For sale everywhere. And for sale wholesale only by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 8 Church St., N. Y. P.O. Box 5506. Send for Thea-Nectar Circular.

C. WORCH, destroyer of

MOTHS IN FURNITURE.

The only reliable remedy for vermin of this kind. 110 Fourth Avenue, New York.

RIFLES, Shot-Guns, Revolvers, Gun Material. Write for Price-List, to GREEN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Rifles, &c., bought or traded for. Agents wanted.

Digitized by Google

THE BEAVER BRAND.

SILK-FINISHED

BLACK PURE MOHAIRS.

These GOODS are finished alike on both sides, and are distinguished for their silky appearance, brilliant lustre, and pure shade of fast Black. Being made of the very finest material, they positively excel all other Mohairs ever sold in the United States.

These splendid Goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

☞ Purchasers will know these Goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Beaver, precisely like the above.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 & 429 Broadway, New York,
Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

LADY'S TROUSSEAU "B"

FOR $200.

6 Muslin Chemises	@	$2 25..	$13 50
6 Linen "	@	4 75..	28 50
1 Bridal Set (3 pieces)			12 00
6 Pairs Muslin Drawers	@	2 00..	12 00
6 " Linen "	@	2 75..	16 50
3 Plain Cotton Skirts	@	2 25..	6 75
3 Tucked " "	@	3 00..	9 00
3 Plain Muslin Night Dresses	@	4 50..	13 50
3 Tucked Cambric " "	@	5 00..	15 00
3 Embr'd " " "	@	9 00..	27 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@	5 00..	10 00
2 Corset Covers	@	3 75..	7 50
1 " "			6 75
2 Dressing Sacques	@	3 50..	7 00
1 Robe de Chambre			15 00
			$200 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent, C. O. D., by Express. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials.

LORD & TAYLOR,

BROADWAY & TWENTIETH ST.,

NEW YORK.

NOW OPENING,

a large stock of

LADIES' COSTUMES,

FANCY WOOLEN CLOAKS,

EMBROIDERED HOUSE JACKETS,

FUR SEAL JACKETS, FANCY FURS, &c.

All Imported Goods, and in elegant variety, to the Trade only.

THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO.,
391 Broadway, N. Y.

Figures will not lie!

How Large Fortunes are made!

☞ FACTS FOR THE PEOPLE. ☜

☞ SEE the prices at which four of the leading Sewing Machines are sold in the UNITED STATES, and ENGLAND.

	Price in England.	In the U. S.
Wheeler & Wilson	$45.00	$85.00
New Singer - -	32.50	65.00
Elias Howe - -	35.00	65.00
Wilson Shuttle -	40.00	45.00

The above Prices are for exactly the same classes of machines as sold in both Countries. There is scarcely any difference in the cost of material and labor in any of the above named machines.

☞ AFFIDAVIT.—W. G. Wilson, President of the Wilson Sewing Machine Co., personally appeared before me, and made oath that the above prices are correct, and taken by him from Circulars published in the United States and England under the corporate names of the Companies manufacturing said machines.

FRED. SMITH,
Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas of Cuyahoga Co., O.

The WILSON SEWING MACHINES are for Sale in most every County in the United States, and

No. 707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

GLYCERINE CAKE.

RAWOLLE'S TOILET GLYCERINE CAKE is unequaled for Washing, Shaving, Shampooing, Tooth Soap, and Baby Wash; produces a clear, soft, white skin, and prevents pimples and chapping. Warranted over one-half pure Glycerine. For sale by druggists. MARX & RAWOLLE, Manufacturers of Glycerine, 179 William St., New York.

$250 A Month easily made with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Secure Circular and Samples, free. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Continue the sale of

MOQUETTE CARPETS,

FRENCH, &c.,

At the EXTREMELY LOW PRICE of $3 per YARD.

NOVELTIES IN 5-FRAME

ENGLISH BODY BRUSSELS,

Extra Quality,

THE NEWEST AND CHOICEST DESIGNS,

The greater part confined styles,

ONLY $2 25 PER YARD.

SAME QUALITY, SELECTED DESIGNS OF LAST SEASON,

Only $2 per yard.

WILTONS, VELVETS, TAPESTRY BRUSSELS, &c.,

PROPORTIONATELY LOW.

Prices the same as, and in some styles lower than, those of last Spring, notwithstanding the recent advance in Europe of fully 20 per cent.

A LARGE AND ELEGANT ASSORTMENT of AXMINSTER, AUBUSSON, AND TURKEY CARPETS,

IN ONE PIECE. AT OLD PRICES.

RUGS, MATS, OILCLOTHS, &c., &c.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH & 10TH STS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

MOURNING GOODS DEPARTMENT.

We have now open a superior stock of new and desirable fabrics for Fall and Winter Wear, in addition to our usuall arge supply of Staple Goods:

Camel's-Hair Cloth, Cachemire Sicilien, Drap de Russe, Baratheas and Imperial Baratheas, Drap d'Ete, and Cashmeres.

French and English Bombazines, Henrietta Cloths, French and English Serges, Mohair Brilliantines, Alpacas, Crapes, and a full assortment of Second Mourning Goods, presenting the largest and most varied stock yet offered, and at the most Reasonable Prices.

HOSIERY, UNDERGARMENTS,

Gentlemen's and Youths' Ready-Made Furnishing Goods, Sash Ribbons, Cravats, Ties, Scarfs, Braces, &c., &c., at the very lowest prices.

"CHOSSON'S CELEBRATED KID GLOVES," in all the Latest Colorings for Street and Evening Wear, in 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6 Buttons.

Also, Dog-Skin, Castor, Buck, Driving, and every description of Lined Gloves for Fall and Winter Wear.

UPHOLSTERY DEPARTMENT.

Now open, a Large and Attractive Assortment of Satins, Damasks, Cachimere Moquets, "Broche Satins," Figured and Plain Silk Terries, Cotelaines, Striped S. & W. Pekinades, Satines, Chintzes, Cretonnes.

LACE AND NOTTINGHAM CURTAINS, in Choice Designs.

MIRRORS, CORNICES, SHADES, BEDDING, &c. Wholesale and Retail.

CARPET DEPARTMENT.

The Newest Styles and Designs in Fine Carpets, from the most celebrated European Manufacturers, now arriving by every steamer.

Aubusson, Axminster, Turkey, and Smyrna Carpets, some entire for Rooms, in a variety of sizes.

Moquette, Axminster, Tournay, and Royal Wiltons, Velvets, and English Body Brussels, and Tapestry Carpets, in a great variety of private patterns.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN OILCLOTHS.

All at Lowest Market Prices, Wholesale and Retail.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

BUILDERS and all who contemplate building, supplied with descriptive circular of "Village Builder." Address A. J. BICKNELL & CO., Publishers, 27 Warren St., N. Y.

FREE Try samples of our great 8-page, $1 00, illustrated weekly—30 years established. Fine steel engravings free to sub's. Ag'ts make $5 a day. Send for The Saturday Gazette, Hallowell, Me.

BAZAR

Cut Paper Patterns,

For Ladies, Misses, Girls, and Children of Both Sexes.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Our business will be conducted in a spirit of progress. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue of 28 pages, containing over two hundred figures, showing the leading fashions of the day. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, ranging from 30 to 46 inches bust measure; also for misses from 10 to 16 years of age, and for children of both sexes under 10. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent to any address free of charge. A good, active Agent wanted in every town and city in the United States for the sale of the Bazar Patterns. For terms to Agents, orders for Patterns, or any business pertaining to the Bazar Patterns, address

JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—Read the following extraordinary offer: The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Co. manufacture and warrant two different Sewing Machines, one called the Elliptic, the other called the Wheeler & Wilson. The Elliptic Machine excels in many important points. It is so light that a child can run it with ease; or an invalid, whose strength is sufficient to walk about the house or to do the work of a child ten years old, can sew all day without being overfatigued. It is impossible to convey by language a tithe of the merits belonging to this deservedly popular Machine. To see it perform the different operations, such as hemming, felling, gathering, embroidering, tucking, cording, frilling, quilting, fringing, etc., it seems more like a thing of life than a machine moved by the will of the operator. It has adjustable guages for every description of work, and can be changed in a moment to suit any material, coarse or fine. The economy of the Elliptic Machine in a family is almost incredible—with one, a good operator can do the work of twelve hands. A breadth of a skirt can be sewed in less than a minute; a gentleman's fine shirt can be made in three hours; or a child's dress, with many tiny pleats, in less time than the hands can fold them—in fact, every description of sewing is reduced from a question of hours to one of minutes. We make the following offer: Any person in the United States desiring one of these celebrated Machines can buy one and pay for it in work furnished at their own home. The work is pleasant and profitable, and can be accomplished by any lady, old or young. We send circulars free on application. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the offer has no parallel, and will, we trust, benefit hundreds and thousands of families. Send for Circulars. Address

ELLIPTIC SEWING MACHINE CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

TRADE-MARK.

"RUSSIAN GORED KNIT UNDERSKIRT,"

A NEW ARTICLE,

Invented and manufactured exclusively by the NORFOLK & NEW BRUNSWICK HOSIERY CO., upon their Patented Knitting Looms, being superior to flannel, much lighter, perfect in shape, and will not shrink nor change in color from washing.

ALSO,

FULL-FASHIONED HOSIERY,

consisting of

Ladies', Gents', Misses', and Boys' Underwear, of every description, superior in quality and style to any goods made in this country, and fully equal to the best hand-loom imported goods, and at greatly reduced prices.

Full lines for sale, to the jobbing trade only, at H. J. LIBBY & CO.'S, 47 & 49 White St., N. Y.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

THE GREAT SALUBRIENT.

Prepared in an instant, bright and sparkling as champagne. Thirst satisfying, cooling, and refreshing.

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT

Is the most convenient and palatable preparation ever administered to an invalid. If it were not classed among the most celebrated medicines of the age, because of its wonderful efficacy as a corrective and alterative, it might well be styled a choice summer luxury. It is a swift remedy for all the pains and penalties of imprudence in eating or drinking, immediately relieving acidity of the stomach, flatulence, bilious headache, nervousness, physical prostration, colic, and all derangements of the stomach, bowels, liver, or kidneys occasioned by undue indulgence or other causes.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

WOMANHOOD

Is rendered more lovable and the glory of mature beauty more enduring by the use of DR. VERNA'S PERSIAN SPRAY. Its remedial qualities in softening the asperities of time by giving the complexion that healthful yet delicate appearance, which is generally thought the perfection of beauty, causes it to stand alone amongst face preparations. Free from all hurtful ingredients. At all Drug Stores.

NEW YORK CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,

The oldest and best Music School in the country,
NOW OPEN FOR PRIVATE AND CLASS INSTRUCTION
In all branches of Vocal and Instrumental Music, Harmony and Composition, and the Modern Languages.
All Applications for Admission must be made at the
GENERAL CONSERVATORY OFFICES,
820 BROADWAY, near 19th St., over the Music Store.
(The branch at No. 82 Fifth Avenue removes up town.)
BROOKLYN BRANCH, 102, 104, & 106 COURT ST., near State.

$100,000 00.

LAST CHANCE!

Omaha Legal Enterprise!

IN AID OF A PUBLIC LIBRARY.

$100,000 00

IN CASH PRIZES!

$20,000 the Highest Prize!

Tickets $2 each, or three for $5. At a meeting of the citizens of Omaha, Sept. 19th, 1871, it was voted to draw POSITIVELY October 31st.

REFERENCES—City Marshal, Chief of Police, or any citizen of Omaha, Nebraska; Depository—Banking-House of Caldwell, Hamilton, & Co., Omaha. City papers sent free to persons desiring to see them. Money can be sent in registered letters or money orders. For full particulars address

J. LYFORD & CO.,
Business Managers, OMAHA, NEB.

BLEES

NOISELESS,

LOCK-STITCH

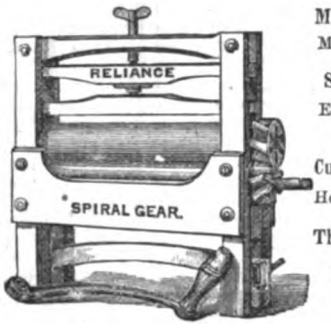
SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion. Call and examine. Send for circular. Agents wanted.

MANUFACTURED BY
BLEES
Sewing Machine Co.,
623 Broadway, N. Y.

RELIANCE WRINGER,

PERFECTED 1871.



Moulton Rolls,
Most Durable;
Spiral Cogs,
Easiest Working;
Curved Clamp,
Holds Firmest;
The Cheapest,
The Best,
TRY IT.

PROVIDENCE TOOL COMPANY,
11 Warren St., N. Y., and PROV., R. I.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER

Is rapidly superseding all other preparations for producing Elegant, Sweet and Wholesome ROLLS, BISCUITS, BREAD, Buckwheat and other Griddle Cakes. Perfectly Pure and Reliable, and always ready for immediate use. The CHEAPEST Baking Powder in the WORLD, and it WILL KEEP ON LAND OR SEA, in any climate, for years. It is well adapted to the use of Housekeepers, Miners, Mariners, Emigrants, &c., and is in fact, in every respect, the BEST YEAST POWDER made "for the Kitchen, the Camp, the Galley"

SOLD BY GROCERS & DEALERS EVERYWHERE.

Manufactured by DOOLEY & BROTHER,
69 NEW STREET, NEW-YORK.

WICKES'

ECLECTIC OIL

Is Pure, Safe, Sweet, and Economical.

J. H. WICKES,
120 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

CARBOLIC HEALING COMPOUND. C. S. SALVE

Beautifies the complexion by removing Pimples and all other disagreeable disorders of the skin. Twenty-five cents per box.

JOHN F. HENRY, Sole Proprietor,
No. 8 College Place, New York.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 50 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Digitized by Google

"CANNY."

got Raw Whisky here!"
th while to bring Water. We can always find that as we go along—when we Want it."

GENT IN WANT OF A SITUATION (bitterly). "Call again To-morrow! What's the use? Here, I paid my Fee a Month ago, and walked here and 'ome again, a matter of Eight Miles each way, twice every blessed day since, bar Sundays, and yet you profess to find me Constant Employment!"
CLERK. "Well, don't you call that 'Constant Employment?'"

"HAPPY THOUGHT."

(who had come down to see about the Bass Voice she had heard in the Kitchen—Policeman discovered). "Oh, you Deceitful Girl, to say there was ! And after I'd given you distinctly to understand I didn't allow 'Followers;' and here, you haven't been here a Week—" auks, M'm, it must be one o' the Follerers as the last Cook left be'ind 'er!"

AN ALARMING ACCIDENT.—A young gentleman of prepossessing exterior at a picnic the week before last had the misfortune to fall into a mistake. When extricated by a friend he was found to be senseless; but as that is his natural condition, no fears are entertained for his recovery. The mistake he fell into was that of making an offer to a married lady, whom he supposed to be single, so that his may be described as a singler escape.

Gardeners might not like to part with their gardens, though they are always ready to fork over their grounds.

Can an individual be said to be over head and ears in debt when he hasn't paid his hatter?

A gardener's wife made a pincushion out of a Spanish onion, but she found it brought the tears into her needles' eyes.

A CURIOUS ROOSTER.—California's latest curiosity is a rooster with two sets of legs, one on his back. When he is weary of standing in his natural position, it is gravely asserted, he turns a somersault, and walks off upside down; and when he takes a drink he immediately turns over, so as to swallow it the more easily. But it is in a free fight that he shows to the greatest advantage; for he is a terrible fighter, and when thus diverting himself looks like a revolving wheel, turning somersaults incessantly, and kicking in every direction.

"What's your Name?"

r."

ir."
hat does he Work at?"
he Corner by the Public 'Ouse!"

"HE, SHE, IT."

AUNTIE. "Well, Lucy, I suppose you're very pleased with the New Baby."
LUCY. "No, I ain't!"
AUNTIE. "It will be such a nice little Playfellow for you!"
LUCY. "How can it be a Play*fellow* when it's a Girl?"

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 43.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Fall Hats and Bonnets, Figs. 1–8.

Figs. 1 and 5.—VELVET HAT. This hat of black velvet is trimmed with a black ostrich feather, and with velvet ribbon two inches and three inches and a quarter wide; the narrower velvet ribbon is box-pleated, and sewed on the outer edge of the hat. First cut the frame shown by Fig. 5, page 676, of a double layer of stiff lace from Figs. 91–93, Supplement. Join these pieces according to the corresponding figures, and wire the frame on the outer edge, along the seams, and as indicated on Fig. 92. Cover the outside of the frame smoothly with black velvet, and line the inside of the hat with black lustring. Trim the hat as shown by the illustration, and furnish it with an elastic band to keep it in place.

Figs. 2 and 6.—BROWN FELT BONNET. This bonnet is of the Pamela shape, and is bound with brown velvet. The trimming consists of brown gros grain ribbon four inches wide, and velvet flowers, wheat, and leaves, arranged as shown by the illustration. A ruche of white silk illusion is set inside of the bonnet. The illustration, Fig. 6, page 676, shows the bonnet without the trimming.

Figs. 3 and 7.—TULLE AND LACE BONNET. This bonnet is made of black figured tulle and black lace an inch and a quarter and three inches and a quarter wide. The trimming is composed of bows and ends of gros grain ribbon two inches and a half wide, and of a spray of ivy leaves and berries. To make the bonnet, cut the frame, of black stiff lace, from Figs. 94–97, Supplement. Join it according to the corresponding figures, and furnish it with covered wire. The illustration, Fig. 7, page 676, shows the frame. Cover the latter on the outside with a double layer of crape, and then with figured tulle. Arrange the middle of the scarf edged with lace in several pleats, and fasten it on the back edge of the bonnet. The manner of arranging the lace, ribbon, leaves, and berries is plainly shown by the illustration. Lining of black lustring.

Fig. 2.—FELT BONNET.—[See Fig. 6, Page 676.]

Figs. 4 and 8.—BLACK FELT ROUND HAT. This hat is trimmed with velvet ribbon four inches wide, side-pleated gros grain, and a spray of roses. A row of black lace three-quarters of an inch wide is set on the outer edge of the hat. The illustration shows how to arrange the trimming. The illustration, Fig. 8, page 676, shows the hat untrimmed.

HEDGE CULTURE.

MR. M. L. SULLIVANT, the farmer-king of Illinois, whose agricultural domains were lately illustrated in Harper's Weekly, gives the following valuable instructions respecting the culture of Osage orange hedges as the result of practical experiment. He says that the best plan is first to soak the seed about thirty days in water, then plant in drills, the seeds to be about one inch apart and the rows eighteen inches apart. The ground should be rich sandy loam, and the plants should be carefully hoed and cultivated the first season. In the fall the plants should be taken up and tied in small bundles. The tops should be cut off to within six or eight inches of the yellow (root), and the bundles buried in the ground and protected through the winter. In the spring set the plants out in the hedge-rows about twelve inches apart. The rows should be graded up about a foot above the ordinary level of the ground. This can be done by throwing five or six plow furrows on each side—the dirt thrown inward. Care should be taken that no water can stand on the sides of the hedge-rows. Cross drains should be made to let the water off.

When the plants are about one and a half inches in diameter within a foot of the ground, the whole plant should be trimmed laterally and topped four feet high, and then the stalks should be bent down at an angle of twenty-two and a half degrees. The bending process can be facilitated by cutting the stalks on the opposite side from the direction they are to be bent about quarter their diameter. The tops can be fastened by intertwining the branches; the bent twigs will then shoot out innumerable branches laterally and upright, and then the process of trimming may begin, according to the taste and fancy of the owner. It should not be trimmed until it is four years old.

In our latitude (about 40½°), the branches are apt to be killed down about one-third of their growth every winter.

Fig. 1.—VELVET HAT.—[See Fig. 5, Page 676.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXI., Figs. 91–93.

Fig. 4.—BLACK FELT ROUND HAT.—[See Fig. 8, Page 676.]

Fig. 3.—TULLE AND LACE BONNET.—[See Fig. 7, Page 676.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXII., Figs. 94–97.

TO MAKE CHROMOS LOOK LIKE NATURE.

TAKE a game piece (birds are best), and, laying the picture flat upon a hard board, first proceed to cut the largest wing feathers close to the outlines, until each separate feather will stand out by itself. It is better to do this before the outside shape of the bird is cut. It may be very neatly done with a sharp penknife, and afterward a slightly curved shape may be imparted to the feathers, and, indeed, to the whole bird, by pressing the thumb nail firmly across the under side. Then it is to be laid upon a background of black velvet or velvet paper, and gummed down on the upper edges, leaving the lower ends of the wings open.

When perfectly firm, a small portion of raw cotton is very carefully pushed under the edges, until the desired shape is obtained, and the head and body of the bird are round and of a natural shape, the wings and feathers also standing out as if they were real plumage. When done, they are to be mounted in a deep frame, and at a little distance will look precisely like natural stuffed birds. Sometimes they are placed in passe-partout frames, with boxes or recess backs half an inch deep, having a slight space between the mat and the glass. The heads of the birds, being downward, are allowed to extend outside of the mat—a device greatly increasing the deceptive appearance.

Digitized by Google

urn; to dream concerning the fate before it; o know that this atom now of a day's existence already inherits eternity!

The time is too bright, the success of the hing is too intoxicating, not to need the shading of the reflection of stiller moments, when the mother, lying and holding that iny hand in hers, feels that what she has become herself she has made this child; that where any sin has struck its dark tap-root nto her blood, that sin has gone to her child; hat wrong wishes, evil imaginings, selfish acts, now all come back to plague their inventor, and, more than that, to plague and log this precious spirit on its upward flight, till she expiates the faults of years in the apprehension and suffering of an hour.

Yet, in the ecstasy of the blissful season hat comes but once, such thoughts can have but brief duration; there is but little time o spare out of the happiness, out of the marvel, of this new being starting on its course like a new star. Death fled from the place a moment since; the great breath of life blew in there; and their hearts have just been set beating in time and tune with all humanity. Their hearts have caught the key-note of the lives before and the lives hat are to come; for certainly the childless must be aware that they drop out of the world like dead leaves, that they send no strength or vitality onward to the future; hey have no bond with it, no part in it, no right or room in the great and perfect race which one day shall blossom out of this; hey fall by the way, and are no more.

But that First Baby is a pledge and an assurance of perpetuity to its parents; it links hem, little creature that it is, with the destinies of the planet as nothing else can do; hey will live again in that child's life; and hey fancy that, carrying their noblest hopes and their best impulses into the new generation, with virtue and heroism of its own, it will glorify their passive and undeveloped traits into splendid deeds and vital charities —traits that have slumbered unstirred in hem as the seeds of oak and maple slumber beneath the shadow and density of dark primeval pine forests.

Well, little perambulators, as we look at you trundling on in the sunshine, we can not help thinking something of the same thoughts that your owners think concerning your laughing and cooing inmates. Your little wheels are wheels of fortune and wheels of time; you are chariots of history and of fame; the world waits upon you! And if those who guide you understand as much, and guide you well, calling health and wisdom to their side, it will not wait in vain.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Autumn Leaves.

MY DEAR ARTHUR,—I am very glad to see that you have returned safely to town, and I hope that your summer vacation has been of great service to you. I know how constantly you have been engaged in renewing your health and strength by an unintermitting course of billiards, brandy, tobacco, and gambling and dancing until two and three in the morning. These restoratives, with enormous dinners and plenty of Champagne and other gentlemanly liquors, are of the greatest benefit, I presume, for I observe that they are in the highest favor among those who go off for health and relaxation during the summer. Indeed, few spectacles are more gratifying or more suggestive of respect for human nature than the pursuit of health and refreshment at the watering-places—places, by-the-bye, at which water seems to be in very slight request. The total freedom from care and thought; the happy negligence of dress in which the ladies as well as the gentlemen indulge; the sweet forgetfulness of the obligations of society, and the absence of gossip and foolish display of every kind; the reasonable and moderate methods of life and enjoyment, and the tranquillity and elevation of soul which are always to be remarked at such resorts—show what a wise and simple folk we are.

Indeed, when I find myself for a happy day at Newport or Long Branch, or Saratoga or Sharon, or the Virginia Springs or Cape May, I feel that I have been suddenly thrown among guileless islanders in some distant sea, whose hearts are as pure as their lives are innocent. And when the tough matron of forty seasons says to me, in these autumn days as we meet in the street, "Dear Mr. Bachelor, it was so reviving at Newport, and I am so much better!" I can only remark, as I bow in reply, "Dear madame, it is not only a physical, but a mental and moral sanitarium." The matron smiles sweetly, as the well-bred always smile when they haven't the least idea of what you are saying, and trips away, nodding a farewell, as if she and were twenty and twenty-five, passing upon the beach with the other young people.

I met one of the matrons yesterday as I came down town, and as we exchanged these pretty civilities and parted, I remembered arriving at a watering-place, one day in the golden age, before the crowd had come, and finding there a philosopher who had arrived even earlier. After a few days the devotees of relaxation and rest began to appear: those who came, like my matron, to be revived after their arduous winter of dinners, balls, calls, and matinées—the lofty and reasonable business of their lives. My philosopher and I watched each arrival, and commented upon it; for that was part of the recreation which we had come to seek. We commented, he said, like happy spirits who had the start of others in entering paradise, and who watched with delight their opening eyes of wonder and joy as they ascended. But my philosopher was silent, and rubbed his nose. In the mornings we loitered into the bowling-alley, in the evenings we sat in the parlors and enjoyed the excitement of observing the other loiterers, until one day I heard him say, as he looked in at the door of the great hotel drawing-room and scanned the company, "Well, Bachelor, here are the same old flies booming about."

It was with something of the same feeling, I suppose, that I was oppressed a week or two ago when I went for a day to one of these pleasant spots where matrons are revived. It was already late in the autumn. The air was cool and clear—an exhilarating cordial to breathe—and the leaves upon the trees hung crisp in the yellowing light. They were of all brilliant colors, and were rapidly falling. Every slight puff of wind lifted a splendid tribute from the trees, and they fell softly, and were gathered in little piles by the road-side. Already the landscape began to wear the thin and shriveled aspect of late autumn, and the breeze had a conscious sadness in its tone, caused by the rustling of the dried leaves and boughs. It was pleasant but pensive weather; the more suggestive, I suppose, because of the contrast of the withering and forsaken scene with the gay bustle and brilliant throng of a month before. I had not seen them, but I knew that they had been there; and that, having obtained the repose and relaxation which their health required, they had all fled like a group of bright-plumed birds which the frost sends southward.

It was interesting to stroll along the paths lately so frequented, and curiosity led me to one of the great hotels. There were no parties arriving and departing; no porters pushing about with luggage; no handsome "teams" awaiting the descent of Alonzo the brave and the fair Imogen from the house; no groups of gentlemen of the kind peculiar to these reviving resorts, tilting in chairs and staring through their tobacco-smoke at the inspiring spectacle of the street. Nothing of all this was to be seen. But there were one or two vacant arm-chairs by the door, and as I entered the hall I saw one or two trunks, and felt as if I were watching the last spark expire from a burned piece of paper. I went toward the parlor. It was after the season, as my philosopher and I had been before the season at the time which I have mentioned, and I smiled faintly as I recalled his tone of weariness and satiety when he said, "The same old flies booming about." Reaching the parlor, I looked in.

You know those cheerful, home-like rooms and their modest decorations, and I merely recall them to your memory. This one was immense. There were sofas and lounges and easy-chairs, and here and there were a few matronly figures sitting upon them. I looked at one and at another, and to my amazement I recognized them. From under those morning head-dresses and those skillful structures of hair, old faces—I mean no reflection, but faces of old times—looked out at me. There was no doubt of it. These respectable dames, stranded, as it were, upon the lees of the season, were the belles of my boyhood. With that comfortable and ample figure of eld, my arms gallantly and respectfully embracing, had I danced in a vanished age; with that grandmother, who at the moment I looked was giving candy to calm a truculent grandchild, had I ridden in the summer twilight on the edge of the loud-sounding sea. I recalled the very words that she said, and how she looked as she said them; and there is no lithe and rosy-cheeked damsel caracoling in the Park today of a lovelier form and of more delicate beauty than then she was.

I stood and watched her now. The yellow October light filled the room, and as her eyes followed the grandchild whom she had soothed, they were gentle and tender. Her dress was subdued and decorous. Among the other figures in the room, she was the most winning. A bright, smiling, mature beauty seemed to me not less fascinating than the earlier charm that I remembered. The wind blew in at the great hall door, and wafted something against my feet. I looked down and saw a cluster of bright autumn leaves. It is not upon the maple and nut trees only that the autumn hangs its splendor, but upon the tree of human life also. Two youths approached, and, looking into the room, turned and walked away. "Nothing there but a few old ladies," said one, as they passed me. "Ladies!" I observed; "why, I can see nothing but a cluster of bright and beautiful autumn leaves."

Of course I need not have gone so far to find them, for they are visible every where. Yesterday I received a letter from the country, and my friend says that he wishes I could see the glory of the hills around him; and to-day I was in the Park, and wished that he could see the glory here. Nothing, indeed, is surer or more universal than autumn and its leaves. Last Sunday in church I fixed my eyes unconsciously upon Adonis, who sits near me, and I should probably have thought of nothing but the sermon, as usual, if there had not been a sudden glistening in the very heart of his beautiful whiskers that caught my attention, and upon closer observation I discovered a lock of white hair! Autumn leaves, you see; and I have remarked them upon other trees as early as August. It is the ripeness of the leaf, I am told, not the frost, that tints them so gorgeously, and it is a theory which I am inclined to believe. For I observe that in the sermons at Saint Rainbow's there is a cheerfulness of tone which has been steadily increasing.

To listen to our good rector formerly, and hear those tremendous discourses in which he rebuked us for our short-comings, and thundered in our ears that the depravity which we could not help would be the eternal death of us—to hear these things was like walking in the gloomy, chilly forests of the grim old Druids, where the thick masses of green leaves shut out the sunlight, and made a horrible dampness and darkness, in which human sacrifices were offered. But to hear the good man now preach one of his mellow, thoughtful discourses, full of charity and humanity, and divine sympathy and pity, is like walking in the same forest when the leaves are thickly matted no longer, and gloom and horror and human sacrifices have disappeared, and through the brilliant leaves of autumn the sunshine falls warm and golden, and all is so serenely cheerful that there is a constant sense of flowers and of singing birds. It is not exactly summer, but the air is full of the feeling of summer; and so the tender lights of feeling and hope in those sermons fall upon us like the benediction of autumn leaves.

And I see them, also, not in the words only, but in the deeds of generosity which often come with years. Age is cynical, we think, and is swept by sharp winds of distrust, like the autumn landscape. But when the busy time of making wood and ripening fruit is gone with the maple-tree over my favorite seat in the Park, it becomes a great benefactor, showering down the leaves, which we all carry home to fill it with brightness during the long winter. And what else is Mæcenas doing, who has given his active life to making a great fortune, and now, when his accumulation is ended, showers his golden gifts like leaves on every side? The laws of autumn are not peculiar to the trees, and autumn leaves elsewhere are as glowing and as beautiful as those upon the groves. This, I suppose, was what Eugenia meant the other day when I heard her say, in reply to the question why she did not have a vase of autumn leaves in her drawing-room, "Because I have grandpa."

Yours, my dear Arthur, always,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FRENCH modistes continue to display a bewildering variety of novelties. The anarchy of fashion, spoken of in another column by our Parisian correspondent, begins to be seen here. Each house has styles of its own, and fresh importations each week offer new suggestions in costumes, sometimes enlarging upon features previously introduced, in other cases flatly contradicting accepted facts. There never was a time when independence in dress was so admissible and individuality so possible. It is the province of the Bazar to describe the most attractive and useful styles at each establishment for the benefit of its readers, leaving them to choose for themselves the styles best suited to their figure and taste.

MANTLES OF COSTUMES.

The most important feature of stylish costumes is the mantle. As the season advances the preference for sleeveless wraps increases. There are still many paletots worn, as almost every lady has a sacque of some sort left from last year, but those who purchase new wraps are apt to select the more novel mantle. The popular fabric for these is French cashmere, but the more distinguished-looking are of the new camel's-hair, a fleecy woolen goods with coarse diagonal twill, as soft, thick, and warm as flannel. This rough-looking material is now the object of desire by lovers of novelty, who already begin to tire of the fine French cashmeres. It is made up in double round capes, or as a loose, sleeveless sacque, that falls low on the tournure, with an elbow cape above it, open and trimmed up the entire back. It is in dark gray, plum, brown, or black, is heavily braided with the same color or black; the edges are in Gothic points, fringed, and in some cases finished with French lace in Chantilly patterns, guipure having become too common. An upper skirt of medium length, braided and fringed, usually accompanies these mantles, and some modistes have extra material for a basque. Worn with a black or brown silk skirt, they make useful and stylish costumes for the promenade.

Digitized by Google

Another new material in Parisian mantles is a soft twilled silk, a sort of serge, heavier than Levantine. This goods is considered handsome enough for dress wraps, and is trimmed with velvet, fur, and fringe. The graceful design most used has a mantilla front of half long, square tabs, while the back is gored by two and sometimes three seams, making it fall slightly to the figure, with or without a belt, but with no suggestion of sleeves, as the baschlik has. The black marten or Alaska sable of last season is the fur used for a border, and thick chenille fringe falls below. A tiny muff is made of the goods, with a row of fur on each end.

These mantles are the novelties of the season, but the garments in general use are of black cashmere or cloth in double capes, the upper one open behind, or else a single talma with broad Watteau fold, belted underneath to form a sort of jacket back. The Bazar gave patterns of these wraps months ago, when they first appeared abroad. Elaborate braiding, in which some fine jet and embroidery are introduced, bias faille bands, and fringe, are the trimmings. A black mantle is preferred above colors, as it may be worn with various costumes. Colored cashmeres, and, in fact, all other wool costumes that require more than a simple basque or polonaise, are now provided with these capes. When the season demands it, flannel lining of deep blue or scarlet will be added for warmth.

Faille cashmere, the new repped fabric called by some Cachemire Cicilienne, is used for opera wraps. We have seen some lovely sacques of this goods. One of pale gray has white and gilt braiding, and a border of white fox fur; a darker gray has elaborate braiding of black in a palm leaf design; one of lavender has Oriental colors richly wrought upon it; a black garment is embroidered with gilt thread, and edged with black and gilt fringe.

Warm talmas, shown for carriage wraps, are of lamb's-wool cloth half an inch thick. On one side the cape is a solid color, gray, blue, or brown, while the reversed side is striped in that color and white. $12 to $15.

Long shawls for traveling are shown in thick, warm, twilled wool, in the fashionable plum-color, brown, and gray shades. They measure four yards in length, and cost $6.

NOVELTIES IN POLONAISES.

Most whimsical fashions are seen in polonaises. An effort is being made to transform them into coats or redingotes with plain straight hanging skirts, like the old-time basquine. The idea is sensible, but there is still a decided preference for the graceful drapery of the Marguerite and other full polonaises. A novelty among these, called a habit, is a simple long basquine with faille revers, and a long and wide Continental vest that has pockets in it. It has deep mousquetaire cuffs of faille, and horizontal rows of braid in military fashion. The buttons with which it is fastened are made of bomb-shells that were thrown into Paris during the siege. They are oxydized with silver, and cut in quaint devices.

A less conspicuous and most tasteful garment shown at several of the best houses is a Louis XIV. polonaise of the black twilled silk described above. The vest and cuffs are of black velvet, and the back of the garment is draped in the Marguerite style. The trimming is black marten fur and chenille fringe. The bows draping the skirt behind have long ends, each finished by a fur tail. With muff to match, the price is $240. It is to be worn with a black velvet skirt, or else faille, with fur bands heading the flounce. Another desirable garment is a camel's-hair polonaise richly embroidered. One model is of leaf brown, made in the Marguerite shape, with an embroidered border and fringe of the same shade. It is to be worn over a brown silk skirt trimmed with ruffles and folds.

Brocaded cashmere in palest buff, blue, and white is made into polonaises, and trimmed with black velvet bands, black lace, and Valenciennes. Black silk or velvet skirts are worn with these, making a fancy costume for dinner-parties. The cretonne polonaises in dark colors are worn to breakfast at hotels, and for morning promenades.

The popular polonaise worn by ladies who do not have many costumes, and who are not frantic after novelties, is a simple black cashmere in Marguerite shape, with folds of faille and fringe for trimming. At present these have but two bows behind—one draping each side form—the centre seam having merely a deep pleat just below the added fullness. The bows are lengthwise, with two standing loops, and the ends are half a yard long. They may be made of bias faille or of faille ribbon. The bows in front have short ends, and jet buckles are now mounted on all the bows of the garment. We have dwelt at length on these outside garments, that constitute the principal part of street dresses, for the benefit of ladies of moderate means, who seldom purchase entire suits of one fabric. With the aid of one such mantle and polonaise, a lady can give variety to her toilettes by having skirts of various colors.

CLOTH AND CHEVIOTTE SUITS.

Imported suits of cloth are of dark wine and plum color. They are made with plain short skirt, a simple over-skirt of medium length, a basque, and double capes. A thick cord, usually black, edges each skirt and cape, and the trimming is of cord almost as thick, put on in clusters of fancifully curled figures. These trim and jaunty suits are intended for walking dresses, and the skirts are therefore short enough to escape the ground. The best modistes protest against long skirts in the street. Frenchwomen, they say, are amazed to see Americans walking in long skirts that a Parisian only wears in her drawing-room, or, at most, in her carriage.

The new cheviotte suits—a Scotch twilled cloth that it is said will never wear out—are the novelty for traveling costumes. One designed for the Pacific Railroad trip is of drab, with brown silk ruffles, and the inevitable fringe. It is fashioned like cloth suits.

BLACK SILK SUITS.

The novelty in imported suits of black faille is trimming them with black marten (skunk) fur. The under-skirt has a wide straight flounce, ruffled, with bias velvet on the lower edge, and headed by a black marten band. The over-skirt, edged with fur, has an apron, and two straight separate widths hanging behind. The basque is of velvet, with silk vest, and cuffs bordered with fur. Correspondents ask how to trim lower skirts of silk dresses. The prevailing fashion is one straight flounce three or four fingers deep. If gathered, it has seven widths, and is edged with two narrow ruffles of bias velvet; if in side pleats, it has an inch-wide hem, with a bias velvet band above the hem. The most stylish heading is four or five bias folds, alternately velvet and silk, each an inch and a half wide, overlapping, and lined with foundation muslin; or else the folds are all silk, with the tiniest piping of bias velvet sewed in the lower edge. Other deep flounces have velvet almost as wide, cut in deep Gothic points, falling over the gathered flounce of silk. Three piping-cords finish the edge of some flounces.

TRAINED BLACK SILKS.

Black silks for the house have demi-trains and basques. The front of the skirt has three flounces; the upper skirt has a wrinkled apron front about half a yard deep, and falls long behind to form the train, dispensing with any skirt beneath. This train has no trimming, but a cord on the edge, covered with the silk of the dress. The basque is a round waist in front, with a belt and bows, the back is a deep postilion. Duchesse sleeves, with Malines lace at the wrist, and a Malines collar. Other basques represent vest fronts. The lower edge is corded, while a trimming of sharp points, beneath which is a frill of lace or of raveled silk, outlines a vest, and edges the basque behind. There is a great fancy this season for these small points neatly bound with a scant gathered frill of silk, or else a box-pleated ruffle showing in the interval between the points. Black lace over Valenciennes sometimes trims the points on black silk dresses worn in the house.

CAPRICES OF FASHION.

When sashes are just being willingly relinquished, a perverse effort is being made to restore them, or something similar in the way of scarf drapery. These are not simple ribbon bows and ends, worn at the back of a belt, but something more complicated. There is, first, a belt of four folds; then a width of silk is cut in two, lengthwise—ribbon is not wide enough—a bow is tied at the back of the folded belt, the ends are caught together again low down on the tournure, and a long streamer is then made to fall on each side of the figure—not behind. This unique arrangement may be graceful with long trained dresses, but we do not admire it worn with polonaises and short skirts.

Such a scarf sash accompanies one of the most remarkable dresses ever designed by Worth. This dress is an evening robe, made by private order, and illustrates some of the peculiarities that this designer of fashions is striving to introduce. It is faille of three colors—ciel blue, flesh-color, and rose. The front of the skirt is blue, with flounces of the same; the over-skirt, of flesh-color, has a short apron, and forms the train of the dress, as in court trains. On this train are fourteen flounces, in groups of two, reaching to the belt. The low waist is short and round—the body of flesh-color, the Grecian drapery of blue and white—and is finished by a rose-colored sash like that just described. The corsage bouquet has flowers in which these three colors enter, and is put high on the right side—not in front. Similar bouquets loop the upper skirt on each side.

Another such sash, also of pale rose faille, is shown on an elegant carriage costume of Vandyck brown velvet.

VARIETIES.

The newest bow for the throat is the Pompadour, made of folds of palest blue faille, showing inner facings of rose-color, and edged with finest Malines lace. This is to be worn with a black silk dress and Malines collar.

New veils are of clear net, not dotted as hitherto, with an appliqué edge, or sometimes with a frill of lace. The shape is plain over the face, hanging below the chin, and tied behind with streamers.

For the hair are two lengthwise bows of faille ribbon, black or colored, the bows close against each other, with two short ends hanging behind. The ribbon is an inch and a half wide. A tiny comb is underneath to fasten them on the hair, or else an elastic cord passes beneath the chignon. This double bow is placed just back of the Pompadour roll, and directly on top of the head.

New and dressy coiffures are made of Valenciennes ruches and a China crape scarf of pale pink, puffed to form a rosette, while lace streamers fall behind: price $22. A square of Malines has a Nile green rosette in the centre, with ends hanging. A third has a large bag crown of white tulle, with streamers of tucked organdy and Valenciennes; in front is a coronet ruche of lace and pink faille bows: price $15.

Parures for ball dresses are in innumerable vines of small flowers, and in hanging clusters to form fringe on the edge of upper skirts and berthas. A fringe of white acacias is on a ciel blue dress, partly faille, partly tulle. Sprays of pink marguerites and dwarf convolvuli are on a white tulle; the horse-chestnut in its half-opened burs, and with blossoms.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames DIEDEN; VIRFOLET; and BERNHEIM; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

PEOPLE will have their little pleasantries about functionaries. Some one says that Professor PORTER is appropriately to take the head of the Yale (ale) brood (brewed) this month. The former president is now "ex," the new one may be regarded as double X. Notwithstanding the admixture of PORTER with Yale, it is understood that the former will make a pint of reform without any 'alf-and-'alf measures.

—In diplomatic circles at Washington, and among the quidnuncs at the clubs, it seems to be settled that M. DE TOCQUEVILLE, nephew of the famous author, will be embassador from France to the United States.

—Mrs. ROGERS, of Newport, Rhode Island, has given to the Redwood Library of that place a collection of rare books, valued at $3000, and a United States bond of $10,000, to be held under the name of the "Robert Rogers Memorial Fund," the interest of which only is to be expended for books.

—Mrs. IDA NORTH has been appointed State Librarian of Iowa.

—A neat spectacle, and very French, was enacted a few Sundays since in Paris: Mesdames THIERS and M'MAHON held plates for a collection at the Church of the Holy Trinity. The papers made quite a little rave about it, and ended by saying that Madame THIERS wore black, as usual, while Mrs. M'MAHON wore "a pretty white muslin dress."

—Emulous of the literary fame won by her husband's "Julius Cæsar," the Empress EUGÉNIE has written a history of MARY STUART, Queen of Scots, which has been translated into English by CHARLES DE FLANDRE, and will soon be published. The public will be curious to see how far religious and womanly sympathy has painted the beautiful queen who was beheaded by her enemies, and doubly beheaded by Mr. FROUDE.

—FRANCES VOUSTORY, of Memphis, has recovered $10,000 damages from a deceiving J. FLYNN, for breach of promise of marriage—the highest sum ever paid for that sort of thing in Tennessee.

—Under the new régime in Germany it has been determined by King WILLIAM to change the Prussian currency from silver to gold, and that a law for this purpose shall be passed at the next meeting of the North German Parliament. Gold is now being drawn from the Bank of England for that purpose.

—Mr. ROBERT C. WINTHROP, of Boston, has recently obtained an old English clock made in London about 1600 especially for Governor JOHN WINTHROP, and sent to him while he was Colonial Governor of Massachusetts. It is still in running order, and has been placed among many other valuable relics, including family portraits which date back to 1400.

—The late Duke of Sussex told Mr. ADOLPHUS, in 1839, that till he was twenty-one his pocket-money never exceeded a guinea a week. When he was one-and-thirty an income of £2000 a year was allotted him. He was always in arrears and poor. Mr. ADOLPHUS said that if the bill had passed in 1791 giving the king's younger sons (perhaps two of them) high positions in the colonies, he (the Duke), for instance, might have been made Viceroy of Canada, with power to create a hereditary nobility and establish a church. The Duke seemed much struck with the idea, and said he thought such a measure, taken before his time, might have saved America.

—A. PARDEE, Esq., of Hazleton, Pennsylvania, has now given half a million of dollars to Lafayette College, his gift last week of two hundred thousand dollars for the erection of a building for the scientific department making this magnificent total. Mr. PARDEE is very modest in his munificence, but withal a gentleman of education and culture, the friend of the poor, of the church, and of every good work. Very retiring in his habits, he is yet beloved by all who know him.

—This pleasant "personal" is from the Concord Monitor: "WILLIAM B. WASHBURN, the Republican nominee for Governor of Massachusetts, and JOSEPH B. WALKER, of Concord, were classmates and room-mates at Yale College, graduating in the class of 1844. The eldest sons of these gentlemen are now classmates and room-mates at the same college."

—Madame DE LAVALETTE, daughter of M. BOUHER, is a woman of large spunk. Recently she bought a photograph of M. THIERS, placed it on a target, fired twelve shots at it, hit it three times, and exclaimed, "Now I am satisfied; I have finished my work of destruction!" The crowd cried, "It is M. ROUHER who ought to be served like that!" Then she scampered to her hotel.

—The Grand Vizier, recently deceased, is said to have been the most learned man in Turkey.

—The most opulent silver miner in the world is José CORRESCO, of Mexico. He owns several mines, from one of which alone he receives $200,000 per month.

—Mrs. HOWE, the mother of ELIAS, of sewing-machine fame, recently deceased at eighty.

—The Earl of Gainsborough's daughter, who married Mr. MURPHY, her father's organist, is a resident of New York, and a contributor to the Catholic World. Mr. MURPHY is organist at the Church of the Holy Innocents. The nuptial arrangement has proved a success.

—Bishop WHITEHOUSE, of Illinois, who has come prominently under the public gaze in consequence of his troubles with the Rev. Mr. CHENEY, is described as a man of about sixty-five, short, erect, quick, decisive. Levity has no place in his countenance. A man of great intellect and extensive learning, fluent and logical in debate or sermon, cool and commanding in all circumstances, a capitalist and an aristocrat—he is naturally separated from the masses—a monarch, rather than a shepherd. He lives in good style in one of an imposing row of marble fronts. He keeps a showy carriage, with liveried coachman and footman. Born to rule, the bishop does rule his diocese most thoroughly, and the individuality of his rectors seldom stems the tide of his overmastering authority. An illustration will show this. At one of the meetings of the Diocesan Convention a vexed question came up, in which the vote by acclamation was evidently against the bishop. "The negatives seem to have it," said the bishop, with a suppressed chuckle—that is the best word at hand. "Let us see how it will be on a standing vote." And on the standing vote, when the bishop's eye was on the action of each individual, the affirmative carried the day largely. Admirable as an executive, a disciplinarian, a logician, a preacher, and a scholar, Bishop WHITEHOUSE seems to be lacking in that liberality which characterizes the nineteenth century.

—The Rev. Mr. CHENEY, the bishop's "bad boy," is about thirty-five, of good height, solidly built, full faced, with light, mutton-chop whiskers, a sonorous voice, a pleasant countenance, and an energetic carriage. He is genial and easy of approach, and popular in the family circle; a fluent and at times eloquent speaker, abounding in metaphors, especially those relating to the ocean and ships. Mr. CHENEY, no doubt, is conscientious, although, perhaps, mistaken in the strenuousness with which he adheres to the omission of the word "regenerate;" and the persistent character of the man is illustrated in his speech before the Convention some three years ago, when he said that if he was read out of the Church for his heresy, he would climb to the top of a mountain and proclaim, "I am the Episcopal Church." He is the opposite of the bishop in respect to approachableness, liberality, and popularity; and whatever be the result of the diocesan attempt to close the doors of Christ Church against him, he is sure of a strong and faithful body of adherents, who will follow his fortunes and support his ministrations.

—The father of JAY COOKE was named ELEUTHEROS. He lost an office once (before printed ballots were in use), it is said, because not one voter in five could spell his name right. To make it easy for his boys in that respect, he named them PITT, JAY, and HENRY. Something still more simple occurred in the family of Mr. STICKNEY, of Ohio, whose name was CHERDOLAOMER. He thought that rather tough, so named his boys ONE, TWO, and THREE STICKNEY. His neighbor, Elder NEW, had a son and daughter, the first of whom he named SOMETHING, the second NOTHING. It expressed what was to him a simple fact; but it was inelegant.

—King AMADEUS has just returned to Madrid after a royal progress through Spain, and has added greatly to his popularity. He is an unpledged teetotaler, drinking neither wine nor spirits, though furnishing it to his guests. He is up at six in the morning, reads all the papers, breakfasts at ten, and dines at five. Never spends but an hour at table, no matter who is present. He gives away about $17,500 monthly in charities, and seems to be doing every thing that an intelligent, well-disposed young man can do to make himself acceptable to his people.

—Grace Greenwood calls a garden fenced in with cactus a prickly pear-a-dise.

—GASPARONI, the liberated brigand, recently visited the Pantheon, and contemplated it with satisfaction, saying it made him feel young again, for it looked exactly as it did forty-six years ago.

—Senator WILSON, summing up his foreign trip, says: "I was seventy-three days in Europe; traveled on land 5800 miles; saw a great deal; was up early and out late; enjoyed perfect health; and as it was probably my only visit—I don't like the ocean—I improved all my time, and had a great deal of enjoyment. I saw a great deal that we have not, and don't want, and a great deal that we have not, and need. I heard only three oaths while I was gone—once in London, once in Germany, and lastly by an American consul. The Americans are said to swear so much because of the influence of the climate; but there may be said to be no profanity there. There is no chewing of tobacco except among Americans. I didn't see a spittoon. Chewing tobacco is an awful vice, and kills as many men as drinking whisky. Every body drinks. You could put in this room all the teetotal men on the Continent. In France they drink beer and wine, and in Germany wine and beer. I saw some brandy drank in France, but they do not throw down a tumblerful, as we do here. At the cafés they draw about two and a half table-spoonfuls into a wine-glass, and it takes the drinker about an hour to dispose of that, sipping and talking, and then he shows no evil effects. I saw more drunken men in Switzerland than in France."

—The ingenuity of the Iowa youth is illustrated in the person of MARK WARD, aged fourteen, residing at Anamosa, who has constructed a sewing-machine with a jackknife, from pine boards and wires, that makes perfect stitches.

—Dr. HALL, of Washington, is one of the social celebrities of that metropolis. For many years he has been on terms of intimacy with national magnates. The Washington Chronicle says he attended General JACKSON on several occasions, though not his family physician. It is one of the doctor's peculiarities that he does not trouble himself with money matters, and is careless about collecting his fees. Once, however, during a temporary absence, his clerk made out some bills, and among others sent one to the President. On his return the doctor found a note from General JACKSON inclosing a check for the amount, deducting an old charge which had been called for and settled, and for which he held a receipt. The fact that the bill had been sent was not less a mortification to Dr. HALL than the error in the account itself. But on looking at the President's check he found that the General had forgotten to sign it! He therefore returned it, with the expression of his regret that the bill had been sent, and pointed out the General's omission. The check was duly signed and sent back, inclosed in a note with this remark:

DEAR DOCTOR,—The best of men is liable to mistakes. ANDREW JACKSON.

Dr. HALL testifies to the old hero's kindness to all his people, especially to his servants. Once, when the small-pox broke out among them, and nearly every body else fled, the President remained in the White House, and waited on black and white with unremitting attention.

Digitized by Google

ıiding Patterns for Children's Dresses, Wrappings, etc., Figs. 1–5.

ESE designs are suitable for trimming children's dresses, jackets, hoods, etc., or be used for covers, etc. They are worked with soutache or fine braid, and may be worked in chain stitch or diagonal half-polka with silk or cotton, or else with the sewing-machine aid stitch.

th Slipper with Chain Stitch Embroidery.

IIS slipper is made of brown cloth, trimmed with stitch embroidery of corn-colored silk, and lined flannel. Cut the slipper of cloth from Fig. 54, Supent, which gives one-half of the pattern, and emer it in chain or braid stitch. Although the manner orking the slipper is very simple, the effect is exngly pretty.

Embroidered Java Canvas Tidy.

IIS tidy, which is seventeen inches square in the original, is made of Java can- n an open-work pattern, embroidered in point Russe with black embroidery silk, in twisted stitch (point de minute) with white Estremadura cotton. The founda-

Fig. 7.—FRAME OF TULLE AND LACE BONNET.

Fig. 5.—FRAME OF VELVET HAT.

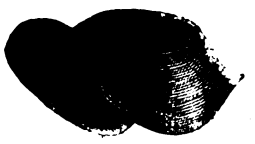

Fig. 6.—FELT BONNET. UNTRIMMED.

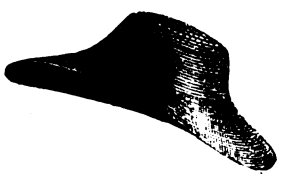

Fig. 8.—FELT HAT. UNTRIMMED.

shown by the illustration. Ornament the firm squares in the corners each with a cross stitch of black split zephyr worsted, and surround the white threads that cross each other circularly with white cotton. Finally, fringe out the tidy on the outer edge.

Needle-work and Point Lace Border.

See Illustration on page 677.

WORK this border on a foundation of white Swiss muslin or cambric in button-hole, half-polka, and diagonal half-polka stitch. Work button-hole stitch bars with picots between the figures, and cut away the material underneath the bars. The lace stitches are worked as shown by the illustration. The veins in the oblong leaflets are formed by two rows of button-hole stitches with picots, worked toward each other. The border may also be used as a lambrequin for trimming baskets, étagères, etc.; in this case, however, use heavy colored materials, such as cashmere, reps, etc., instead of white Swiss muslin, and work the embroidery with colored silk and braid. Cut away the material underneath the bars. This is a beautiful curtain border.

Fig. 1.—BRAIDING PATTERN FOR CHILDREN'S DRESSES, WRAPPINGS, ETC.

of the tidy is formed of squares, each thirty double ıds in length and width, which are bordered, as shown ıe illustration, with point Russe embroidery of black to a depth of four threads, leaving free eight double ıds each in depth and width between the squares. n the foundation thus formed is of the size desired, the border in point Russe embroidery all around an interval of eight threads. Draw out eight lengththreads each between every two rows of squares, and n the threads left standing for the border by cutting t of the requisite size in each place where the single ıd is afterward slipped through the crosswise threads e material; the edges of these slits are turned down ıe under side and fastened carefully. Next run black thread through the crosswise threads of the material, own by the illustration. The black silk threads that each other between every four squares are surroundircularly with e cotton. Fi-, ornament squares and er in twisted h as shown by illustration, fringe out the erial on the r edge.

Fig. 1.—DESIGN FOR WALL POCKET.—[See Fig. 2, Page 677.]

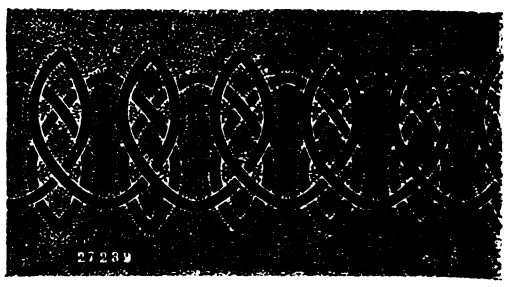

Fig. 2.—BRAIDING PATTERN FOR CHILDREN'S DRESSES, WRAPPINGS, ETC.

Wall Pocket for Newspapers, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See Illustration on page 677.

THIS wall pocket is made of card-board covered with brown silk, carriage leather, and watered paper, and trimmed with brown velvet of a darker shade, and with embroidery, and a silk cord and tassels. The illustration, Fig. 1, gives the design for the embroidery. To make the pocket, cut two circular pieces of card-board, each fourteen inches and a half in diameter, and cover the back surface of the piece intended for the back with carriage leather, and the front surface with watered paper, leaving free an edge an inch and three-quarters wide all around. Then cut the inner surface of ten inches and a half diameter out of the second piece of card-board for the front of the pocket. Cover the ring formed by doing this, which is intended for the outer cover of the back, smoothly with brown silk underlaid with wadding, or soft heavy woolen material. For the velvet trimming, cut of card-board first another ring of the same inner circumference; this, however, is only an inch and a quarter wide, and is cut out in thirty-two even scallops on the outer edge. Cover the outer side of this ring with brown velvet, surround the outline of the scallops with fine gold braid or coarse twisted gold thread, and paste it on the larger ring, observing the illustration. Now cover the middle piece, which has been cut out of the second piece of card-board. To do this, transfer the outline of Fig. 52, one-half of which is given in Supplement, to the card-board, cut of soft flannel sixteen separate leaf-shaped pieces from the outline of Fig. 52, and paste them on the card-board so as to correspond exactly with the drawing. Cover the surface with brown silk, the middle of which is ornamented with embroidery of brown silk in different shades and gold thread, as shown by the full-sized illustration, Fig. 1. Run the silk on the card-board, first, in a circle four inches and three-quarters in diameter, and then along the outline of each of the sixteen leaflets. Surround the leaflets, as shown by the illustration, with fine brown silk cord mixed with gold thread. The velvet trimming of this piece, one-half of which is given

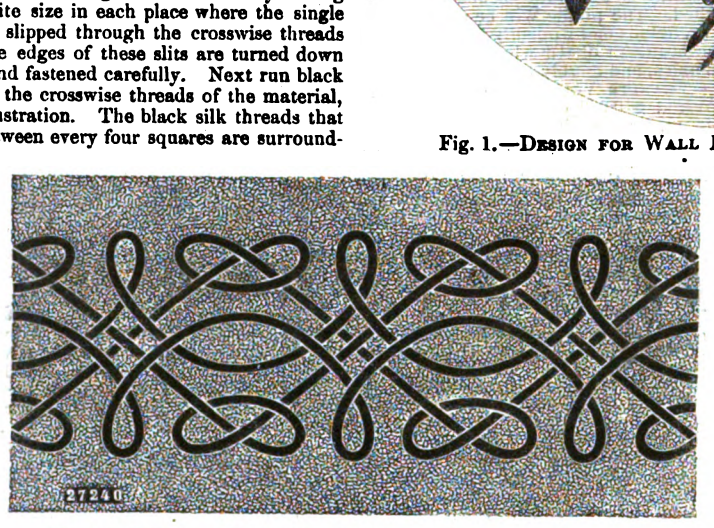

Fig. 3.—BRAIDING PATTERN FOR CHILDREN'S DRESSES, WRAPPINGS, ETC.

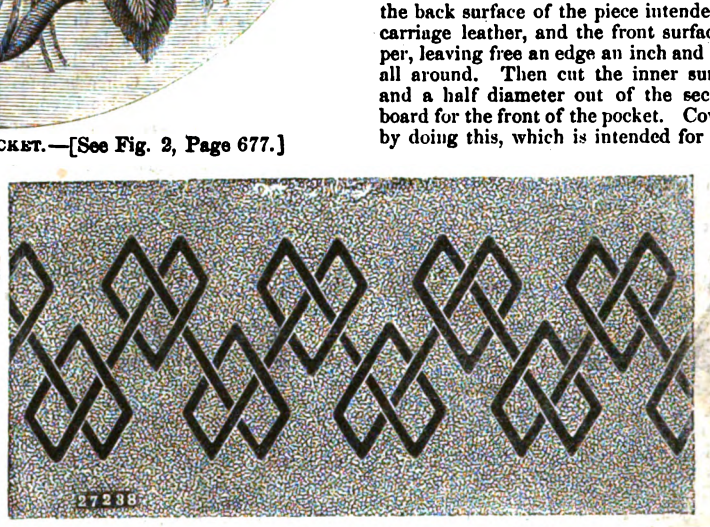

Fig. 4.—BRAIDING PATTERN FOR CHILDREN'S DRESSES, WRAPPINGS, ETC.

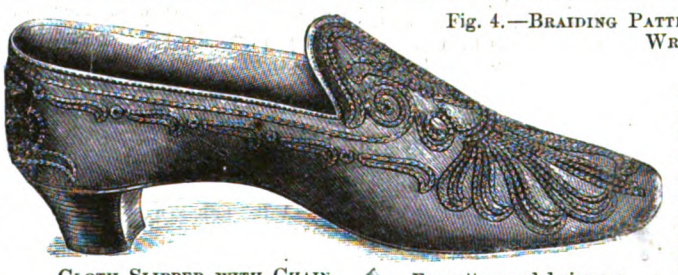
ava Reps Tidy.

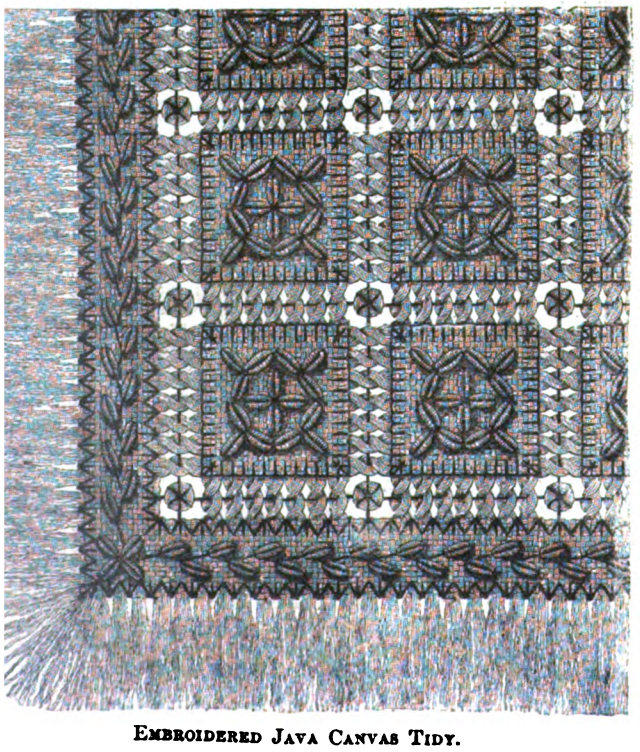
HIS tidy is e of Java reps. med with an -work border with embroidn point Russe herring-bone h, with black zephyr worst-

The original is seventeen inches square. Begin with the dation by working one of the foundation figures shown by llustration with black split zephyr worsted exactly on the lle of the foundation, and from there, at regular intervals, the remaining foundation figures until the foundation is e requisite size. The foundation is finished by point Russe ming, which must be edged all around with one of the ser threads of the fabric. The border consists of three -work and two close strips; the latter are trimmed with roidery in herring-bone stitch. The outer edge of the bor- is surrounded with point Russe embroidery. Edge the with a row of button-hole stitches after an interval of n threads. For each open-work strip draw out eight lengthwise threads, fasten the of the threads left standing for the outer edge in the manner described for the Embroidered Java Canvas Tidy, and through the crosswise threads run white threads as



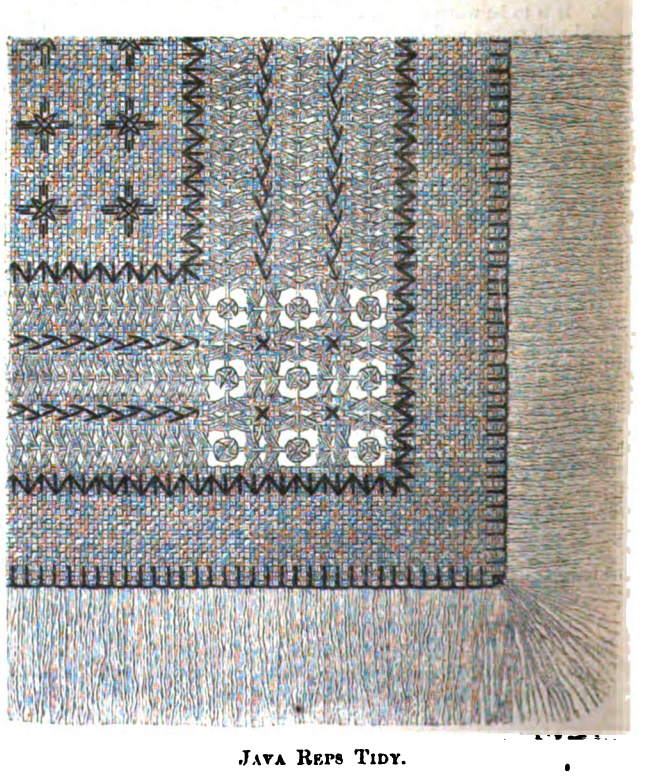
CLOTH SLIPPER WITH CHAIN STITCH EMBROIDERY.

For pattern and design see Supplement, No. X., Fig. 54.



EMBROIDERED JAVA CANVAS TIDY.

Fig. 5.—BRAIDING PATTERN FOR CHILDREN'S DRESSES, WRAPPINGS, ETC.



JAVA REPS TIDY.

Digitized by Google

by Fig. 53, Supplement, is made in a manner similar to that on the outer edge, and is pasted on the front. The inner surface of the front is covered with watered paper. Join both pocket pieces with a soufflet, which consists of a bias strip of material and lining each eighteen inches and a half long and three inches and a quarter wide, which is sewed through lengthwise several times. One side of the soufflet is pasted to the front, and the other side to the back of the pocket. The two loops for hanging up the pocket are made of a double strip of silk three inches and a quarter long and three-quarters of an inch wide, which are sewed together over an interlining of carriage leather. Along the middle of these loops set a piece of brown velvet ribbon one-third of an inch wide, which is sewed on with slanting stitches of gold thread. Edge the sides of the loops with fine cord. Sew a brass ring covered with single crochet and picots of brown saddler's silk in one end of each loop. Then sew two similar rings on the edge intended to cover the back of the pocket, and in the middle of these rings fasten the rings previously made by means of cord, the ends of which are slid to the under side through a small hole bored in the card-board, and pasted there. Paste this edge on the back, and surround the outer edge with coarse cord. For the agrafe at the top cover a piece of card-board an inch and three-quarters square, scalloped as shown by the illustration, with silk and carriage leather, and in doing this fasten the free ends of the loops of the pocket at the same time. Surround this figure with fine cord, and trim it with velvet and gold braid, and with cord and tassels as shown by the illustration. Rings, covered in crochet-work, serve to hang up the pocket.

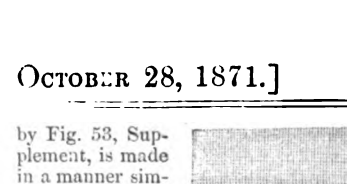


Fig. 1.—Crochet Edging for Lingerie.

Crochet Edgings for Lingerie, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—This edging is worked with twisted crochet cotton, No. 60, and is suitable for trimming articles of linen, children's garments, etc. It can also be worked with black saddler's silk, and used for trimming jackets, paletots, cloaks, etc., instead of a passementerie border. To make the edging work the ring-shaped figures in connection in one round, as follows: * 16 ch. (chain stitch), close these in a ring with one sc. (single crochet), and on the ring work 29 sc., then again on the ring, and passing the needle through the back veins of the stitches, work 2 sl. (slip stitch) on the next 2 st. (stitch), 2 sc. on the following 2 st., 3 ch., pass over 1 st., 1 sc. on the following st., nine times alternately 1 picot (4 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these) and 1 sc. on the second following st., 3 ch., pass over 1 st., 2 sc. and 2 sl. on the next 4 st. of the ring; 14 ch., and repeat from *; but in working every 3 ch. and the picots, fasten the rings to each other as shown by the illustration. The following round consists of sc. and 1 short treble crochet each on the joining point of two rings; of each 14 ch. the last 3 st., which lie back of each ring, are always left unnoticed, the 2 st. before the rings and the first 2 st. of each 14 ch. remain free likewise, and, by coming together, form a kind of short stem for each ring.

Fig. 2.—This edging is worked with twisted crochet cotton, No. 80. First work a chain stitch foundation of the requisite length. This foundation must be worked very loose and even, for which purpose a coarse crochet needle should be used. For the remainder work with a needle to suit the size of the cotton: 1st round.—On each st. (stitch) of the foundation work 1 sc. (single crochet), in doing which pass the needle through the upper of the 2 veins of stitches. 2d round.—* 5 dc. (double crochet) on the next 5 sc., 3 ch. (chain stitch), pass over 2 st., one cross double crochet; to do this work 1 stc. (short treble crochet, throwing the thread over twice) on the following st., only half finish this stc., however, thus still keeping two loops and one thread thrown over on the needle; then work 1 dc. on the third following st., work it off together with one loop on the needle, finish the stc. with the other loop and thread thrown over, which are still on the needle, and finally crochet 3 ch. and 1 dc. on the middle of the stc. Then 3 ch., pass over 2 st., and repeat from . 3d round.— 3 dc. on the middle 3 of the 5 dc. of the preceding round, 3 ch., pass over 2 st., 1 dc. on the next st., 5 ch., pass over 7 st., 3 ch., pass over 2 st.; repeat from . 4th round.—Always alternately 1 dc. on the second following st., and 1 ch. 5th round.— 1 sc. on the next st., 1 ch., 1 picot (that is, 4 ch., and 1 sc. on the second, 1 sc. on the first of these 4 ch.); repeat from . This last round forms the upper edge of the lace. For the outer scalloped edge work on the other side of the foundation, always passing the needle through the still free vein of each foundation stitch, the 1st round.— 5 sc. on the 5 foundation stitches on which 5 dc. have been crocheted at the other side of the foundation, eight times alternately 3 ch. and 1 sc. on the next st., 3 ch., and repeat from . 2d round.— 1 sc. on the middle of the next 3 ch., eight times alternately 4 ch. and 1 sc. on the middle of the next 3 ch., then 1 ch., and repeat from *. The veins of the foundation stitches, which are stretched by crocheting on them again, form an open-work round. When worked with black silk or with fine Shetland wool, this edging is well adapted to wrappings.

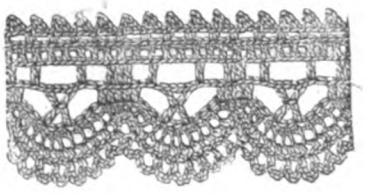

Fig. 2.—Crochet Edging for Lingerie.

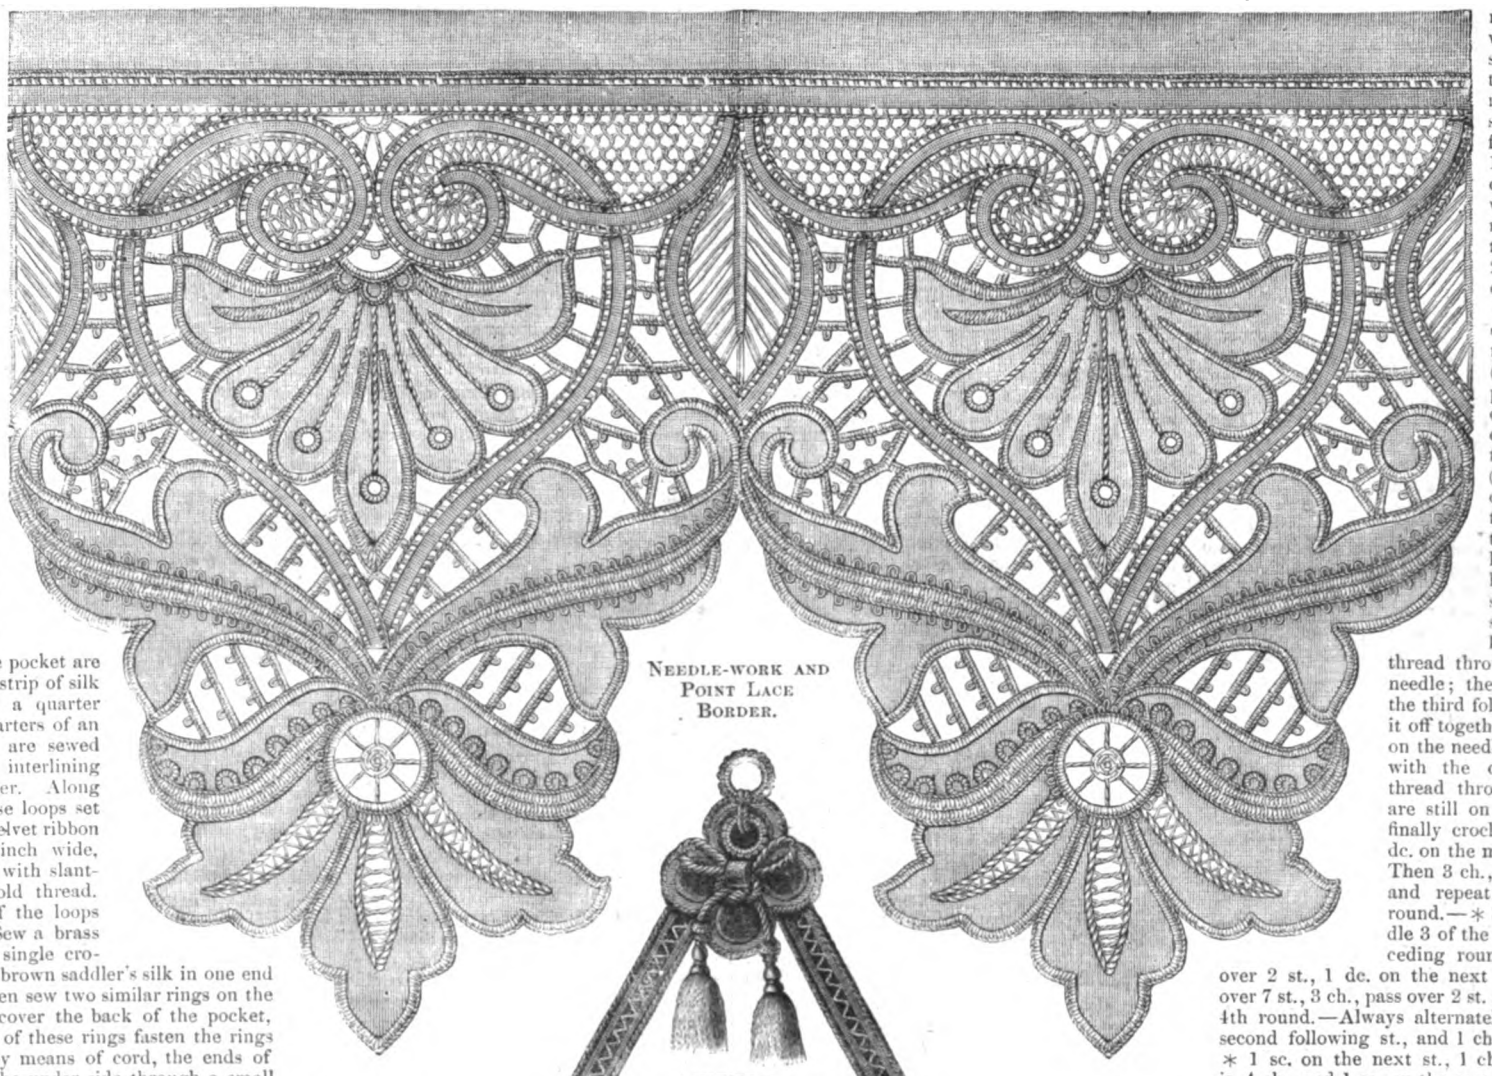

Needle-work and Point Lace Border.

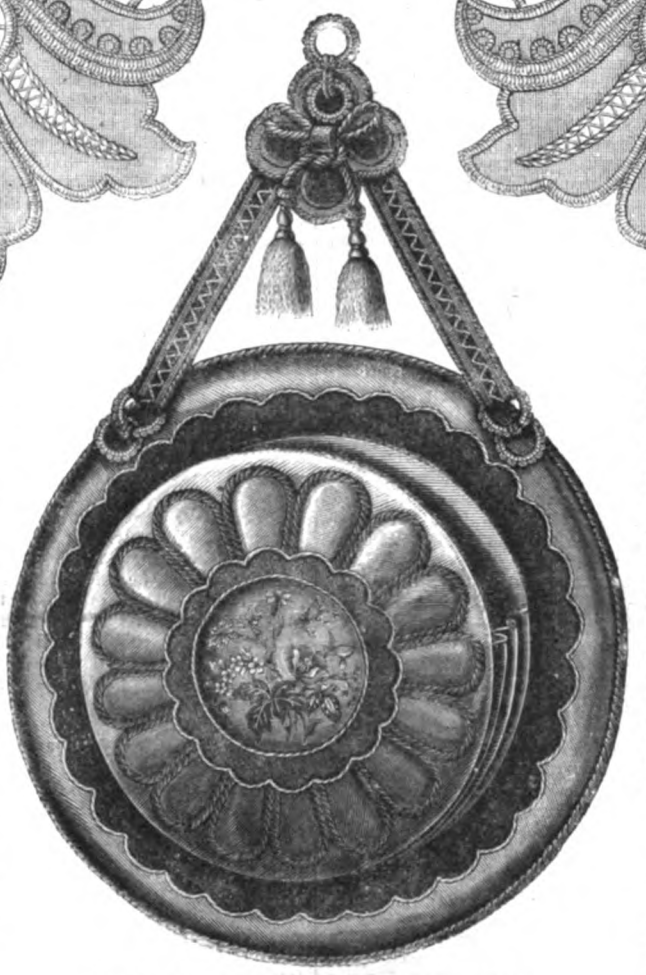

Fig. 2.—Wall Pocket for Newspapers, etc.
[See Fig. 1, Page 676.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 52 and 53.

Case for Table Mats, Tea Napkins, etc.

This case, designed to hold table mats, napkins, and such other table articles as are in daily use, is made of gray drilling or gray English linen, trimmed with braid and back stitch embroidery of maroon silk, and closed with bows of silk ribbon of a similar color. To make the case, cut of gray drilling and fine gray linen for the lining two pieces each twenty-one inches long and thirteen inches wide. In the four corners of one piece of drilling work the design given on Fig. 98, Supplement, in back stitch or half-polka stitch with saddler's silk, and sew on narrow silk braid or soutache as indicated on Fig. 98. Join each piece of drilling with one piece of linen over an interlining of card-board, and face the outer edge with silk or worsted braid in the width indicated on Fig. 98. For the upper pocket, which is intended to hold tea napkins, cut of drilling and linen four pieces each from Fig. 99, Supplement; ornament the pieces of drilling with embroidery and narrow braid in the design given on Fig. 99, and join each piece of drilling with one piece of linen over an interlining of card-board. Bind the outer edges with wide braid. The four corners indicated by *, which meet in the middle, are furnished with an eyelet-hole each, through which a ribbon is passed, which is tied in a bow. The Case for Table Mats and Tea Napkins.

For pattern and design see Supplement, No. XXIII., Figs. 98 and 99.

Fig. 1.—Corner of Border in Satin Stitch Embroidery for Album Covers, Port-Folios, etc.

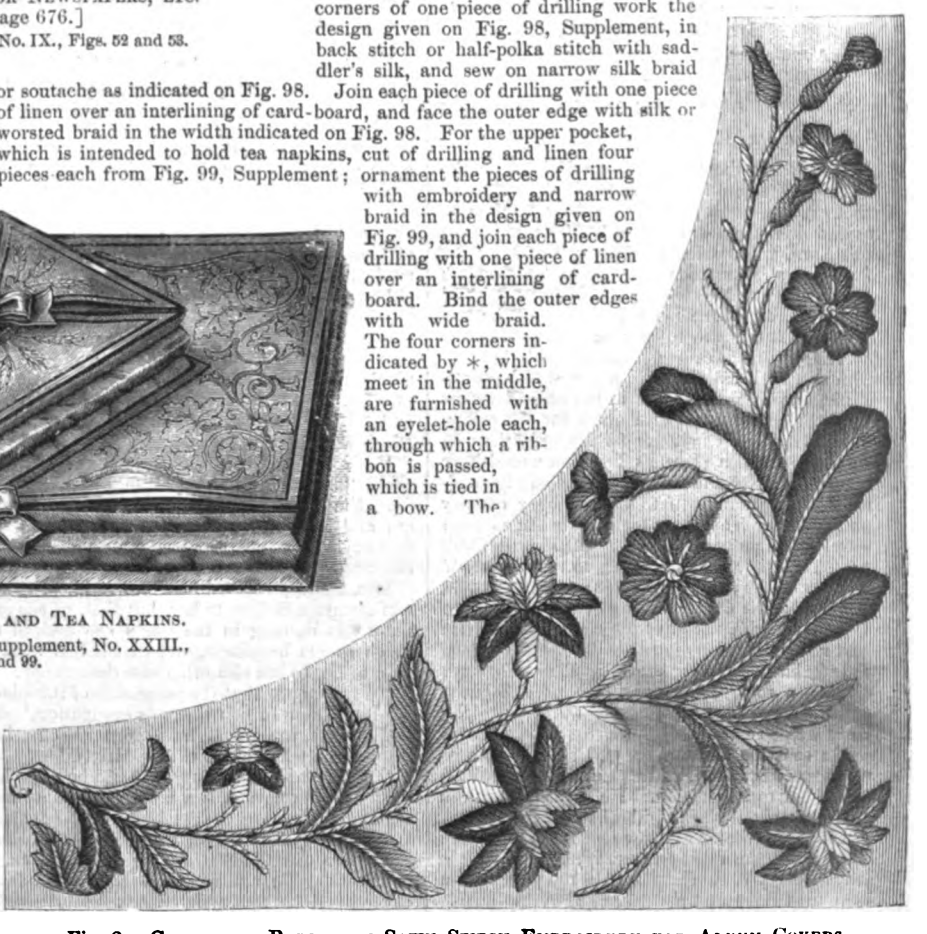

Fig. 2.—Corner of Border in Satin Stitch Embroidery for Album Covers, Port-Folios, etc.

Digitized by Google

soufflet for this pocket consists of four strips of linen, each nine inches long and three inches and a quarter wide, which are joined at the ends with fine seams, and bound with wide braid on the sides. Fasten one side of the soufflet on the upper part of the case along the straight line indicated on Fig. 98 from : to :, passing the needle through the card-board. Overseam the free side of the soufflet to the four flaps of the smaller pocket. For the soufflet of the larger pocket cut of gray linen four strips, each four inches wide, two of which are twenty-one inches, and two thirteen inches long, and join each of the two longer strips with one of the shorter strips at the ends by means of a fine seam. Bind the sides with braid, and overseam the soufflet thus formed to the leaf intended for the bottom of the case. Sew the embroidered piece to the soufflet in a similar manner, but only on three sides; the fourth is left open for the table linen. For greater durability face the free side of the soufflet with a strip an inch and a quarter wide, made of gray linen over an interlining of card-board, and bound with braid; both ends of this strip are caught in sewing the soufflet and upper leaf together. The case is closed by two ribbons at the middle of the front of the soufflet and at the upper part of the case. The case is very pretty when made of a costlier material, such as silk, or silk reps, and ornamented in satin stitch embroidery.

THE DEAD SUMMER-TIME.

THE Autumn may come with her splendor,
Full-breasted, gold-wreathed, lips of red,
With largess of charms that may lend her
Grace richer than summer-tide sped.
Can her plenty, her pride, and her glories
Sweet summer-time make me forget?
Oh, sweet happy time, that no more is,
I cling to you, dwell on you yet!

Oh, that time when, day nestling in shadow,
The summer-light just growing dim,
Book in hand, by the marge of the meadow,
I thought of, I waited for him!
Ah, sweet was the rhyme—well I know it!
Was it epic or lyrical lay?—
Which helped me—and writ by what poet?—
To beguile the last moments of day!

The Summer, methinks, is a maiden
Light-hearted and gladsome in mien;
And Autumn, the heavily laden
With wealth, she comes on like a queen.
And Summer is all expectation,
And tremulous over with joy;
And Autumn she brings consummation,
But the pleasures achieved, soon they cloy!

They are fair, sun-lit stubble and fallow,
The woods' lustrous deepening hue;
But restore me the joys which you bore me,
O Summer, the hopeful and true!
Sweet to watch was the harvest's rich token,
Ere the work of the reaper was done;
Sweet, sweet were Love's promises, spoken
In the days of the Summer that's gone.

From Night we her beauties must borrow.
Night draws on as evening descends,
That tells us of tears and of sorrow
For friends, and the parting of friends.
Sweet Summer! all hope and all gladness,
Fit topic for soul-cheering rhyme,
Dispel for me Autumn its sadness,
Restore me the sweet summer-time!

(Continued from No. 41, page 647.)

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE NEAREST WAY TO CARLSRUHE.

A GREAT event befell George Fairfax in the spring of the new year. He received a summons to Lyvedon, and arrived there only in time to attend his uncle's death-bed. The old man died, and was buried in the tomb of his forefathers—a spacious vaulted chamber beneath Lyvedon church—and George Fairfax reigned in his stead. Since his brother's death he had known that this was to be, and had accepted the fact as a matter of course. His succession caused him very little elation. He was glad to have unlimited ready money, but, in the altered aspect of his life, he did not care much for the estate. With Geraldine Challoner for his wife, the possession of such a place as Lyvedon would have been very agreeable to him. He could have almost resigned himself to the ordinary country gentleman's life: to be a magnate in the county; to attend at petty sessions, and keep himself well posted in parochial questions; to make himself a terror to the soul of poachers; and to feel that his youth was over. But now it was different. He had no wife, nor any prospect of a wife. He had no definite plans for his future. For a long time he had been going altogether the wrong way; leading a roving, desultory kind of existence; living among men whose habits and principles were worse than his own.

He sent for his mother, and installed her as mistress of Lyvedon. The place and the position suited her to admiration. He spent a month in dawdling about the neighborhood, taking stock of his new possessions, now and then suggesting some alteration or improvement, but always too lazy to carry it out; strolling in the park with a couple of dogs and a cigar, or going fly-fishing along the bank of a little winding river; driving in an open carriage with his mother; yawning over a book or a newspaper all the evening, and then sitting up till late into the night writing letters which might just as easily have been written in the day. His manner made his mother anxious. Once, with a sigh, she ventured to say how much she regretted the breaking off his engagement to Lady Geraldine.

"You were so admirably adapted for each other," she said.

"Yes, mother, admirably adapted, no doubt; but, you see, we did not love each other." He felt a little pang of remorse as he said this, for it misgave him that Geraldine had loved him. "It would have been like those chestnut ponies you drive; they go very well together, and look superb, but they are always snapping at each other's heads. I don't mean to say that Geraldine and I would have quarreled—one might as well try to quarrel with a rock—but we shouldn't have got on. In short, I have a prejudice in favor of marrying a woman I could love."

"And yet I thought you were so much attached to her."

"I was—in the way of friendship. Her society had become a kind of habit with me. I do really like her, and shall always consider her one of the handsomest and cleverest women I know; but it was a mistake to ask her to marry me, and might have been a fatal one. You will say, of course, that a man ought not to make that kind of mistake. I quite agree with you there; but I made it, and I think it infinitely better to pull up even at an awkward point than to make two lives miserable."

Mrs. Fairfax sighed, and shook her head doubtfully.

"Oh, George, George, I'm afraid there was some newer fancy—some secret reason for your conduct to poor Geraldine," she said, in a reproachful tone.

"My dear mother, I have a dozen fancies in a month, and rarely know my own mind for a week at a stretch; but I do know that I never really loved Geraldine Challoner, and that it is better for me to be free from an ill-advised engagement."

Mrs. Fairfax did not venture to press the question any farther. She had her suspicions, and her suspicions pointed to Clarissa. But Clarissa now being married, and fairly out of the way, she had some faint hope that her son would return to his old allegiance, and that she might even yet have Geraldine Challoner for her daughter. In the mean time she was fain to be patient, and to refrain from any irritating persistence upon a subject that was very near to her heart.

So far as her own interests were concerned, it would have been a pleasant thing for Mrs. Fairfax that her son should remain a bachelor. The sovereignty of Lyvedon was a pure and perfect delight to her. The place was the home of her childhood; and there was not a thicket in the park or a flower bed in the garden that was not familiar and dear to her. Every corner of the sombre old rooms—in which the furniture had been unchanged for a century—had its tender associations. All the hopes and dreams of her long-vanished youth came back to her, faint and pale, like faded flowers shut in the leaves of a book. And in the event of her son's marriage she must, of course, resign all this—must make a new home for herself outside the walls of Lyvedon; for she was not a woman to accept a secondary place in any household. Considering the question merely from a selfish point of view, she had every reason to be satisfied with the existing state of things; but it was not of herself she thought. She saw her son restless and unsettled, and had a secret conviction that he was unhappy. There had been much in the history of his past life that had troubled her; and for his future her chief hope had been in the security of a judicious marriage. She was a woman of strong religious feeling, and had shed many bitter tears and prayed many prayers on account of this beloved son.

The beloved son in the mean while dawdled away life in a very unsatisfactory manner. He found the roads and lanes about Lyvedon remarkable for nothing but their dust. There were wild flowers, of course—possibly nightingales and that sort of thing; but he preferred such imported bouquets, grown on the flowery slopes of the Mediterranean, as he could procure to order at Covent Garden; and the song of nightingales in the dusky after-dinner time made him melancholy. The place was a fine old place, and it was undoubtedly a good thing to possess it; but George Fairfax had lived too wild a life to find happiness in the simple pleasures of a Kentish squire. So, after enduring the placid monotony of Lyvedon for a couple of months, he grew insufferably weary all at once, and told his mother that he was going to the Black Forest.

"It's too early to shoot caper-cailzies," he said; "but I dare say I shall find something to do. I'm nothing but a bore to you here, mother; and you can amuse yourself while I'm gone in carrying out any of the improvements we've discussed."

Mrs. Fairfax assured her son that his presence was always a delight to her, but that, of course, there was nothing in the world she desired so much as his happiness, and that it had been a pain to her to see him otherwise than happy.

"I had hoped that the possession of this place would have given you so much occupation," she said, "that you would have gone into Parliament and made a position for yourself."

"My dear mother, I never had any affection for politics, and, unless a man could be a modern Pitt, I don't see the use of that kind of thing. Every young Englishman turns his face toward the House of Commons, as the sunflower turns to the sun-god; and see what a charming level of mediocrity we enjoy in consequence thereof."

"Any thing that would occupy your mind, George," remonstrated Mrs. Fairfax.

"The question is, whether I have any mind to be occupied, mother," replied the young man, with a laugh. "I think the average modern intellect, when it knows its own capacity, rarely soars above billiards. That is a science; and what can a man be more than scientific?"

"It is so easy to laugh the subject down in that way, George," returned the mother, with a sigh; "but a man has duties to perform."

"Surely not a man with an estate like this, mother! I can never understand that talk about the duties of a rich man, except to pay his income tax properly. A fellow with a wife and children and no income to speak of has duties, of course—imprimis, the duty of working for his belongings; but what are the privileges of wealth, if one may not take life as one pleases?"

"Oh, George, George, I used to hope such great things of you!"

"The fond delusion common to maternity, my dearest mother. A brat learns his A B C a shade quicker than other children, or construes Qui fit Mæcenas with tolerable correctness, and straightway the doting mother thinks her lad is an embryo Canning. You should never have hoped any thing of me, except that I would love you dearly all my life. You have made that very easy to me."

Mr. Fairfax took his portmanteau and departed, leaving his servant to carry the rest of his luggage straight to Paris, and await his master's arrival at one of the hotels in the Rue de Rivoli. The master himself took a somewhat circuitous route, and began his journey to the Black Forest by going down to Holborough.

"I can take a steamer from Hull to Hamburg," he said to himself, "and push on from there to Carlsruhe."

He wanted to see Clarissa again. He knew that she was at Arden Court, and that Lady Laura Armstrong was not at Hale Castle. He wanted to see her; his ulterior views were of the vaguest; but that passionate yearning to see her, to hear the sweet winning voice, to look into the soft hazel eyes, was strong upon him. It was a year since the day he dined in Clarges Street; and in all that year he had done his uttermost to forget her, had hated himself for the weakness which made her still dearer to him than any other woman; and then, alike angry with her and with himself, had cried, with Wilmot, Earl of Rochester,

"Such charms by nature you possess,
'Twere madness not to love you."

He went up to London early one morning, and straight from London to Holborough, where he arrived late in the evening. He slept at the chief inn of the place; and in the golden summer noontide set out for Arden Court—not to make a formal visit, but rather to look about him in a somewhat furtive way. He did not care to make his advent known to Daniel Granger just yet; perhaps, indeed, he might find it expedient to avoid any revelation of himself to that gentleman. He wanted to find out all he could of Clarissa's habits, so that he might contrive an interview with her. He had seen the announcement of the baby's birth, and oh, what a bitter pang the commonplace paragraph had given him! Never before had the fact that she was another man's wife come home to him so keenly. He tried to put the subject out of his thoughts, to forget that there had been a son born to the house of Granger; but often in the dreary spring twilight, walking among the oaks of Lyvedon, he had said to himself, "Her child ought to have been heir to this place."

He went in at the lodge gate, and strolled idly into the park, not being at all clear as to how he was to bring about what he wanted. The weather was lovely—weather in which few people, untrammeled by necessity, would have cared to remain in-doors. There was just the chance that Mrs. Granger might be strolling in the park herself, and the still more remote contingency that she might be alone. He was quite prepared for the possibility of meeting her accompanied by the lynx-eyed Miss Granger, and was not a man to be thrown off his guard or taken at a disadvantage, come what might.

The place wore its fairest aspect: avenues of elms that had begun to grow when England was young; gigantic oaks dotted here and there upon the undulating open ground, reputed a thousand years old; bright young plantations of rare fir and pine that had a pert, crisp newness about them, like the air of a modern dandy; every where the appearance of that perfect care and culture which is the most conclusive evidence of unlimited wealth.

George Fairfax looked around him with a sigh. The scene he looked upon was very fair. It was not difficult to understand how dear association might have made so beautiful a spot to such a girl as Clarissa. She had told him she would give the world to win back her lost home; and she had given—something less than the world—only herself. "Paris is worth a mass," said the great Henry; and Clarissa's perjury was only one more of the many lies which men and women have told to compass their desires.

He kept away from the carriage-roads, loitering in the remoter regions of the park, and considering what he should do. He did not want to present himself at the Court as a formal visitor. In the first place, it would have been rather difficult to give any adequate reason for his presence in Holborough; and in the second, he had an unspeakable repugnance to any social intercourse with Clarissa's husband.

How he was ever to see her in the future, with that hideous hypocrisy of friendliness toward Daniel Granger, he knew not; but he knew that it would cost him dearly to take the hand of the man who had supplanted him.

He wandered on till he came to a dell where the ground was broken a good deal, and where the fern seemed to grow more luxuriantly than in any other part of the park. There was a glimpse of blue water at the bottom of the slope—a narrow strip of a streamlet running between swampy banks, where the forget-me-nots and pale water-plants ran riot. This verdant valley was sheltered by some of the oldest hawthorns George Fairfax had ever seen—very Methuselahs of trees, whose grim old trunks and crooked branches time had twisted into the queerest shapes, and whose massive boles and strange excrescences of limb were covered with the moss of past generations. It was such a valley as Gustave Doré would love to draw—a glimpse of wilderness in the midst of cultivation.

There were not wanted figures to brighten the landscape. A woman dressed in white sat under one of the hawthorns, with a baby on her lap; and a nurse-maid, in gayer raiment, stood by, looking down at the child.

How well George Fairfax remembered the slight, girlish figure, and the day when he had come upon it unawares in Marley Wood! He stood a few paces off, and listened to the soft, sweet voice.

Clarissa was talking to her baby in the unintelligible mother-language inspired by the occasion. A baby just able to smile at her, and coo and crow and chuckle in that peculiarly unctuous manner common to babies of amiable character—a fair, blue-eyed baby, big and bonny, with soft rings of flaxen hair upon his pink young head, and tender little arms that seemed meant for nothing so much as to be kissed.

After a good deal of that sweet baby-talk there was a little discussion between the mistress and maid, and then the child was wrapped up as carefully as if destruction were in the breath of the softest June zephyr. Mr. Fairfax was afraid the mother was going away with the child, and that his chance would be lost; but it was not so. The maid tripped off with the infant, after it had been brought back two or three times to be half smothered with kisses—kisses which it seemed to relish in its own peculiar way, opening its mouth to receive them, as if they had been something edible. The baby was carried away at last, and Clarissa took up a book and began to read.

George Fairfax waited till the maid had been gone about ten minutes, and then came slowly down the hollow to the spot where Clarissa was seated. The rustle of the fern startled her; she looked up, and saw him standing by her side. It was just a year since he had surprised her in Mr. Wooster's garden at Henley. She had thought of him very much in that time, but less since the birth of her boy. She turned very pale at sight of him; and when she tried to speak, the words would not come: her lips only moved tremulously.

"I hope I did not alarm you very much," he said, "by the suddenness of my appearance. I thought I heard your voice just now speaking to some one"—he had not the heart to mention her baby—"and came down here to look for you. What a charming spot it is!"

She had recovered her self-possession by this time, and was able to answer him quite calmly.

"Yes, it is pretty. It was a favorite spot of Austin's. I have at least a dozen sketches of it done by him. But I did not know you were in Yorkshire, Mr. Fairfax."

She wondered whether he was staying at Hale; and then it flashed upon her that there had been a reconciliation between him and Lady Geraldine.

"I have not been long in Yorkshire. I am merely here en passant, in short. My only excuse for approaching you lies in the fact that I have come to talk to you about your brother."

"About Austin!" exclaimed Clarissa, with a look of alarm. "There is nothing wrong—he is well, I hope?"

"Pray don't alarm yourself. Yes, he is tolerably well, I believe; and there is nothing wrong—nothing that need cause you any immediate concern, at least. I am going to Paris, and I thought you might be glad to send some message."

"You are very kind to think of that: yes, I shall be glad to send to him. He is not a good correspondent, and I get very anxious about him sometimes. What you said just now seemed to imply that there was something wrong. Pray be candid with me, Mr. Fairfax."

He did not answer her immediately; in fact, for the moment he scarcely was conscious of her words. He was looking at the beautiful face—looking at it with a repressed passion that was deeper and more real than any he had ever felt in his life. His thoughts wandered away from Austin Lovel. He was thinking what he would have given, what peril he would have dared, to call this woman his own. All this lower world seemed nothing to him when weighed against her; and in such a moment a man of his stamp rarely remembers any other world.

"There is something wrong," repeated Clarissa, with increasing anxiety. "I entreat you to tell me the truth!"

"Yes, there is something wrong," he answered, vaguely; and then, wrenching his mind away from those wild speculations as to what he would or would not do to win Daniel Granger's wife, he went on in another tone: "The truth is, my dear Mrs. Granger, I was in Paris last winter, and saw something of your brother's mode of life; and I can not say that I consider it a satisfactory one. You have sent him a good deal of money since I saw you last, I dare say? Pray understand that there is nothing intrusive or impertinent in my question. I only wish to be some use to you, if I can."

"I am sure of that. Yes, I have sent him what I could—about four hundred pounds—since last June; and he has been very grateful, poor fellow! He ought to know that he is welcome to every shilling I have. I could send him much more, of course, if I cared to ask my husband for money."

Digitized by Google

"It is wiser to trust to your own resources. And I doubt if the command of much money would be a positive benefit to your brother. You have asked me to be candid, and I shall obey you, even at the hazard of giving you pain. There is a kind of constitutional weakness in your brother's nature. He is a man open to every influence, and not always governed by the best influences. I saw a good deal of him when I was last in Paris, and I saw him most in the fastest society; among people who petted him for the sake of his genius and vivacity, but who would turn their backs upon him to-morrow if he were no longer able to amuse them: the set into which an artist is so apt to fall when his home influences are not strong enough to keep him steady, and when he has that lurking disposition to Bohemianism which has been the bane of your brother's life. I speak entirely without reserve, you see."

"I am grateful to you for doing so. Poor Austin! if he had only chosen more wisely! But his wife is fond of him, you say?"

"Too fond of him, perhaps; for she is very much given to torment him with jealous outbreaks; and he is not a man to take that sort of thing pleasantly. She does not go into society with him; indeed, I doubt if half a dozen out of the people whom he lives among know that he has a wife. I found his social position considerably improved—thanks to your remittances, no doubt. He was still in the Rue du Chevalier Bayard—as, of course, you know—but had moved a stage lower down, and had furnished a painting-room in the stereotyped style—Flemish carved buffets, dingy tapestry from a passage behind the Rue Richelieu, and a sprinkling of bric-à-brac from the Quai Voltaire. The poor little woman and her children were banished; and he had a room full of visitors chattering round him while he painted. You know his wonderful facility. The atmosphere was cloudy with tobacco-smoke; and the men were drinking that abominable concoction of wormwood with which young France cultivates madness and early doom."

"It is not a pleasant picture," said Clarissa, with a profound sigh.

"No, my dear Mrs. Granger, but it is a faithful one. Mr. Lovel had won a certain reputation for his airy style of art, and was beginning to get better prices for his pictures; but I fancy he has a capacity for spending money, and an inability to save it, which would bring him always to the same level of comparative insolvency. I have known so many men like that; and a man who begins in that way so rarely ends in any other way."

"What am I to do!" exclaimed Clarissa, piteously. "What can I do to help him?"

"I am almost at a loss to suggest any thing. Perhaps if you were on the spot your influence might do something. I know he loves you, and is more moved by the mention of your name than by any sermon one could preach to him. But I suppose there is no chance of your being in Paris."

"I don't know. Mr. Granger talked some time ago of spending the autumn abroad, and asked me if I should like to see a New-Year's Day in Paris. I think, if I were to express a wish about it, he would take me there; and it would be such happiness to me to see Austin!" And then Mrs. Granger thought of her baby, and wondered whether the atmosphere of Paris would be favorable to that rare and beauteous blossom; whether the tops-and-bottoms of the French capital would agree with his tender digestive machinery; and if the cow-keepers of the Faubourg St. Honoré were an honest and unadulterating race. The very notion of taking the treasure away from his own nurseries, his own cow, his own goat-chaise, was enough to make her shudder.

"It would be the best chance for his redemption. A little womanly kindness and counsel from you to the wife might bring about a happier state of things in his home; and a man who can be happy at home is in a measure saved. It is hardly possible for your brother to mix much with the people among whom I saw him without injury to himself. They are people to whom dissipation is the very salt of life; people who breakfast at the Moulin Rouge at three o'clock in the afternoon, and eat ices at midnight to the music of the cascade in the Bois; people to be seen at every race-meeting; men who borrow money at seventy-five per cent. to pay for opera-boxes and dinners at the Café Riche, and who manage the rest of their existence on credit."

"But what could my influence do against such friends as these?" asked Clarissa, in a hopeless tone.

"Who can say? It might do wonders. I know your brother has a heart, and that you have power to touch it. Take my advice, Mrs. Granger, and try to be in Paris as soon as you can."

"I will," she answered, fervently. "I would do any thing to save him." She looked at her watch, and rose from the seat under the hawthorn. "It is nearly two o'clock," she said, "and I must go back to the house. You will come to luncheon, of course?"

"Thanks—no. I have an engagement that will take me back to the town immediately."

"But Mr. Granger will be surprised to hear that you have been here without calling upon him."

"Need Mr. Granger hear of my coming?" George Fairfax asked, in a low tone.

Clarissa flushed scarlet.

"I have no secrets from my husband, Mr. Fairfax," she said, "even about trifles."

"Ten thousand pardons! I scarcely want to make my presence here a secret; but, in short, I came solely to speak to you about a subject in which I know you were deeply interested, and I had not contemplated calling upon Mr. Granger."

They were walking slowly up the grassy slope as they talked; and after this there came a silence, during which Clarissa quickened her pace a little, George Fairfax keeping still by her side. Her heart beat faster than its wont; and she had a vague sense of danger in this man's presence—a sense of a net being woven round her, a lurking suspicion that this apparent interest in her brother veiled some deeper feeling.

They came out of the hollow, side by side, into a short arcade of flowering limes, at the end of which there was a broad sweep of open grass. A man on a deep-chested, strong-limbed gray horse was riding slowly toward them across the grass—Daniel Granger.

That picture of his wife walking in the little avenue of limes, with George Fairfax by her side, haunted Mr. Granger with a strange distinctness in days to come—the slight white-robed figure against the background of sun-lit greenery; the young man's handsome head, uncovered, and stooping a little as he spoke to his companion.

The master of Arden Court dismounted, and led his horse by the bridle as he came forward to meet Mr. Fairfax. The two men shook hands, but not very warmly. The encounter mystified Daniel Granger a little. It was strange to find a man he had supposed to be at the other end of England strolling in the park with his wife, and that man the one about whom he had had many a dreary half hour of brooding. He waited for an explanation, however, without any outward show of surprise. The business was simple and natural enough, no doubt, he told himself.

"Have you been to the house?" he asked: "I have been out all the morning."

"No; I was on my way there, when I came upon Mrs. Granger in the most romantic spot yonder. I felt that I was rather early for a morning call, even in the depth of the country, and had strolled out of the beaten path to get rid of an hour or so."

"I did not know you were in Yorkshire," said Mr. Granger, not in the most cordial tone. "You are staying at Hale, I suppose?"

"No; Lady Laura is away, you know."

"Ah—to be sure; I had forgotten."

"I am spending a few days with a bachelor friend in Holborough. I am off to Germany before the week is out."

Mr. Granger was not sorry to hear this. He was not jealous of George Fairfax. If any body had suggested the possibility of his entertaining such a sentiment, that person would have experienced the full force of Daniel Granger's resentment; but this was just the one man whom he fancied his wife might have cared for a little before her marriage. He was not a man given to petty jealousies; and of late, since the birth of his son, there had been growing up in his mind a sense of security in his wife's fidelity—her affection even. The union between them had seemed very perfect after the advent of the child; and the master of Arden Court felt almost as if there were nothing upon this earth left for him to desire. But he was a little puzzled by the presence of George Fairfax, nevertheless.

Holborough was a small place; and he began to speculate immediately upon the identity of this bachelor friend of Mr. Fairfax's. It was not a garrison town. The young men of the place were for the most part small professional men—half a dozen lawyers and doctors, two or three curates, a couple of bankers' sons, an auctioneer or two, ranking vaguely between the trading and professional classes, and the sons of tradesmen. Among them all Mr. Granger could remember no one likely to be a friend of George Fairfax. It might possibly be one of the curates; but it seemed scarcely probable that Mr. Fairfax would come two hundred and fifty miles to abide three days with a curate. Nor was it the season of partridges. There was no shooting to attract Mr. Fairfax to the neighborhood of Holborough. There was trout, certainly, to be found in abundance in brooks and river within a walk of the town; and Mr. Fairfax might be passionately fond of fly-fishing.

"You will come in and have some luncheon, of course?" Mr. Granger said, when they came to the gate-way, where George Fairfax pulled up, and began to wish them good-by. Not to ask the man to eat and drink would have seemed to him the most unnatural thing in the world.

"Thanks. I think I had better deny myself that pleasure," Mr. Fairfax said, doubtfully. "The day is getting on, and—and I have an engagement for the afternoon." ("Trout, no doubt," thought Mr. Granger.) "I have seen you—that is the grand point. I could not leave Yorkshire without paying my respects to you and Mrs. Granger."

"Do you leave so soon?"

"To-morrow, I think."

"A hurried journey for trout," thought Mr. Granger.

He insisted upon the visitor coming in to luncheon. George Fairfax was not very obdurate. It was so sweet to be near the woman he loved, and he had not the habit of refusing himself the things that were sweet to him. They went into the small dining-room. The luncheon-bell had rung a quarter of an hour ago, and Miss Granger was waiting for her parents, with an air of placid self-abnegation, by an open window.

There was a good deal of talk during luncheon, but the chief talker was George Fairfax. Clarissa was grave, and somewhat absent. She was thinking of her brother Austin, and the gloomy account of him which she had just heard. It was hardly a surprise to her. His letters had been few and far between, and they had not been hopeful, or, at the best, brightened by only a flash of hopefulness, which was more like bravado, now and then. His necessity for money, too, had seemed without limit. She was planning her campaign. Come what might, she must contrive some means of being in Paris before long. Mr. Fairfax was going on to Carlsruhe; that was an advantage; for something in his manner today had told her that he must always be more or less than her friend. She had a vague sense that his eagerness to establish a confidence between her and himself was a menace of danger to her.

"If I can only go to Austin myself," she thought, "there need be no intermediary."

Luncheon was over, and still Mr. Fairfax lingered—strangely indifferent to the waning of an afternoon which seemed peculiarly advantageous for fly-fishing, Mr. Granger thought. They went into the drawing-room, and Mr. Fairfax dawdled an hour away talking of Lyvedon, and giving a serio-comic description of himself in the novel character of a country gentleman. It was not till Mr. Granger had looked at his watch once or twice in a surreptitious manner, thinking of an engagement to meet his architect for the inspection of some dilapidated cottages on the newest part of his estate, that the visitor rose to depart. Daniel Granger had quite warmed to him by this time. His manner was so natural in its pleasant airiness: it was not easy to think there could be any lurking evil beneath such a show of candor.

"Can't you stay and dine with us?" asked Mr. Granger; "or will you go back to Holborough and fetch your friend? We shall be very glad to know him, if we don't know him already."

If a blush had been possible to George Fairfax, this friendly speech would have raised it; but the capacity had departed from him before he left Eton. He did feel ashamed of himself, nevertheless.

"You are more than good," he said; "but my friend seldom goes any where. Good-by."

He made his adieux with an agreeable abruptness, not caring to prolong the dinner question. Such men as he tell lies without stint upon occasion; but the men are few to whom it is actually congenial to lie. He was glad to get away even from the woman he loved, and the sense of shame was strong upon him as he departed.

If his mother, who was anxiously awaiting a letter from Paris or Carlsruhe, could have known of his presence here in this place, to which his father had come years ago to betray her! If she who loved him so fondly, and was so full of prayers and hopes for his future, could have seen him so utterly on the wrong road, what bitter shame and lamenting there would have been in the halls of Lyvedon that day—those deserted halls in which the lady sat alone among the sombre old-world grandeurs of oak and tapestry, and sighed for her absent son!

Instead of going straight back to the Holborough high-road, Mr. Fairfax struck across the woods by that path which led to the mill-stream and the orchard, where he had parted from Clarissa on that cheerless October night nearly three years ago. He knew that Mr. Lovel was away, and the cottage only tenanted by servants, and he had a fancy for looking at the place where he had been so angry and so miserable—the scene of that one rejection which had stung him to the very quick, the single humiliation of his successful career. It was only the morbid fancy of an idle man who had an afternoon to dispose of somehow.

Half-way between the Court and the cottage he heard the jingling of bells, and presently, flashing and gleaming among the trees, he saw a gayly-painted carriage drawn by a pair of goats, with plated harness that shone in the sun. Mixed with the joyous jingle of the bells, there came the sound of an infant's laughter. It was the baby taking his after-dinner airing, attended by a couple of nurses. A turn in the path brought George Fairfax and the heir of Arden face to face.

A sudden impulse seized him—a sudden impulse of tenderness for her child. He took the little bundle of rosy babyhood and lace and muslin in his arms, and kissed the soft little face as gently as a woman, and looked into the innocent blue eyes, dilated to an almost impossible extent in a wondering stare, with unspeakable love and melancholy in his own. Great Heaven! if Clarissa had been his wife, this child his son, what a happy man he might have been, what a new charm there would have been in the possession of a fine estate, what a new zest in life, the savor of which seemed to have departed altogether of late!

He put the little one back into his cushioned seat in the goat-chaise with supreme care and gentleness, not ruffling so much as a plume in his dainty white satin hat.

"A fine boy, Mrs. Nurse," he said, feeling in his waistcoat pocket for backsheesh; to which proposition the portly head-nurse, who had stared at him, aghast with horror, while he handled the infant, assented with enthusiasm.

"I never nursed a finer, Sir; and I was head-nurse to Lady Fitz-Lubin, which my lady had five boys, and not a girl between them; and Mrs. Granger does dote on him so. I never see a ma that wrapped up in her child."

Mr. Fairfax gave her half a sovereign, stooped down to kiss the baby again—it is doubtful if he had ever kissed a baby before—and then walked on, wondering at the new sensation. Such a little soft thing, that opened its mouth to be kissed, like a petted bird! And yet he contemplated a future in which he should come between Clarissa and this child; he could dream of a possibility which should make its mother's name a shame to this little one.

Mr. Granger kept his appointment with the architect, and came to the natural conclusion of a rich man upon the subject of dilapidated buildings. After inspecting the lapsided old cottages, with their deep, roomy chimneys, in which the farm-laborer loved to sit of a night, roasting his ponderous boots and smoking the pipe of meditation, and their impossible staircases, which seemed to have been designed with a deliberate view to the breaking of legs and endangerment of spines, Mr. Granger made a wry face, and ordered that rubbish to be swept away.

"You can build me half a dozen upon the New Arden design," he said; "red brick, with stone dressings; and be sure you put a tablet with the date in front of each."

He was thinking of his son, anxious that there should be some notable improvement, some new building every year, to mark the progress of his boy's existence.

The farm-laborers and their wives did not look so delighted as they might have been by this edict. These benighted souls liked the old cottages, lapsided as they were—liked the crooked staircase squeezed into a corner of the living-room below, the stuffy little dens above, with casement windows which only opened on one side, letting in the smallest modicum of air, and were not often opened at all. Cottages on the New Arden model meant stone floors below and open rafters above, thorough draughts every where, and, worst of all, they meant weekly inspection by Miss Granger. The free sons and daughters of Hickly-on-the-Hill—this little cluster of houses which formed a part of Mr. Granger's new estate—had rejoiced that they were not as the Ardenites; that they could revel in warmth and dirt, and eat liver and bacon for supper on a Saturday night, without any fear of being lectured for their extravagance by the omniscient Sophia on the following Monday, convicted of their guilt by the evidence of the grease in an unwashed frying-pan; that their children could sport on the hill-side in garments that were guiltless of strings; that, in short, they were outside the circle of Miss Granger's sympathies, and could live their own lives. But that sweet liberty was all over now: with the red brick and stone dressings would come the Draconian laws of New Arden; no more corners for the comfortable accumulation of dirt, no more delicious little cupboards for the stowing away of rubbish. Every thing was to be square and solid and stony. They heard Mr. Granger giving orders that the chimney was to be flush with the wall, and so on; the stove, an "Oxford front," warranted to hold not more than a pound and a half of coal; no recesses in which old age could sit and croon, no cozy nook for the cradle of infancy.

After this interview with the architect Mr. Granger rode home through Holborough. His way took him past that very hotel where George Fairfax was staying—the chief inn of the town, a fine old red brick building that filled nearly one side of the market-place.

It happened that just as Mr. Granger rode along the High Street, where there were some half a dozen stragglers visible upon a wide expanse of pavement, and one carriage waiting at the draper's, Mr. Fairfax walked up the broad steps of the hotel and entered—entered with the air of a man who lived there, Daniel Granger thought. And he had said that he was staying with a bachelor friend. Mr. Granger rode slowly past the principal part of the hotel to an archway at the end—an archway leading to livery-stables, where the hostler was lounging. He stopped opposite this archway, and beckoned the man over to him.

"There was a gentleman went into the hotel just now," he said; "did you see him?"

"Yes, Sir, I seed him. Mr. Fairfax; him as was to have married Lady Laura Armstrong's sister."

"Is he staying in the house, do you know?"

"Yes, Sir; came last night, down from London. Shall I take him your card, Sir?"

"No, thank you, Giles; I won't call upon him this afternoon. I only wanted to be sure. Good-day."

He rode on. What was the meaning of this lie which George Fairfax had told him? Had it any meaning which it behooved him to fathom? It was strange, at the least—strange enough to make Mr. Granger very uncomfortable as he rode slowly back to the Court.

USEFUL RECIPES.

ICED APPLES.—Pare and core one dozen large apples; fill with sugar, very little butter, and cinnamon; bake till nearly done; let them cool, and if you can without breaking, put on another dish; if not, pour off the juice; have some icing prepared, lay on top and sides, and set into the oven a minute or two to brown slightly; serve with cream.

QUINCE JELLY.—Slice the quinces without either paring or coring, put them in the preserving-kettle, and just cover with cold water; place over the fire and boil until entirely soft; remove from the stove, and strain off the liquor, and to every gallon allow three pounds of white sugar; boil it very fast until it becomes a stiff jelly.

ANOTHER.—Grate the fruit, and place, cores and all, on to boil. When it has boiled about five minutes, strain, and do it as quickly as possible, so it may not cool before it is returned to the fire. Measure, and allow to every pint of juice one pound of white sugar; let it boil very fast, and when it seems inclined to stiffen, remove, and put into jelly glasses.

Preserves, jellies, etc., should always be put into the glasses hot, and, to prevent cracking, under each glass as you are going to fill it put a large cloth wrung out of cold water, and folded until it is very thick.

YANKEE PONES.—When properly made and baked, these are delicious. The buttermilk should be rich, and not too sour. Allow to every pint one spoonful of soda, and three scant coffee-cupfuls of corn meal; put the soda in the basin, pulverize it well, and pour the buttermilk on; then the meal; add salt to taste. Taste a little of the batter, and if it seems sour, add more soda; have the griddle hot, put on the cakes with a spoon, making them round and about a quarter of an inch thick; when brown, turn, and bake the other side send to table hot. They should be split and buttered as muffins. This quantity makes fifteen or sixteen cakes. If liked, add a small quantity of molasses—about three table-spoonfuls—to the batter before baking.

Digitized by Google

Fig. 1.—GRAY SULTANE SUIT.—BACK.
r pattern see Supplement, No. XL., Figs. 55 and 56.

Fig. 2.—GRAY SULTANE SUIT.—FRONT.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XL., Figs. 55 and 56.

tane Suit, Figs. 1 and 2.

tane consists of a double skirt and basquemmed with four wide folds of gros grain o narrower folds of the same and gray lace trim the over-skirt and basque-waist. Figs. 55 and 56, Supplement, give the pattern for the over-skirt. For the front and back of the over-skirt cut one piece each from Figs. 55 and 56, having previously joined on the piece turned down in Supplement on Fig. 55. Set on the trimming and pleat the top, bringing × on ●. For the scarfs on both sides, cut of the material two pieces each twenty-four inches long and twelve inches wide, round off the under edge as shown by the illustration, put on the trimming, lay the top in a deep pleat, and set both scarfs and over-skirt into a double belt, in doing which the back of the skirt must overlap the front at each side from 1 to 2. The scarfs must be fastened on at this place.

Corners of Borders in Satin Stitch Embroidery, for Album Covers, Port-Folios, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 677.

BOTH of these borders are worked on cloth, velvet, or heavy silk material, with silk of different colors in diagonal satin stitch, knotted stitch, and point Russe. Gimp of two colors is used for Fig. 2. The stems of the leaves and flowers are worked with gold thread and fastened with cross stitches of darker silk.—Gold bullion and gold thread may be used instead of silk of different colors.

Water-proof Cloak for Girl from 6 to 8 Years old.

See illustration on page 681.

THIS cloak of gray water-proof cloth is furnished with a cape and a small collar. Gray pearl buttons close the cloak, and similar buttons are set on the sleeves and pocket welts. Cut the cloak from Figs. 57–62, Supplement, join all the pieces according to the corresponding figures, face the edge of the cape and collar with a strip of silk, and the front and bottom of the cloak with a strip of water-proof, and sew pocket welts, an inch and a quarter wide and five inches long, on the fronts, as shown by the illustration. Finish the cloak with buttons and button-holes as shown by the illustration.

KING SUIT.
n see Supplement.

CATS.

CATS are held in great estimation in the East, and large prices are sometimes paid by native ladies for fine Persian specimens. In Cairo a sum of money was left in trust to feed poor cats, who daily receive their rations at the Mahkemah (law courts). Many animals have in Arabic a large number of names—more than 560, for instance, being applied to the lion. The following story, current among them, will illustrate this fact with reference to the cat. A Bedawi was out hunting one day, and caught a cat, but did not know what animal it could be. As he was carrying it along with him he met a man who said, "What are you going to do with that sinnaur?" Then another asked, "What is that kutt for?" A third called it hirr; and others styled it successively dhayun, khaidà, and khaital. So the Bedawi thought to himself this must be a very valuable animal, and took it to the market, where he offered it for sale at one hundred dirhems. At this the people laughed, and said, "Knowest thou not, O Bedawi, that it would be dear at half a

GREEN SILK EVENING DRESS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 63-65.

Digitized by Google

dirhem?" He was enraged at having his dream of wealth thus rudely dispelled, and flung it away, exclaiming, "May thy house be ruined, thou beast of many names, but little worth!" The Arabs say that the occasion of the cat's first appearance was as follows: The inhabitants of the ark were much troubled with mice. Noah, in his perplexity, stroked the lion's nose and made him sneeze, whereupon a cat appeared, and cleared off the mice.

SACQUE FOR GIRL FROM 11 TO 13 YEARS OLD.

For pattern, design, and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 66–71.

PALETOT FOR GIRL FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 72–74.

WATER-PROOF CLOAK FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 57–62.

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.

For description see Supplement.

PARIS MODES.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

SHALL we have a complete innovation? shall we simply return to the past? or shall we continue as at present? Such are the questions which are asked, as well in the domain of fashion as in the political world, more closely connected with each other than is generally supposed. When fashions are absurd, politics are mad; this always has been and always will be seen; and it may be affirmed that fashion, in France, is the barometer of politics, for it is that which indicates whether the weather is clear, threatening, or stormy.

Accustomed as I am to interpreting these mysterious characters which strike the eyes of all, and disclose their real meaning to but few, I confess that I am utterly at a loss how to decipher them in circumstances like these. Fashion at this moment takes no decisive stand, but hesitatingly gropes its way along, and finds itself, like Thiers, the President of a republic without having a republic over which to preside. Doubtless this very analogy is an additional confirmation of my doctrine, but it does not permit me to see beyond the present moment, while two years ago I could have predicted the dangers that were menacing France by studying the feminine toilette in all its details: the extravagantly long trains; the dresses composed of packages of costly stuffs and laces piled one above another; the edifices built up of false hair, powder, rouge, copper, glass, straw-work, and gilt jewelry—every thing, in a word, announced mad waste, and tes-

Fig. 1.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 42–51.

Fig. 2.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 75–81.

Fig. 3.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 2 TO 4 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 82–87.

WALKING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 14 TO 16 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1–9.

SUIT FOR BOY FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 27–36.

WATER-PROOF CLOAK FOR GIRL FROM 12 TO 14 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 21–26.

Digitized by Google

tified loudly of the troubled intellect and lack of mental equilibrium of the dominant and governing classes.

It is whispered that a return to the fashions of 1830 is proposed this winter. This would be a very significant symptom. The fashions of that time might very readily bring us back to other things of the same date. I have said, and repeat, that fashion and politics are so closely united that the first universally paves the way for the second. Indeed, if we return to the fashions of 1830, which are much less graceful, it must be owned, than those of the present day, it is because a powerful reactionary party is forming in favor of the institutions of that time. When fashion once takes a decided stand, it rapidly makes proselytes, as will be seen should the projected change become an accomplished fact; and as it needs a certain zeal to be willing to exchange an elegant style for an ungraceful one, from the number of persons who adopt the fashions of 1830, we may infer how many partisans there are of that régime.

The princesses of Orleans, who have not yet taken up their residence in Paris, but who are seen there often, are destined by the force of circumstances to lead the ton this winter; for the feminine portion of the official government of France is not in a condition to take this part of the direction of affairs. Madame Thiers is old and too grave, and has no young ladies in her family who could assume the leadership of fashion. This place, so important through the consequences that it involves, and the influence that it gives over all the innumerable merchants, manufacturers, and tradesmen who minister to the wants of the French dames, as well as of the foreign ladies who always copy after the former, will naturally be filled by this numerous family, which numbers so many elegant and educated women and young girls, well-bred, in the true acceptation of the term, with manners as remote from the pert, fast manners of the girl of the period as from awkward shyness and chilling reserve. The Duc d'Aumale has purchased the magnificent mansion of M. Fould, in the Faubourg St. Honoré; and his brothers, nephews, and nieces will also live there this winter. In a few months we may expect to see Paris very interesting; but every thing is involved in the question, Shall we return to the fashions of 1830?

Two new colors have just been invented—Ashes of Paris and Vendôme Column. The first is a decided and handsome reddish-gray tint; the second is a bronze green. Here again fashion trenches on politics. Hats themselves, in fact, are nothing more than shakos, so high do they tower above the head in true military fashion; wrappings copy the sailor collar and trappings of the fusileers of the marine, in compliment to the French navy, which bore itself so valiantly during the war; and dresses, for the most part, are of cloth in the shades of blue worn by certain regiments that are gratefully remembered as the liberators of Paris. I might go on citing curious resemblances, but there is nothing in all this that enables me to predict the future. In two or three months at most we shall probably know on what to reckon.

The theatres are prospering. After having been so long deprived of them, it is pleasant once more to see the brilliant representations of the Comédie Française, where the artists resume their old repertory with a few new pieces. Here, in Molière's house, as it is proudly called, the most trifling details are studied with the utmost care, and every pains is taken to insure perfection. At this time last year I visited the Théâtre Française under the escort of Mademoiselle Favart and M. Coquelin. The finest ambulance in Paris had just been installed in the magnificent greenroom of the theatre, extending over the façade of the Rue de Richelieu. Mademoiselle Favart, the most charming of cicerones, showed me the linen, the hospital stores, the kitchen, and the beds, neatly ranged in rows, and said, with a sigh, "We shall nurse them all, both the French and the Germans. The last, poor fellows, will be even more to be pitied than our Frenchmen; they will be so far from home." "Yes," said M. Coquelin; "but we shall be bombarded; we shall be in the very centre of the fire." We both repulsed the idea indignantly. It seemed impossible that an enemy should turn his guns on such a Christian work; but we had yet to learn that war sets at naught all civilization and humanity.

It is curious to see the Théâtre Française in one year from that date restored to its original use, and more brilliant than ever, with receipts equaling, if they do not exceed, those of its palmiest days, and to jostle deputies, journalists, and authors in the same greenroom which only last winter was inhabited alone by suffering and death. And may we accept this as a presage that the tide of affairs has changed, and that a new France will arise from the darkness more blooming and prosperous than ever? God grant that it may be so!

A very significant sign of the times is this. A new and rather mediocre piece by M. Barrière was played the other evening at the theatre of the Palais-Royal. The dialogue contained sundry squibs, rather broad and indecorous, but such as used to be applauded often enough fifteen months ago. The audience hissed them down at once, and they were omitted in the second representation. This proves that public taste is changing, and that indecency will no longer be accepted on the Parisian stage. The carnival which has reigned in France for twenty years is over, we hope, and we have returned to habits of order and decorum.

One thing is decided in respect to fashion—namely, that trained dresses will not be worn at all in the daytime. They are provincial, unfashionable, condemned. Long trains are reserved for evening, and short suits will be universally adopted for the street. At most, demi-trains will be allowed for carriages.

Many redingotes, or long casaques, are seen, of cloth and velvet, without trimming or other ornament than an edge of velvet for cloth redingotes, and of satin or fur for velvet ones. Short, loose sacques will be reserved solely for negligée toilettes; they are never dressy, though very convenient, and for this reason may be considered, as it were, the robes de chambre of the street.

Cloth and velvet redingotes will be worn with moiré, faille, and satin dresses of the same color, for the use of two colors in a dress is more than ever avoided; the bonnet itself is made of two or three different shades to match the dress. An effort was made to reduce the gloves to the standard of uniformity, and to wear lilac gloves with lilac dresses, and so on, but the attempt proved a failure.

The article of jewelry most in vogue at this moment is the Alsace-Lorraine ring, composed of a wreath of ivy and myosotis, delicately wrought in gold, and holding the enameled escutcheons of the two provinces. Sleeve-buttons are made to match the ring.

One of the most original winter wrappings that we have seen is the pelerine-mantelet, which is made both in cashmere and in velvet. This is tight-fitting both in the front and back. The fronts are prolonged, forming long, square tabs. Over all is a pelerine or cape of the same stuff, which is sewed in at the neck and shoulders, and falls loosely from them, so as to show the tight-fitting fronts. This garment is trimmed with lace, guipure, and fringe.

The ungraceful water-proof cloaks are replaced by large circulars of water-proof cloth, long and full enough to envelop the whole figure; the top is laid in pleats and gathers, which are concealed under an embroidery of heavy black woolen braid. A sort of mantle of the same kind is made of Scotch plaid, with a border and fringe woven of the stuff; these are prettier, but less convenient and useful, than the former.

Soutache embroidery is found on every article of feminine wearing apparel—on over-skirts, waists, and sleeves; it entirely covers cloth wrappings, and white cashmere opera cloaks are braided all over with white silk soutache.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

TEN IN TEN, ONCE.

THAT was what Fred and I called the rule we had to use in ciphering out our life sums. It was after we had read Hale's charming story of "Ten Times One are Ten," where good was made to work out and increase and multiply. We had to work backward, at least it seemed so, when others could do so much and we so little.

We got thinking about it, especially when our friends the Royals, who lived near by, took Sarah and Mary Rush into their beautiful house and gave them a home. We had all been so sorry for the two girls! Sarah was an invalid needing care, and Mary an overworked teacher with an insufficient salary. So they were struggling along, orphans, with absolutely no other resource than Mary's ten dollars a week, which barely paid board. We all liked them, and all said how sorry we were, and that was the end of it; when suddenly Mrs. Royal, being disappointed about the coming of some expected guests, took the two lovely rooms she had prepared for them, made them lovelier yet, and then, driving out with her husband in their carriage, brought back the two Rush girls and installed them there. They should stay as long as they liked, the Royals said; and, indeed, every one felt that it was little likely Sarah ever would go away again till she went to her long, last home. I went over to see them, and found Mary Rush weeping for sheer relief and gratitude. I told Mrs. Royal her house seemed consecrated for what she had done.

When we first heard of it in our own little family, a neighbor telling the news, I looked at Fred, and he at me.

"Now why couldn't we have done that?" I exclaimed.

"We couldn't," he said, softly; and then I remembered how small our house was, with its one little spare room, often wanted by some passing guest, and how we had no servant, and how much of my time and strength it took to look out for our tricksome two-year-old.

"No, we couldn't," I echoed, more softly still. "But oh, it does seem as if we ought to do something in some way."

We talked it over a good deal after that, Fred and I; and for some time we could think of nothing more than the mission school, and carrying flowers, jelly, and little trifles to some sick people we knew. You see, our means were so small. Such shining, lovely charities as the Royals' seemed out of our reach. We could not take any poor, pining souls off on a glad journey to mountains or sea-shore; we could not put unexpected purses in poor widows' hands, nor pay for any struggling youth's education; we had not even a carriage to take invalids and neglected people out for lovely little drives. There was Fred hard at work all day in the office, and I at home busy as a bee from morning till night with the housekeeping, sewing, and Bertie. But there must be at least one little talent, hid away in our opportunities somewhere, that we could bring out and use in the Master's service.

At last we thought of something. I can remember almost the moment. We had such a good little supper that evening—light biscuit and butter, jelly, hot oysters, and remarkably good tea. Fred was tired and hungry, and enjoyed every thing. But when we had done, there still remained a goodly portion of oysters steaming in the dish, and plenty of every thing else.

"Pity we hadn't had company to tea," said Fred, reflectively.

"Oh dear!" said I, "if we had invited company, I should have had to bake all day, making cake and cookies and tarts, and all such things. That is why I never have tea-parties. I should be all tired out by the time the folks came."

"Just so," replied Fred. "Cake is a folderol, and dyspepsia attends tea-parties. But suppose, girlie, I had brought poor Nevins, our overworked clerk, home to supper with me, or suppose old Mrs. Wynn had been here, or one or two tired young teachers or seamstresses had dropped in, don't you think they would have heartily enjoyed just what we have had, and been all the better for it, and for one of our happy evenings in our little parlor?"

"Yes, indeed!" I cried, catching his idea in the instant. "Fred, you are a blessed boy. We'll do it."

And this was the origin of our Tuesday and Thursday evenings. There was no hard work or fuss about them at all. We just got up a good, relishable little supper, such as we might have had for ourselves, only more of it, and then called in whomsoever Providence threw in our way—sometimes not more than one, sometimes three or four. Fred often brought home poor, careworn Nevins, who starved at a fourth-rate boarding-house, and it heartened him up wonderfully. Now and then I had Kitty Lang to help me sew on Bertie's dresses, and told her to invite any three of the most tired sewing-girls she knew to come to tea and stay the evening. And wasn't it a pleasure to heap up those pale girls' plates with strengthening oysters and chicken, and see them sip delicious tea and chocolate! It fairly brought color into their poor faces. And then in the evening we had games, or I played some of my half-forgotten music, or Fred read poetry aloud to us all; and we coaxed some of the girls to read to us too. We found out in that way that one girl had a beautiful, clear, sympathetic voice for reading; and when I told Mrs. Royal about it, she found a delightful old lady who wanted just such a girl to go with her to the seashore for the whole summer, to be company for her and read to her. Now wasn't that a splendid thing to happen to that worn, delicate girl? and didn't one thing grow out of another beautifully? I don't know what we should have done without the Royals. They put a bright finishing touch on so many things!

Sometimes it was a few hard-working teachers we had; and then in the course of the evening Mrs. Royal and Mary Rush were pretty sure to come in upon us, with glowing cheeks and shining eyes, bringing fruit or flowers, or a great dish of ice-cream; and so, one way or another, our little evenings were a great success. We had teachers pretty often: such young girls, many of them overtasked, and working for such small salaries—brain-work, too, the most exhausting of all. Do you know how many such teachers there are? Reckon them up in your own town; look at city statistics. As many times as I have done it, it always takes me by surprise. And then to think what numbers of applicants there are for every vacant situation! so many girls struggling for ways to support themselves! so many fainting by the way, like Sarah and Mary Rush!

Fred, keeping his eyes open, made the acquaintance of young clerks just beginning on meagre salaries, many of them strangers in the place, and with absolutely no society. It did them as much real good as any one, he argued, to get a taste of home pleasures; so I was never surprised, when our evenings came, to see Fred bringing in with him some bashful clerk or pale student. Then I began to want a romance; why couldn't some of our young clerks fall in love with some of our young teachers or seamstresses? But Fred laughed at the idea, begged me not to mix in sentiment with our little schemes of good, and desired to know what sort of figure poor young Stebbins, for instance, would cut, getting married to one of our bright young teachers, on six dollars a week!

One Tuesday, when I had Kitty Lang to sew, she told me she had invited a new friend to come to tea—not a sewing-girl nor a teacher; in fact, a girl with no business whatever.

"But that, we hope, won't last long," she added, between a sigh and a laugh. "Poor Fanny is trying so hard to get employment; but there is not a single vacancy among the school-teachers, and all the stores where girls clerk are full. She don't know which way to turn."

On inquiring more, Kitty told me that her new friend, Fanny Gray, was an English girl who came to this country with her parents three years before. They had both died soon after, and left her almost destitute. She succeeded in getting a few music-scholars, but earned barely enough to pay board; so after a while she went into a sewing-room and worked there a year, till she found her health was absolutely breaking down, and she had spirit enough left to renounce the needle, and declare her faith that there must be other work in the world a girl could do. Then she found her way to Foxborough, to the great straw-works, and found employment there, sewing braid and wiring hats. She had done well there while the busy season lasted, but now work was slack, and they had dismissed four-fifths of the girls. So she had drifted at last to our little town, with twenty dollars in her purse to keep her till she found something to do.

"And half of that is gone already," said Kitty, "and she has to pay three dollars a week for board. And oh! she is such a nice girl; and I thought maybe you or Mrs. Royal could find something for her."

Alas! not Mrs. Royal, and much less I, could command places for one tithe of the poor girls in our town seeking employment. I had heard of so many cases lately. But Kitty talked on and on, while she stitched at Bertie's blue dress, till by-and-by she had won my whole heart to an interest in her friend. She was so sweet and bright, yet with something sad about her—this was Kitty's description—and she could sing hymns so beautifully, and could do dainty lace-work; and she kept a journal, and she was ready to do any thing for a living, if it was to scrub door-steps; only this one thing—a sewing-girl—she would never again become.

"And I don't blame her!" said Kitty, and her words were accompanied by the little hacking cough which was troubling her of late.

I grew very curious to see this Fanny Gray, and when Kitty, looking from the window, exclaimed, "Here she comes!" and the bell rang, and I went to the door, it was with a real flutter of excitement that I welcomed the one who was destined to become my pet protégée. She had a brave, bonny face, this fair English girl, with soft, yellow hair, and not the usual blue eyes, but eyes of trusty brown—earnest, a little pathetic, maybe. I brought her in at once, and got her things off, and in five minutes more she was sitting in a little low chair playing with Bertie as if she felt at home. Fred came in directly, bringing Nevins, and I flew to set my table. We had one of the coziest little suppers imaginable, and Fred had gone to the extravagance of bananas, for which I pardoned him when Kitty Lang said she never tasted one before in her life, and how delicious they were!

After tea I opened the piano and played a little, preparatory to asking Fanny Gray to sing—for Kitty had said so much about her hymns. She made no apology when I entreated her, but said she knew little besides a few ballads and hymns. She had a sweet, powerful voice, with great expression; and Fred nodded his pleasure to me as she sat there playing her simple accompaniments and singing. She gave us some of the anthems from the prayer-book first, and then took up the dear old psalm:

"As pants the hart for cooling streams,
When heated in the chase;
So longs my soul, O God, for thee,
And thy refreshing grace."

Her voice rose in such pure, thrilling pathos, it seemed as if my heart stopped beating. Poor old Nevins bowed his head in his hands and wept. I suppose he knew well enough in his hard, drudging life what it was to feel like the hart panting for cooling streams.

There was a little pause after the psalm: I think we all had tears somewhere, in our hearts if not our eyes, and did not want to speak. Fanny Gray waited a moment, and then her voice took up that dear, beautiful hymn:

"Come, ye disconsolate, where'er ye languish,
Come to the mercy-seat, fervently kneel;
Here bring your wounded hearts, here bring your anguish:
Earth hath no sorrows that Heaven can not heal."

When this was done she turned round from the instrument and faced us—the quiet, fair young English girl—once more. We all took her into our hearts from that evening.

But what could we find for her to do? No school wanted a teacher, no family a governess, no store a girl for clerk, no lawyer a copyist, no milliner a work-woman; and they had too many hands already, the foremen told me, at the hoop-skirt factory, the book-binderies, and the artificial-flower establishment. The season was dull, and labor a drug in the market. I puzzled my brain over Fanny Gray's case till Fred said, laughing, I would soon become perfect in the law of supply and demand, and the relation of capital to labor, and be able to talk with Ruskin or John Stuart Mill, and all the rest of the political economists. Meanwhile the weeks were slipping by, and with them Fanny's little store of money. At last, in desperation, I told her she could at least save her board-bill by coming to our house to stay till she found some employment, and perhaps she could help me a little about the house, enough to relieve her from obligation; but I could not offer to pay her any thing, because Fred and I had to practice economy, and did not feel able to hire. Well, the girl actually cried for joy at the offer, and came to us the very next morning; and I must say that during the few weeks she staid with me I enjoyed the very poetry of housekeeping. She knew how to do every thing, and had the neatest, deftest ways, and was perfectly splendid in taking care of Bertie. I told Fred that I believed Providence had never meant her to work in a store or factory, but had destined her to be a sunshiny little wife and housekeeper and mother.

On my first baking-day after she came she made me up the most delicious little cakes and tarts that I ever tasted. I told her jestingly she would be a treasure in a bakery; and, seizing the idea, she went out that afternoon without telling me her purpose, and when she came back, said she had found a baker on S—— Street who would engage her at fair wages if she could bring him some satisfactory specimens of fancy baking. The next day we held a high festival in the kitchen, and though I don't think much of cake generally, that day it presented itself to me as a fine art. If you could have seen the display on my shelves when the battle was won! Queen cakes, cocoa-nut drops, cheese cakes (which I had read of in English stories, but never tasted), jelly tarts and cream tarts, trifles and macaroons. My little pantry had never dreamed of such dainties. We selected the nicest-looking of each kind, and when I had borrowed two broad, shallow flower baskets of Mrs. Royal to lay them in, we started forth together to visit the baker. The moment I saw him I took a dislike to him. He did not seem to me like a nice man, and I did not like his manner toward Fanny. But he professed himself satisfied with the samples, and offered her good wages if she would come into the bakery. She would be expected to board in his family. Fanny looked at me as if seeking my opinion, when he named his terms. I took the responsibility of saying that she would like a few days to think the matter over and consult her friends. He showed a little bad spirit then, and said he supposed she applied for the place because she wanted it.

Digitized by Google

When we got home I told Fanny she must not go there; and I think she felt really relieved at my decision, though she had been so anxious to find employment that the failure of this little plan quite disheartened her.

But she had a bit of good luck that very evening. I had told the Royals about her, and Mr. Royal happening to drop in, ? by-and-by got Fanny to sing. He was very much pleased with the quality of her voice, said it was just the thing for a church, and asked her if she had ever sung in a choir.

"I used to do so before we left home," said Fanny, softly; and I fancied there were tears ready to start as she thought of her early village home.

"Very well," said Mr. Royal; "there is a little church, a sort of mission chapel, down town, in whose success I am interested. They need a leading soprano, and, as I have rather looked out for their music, I suppose I have as much right as any one to offer you an engagement. The salary is very small, but every little helps; and would you accept the position, Miss Gray, for a hundred dollars a year?"

"Indeed I would!" she exclaimed; "and be grateful for the chance. It will be a pleasure to me, as well as a great assistance."

So that was settled. I told Fanny she would have enough to clothe herself now; but she did not slacken her search for a steady employment. One day Mrs. Royal came in with a long face, and said she was going to lose her excellent nursery girl, Norah. The girl was to be married in a fortnight. She asked me if I knew any one trustworthy enough for the place.

"I don't consider taking care of children a menial employment," said Mrs. Royal, in her noble way. "If I had not so many duties, I should rejoice to give up my time to them myself. I hate to lose a single one of their sweet smiles and pretty attitudes and baby speeches. And I want to hire some one who looks at them in the same way I do—as priceless little treasures to be trained into good men and good women. You know I have fitted up a pretty little sleeping-room opening off the nursery, and to a person who really satisfied me I would give fifteen dollars a month."

Fanny Gray, who had just been getting Bertie to sleep on the sofa, rose at this, and came forward in her calm, modest way, but with a little tremble in her voice, and said:

"Would I do, Mrs. Royal? Would you take me? Mrs. Brown here will tell you how much I love little children."

"You are just the one, my dear!" exclaimed Mrs. Royal, getting up and kissing her. "And I'll confess that when I mentioned it just now I was in hopes you would hear me and take a fancy to the place. Perhaps I am partial to my own babies, but I do think it must be a great deal nicer and better to take care of them than to work all day in a heated factory, or stand from morning till night in a store—or even make cakes in a bakery!" She said this with an arch smile.

"A great deal better," said Fanny, sensibly. "I think it is happier work, and healthier and more inspiring."

"And you will sing them such sweet lullabies at night!" said Mrs. Royal, with motherly pleasure.

It was agreed, then, that Fanny should go to her in two weeks' time, when Norah left; and for those two weeks, of course, she would remain with me. I began to think Bertie and I would not know what to do without her. While Fanny had been with us, behind all her sweet usefulness and modest dignity, which pleased us so, there seemed always to lie a background of sadness. I had spoken of it to Fred, and said I was afraid she had some mental trouble.

"Oh no," he answered, cheerily; "it is only her anxiety about the future. As soon as she gets a good place, you will see her as merry as a lark."

The good place was found now, and a great deal of the shadow did certainly pass away. I thought Fred had been quite right when I heard her singing through the house, and telling Bertie the most bewitching, joyous little stories. But at twilight, or when she was singing hymns, or when she had been alone and I came upon her unawares, there was a touch of pathos lurking there still, a hint of tears, a look of patience, that went to my heart. I told Fred it seemed just like the way I felt, before we were married, when he had gone off on that long business voyage and I did not hear from him for months, and I believed Fanny had a lover somewhere.

"Nonsense, dear!" said Fred, kissing me. "You are the most romantic little woman on earth, and think more about love than Fanny does, I'll warrant!"

The next Thursday we were expecting Kitty Lang to tea, with two homesick girls she had discovered, who had come up from the country to learn the milliner's trade. Fanny and I flew around making preparations; for I meant to have a delicious chicken salad for supper, biscuit and coffee, and some of Fanny's wonderful cakes and tarts. Every thing came from the stove a perfect success. Bertie was good as a little cherub, and kept his white frock clean all day. Fanny and I finished every thing by three o'clock, and were congratulating ourselves, when suddenly the clouds began to gather, the wind rose to almost a hurricane, and in half an hour the rain was pouring down in torrents.

We said it might be only a shower that would pass off, and so kept hoping till half past five, when the skies seemed blacker than ever, and it was evidently setting in for a wild, stormy night.

"Do you suppose they will come?" I asked Fanny, thinking to myself how many weary blocks away Kitty Lang's boarding-house was.

Fanny shook her head.

"Kitty hasn't any overshoes, I know," she said, "and her umbrella is broken. I don't believe they will come."

And they did not come. We waited and waited, till at last I began to think even Fred himself would not get home, he was so late. But at seven I heard him rushing in at the hall door, and his voice telling some one where to set the umbrella.

"Oh, I hope he has brought Nevins!" I exclaimed, running out.

But it was not Nevins, nor any one I knew; only a red-haired, shrewd-looking boy about fourteen years old, who, Fred explained, had just been taken into the office as an errand-boy, with a chance to work his way up. And Fred added, with a smile, that the little fellow meant to be one of the firm yet.

I don't think I ever saw a smarter boy in my life—a perfect specimen of young America—wide awake, keen, not a bit afraid. If he had been six years older, Fred said afterward, he should not have thought of inviting so self-sufficient a young man to our "Thursday evenings." But, as it was, it was the very courage of the boy that won on his sympathy thinking of all the probable disappointments, temptations, and pitfalls that lay before the unconscious little fellow. His name was Roger. I left him in the sitting-room with Fanny, and hurried to boil my coffee, which I made none the less nice because we had only this little waif to share it with us.

And didn't he enjoy his supper! I have known hosts of boys in my day, but none with a better appetite than Roger! He thought the chicken salad "bully," and regarded Fanny's tarts with especial favor. He got acquainted with the utmost rapidity, and was very ready to tell all about himself, about his widowed mother, how they had lived, and about the bit of property that lay in the bank waiting for him to be twenty-one and go into business. He spoke cheerily of his position as errand-boy, saying,

"If I'm going to climb the ladder, I suppose the right place to begin is at the bottom!"

It rained harder than ever after tea; but we adjourned to the parlor, as usual, to entertain ourselves. Roger seemed pleased with every thing—played with Bertie, whom he called a "cunning little shaver," looked through the stereoscope, examined the albums, and finally sat down opposite Fanny. He seemed to take the greatest fancy to Fanny from the very first, and his eyes were wandering toward her continually. He found she was from England, and then he plied her with questions about what parts of it she had seen, in what county she had lived, and how long since she had left there. She was more amused at his curiosity than offended, and answered him fully, as one would tell stories of long ago to a child.

Fred sat reading his newspaper, and presently called our attention to a curious account, which he read aloud, of a returned soldier looking in vain for his only sister for years. She had heard he was dead, had married, and gone West. The name of her husband he could not learn, nor where she went; and so had searched and inquired throughout the country for three years, without finding any clew, till one day he met her face to face in a little village post-office in some remote part of Michigan.

This led to a conversation on the ways in which friends might be lost to each other, and Roger brightened up. He evidently had a story to tell.

"That is like what has happened to my brother," he said. "May I tell you about it, Sir?"

Fred laid down his paper indulgently to listen, I took my knitting, and Fanny, saddened maybe by the talk about her English home, sat with dreamy, sorrowful eyes, looking off into vacancy.

So Roger began: "You ought to see my brother Phil; he's a splendid fellow. He's only my half-brother, but I love him just as well. He don't look like me: he has black, curly hair, and is real handsome. He's a smart business fellow, too, and he is twenty-nine years old; but he don't get married, because he can't find the girl he's in love with, though he has hunted high and low. You see, the firm he worked for sent him to England three or four years ago to see to some agency, and there, in some little village, he fell in love on a Sunday with a girl that sung in the choir. You ought to hear him tell about her voice, and how pretty she was. He got acquainted, and saw her all he could, and found she was just as nice as he thought for, and he thinks she was beginning to like him a little; anyway, he at last made up his mind to propose to her the very next day, when a telegram came and took him off as quick as a wink to Liverpool; and from there he had to go to Edinburgh, and wait a good while about something; and then he was sent to Paris; and, one way and another, it was two months before he could get back to the village where the girl lived. And then he found that the old folks had taken a sudden notion, and sold out and gone to America, taking his 'little English daisy,' as he called her, without leaving any word or clew by which he could find them. He came back to New York as quick as ever he could, and made all sorts of inquiries, and advertised, but it wasn't any use. And he'd be just about heart-broken if he didn't keep hoping to find her some day. Every time he hears of such a family he hunts them up. He's away off in San Francisco now on business, and I expect he'll search California through before he leaves, thinking she may possibly be there. Isn't it too bad, Mr. Brown? I feel so sorry for him—she was such a nice, pretty girl. I should know her in a minute if I saw her: I am sure I should, for he has told me just how she looks, with smooth, golden hair, you know, and shining, dark brown eyes. I believe I've found her for him now!" he added, excitedly. For the last five minutes his eyes had been eagerly fixed on Fanny, and hers as eagerly on him, and now she turned away and burst into tears.

He sprang toward her. "Say!" he exclaimed. "Fanny Gray, aren't you my brother Phil's Fanny Gray?"

Of course she was! And wasn't it splendid? And didn't I have the romance I wanted to perfection? She, poor child, had thought, perhaps, after all, he did not care for her, because he had gone without speaking; and so she left no message, never dreaming but what he could find them easily enough in America if he wanted to. But she loved him with her whole heart; and that was why, when she realized how hopelessly they were lost to each other, the brooding, wistful, sad, Evangeline look came into her eyes and dwelt there.

A telegram sped to San Francisco the next day, and just as quick as the noble through-train on the Pacific Railroad could bring him, Philip Belton came. I liked him the moment I saw him; and oh! how proud and glad he looked when he had his "little English daisy" in his arms!

Well, of course he wanted to be married right away, and that broke up all the fine plan of Fanny's going to take care of the little Royal children. They had a quiet morning wedding in our parlor, with no guests but the Royals, and Mary Rush and Kitty Lang, and poor old Nevins. Phil's home was in another town, and there he took our Fanny; but I hear from them often, and they are always doing well and always happy. Said I not that Providence had meant Fanny to be a sunshiny little wife and housekeeper and mother!

"And now whom shall I get to take care of my little children?" wondered Mrs. Royal.

"I will!" said Kitty Lang, a flush of resolution coming into her pale face. "I used to think I couldn't do any thing but sew; but I am more sensible now, and know better; and if you will let me come, I will be glad and thankful!"

So poor Kitty found safe harbor at last, for they will never let her leave them. She is growing round and rosy. She never had so comfortable a room in her life before, she says, and she really feels that she is improving every day in mind and heart among those dear children.

Fred and I still keep up our Tuesday and Thursday evenings, and I hope a great many more good results will spring from them. After wishing in vain that we could do the great things that we can't, it is really an exquisite happiness to grow content, and begin to do all the little things that we can. Ones are as necessary as tens, and "All service ranks the same with God!"

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

"MOSQUITOES," remarks a recent writer, "are a trifle smaller than a humming-bird, and as musical as a sewing-machine." This graphic description is pleasing or otherwise according to the way you view it. Perhaps your mind instantly reverts to the tiny flutterer who every morning while you lingered in the country came with wonderful regularity to extract the sweets from the flowers beneath your window, and whose bewildering movements you watched with delight. But if you have battled half the night with those huge, blood-thirsty creatures who retreat only to renew the attack with fresh vigor, who are never conquered till death, you will take no poetic view of the subject. There are few things more vexatious than to lie in bed, weary and sleepy, listening to mosquitoes warbling in the distance, and silently waiting the gradual approach of that hideous humming, hoping that when the song ceases a dextrous slap will end it forever. Alas! the blow falls on your defenseless face, and afar off you hear the note of victory. The mosquitoes of summer are bad enough, but the stalwart October veterans are renowned for ferocity. They enjoy a fight, and their bills pierce like Damascus steel. Nothing but the strongest and most carefully arranged net affords any protection. Then they spend the night in vain assaults upon the fortifications, uttering ceaseless notes of discomfiture and revenge.

During the recent trial in France of the women called petroleuses some small circumstances appeared which showed that, evil as they were, they were not the unmitigated fiends that popular imagination represented them. It was admitted that they were tools in the hands of men more guilty than themselves; that they had assisted in succoring the wounded; on the trial each sought to conceal the guilt of her companions; and during the prosecutor's speech three of them sank down sobbing pitifully. Some traces of good remained even in them.

The Wesleyan University of Middletown, Connecticut, opened with a Freshman class numbering fifty-one. There were no "Freshwomen," although the announcement had been made that they would be admitted on the same conditions as men.

In dress, colors should be harmonious and becoming. One tint should prevail, relieved by a contrasting tint. No amount of fashionable prestige can make an unbecoming color becoming. Nile green will turn some people into oranges, though twenty empresses ordain its adoption. Dress should supplement good points and correct bad ones, and what suits one person does not suit another, for that reason. Lines should be continuous, graceful, and feminine. It is better to look like a woman (if you happen to be one) than like any thing else—even a fashion plate! Ornament must be subordinate. To see a little woman adorned with an immense breastpin or an enormous pair of earrings is simply absurd. And, of course, only genuine jewels should be worn. Scrupulous neatness is essential in a woman's dress. Soiled gloves, collars, and cuffs, and shabby boots, indicate wrong habits. If one can not afford kid gloves and lace collars, wear cotton gloves and linen collars, only let them be clean and fit neatly. It has been said, with some truth, that individuality in dress is the rarest and yet the cheapest thing in the world. There is something very pleasant in connecting a certain color, some special fancy in dress, or an individual style of arranging the hair with a particular friend, provided she is tasteful. But it is surely very little worth one's while blindly to follow a prevailing style, regardless whether it is suitable and becoming. The word "stylish," as some one remarks, "has slain its thousands."

At the close of the investigation of the case of Miss Doolittle, who recently died from the effects of chloroform in a dentist's office in Brooklyn, the jury returned the following verdict: "That the deceased came to her death by the use of chloroform, producing paralysis, or stopping the action of the heart; and while we would exonerate the attending physician from any blame under the circumstances, we would urge the disuse of chloroform except in the most severe cases, which might require the agency of so powerful an anæsthetic."

The new census of 1870 is to be utilized by being incorporated in new editions of various gazetteers and books of reference.

Queen Victoria has of late years declined to receive books or presents of any kind, as a general thing. In rare cases, where gifts have been accepted, she has only ordered a formal acknowledgment. She lately made a notable exception to this rule, when a little volume was presented to her containing a full report of the speeches delivered at the banquet given in New York by Mr. Cyrus W. Field to her Britannic Majesty's Commissioners on the conclusion of the Treaty of Washington. The report was edited by a London literary man who happened to be present at the banquet. The queen took a great interest in the volume, and directed her secretary especially to return her thanks to Mr. Field.

Boston clergymen and their wives, as well as the public school teachers of that city, have been furnished with season tickets to the Citizens' Course of lectures by a benevolent gentleman.

Among the interesting apparatus on exhibition at the American Institute fair are a huge Ruhmkorf's coil, by which, with the connecting battery, a spark may be thrown a foot distant having three times the power necessary to destroy human life; a magnet weighing 1500 pounds, said to be the most powerful in the world; an admirably constructed working model of a marine engine, with feathering paddles, worked by compressed air; a model in brass of a torpedo of curious construction; a model of the celebrated Stevens Battery; and the works of the engine of the first steamer that sailed the waters of the Hudson. These contributions were all made by the Stevens Technological Institute of Hoboken.

Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise seems likely to have Bibles enough for her private and family use, although some of them come rather late as wedding presents. A few weeks ago an elegant copy of the Scriptures was given to the Princess "on the occasion of her marriage, by the Church of England Sunday-schools of the United Kingdom."

A vegetable wonder, in the form of a most extraordinary potato, is on exhibition in Castleton, Isle of Man. It has been dubbed "Miss Murphy, the real Irish Girl." It is of a blue color, and the head and body, eyes, nose, ear-rings, and chignon, are as perfect as possible. The limbs are well formed, and the figure carries in its arms a cluster of little potatoes.

Colporteurs are selling Testaments in the streets of Rome without molestation; and on the Corso a Bible Society has opened a shop.

Maine has already commenced raising a crop of ice. At Bangor last week ice was formed half an inch thick.

Persia is still suffering from a combination of horrors. In a single province 8000 persons have perished from famine; 40,000 of the inhabitants have been carried into slavery by the Afghans; insurrections prevail; inundations overspread the country, and the government is doing nothing.

Correspondents from Paris represent the condition of the female Communist prisoners as most forlorn. Every male prisoner has some one who brings him food or money, but hardly one woman in ten receives any visits. It has often been said that there is never a man so bad but what some woman believes in him. It is certain that there is no man so degraded but what some woman is willing to sacrifice herself to him, and to give him what comfort she can. But these miserable women seem utterly deserted. The men who know them, and for whom they have done so much, afford them no sympathy. When the men have money, they spend it on themselves. When the women have managed to conceal a little money, their only anxiety is as to how to convey it to the men to whom they wish to give it; and by these it is received without the slightest gratitude—often, indeed, with a grumble because it is not more. "Certainly," remarks one writing on this subject, "there are abysses of infamy into which women will fall; but in every abyss, however unfathomable, there is yet a lower depth, and in that depth one may generally find a man." It does appear often to be the case that the sufferings of women are less sympathized with than those of men, and that where retribution is dealt out to sinners of both sexes, it is the women on whom it falls heaviest.

An English invention is a novel description of water-proof paper, which may be grained or printed in an ornamental way, and be used for table covers and various other purposes.

Fifty thousand persons have left the port of Liverpool during the last three months—a fact which would indicate that restless discontent is prevailing among the masses in England.

Digitized by Google

HE CELL OF E CENCI.

we see the painter Guido the ill-starred Beatrice en admitted to paint the a is still preserved in the ne, and which multiplied endered familiar to our s just finished the pic- ding on a shelf, and is and palette as he gazes sorrow-laden face which

GUIDO IN THE CELL OF BEATRICE CENCI.

for a political demon- to a simple token of re- n.

THIMBLES.

, the first mention we little household imple- kelton, a satirical En- ie early part of the six- sion makes sure of their ate, but they must have d accounted a luxury. Doubtless some of the gentry of those times were, as now, "fuller of vain desires than means to meet them," for our poet says:

"Some went so narrow
They laid to pledge they'r wharrow,
They'r rib-skin and they'r spindell,
They'r nedel and they'r thimbel."

In the list of wares taken to America by the party of gentlemen adventurers and merchants appointed by Sir Walter Raleigh, and to whom were granted large concessions under his patent, we find them, with other enumerated "means of traffic." "The 24 likewise we sold—bels—sheetes, and thimbles, and took two l's one ounce and a quarter of gold."

From the writings of Beaumont and Fletcher we learn that "a traveling tailor, by the mystery of his nedel and thimble, surveyed the fashions of the French and English."

Dryden, too, who died in 1701, alludes playfully to their form "Yes, and measure for measure, too, Sosia—that is, for a thimbleful of gold, a thimbleful of love!"

It is recorded that we are under obligations to the Dutch for the invention of thimbles; but after a time, in 1695, an establishment was set up in England by John Lofting, who, at Islington, near London, "making them of different metals, secured for himself a business of much profit."

They may have been fashioned with grace and elegance before, but we are sure that at this period they were made the subject of the graver's touch, and doubtless esteemed a gift worthy the acceptance of such as

"wrought right daintily
With fairy flosses and gay satin threads;"

for Pope, living at this time, mentions one, where,

"Upon the bottom shines the queen's bright face,
A myrtle foliage round the thimble-case."

Thimbles have been manufactured of bone, ivory, and porcelain, but only for ornamental purposes; where strength or force is required, those of silver, silver and steel, or brass have been selected. Great numbers are now made of rubber, moulded to shape, receiving at the regular thimble-manufactories the indentations necessary to completion. They are recommended for strength and durability, and if gold-leaf ornamentation is added, they must really be very pretty.

The process of MM. Rouy & Berthier, Paris, is much commended; but as their method of manufacture differs from that most approved in this country, it seems not best to go into detail respecting it. There are marked points of resemblance—strength, beauty, durability—for which due credit must be allowed; but we confess to a partiality for home manufactures, and have endeavored to investigate in a direction amply sufficient to give all needed information. In pursuance of this, note of introduction in hand, we visited a large thimble-manufacturing establishment, where intricacies were intelligently explained, and great latitude of observation and question kindly granted.

First, we were shown bars or lengths of silver about two inches wide and one-twenty-fourth of an inch in thickness. These had already, by several processes, been made sufficiently thin, and ready for the Second step, by which a punch-press was made to cut from these thin strips pieces of regular form, about the size of a half dollar.

Thirdly. By machinery specially adapted the rim was turned up, an edge was formed, and the small "finger-hut," as the Germans call it, at this stage looked not unlike a shallow box-cover.

Another press now secures the peculiar tapering shape; the edge is now turned over and made fast, thus presenting a firm, cord-like border.

Another machine now receives it, and while the lathe is turning rapidly, the operator, sitting just in front, applying with his hand a delicate, mallet-shaped instrument, presently leaves upon the hitherto smooth surface the indentations, or, as one has prettily called them, "the dimples." Commencing at the top, the central dent is made, the radiations gradually increasing until "the roof" is finished. The same process applied to the upper part of the barrel of the thimble completes it as a protection from needle-heads.

Just at this point music was heard. No instrument seemed in sight, and looking inquiringly, I was assured by the gentlemanly proprietor that it was directly before me. "Sometimes," he added, "the notes are very clear; it depends much upon the rapidity of the motion. Where the rapidity is slight the tone is deep, almost guttural; as the velocity increases the tones become fainter, higher, sweeter. One artisan with us was such an adept in this movement that two entire strains could be brought out distinctly while he was indenting one thimble." Here, surely, were "strains of silvery sweetness," and "the poetry of motion."

Finishing and polishing now followed; and, if desired, the engraver plies his delicate art, bringing out in tender outline and dainty tracery fairy-like leaves and buds, minute castles, or heraldic devices. A blank is left for the monogram. Usually only gold thimbles are thus elaborately ornamented, but sometimes we find silver ones so adorned.

The "open-tops"—such as are used by tailoresses and needle-men—bear only a small proportion to the whole number brought into market.

From first to last each thimble passes through at least twenty different hands.

Sail-makers, and others doing heavy sewing, use, in lieu of these comfortable, bell-shaped tools, circular plates of cast iron, indented, or pitted, on the surface, called palms. They are fastened securely to the hand by straps.

Digitized by Google

At the establishment we visited gold and silver thimbles only are made —none "gold-lined," as by the Parisian firm mentioned, but wholly of the precious metal; and very beautiful and exquisitely finished were the scores of them brought out for inspection. The greater part of the silver ones were plain, for the every-day market.

There are, we learn, manufactories in Philadelphia and other cities; and in Connecticut, we are told, thimbles "are turned out by the bushel." They are a cheap article, and not, it is said, specially pleasant to the touch or reliable for use.

Swiss Muslin Fichu.

This fichu is made of white Swiss muslin, and trimmed with lace insertion, side-pleated strips, and a revers collar of fine linen. Cut of Swiss muslin one piece from Fig. 39, Supplement, and of a double layer of linen two pieces from Fig. 40, and one piece from Fig. 41. Trim the fichu with lace insertion as shown by the illustration, cut away the material underneath the insertion, and fasten the edges carefully. Then trim the outer edge with a side-pleated strip of Swiss muslin an inch and three-quarters wide, which is edged with narrow lace, and set on the linen collar and revers according to the corresponding figures. Finish with a colored silk bow in front.

Fig. 1.—Muslin, Insertion, and Lace Collar.—Front.

For pattern and description see Suppl., No. XIX., Fig. 89.

Insertion and Lace Fichu-Collar.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XX., Fig. 90.

Fig. 2.—Muslin, Insertion, and Lace Collar.—Back.

For pattern and description see Suppl., No. XIX., Fig. 89.

Linen and Lace Collar.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVIII., Fig. 88.

Cambric Apron for Girl from 5 to 7 Years old.

For pattern see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 15-19.

Cambric Apron for Girl from 5 to 7 Years old.

This white cambric apron is trimmed with needle-work insertion an inch wide and side-pleated strips of the material an inch and a quarter wide. Cut one piece each from Figs. 15 and 17, Supplement, and two pieces each from Figs. 16, 18, and 19; join the back and fronts according to the corresponding figures (in doing this pay no attention to the signs on the shoulders), make a hem an inch wide on the bottom, and edge the apron with a side-pleated cambric strip an inch and a quarter wide, covering the seam with the needle-work insertion. After facing the apron where the piece is cut out for the sleeves with a strip of the material half an inch wide, finish the pockets and trimming pieces with insertion and side-pleated strips, as shown by the illustration; sew the pieces on the apron according to the corresponding figures, and set a row of insertion on the neck. To fasten the tabs sew loops on the two points of the front of the trimming, and buttons on the upper edge of the pockets, and trim the apron with bows of narrow colored ribbon. Narrow silk ribbons serve to tie the apron.

Linen Apron for Girl from 5 to 7 Years old.

This gray linen apron is trimmed with tabs of the material and with a braiding of white soutache. Cut the apron from Figs. 15 and 16 of No. III. of the present Supplement, but only to the straight line indicated, without the shoulders. For the tabs, cut two pieces each from Fig. 20, Supplement, trim them with braiding as shown by the illustration, work the outer edge in button-hole stitch, and sew them on the apron according to the corresponding signs. The pattern of the design is given in the Supplement, but any of the braiding patterns illustrated on page 676 may be substituted for it. Black soutache may be used instead of white.

Swiss Muslin Fichu.

For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 39-41.

FREAKS OF MEMORY.

MEMORY is nearly as much a puzzle as ever. Why in some men memory should be strong and in others weak; why the memory should be stronger at one time than another; why the same man should have a strong memory for some subjects and a weak one for others; why illness should obliterate some subjects completely from the mind—are problems still undergoing patient and attentive scrutiny.

The memory for figures, or power of mental calculation, is well known to all of us, either by its presence or its absence. George Watson, the Sussex calculator, could tell the dates of every day since he was a child, and what he was doing on that day; he could show many other strange freaks of memory, but was a heavy, ignorant fellow generally, very vain of his one acquirement.

The memory of languages is quite a distinct faculty, so far as can be judged from recorded instances. Cardinal Mezzofanti appears to have had this faculty in a stronger degree than any other person that ever lived. While educating for the priesthood, he learned Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, Spanish, French, German, and Swedish. As a professor at some of the Italian universities, he constantly added to his store, until at the age of forty-three he could read in twenty languages, and converse in eighteen. In 1841, when he was sixty-seven years old, he was as well acquainted with Portuguese, English, Dutch, Danish, Russian, Polish, Bohemian, Servian, Magyar, Turkish, Irish, Welsh, Wallachian, Albanian, Bulgarian, Illyrian, Lettish, Lappish, as with the languages which he had first learned; while to Arabic he added Persian, Sanscrit, Koordish, Georgian, Syriac, Chaldee, Samaritan, Chinese, Coptic, Ethiopic, Abyssinian, and other Asiatic and African tongues. At the time of his death, in 1849, Mezzofanti could write eloquently, and converse fluently, in more than seventy languages.

One kind of retentive memory may be considered as the result of sheer hard work, a determination toward one particular achievement, without reference either to cultivation or to memory on other subjects. This is frequently shown by persons in humble life in regard to the Bible. An old beggarman at Stirling, known some forty years ago as Blind Alick, afforded an instance of this. He knew the whole of the Bible by heart; insomuch that, if a sentence were read to him, he could name book, chapter, and verse; or, if the book, chapter, and verse were named, he could give the exact words. A gentleman, to test him, repeated a verse, purposely making one verbal inaccuracy; Alick hesitated, named the place where the passage is to be found, but at the same time pointed out the verbal error. The same gentleman asked him to repeat the ninetieth verse of the seventh chapter of the book of Numbers. Alick almost instantly replied, "There is no such verse; that chapter has only eighty-nine verses."

There are no phenomena of memory more strange than those in which—usually through some illness, or some accidental injury to the brain—some particular facts or classes of facts baffle the recollection altogether. One

Linen Apron for Girl from 5 to 7 Years old.

For pattern and design see Suppl., No. IV., Fig. 20.

Fig. 1.—Velvet Paletot.—Front.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 10-14.

Crêpe de Chine and Lace Fichu.

For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—Velvet Paletot.—Back.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 10-14.

Digitized by Google

E. RIMMEL,

PERFUMER,

PARIS, LONDON, BRUSSELS.

THE AMERICUS CLUB BOUQUET,

The Perfume of the Season.

JOCKEY CLUB,
WHITE ROSE,
MUSK,
IHLANG IHLANG,
&c., &c., &c., &c.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Special Representatives for United States,
EDWARDES & RUSSELL, 38 Vesey St., N. Y.

FANS.

TIFFANY & CO.,

UNION SQUARE,

NOW OFFER A CHOICE ASSORTMENT OF FANS, FINE LACE TOPS, WITH CARVED PEARL STICKS, INLAID WITH GOLD AND COLORS. SOMETHING ENTIRELY NEW.

PATENT

Eider-Down Corsets.

WORN BY

QUEEN VICTORIA & PRINCESS OF WALES.

Newest French shapes. Support and add grace to the figure. Warm, light, and elegant. Prevent chills and preserve health. Maintain agreeable warmth, comfort, and equal temperature.

Eider-Down—Lightest, Warmest, and Softest of Downs.

Material in Scarlet, Bismarck, Dove, and White.

"The Eider-Down Corsets are alike excellent in principle and practice. They guard against undue temperature, either hot or cold, most efficiently, and, in addition, they are soft, very light, and flexible. I believe them, therefore, to be infinitely superior to the form of Corset in ordinary use."—W. TINDAL ROBERTSON, M.D.

Sole Agents, ERSKINE & CO.,
M'f'rs & Importers of Lace, Muslin, & Crape Goods,
St. Nicholas Hotel, 523 Broadway, N. Y.

STRASBURGER & PFEIFFER,

(Successors to Strasburger, Fritz, & Pfeiffer),

IMPORTERS OF GERMAN, FRENCH, AND ENGLISH

TOYS,

China & Fancy Goods,

BOHEMIAN GLASS and LAVA WARES,

MUSIC BOXES, ACCORDEONS, HARMONICAS, CONCERTINAS, &c., &c.,

394 Broadway, near Canal St., N.Y.

Parlor Ornaments, latest novelties in Toys, Fancy and Ornamental Goods constantly arriving to supply the general demand.

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES

NOW THE FASHION.

24 inches long, weight 2¼ oz., only $5.
28 inches long, weight 2½ oz., only $6.
30 inches long, weight 2¾ oz., only $7 50.
32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9.

Only importer who retails, CHAS. V. PECKHAM,
687 Broadway, near Amity St., and
251 Grand St., corner Chrystie.

By mail on receipt of sample and price, or by express, C. O. D.

NILSSON BOUQUET.

THE NEW PERFUME

FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.

C. B. WOODWORTH & SON, ROCHESTER, N. Y., and
335 BROADWAY (Room 18), NEW YORK.

HOW SHALL I TRIM MY DRESS?—Send 50 cts. to Geo. H. Field, 15 New Church St., New York, for 10 Patterns of Dress Trimmings, Latest Styles.

C. WORCH, destroyer of
MOTHS IN FURNITURE.

The only reliable remedy for vermin of this kind.
110 Fourth Avenue, New York.

STARR & MARCUS,

No. 22 JOHN ST.

(UP STAIRS), N. Y.,

MAKE A SPECIALTY OF THE

GORHAM M'F'G COMPANY'S

STERLING SILVER-WARE.

Especial attention is requested to the many new and elegant pieces manufactured expressly to our order the past year, and quite recently completed.

An unusually attractive assortment of novelties in fancy silver, cased for wedding gifts, of an inexpensive character.

The works of the Gorham Company are very extensive, enabling them to employ the most accomplished talent in designing, skill in producing, and the best labor-saving machinery and method of manufacture, thus reducing the cost and bringing these beautiful wares within the reach of almost every purchaser.

The standard of this Silver is that of British Sterling, 925-1000.

DIRECT FROM ROME.

—

Roman Sashes,

SCARFS AND TIES.

—

New Goods, Just Opened.

—

UNION ADAMS & CO.,

No. 637 Broadway.

Excelsior Waterproof Cage Mat

Keeps cages clean and free from vermin. 2 Pkgs. to any address, 50 cts. (prepaid), 12 Mats in a Pkg. Send inside measurement of cage. They are vermin-proof. Ask for this Mat, and take no other of the Druggists and House-furnishers. Manufacturers' depots, 269½ Pearl St., N. Y.; 414 Arch St., Philadelphia.

Satisfaction GUARANTEED. Star-Spangled Banner enlarged, size of Ledger. Please send your address and receive copies FREE. 75 cents a year; 3 months for 10 cents. Address BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

$250 A Month easily made with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Secure Circular and Samples, free. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are exhibiting

AN ELEGANT ASSORTMENT

of

POINTE GAZE, APPLIQUE, AND CHANTILLY

SHAWLS, OVER-DRESSES, JACKETS,

BASQUES, PARASOL COVERS,

CAPES, FICHUS, FLOUNCES, HANDKERCHIEFS,

BARBES, COLLARS, &c.

BRIDAL TROUSSEAUX,

consisting of a

POINTE FLOUNCE, GARNITURE SET,

PARASOL COVER, AND FAN,

from $450 to $2500.

Also, a large variety of

CHANTILLY, GUIPURE, VALENCIENNES,

POINTE GAZE, AND APPLIQUE TRIMMING

LACES,

Comprising the largest, richest, and cheapest lot of Laces ever shown in this city.

—

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH & 10TH STS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,

Broadway and Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

GRAND EXPOSITION,
FALL, 1871.

HAVE OPENED THEIR FALL AND WINTER NOVELTIES IN PARIS-MADE SUITS.

RICHLY EMBROIDERED CAMEL'S-HAIR AND CACHEMIRE COSTUMES.

VELVET SACQUES AND POLONAIS.

EMBR'D CLOTH SACQUES, FOR STREET AND HOUSE WEAR.

SEAL-SKIN SACQUES.

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S FURS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

—

RICH LACES.

—

RICH FALL AND WINTER SILKS.

—

BLACK SILKS.

—

VELVETS
in all the CLOTH SHADES.

—

VELVET RIBBONS.

—

FALL AND WINTER DRESS FABRICS.

—

ROBES DE CHAMBRE.

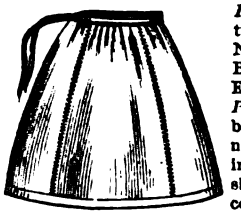
—

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street.

TRADE-MARK.

"RUSSIAN GORED KNIT UNDERSKIRT,"

A NEW ARTICLE,



Invented and manufactured exclusively by the NORFOLK & NEW BRUNSWICK HOSIERY CO., upon their Patented Knitting Looms, being superior to flannel, much lighter, perfect in shape, and will not shrink nor change in color from washing.

ALSO,

FULL-FASHIONED HOSIERY,

consisting of

Ladies', Gents', Misses', and Boys' Underwear, of every description, superior in quality and style to any goods made in this country, and fully equal to the best hand-loom imported goods, and at greatly reduced prices.

Full lines for sale, to the jobbing trade only, at H. J. LIBBY & CO.'S, 47 & 49 White St., N. Y.

NICOL & DAVIDSON, 686 Broadway,

Are receiving Novelties from Paris and London in

REAL BRONZES, COMPOSITION BRONZES, BISQUE GOODS,
FRENCH CHINA DINNER, DESSERT, AND TEA SERVICES,
VASES, PARIAN STATUARY (from Minton), MANTEL SETS,
GLASSWARE (from Baccarat),
GLASS CHANDELIERS (from Osler), SHEFFIELD TABLE CUTLERY, &c., &c.
ALSO, OF OWN MANUFACTURE,
GAS FIXTURES and FINE SILVER-PLATED WARE.

ESTB. 1809.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO

For General Household Purposes,

BETTER & CHEAPER THAN SOAP.

Cleans windows, scours knives and table ware, removes stains and rust, and is the very best thing ever used for general house cleaning. For sale by all good Grocery and Drug Stores. Wholesale, 211 Washington St., N. Y.

YOUTH

The bloom and freshness of youth is perpetuated by using DEVERNA'S PERSIAN SPRAY. It is the only preparation that is perfectly free from all mineral ingredients, and its wonderful restorative qualities in healing the diseased tissues of the skin, and removing every excrescence, renders it an indispensable accessory to the toilet of every lady. Sold by all Drug and Fancy Stores.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

CARBOLIC HEALING COMPOUND C.S. SALVE.

Beautifies the complexion by removing Pimples and all other disagreeable disorders of the skin. Twenty-five cents per box.

JOHN F. HENRY, Sole Proprietor.
No. 8 College Place, New York.

RIFLES, Shot-Guns, Revolvers, Gun Material. Write for Price-List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents wanted.

Digitized by Google

THE BEAVER BRAND.

TRADE MARK PAT'D.

SILK-FINISHED

BLACK PURE MOHAIRS.

These GOODS are finished alike on both sides, and are distinguished for their silky appearance, brilliant lustre, and pure shade of fast Black. Being made of the very finest material, they positively excel all other Mohairs ever sold in the United States.

These splendid Goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

☞ Purchasers will know these Goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Beaver, precisely like the above.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 & 429 Broadway, New York,
Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy; THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	No.	26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	"	30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	"	38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	"	40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	"	46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	"	48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	"	1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	"	5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	"	11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	13
POSTILION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	15
SHORT-SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	17
LADY'S TRAVELING SUIT	"	21
MISS'S POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 7 to 15 years old)	"	23
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)	"	25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)	"	27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)	"	29
BOY'S BLOUSE, SHIRT-WAIST, and KNICKERBOCKERS (for Boy from 4 to 9 years old)	"	31
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)	"	33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt)	"	35
MARGUERITE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	37
LOUIS XIV. POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	39
VEST-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	41
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER	"	42

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

We make only one style, and have but one price for our Pianos, which are all made from thoroughly seasoned and kiln-dried materials, and have seven octaves—rose wood case—carved legs and lyre—large square grand overstrung scale—front round corners—carpentine bottom—iron plate—French action—and are all warranted five years. We have no agents, and allow no commissions or discounts to any one. This explains how we can sell a good Piano for $290, which is about the price Piano dealers pay to manufacturers for instruments similar to ours. Piano dealers are allowed by all manufacturers, except ourselves, to add 100 per cent., and upward, profit to all sales. This the public can prove by investigation to be strictly true. Piano dealers, teachers, professors, and everybody else, are excluded from any and every possibility of a single cent of commission on our Pianos. If you wish a Piano sent for trial, you must make the matter of reference and payment unquestionable; and if the instrument is in any respect inferior to any Piano made in the known world at any price, you may send it back to us at the end of ten days' trial, instead of paying for it. If you order a Piano sent, we have one request to make; and that is, that the trial shall be made by parties who are not interested in other Pianos. Please send for our Circulars containing full particulars and references to bankers, merchants, and families, in thirty-five States and Territories, who are using our Pianos. Address or apply to the UNITED STATES PIANO CO., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

JUST OUT:

The Saturday New-Yorker.

A lively, gossipy, chatty, high-toned Society newspaper. Brimful of news, pure in tone, and chaste in appearance. Price FIVE CENTS. Sold by all dealers.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

MEDICAL MADNESS.

Let us hope that the insane practice of administering poisonous evacuants in cases of indigestion, biliousness, constipation, and female debility, is almost out of date. When the Tonic-Cathartic produced by Nature herself in the most valuable Sanitary Spring in the world is reproduced by science, in the form of it is indeed midsummer madness to rack, relax, and irritate the diseased or enfeebled system with drastic purgatives. This refreshing and delicious counterpart of a remedy prepared by the creative hand of the Omnipotent Physician himself is every where superseding the nauseous and sickening compounds heretofore used as laxatives.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT,

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

NEW YORK CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,

The oldest and best Music School in the country,
NOW OPEN FOR PRIVATE AND CLASS INSTRUCTION
In all branches of Vocal and Instrumental Music, Harmony and Composition, and the Modern Languages.
All Applications for Admission must be made at the
GENERAL CONSERVATORY OFFICES,
820 BROADWAY, near 12th St., over the Music Store.
(The branch at No. 82 Fifth Avenue removes up town.)
BROOKLYN BRANCH, 102, 104, & 106 COURT ST., near State.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns,

For Ladies, Misses, Girls, and Children of Both Sexes.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Our business will be conducted in a spirit of progress. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue of 28 pages, containing over two hundred figures, showing the leading fashions of the day. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, ranging from 30 to 46 inches bust measure; also for misses from 10 to 16 years of age, and for children of both sexes under 10. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent to any address free of charge. A good, active Agent wanted in every town and city in the United States for the sale of the Bazar Patterns. For terms to Agents, orders for Patterns, or any business pertaining to the Bazar Patterns, address

JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
548 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—Read the following extraordinary offer: The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Co. manufacture and warrant two different Sewing Machines, one called the Elliptic, the other called the Wheeler & Wilson. The Elliptic Machine excels in many important points. It is so light that a child can run it with ease; or an invalid, whose strength is sufficient to walk about the house or to do the work of a child ten years old, can sew all day without being overfatigued. It is impossible to convey by language a tithe of the merits belonging to this deservedly popular Machine. To see it perform the different operations, such as hemming, felling, gathering, embroidering, tucking, cording, frilling, quilting, fringing, etc., it seems more like a thing of life than a machine moved by the will of the operator. It has adjustable guages for every description of work, and can be changed in a moment to suit any material, coarse or fine. The economy of the Elliptic Machine in a family is almost incredible—with one, a good operator can do the work of twelve hands. A breadth of a skirt can be sewed in less than a minute; a gentleman's fine shirt can be made in three hours; or a child's dress, with many tiny pleats, in less time than the hands can fold them—in fact, every description of sewing is reduced from a question of hours to one of minutes. We make the following offer: Any person in the United States desiring one of these celebrated Machines can buy one and pay for it in work furnished at their own home. The work is pleasant and profitable, and can be accomplished by any lady, old or young. We send circulars free on application. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the offer has no parallel, and will, we trust, benefit hundreds and thousands of families. Send for Circulars. Address

ELLIPTIC SEWING MACHINE CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA,
with the Green-Tea Flavor. Warranted to suit all tastes. For sale everywhere. And for sale wholesale only by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 8 Church St., N.Y. P.O. Box 5506. Send for Thea-Nectar Circular.

GLYCERINE CAKE.

ROWLLE'S TOILET GLYCERINE CAKE is unequaled for Washing, Shaving, Shampooing, Tooth Soap, and Baby Wash; produces a clear, soft, white skin, and prevents pimples and chapping. Warranted over one-half pure Glycerine. For sale by druggists. MARX & ROWLLE, Manufacturers of Glycerine, 179 William St., New York.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, AND ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

INFANT'S WARDROBE "C"

FOR $125.

2 Flannel Bands	@	$0 62½	$1 25
2 Barrie Coats	@	2 50	5 00
3 Flannel Skirts, Embr'd	@	5 00	15 00
2 Cambric "	@	2 00	4 00
2 " "	@	3 00	6 00
6 Linen Shirts	@	1 00	6 00
6 Night Dresses	@	2 25	13 50
2 Day "	@	5 50	11 00
6 Slips	@	3 00	18 00
1 Calico Wrapper			1 50
1 Robe			9 00
1 Basket, completely furnished			10 00
6 Pairs Knitted Shoes	@	75	4 50
1 Embroidered Merino Shawl			6 50
1 Val. Lace Cap			7 50
1 "Eureka" Diaper			1 00
A Set of Linen Diapers			2 50
1 Rubber Bib			50
3 Quilted Bibs	@	75	2 25
			$125 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent, C. O. D., by Express. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials.

LORD & TAYLOR,

BROADWAY & TWENTIETH ST.,
NEW YORK.

Figures will not lie!

How Large Fortunes are made!

☞ FACTS FOR THE PEOPLE. ☜

☞ SEE the prices at which four of the leading Sewing Machines are sold in the UNITED STATES, and ENGLAND.

	Price in England.	In the U. S.
Wheeler & Wilson	$45.00	$85.00
New Singer - -	32.50	65.00
Elias Howe - -	35.00	65.00
Wilson Shuttle -	40.00	45.00

The above Prices are for exactly the same classes of machines as sold in both Countries. There is scarcely any difference in the cost of material and labor in any of the above named machines.

☞ AFFIDAVIT.—W. G. Wilson, President of the Wilson Sewing Machine Co., personally appeared before me, and made oath that the above prices are correct, and taken by him from Circulars published in the United States and England under the corporate names of the Companies manufacturing said machines. FRED. SMITH,
Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas of Cuyahoga Co., O.

The WILSON SEWING MACHINES are for Sale in most every County in the United States, and
No. 707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

WICKES'
ECLECTIC OIL

Is Pure, Safe, Sweet, and Economical.
J. H. WICKES,
120 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

For particulars, address AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers, 331 Pearl St., New York.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 50 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

NAST'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC FOR 1872. With nearly 150 Illustrations, from Original Designs by Thomas Nast, made expressly for this Almanac. Crown 8vo, Paper, 30 cents; Four Copies, $1 00.

THE RISE AND FALL OF THE PARIS COMMUNE. With a full Account of the Bombardment, Capture, and Burning of the City. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE, an Eye-Witness of the Events described, Editor of "Harper's Hand-Book of European Travel," "Harper's Phrase-Book," &c. With a Map of Paris and Portraits from Original Photographs. Large 12mo, 516 pages, Cloth, $2 00.

KINGSLEY'S WEST INDIES. At Last: a Christmas in the West Indies. By CHARLES KINGSLEY. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE TEMPEST. Edited, with Notes, by WM. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High-School, Cambridge, Mass., and Editor of "The Merchant of Venice." Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

BULWER'S KING ARTHUR. King Arthur. A Poem. By EARL LYTTON. 12mo, Cloth, Illuminated, $1 75.

BROUGHAM'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY. The Life and Times of HENRY, LORD BROUGHAM. Written by Himself. Vols. I. and II. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per vol. (To be completed in Three Volumes.)

THE COUSIN FROM INDIA. A Book for Girls. By GEORGIANA M. CRAIK, Author of "Mildred," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

LITTLE SUNSHINE'S HOLIDAY: a Picture from Life. A Book for Girls. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." With Illustrations by Frölich. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

ABBOTT'S FREDERICK THE GREAT. The History of Frederick the Second, called Frederick the Great. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. Elegantly Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

ANNE FURNESS. By the Author of "Mabel's Progress," "The Sacristan's Household," "Veronica," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

A DAUGHTER OF HETH. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "Kilmeny," "In Silk Attire," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

NEW LIBRARY EDITIONS by the Author of "John Halifax:"

OLIVE.—OGILVIES.—THE HEAD OF THE FAMILY.—JOHN HALIFAX.—AGATHA'S HUSBAND. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per volume.

A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Put Yourself in His Place," "Griffith Gaunt," "Hard Cash," "White Lies," "Foul Play," &c. With many Original Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 30 cents; 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

FOR LACK OF GOLD. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "Robin Gray." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

NEW EDITIONS

OF BOOKS

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

THACKERAY'S HENRY ESMOND and LOVEL THE WIDOWER. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.

ABBOTTS' ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES: Romulus.—Charles II. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20 per vol.

HORACE (Harper's Greek and Latin Texts). 18mo, Flexible Cloth, 75 cents.

HERODOTUS. Vol. II. (Harper's Greek and Latin Texts.) 18mo, Flexible Cloth, 75 cents.

DALTON'S PHYSIOLOGY. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

READE'S GRIFFITH GAUNT. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

ANTHON'S CLASSICAL DICTIONARY. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

WILLSON'S SECOND READER. 12mo, 60 cents.

WHITE'S MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW. Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

GASKELL'S MY LADY LUDLOW. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

FOUND DEAD. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ROBINSON'S NO MAN'S FRIEND. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

TACITUS. Vol. II. (Harper's New Classical Library.) 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

ANTHON'S CICERO. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

ZION'S SONGSTER. 32mo, Sheep, 50 cents.

NOW AND THEN. By SAMUEL WARREN. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

KEITH'S LAND OF ISRAEL. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HUMBOLDT'S COSMOS. Vol. IV. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

LOOMIS'S ELEMENTS OF ALGEBRA. 12mo, Sheep, $1 25.

DUFF'S BOOK-KEEPING. 8vo, Cloth, $3 75.

CARLYLE'S PAST AND PRESENT. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

HAVEN'S RHETORIC. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK OF THE SAGACITY OF ANIMALS. Small 4to, Cloth, $1 50.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Digitized by Google

ITIÆ.

s young law-illionaire for hand.
ve my child a sand dollars
ing-day," anerchant. "It little sum:
ovide break-family. Now the kindness you propose dinners?"
that matter," unabashed who have well will not ier at all."

akes a great
, but scrapes
tances.

"I wish I was ed if I don't,"
as he was so-the cold the
. "They goes
like toll free.
owe nobody that's a com-ver heard tell o had a bill
st? Nobody!
y clothes and has to stand the cold till
in."

t to keep out
can't get tin.

ascertained but 2,000,000
world, and rapidly de-account of the supply
r food, but rly increas-
its quality.
ome tribes
doned it in taken to

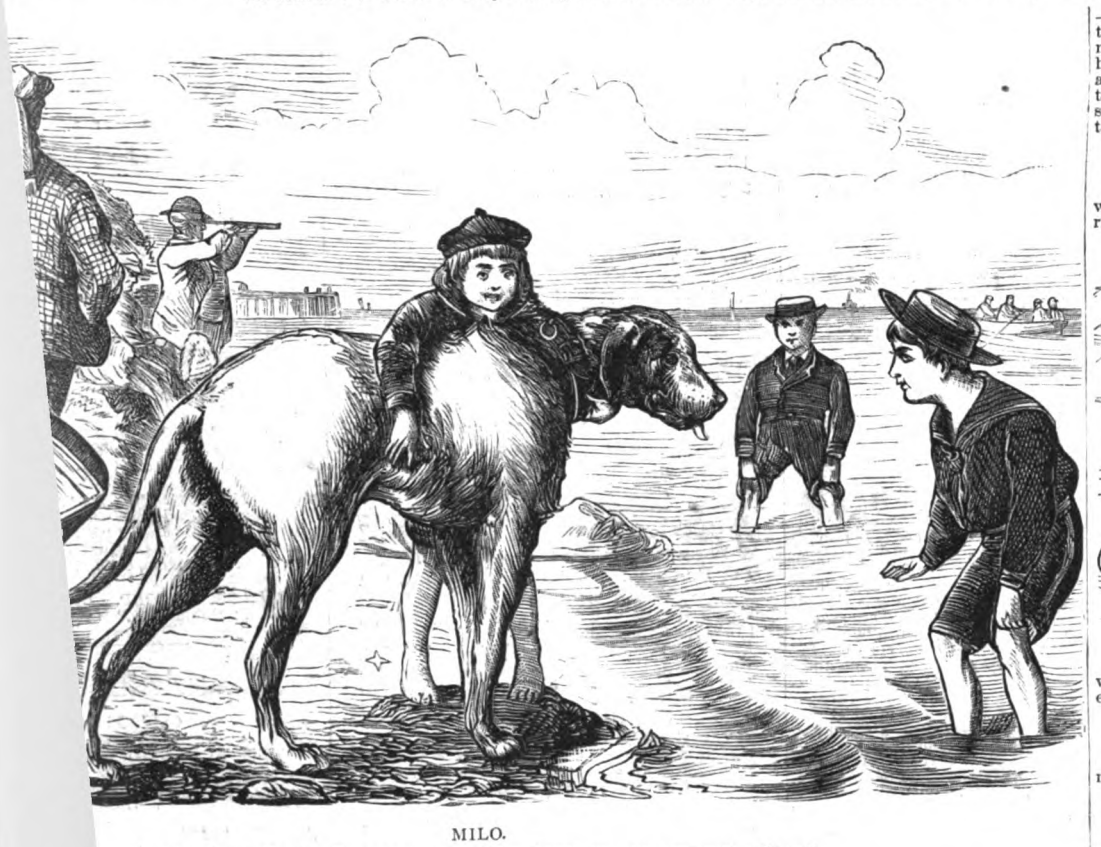
"PERILS OF THE DEEP."

UNPROTECTED FEMALE (waking old Gent, who is not very well). "Oh, Mister, would you find the Captain? I'm sure we're in Danger! I've been Watching the Man at the Wheel: he keeps turning it round first One Way, and then the Other, and evidently doesn't Know his own Mind!"



MILO.

"OH! HIE! FRED! COME, AND I'LL THROW ROVER IN, AND GIVE HIM A SWIM!"

A BOON TO INVALIDS.—We are happy to say that we have found out the only thing to take for the prevention of seasickness. We hasten to give our readers the benefit of it. It is a solemn vow never to go on the water. If this is kept carefully it will last for a lifetime, and is an infallible preventive.

Is it possible for a garret window to suffer room-attic panes?

If a duck goes into the water for divers reasons, does it come on land for sun-dry purposes?

Mr. Planché, in London Society, tells the following story of Sheridan Knowles: One day, in the country, he said to Abbott, with whom he had been acting: "My dear fellow, I'm off to-morrow. Can I take any letters for you?"

"You're very kind," answered Abbott; "but where are you going to?"

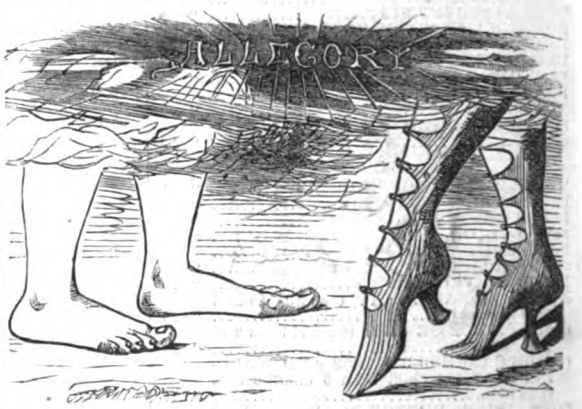
"I haven't made up my mind."

To become the lion of a party, it is not necessary to make a beast of one's self.

MAGNETIC INFLUENCE OF WOMAN.—A commander in the royal mail service found his steamer some thirty miles out of her course. He could not account for the local attraction that had sent him so far out of the way. Instruments and calculations appeared equally faultless. Sorely troubled from having passed a sleepless, watchful night, the captain went on deck after breakfast. Seeing a lady sitting—as was her custom—and working near the binnacle, it occurred to him that probably her scissors were resting on the ledge of it. Detecting nothing of the sort, and bent on closer examination, he discovered that her chair had an iron frame. It also flashed across him that the lady's ample crinoline was extended by steel hoops. So, mustering all his faculties, he exclaimed, with as much forgiveness and as little reproach as possible, "Madame, you have, by your local attraction, drawn my ship some thirty miles from her course!"

When is a smile behind time?—When it's a little laughter.

CAPILLARY ATTRACTION.—It is a curious but incontrovertible fact, that when a hirsute young gentleman pays his addresses to a lady, he invariably becomes hirsuter (her suitor).



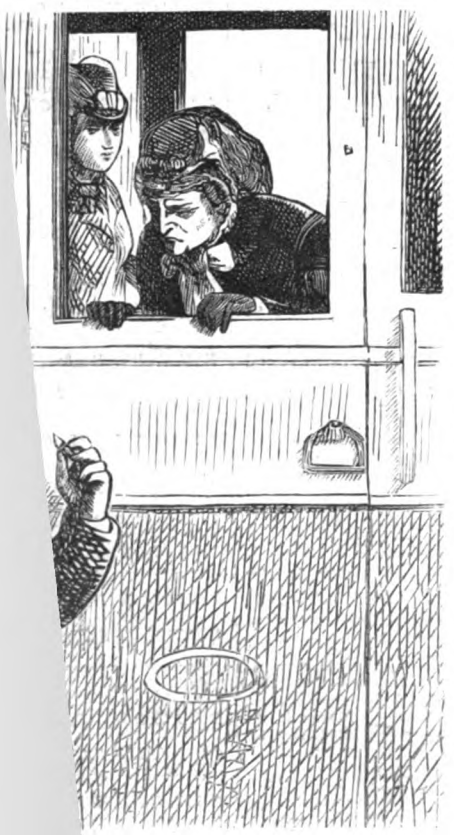
MUSICAL.—The editor of a country paper remarks that half the people who attend musical entertainments in his town "don't know the difference between a symphony and a sardine."

MOTTO FOR A CAT-SHOW—"Come to the Scratch."

Why is the letter S like a sewing-machine?—Because it makes needles needless.

NO POINT TO SAILORS—A gale-a-day.

"You talk of your troubles, but yours is not such a hard case as mine," as the oyster said to the fisherman.



OW-FEELING.

do you allow Smoking in this Compartment?" if nane o' the Gentlemen object, ye can tak'

DIDN'T SEE IT.—A man has sued his barber for cutting off his mustache. He sues for exemplary damages; but the barber says he didn't see any mustache to speak of.

DARK AGES—Ladies' ages.

GOING DOWN.—Marry a poor girl, and she will go up with you; a rich one, and she'll go down with you.

SLIP-KNOTS—Lovers' ties.

One would suppose that the "luxury of woe" (wo!) is best appreciated by the tired cab-horse.

A DAY OF RECKONING—Saturday.

WORTH NOTING.—This is a good time of the year to collect autographs—of your creditors.

A PAIN OF GLASS—A headache.

Why are swells in Hindostan like poverty?—Because they're Indi-gents(ce).

JEU D'ESPRIT.—We are informed that the Rothschild family is about "to celebrate the centenary of the banking house to which it owes its fortune." Would it not be more correct to describe the celebration as a Jewbilee?

What weed does a gardener seldom object to see?—A cigar in his own mouth.

Why are lawyers like ivy?—Because the greater the ruin the more they cling.

We have heard that money is the root of all evil, but we have no objection to having a trunk of it.

THE WAY TO KEEP YOUR SILK UMBRELLA—Only lend your cotton one.

The man who gave a bit of his mind to another has since been punished for a breach of the piece.

A UNIVERSAL WANT—Want of money.

QUACK—A doctor whose science lies in his bill.

The following definition, which occurs in most abridgments of "Webster's Dictionary," must be extremely satisfactory and instructive to a foreigner who is studying our language: "Cock—Male bird; form of a hat; part of a gun; notch of an arrow; spout to draw beer; small heap of hay."

LOVE IS BLIND!

ISN'T IT ODD! CHARLIE HAS BEEN TRYING TO SHOW BESSIE THAT DISTANT VESSEL FOR SUCH A TIME, AND NEITHER OF THEM HAS DISCOVERED YET THAT THEY HAVEN'T TAKEN THE CAP OFF THE END OF THE TELESCOPE!

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 44.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Fig. 1.—Girl's Water-proof Cloak.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS useful and pretty cloak is cut in the form of a loose sacque, and is furnished with sleeves, cape, and hood. It may be made of any material—water-proof cloth, Scotch plaid, serge, or cashmere. Made of linen or light cloth for summer, it will be found an excellent duster. The pattern is graded to fit girls from five to fifteen years old, in eleven sizes, from 22 to 32 inches, bust measure. This measure is taken by passing a tape measure straight under the arms entirely around the body.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises the cloak, sleeves, cape, and hood. It is in eight pieces—front, back, cape, hood, sleeve, cuff, and two pocket welts. The back of the sacque, cape, and hood is cut without a seam. Baste up the cloak, and try it on wrong side out before sewing; if alterations are needed, take up more or less in the seams. Baste up the cape, and try it on over the cloak; if it does not fit well, take up more or less in the darts on the shoulders. Line the hood with silk, or the same material as the garment; make a shirr in it, an inch from the edge, for an elastic cord, draw it up sufficiently to make it conform to the body, and gather the neck; then join the cape and hood to the neck of the cloak, and finish with a narrow binding over the seam. The perforations show where to turn up for the fullness to form the hood. Sew the sleeve plainly into the armhole. Close the front all the way down with buttons and buttonholes; rubber buttons are the best, as they are the most durable. Three rows of Hercules or alpaca braid trim the bottom, and two rows the cape, sleeves, and pocket welts. The perforations show where to baste the seams, to take up the darts on the shoulder, and to sew on the pocket welts. Put the pattern together by the notches. An outlet of an inch is allowed for seams. The notches in front at the top and bottom show where to turn back for a hem. Make the cloak nearly as long as the dress, and add to or take from the bottom, keeping the same shape.

Quantity of material, 54 inches wide, for child five years old, 1¾ yards.

A quarter of a yard more is added for each size.

Quantity of braid, 8 yards.

Three-quarters of a yard more is added for each size.

Silk for hood, quarter of a yard.

Buttons, 2½ inches apart, for child five years old, 24.

Fig. 1.—WATER-PROOF CLOAK FOR GIRL FROM 5 TO 15 YEARS OLD (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). Fig. 2.—LADY'S HOUSE DRESS. Fig. 3.—LADY'S STREET DRESS.

[Cut Paper Patterns of Girl's Water-proof Cloak, graded to fit Girls from 5 to 15 Years old, from 22 to 32 Inches, Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Digitized by Google

he cause. Money marries money; and the laughters of these wealthy homes have some-hing pleasanter to do, to their thinking, than earning to cook, or to utilize raw energy in ther economies, which, perhaps, requires the greater ability. It is notorious that it is not he very rich nor the very poor who reduce ousekeeping to a science—the poor, having ittle or nothing to work with, being bad conomizers—but the middle class, to whom t has happened, by nice processes and care-ul experiments, to make both ends meet n their expenditures, so that at last it be-comes a positive pleasure to see how far one may stretch a certain sum of money, what elastic principle resides in gold or greenbacks, what beautiful results may be achieved by a slight outlay. Therefore I say to Spendthrift and company, if you wish for good housekeeping, by all means marry on a limited income, and afford your wife and children the opportunity of exercising their native skill; and as every power grows with use, before long there will be as great a supply of housekeepers as there is demand. Garnet declares that, for her part, she would prefer to marry on a salary, and be "just a little nipped," and be obliged to piece out the carpets every spring, darn the table-lin-en, turn the sheets, remodel her gowns—put-ting a back breadth in front, making a new waist of a gore; design her own bonnets out of bits of her wedding satin and illusion lace, fashion the boys' jackets from their fa-ther's coats, make Ruby's waistcoats from her old black silk, and cut and contrive to some purpose. "There would be genius in that," says she. "Any body can make an appearance with plenty; but it takes intel-lect to give scantiness the effect of breadth, to make a little go a great way. And then, one often knows a surer pleasure in going without a desired object than its possession could possibly bestow. The diamonds in the jewelers' cases are not half so dazzling as my imagination pictures them. If I were to bring them home, they would lose a great part of their charm. So I have my imagi-nation, which can turn out whole Golcondas at command, and the jeweler has his dia-monds, and we are both content." And this is one of the women whom Spendthrift is "too poor to marry"—Spendthrift, who buys so many suits that the moths take pity upon him, who wears only the costliest ties, whose linen is finer than silk, whose jewelry is of the richest and simplest pattern, whose gloves fit like another skin, whose perfum-ery is Parisian, whose cigars are the choicest importation, who dines at the most fashion-able restaurant, and whose tailor talks of retiring. No wonder Spendthrift and his friends are too poor to marry! But, my friend, when these things have had their day, and have lost their bloom; when purple and fine linen no longer satisfy your heart; when to be fashionable is not to be happy, and when the interest of your companions has strayed away from you to their own fire-sides; when pleasures have grown tame for want of an appreciative sharer; when travel is a bore, with no one to listen to your gush-ing, and call it eloquence and poetry; when nobody remembers your birthdays; when you have met with business reverses, and have felt the cold shoulder of the world—then, per-haps, you may decide that you are not "too poor to marry," after all. But the tardy boy was whipped at school, and that "not im-possible she" may have married old Bullion yesterday—mind, I don't defend her—for a home!

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Blowing Up.

MY DEAR EUSTACE,—All travelers upon every road are compelled in these days to reflect upon the chances of blowing up; and I know a great many persons to whom the beginning of the shortest journey has become a very grave consideration. One gentleman of a serious turn proposes that over the door of every car should be printed in black letters the Dantean line, "Leave hope behind all ye who enter here"—a legend which would cheer the journey in a very lolorous manner. But notwithstanding the horrible disasters, which the railway man-agers call accidents, I observe that travelers seem entirely heedless of danger, or profound-ly resigned to the chances of blowing up, and of all other awful mishaps. Indeed, it is curious to remark how complacently a man darting along at the rate of thirty or forty miles an hour will read of the various perils that attend traveling at the rate of thirty or forty miles an hour; while the pas-senger who would be most furious if any thing ill should happen, will pull out his watch and grumble at the rate at which the lightning express creeps along. Whether he is blown up or not for going too fast, he will have the happiness of blowing up the directors and superintendent, and conductor and engineer, for going too slow.

This sad fate of blowing up often befalls travelers upon the greater road where it is our business to observe manners. In the most unexpected and apparently causeless manner often the most placid of our fellow-passengers suddenly fly to pieces, as it were, explode before our very eyes, and disappear. How often do we not observe a comfortable, respectable, successful fellow-traveler, who lives in a fine house and drives a fine car-riage; who is quoted with deference as an authority upon many most important sub-jects; whose wife is the very queen of fash-ion, and whose daughters are apparently only waiting till their royal highnesses shall arrive, who will hasten to beg them in mar-riage; whose hands, indeed, seem to be the hands of Midas, that turn every thing to gold; whose house is Aladdin's palace, and whose estate seems to be Golconda; and suddenly the good man blows up, explodes into innumerable fragments, and is seen no more!

Where, for instance, is Puff? I remember him when every body bowed to him upon the street; when those who knew him said, with a kind of awe as he passed, "That is Puff;" and those who had never seen him responded, "Indeed, is that Puff?" At all great popular meetings for all great neu-tral purposes he was always president or one of the first vice-presidents; and when people saw his name they said, "It's all right—here's Puff." To new companies of every kind his name in the board of direction was invaluable. Savings-banks and trustees and guardians all invested the moment they saw his name. "If Puff thinks well of it," they said, "it is quite enough. One thousand shares, if you please, at the current rates." But one day, without any warning, Mr. Puff exploded. He blew up. "Old Puff's puffed out," said the rude and the unfeeling. It was, however, only a vulgar way of telling the truth. Nobody knew exactly what had hap-pened, nor why it had happened. There seemed to be no assets, as the commercial phrase is. The end was like that of a soap-bubble in the air. One moment there was a very pretty something sailing along with all the most solid objects perfectly reflected in it, and the next moment there was sim-ply nothing whatever—not a relic, not a trace. Even Puff's name disappeared. He was never again a vice-president or a direct-or. His house was sold and changed so that, like Aladdin's palace, it seemed actual-ly to have gone with him, an exhalation of the dawn.

The explanation in Puff's case, as in all such cases, is that he had too great a pressure of steam. The fast rate at which he lived re-quired what the vehement call a tremendous head of steam. But when it is a head so tre-mendous that it threatens explosion, it should be carefully watched and diminished. For blowing up is the end-all. If you steam to that degree, the very object for which you have steam is defeated and lost. Puff was the text of many private sermons of this kind which were preached at the clubs and other serious resorts after his explosion. Don't crowd steam, was the application of the afflictive event, which, it was hoped, would be blessed to many. I am not sure that the preaching did any good, but I am very sure that it should have been of the ut-most service. Upon the Mississippi River, in the old days, when turpentine and all kinds of furious breeders of flame and heat were thrown into the furnaces, and the rac-ing throng of steamers belching black smoke plowed and glared through the water and the night, the injunction not to crowd steam for fear of an explosion would not have been more needful than in the great city where Puff lived. But I believe that they still race and explode upon the Mississippi, and there are endless Puffs constantly blowing up upon the same course where his name was famous.

The force of the sermons which were preached upon the Puff text was, as I have intimated, that an overpressure of steam imperils your arrival; it endangers the very object that you are seeking. And among our fellow-travelers I observe that this truth holds. They not only frequently explode, like Puff, but they are constantly blowing each other up. It seems, indeed, as if they were under some persuasion that such a course would hasten their own arrival. When my uncle Hiram used to drop his tea-spoon into his cup and tip it over, which he did so con-stantly as utterly to destroy my aunt Janet's equanimity, he always turned suddenly upon his youngest son, who was the personification of all the tea-table virtues, and exclaimed, with a roguish light in his kind eyes, "Solon, you young rascal, if you do such a careless thing again, I'll send you straight to bed. Look at your mother!" It was impossible to scold him after that; and he always winked at me afterward, and said, "My boy, if you want to escape a blowing up, blow up somebody else first."

That is a practical philosophy of the truth of which I am not fully persuaded, but I know that there is a very general conviction that "a good blowing up" is of great serv-ice in the conduct of life. "What that boy wants," says some sagacious observer of a child whom he has never seen before, "is a rousing scolding." And after some of my aunt Janet's most vehement explosions of this kind—in which children, or servants, or shop-keepers, or even Uncle Hiram suffered—that shrewd philosopher would remark, with-out in the least restoring calmness or sweet-ness to my aunt's manner, "Nothing like a thunder-storm to clear the air, Bachelor, my boy. Whirlwinds are marvelous revivifiers." Then if he saw some saucy boy in the street, he threw up the window and exclaimed, "Come in here, you insolent little rascal, and be blown up!" Then to me, in an audi-ble whisper, "How majestic is the commo-tion of the elements!" But all his ribaldry did not disturb Aunt Janet's faith in the efficacy of a vigorous scolding, or blowing up, as she preferred to call it. "Hiram hasn't the spirit of a lamb's tail," she re-marked, sometimes, in the lull of some ex-plosion, as she saw him humorously looking at her. "I believe he would submit to any imposition whatever, and however disgrace-ful. It's infamous!"

In vain Uncle Hiram told his familiar sto-ry of blowing up the wrong man: my aunt would not be pacified. The truth was, that one day long ago, when they were living in the suburbs, a man imposed upon my uncle as a poor artist with a hungry wife and fam-ily; and after he had cordially sympathized with the stranger and given him generous relief, Uncle Hiram ascertained that his vis-itor was the most flagrant knave. But some time afterward, as he was sitting quietly in his room, another suppliant entered and be-gan the same tale of the wife and family; but Uncle Hiram, the mildest of men, sud-denly started up, and actually seizing the intruder by the collar, drew him to the door and put him out, angrily exclaiming, "By Jove! you can't do it twice, Sir. I've heard that gammon before." And he had scarcely slammed the door, which never be-fore shut in a suppliant's face, and seated himself again, than he suddenly perceived that he had made a ridiculous mistake, and had spent his wrath upon the wrong man! "The fact is, Bachelor," he said to me, "I don't blow up right. It isn't natural to me, as it is to your aunt Janet; and since that ridiculous failure, if I am tempted to begin, I am always so sure that I shall doubt at the very wrong moment whether I am blow-ing up the right man, that it is much wiser to leave the business to those who have a natural call to it."

From the day of that mistake, whenever Aunt Janet reproached him for hearing every body who came, he always replied, "My dear, a man who has so disgraced himself and his house can not do less than atone for his in-hospitality to every wayfarer." My uncle Hiram had the quaintest ideas. He really seemed to suppose that he had some duties toward other people! But he stoutly re-fused to smooth his own way with tempests. He had taken passage for Europe, and he and his wife and all the family were on the steamer waiting for the baggage, which he had sent two hours before he left his house, but which had not arrived even at the hour of starting. The condition of Aunt Janet can not be imagined, but Uncle Hiram was as bland as ever. At length the captain told him that the hour had arrived, and that the ship was delayed only for Uncle Hiram's baggage. My serene kinsman turned a beam-ing face upon his spouse, and, stating the ex-act case, asked whether they should go or stay. Aunt Janet replied that the question was too absurd, for how could they go with-out their baggage?

They descended from the ship, and Uncle Hiram calmly watched it slide slowly from the dock; and just as it reached the end of the pier the baggage appeared. The man who had it in charge jumped from his wagon and looked at my uncle in dismay. But the good man stepped up to him and asked qui-etly, "Where have you been?" The man answered that he had had time enough, but that his wife was very ill, and he had turn-ed aside to call the doctor, and when he pushed on again toward the steamer the street was so blocked that he could not reach the wharf earlier. As he ended he looked at my uncle, then burst into tears, and said, "If you'd only blow me up I could stand it; but I can't stand your kindness." The reply of my uncle was that he should go by the next steamer, and that he should expect the man to come for his baggage. He did so, and he reached the steamer in time.

I don't believe that the drayman was ever late again, and I do believe that he took a more charitable view of human nature. My aunt Janet always insisted that Uncle Hi-ram had failed in his duty; for she held him to be religiously bound to blow up the de-linquent. But Uncle Hiram said that he doubted if scolding and cursing and losing his temper would have been of any service. "Depend upon it, Janet," he said, "all the blowing up in the world would not have hastened our arrival in Europe, and I shouldn't have been half so sure that the baggage would arrive at the ship punctually." I confess, dear Eustace, that Uncle Hiram shook my faith in the virtue of scolding; and since in our journey there must be so many unavoidable and disastrous explosions of other kinds—since we are in constant peril of being blown up by fortune, by treachery, or by temperament—might we not wisely refuse to blow each other up?

Digitized by Google

Yours always,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

MISSES' WATER-PROOF CLOAK.

AMERICAN water-proof, at $1 50 a yard, is the fabric most used for school-girls' water-proof cloaks, as they are too soon outgrown to justify the outlay of $3 a yard for finer English water-proof. Plaid water-proofs, especially blue and green plaids, are much used for children. To enliven the sombre black wrap, and also to make it warmer, the cape and sleeves should be lined with scarlet flannel. As the hood is often pressed against the face, a black silk lining is preferred for it. Our model, of which we give a cut paper pattern, is a simple loose sacque with side seams only, an elbow cape, coat sleeves, and hood. The cloak should be as long as the child's dress skirt, in order to protect it, but if much longer, will lap under the dress in a dowdy way. The edges may be simply hemmed, and three rows of braid placed above the hem; but a dressier trimming is to cut shallow scallops on the edge, bind them with braid, and extend the braid (sewed flatly) up between the scallops about two inches, then down again to the next scallop. This gives the effect of deep scallops. Use gutta-percha buttons, or else wooden moulds covered with water-proof.

SMALL FEATURES OF FASHION.

As there is no marked change in costumes this year, great attention is paid to small details, in order to give some appearance of novelty. A conspicuous feature is the revival of jet trimmings, so long predicted, and at last an accomplished fact. Very fine jet beads and short bugles are now attached to passementerie, braiding, and embroidery. In most cases they are sparingly used; but a few garments from the best French houses glisten with elaborate jets. These are of the dull cashmeres or heavy, dead black silks that need to be enlivened. Velvet garments that lay any claim to novelty have bands of black marten fur, or else Chantilly lace, not bought by the yard and sewed on the edge, but wrought in shape to suit the garment, such as slender Gothic points, leaves, cuffs, and collars. These are laid flatly on the velvet, that the beauty of the lace may be seen.

Experience suggests that fringe and passementerie, though fashionable on lower skirts, are not convenient, as they catch in every projection near the wearer; also that velvet does not trim cashmere well, as handsome velvets are of blue-black shades, while French cashmere is jet black.

White beads, dull chalk white, are used to embroider black velvet for trimming black silk dresses for the house. Scarfs, vest, revers collar, and cuffs are imported in sets for this purpose, also as garniture for cashmere mantles for carriage and opera wear, and for mounting India shawls.

Pleated Swiss muslin frills are again worn standing around the neck in Marie Stuart fashion. These soft clear muslin frills are exceedingly becoming when edged with Valenciennes or footing. A similar frill falls over the wrists from inside the sleeves.

Polonaises, basques, and, indeed, all wraps have some sort of a collar or large ruche around the neck, or a three-cornered kerchief or Watteau bow with streamers behind. If there is a velvet vest in front, the velvet is continued at the back like a round collar, nearly two fingers deep, and sewed down flatly on the garment. If a bias band simulates a vest in front, it forms a point behind with a Watteau bow attached, or else the ends lap over each other slightly, and are fringed. Two small round collars, richly trimmed, are on some French garments, while others have immense ruches of lace or raveled silk around the neck. The latter, with a Marie Stuart frill of muslin inside, is especially becoming to the delicate faces of American women. A fan bow is sometimes worn on the back of the corsage, made of a sort of three-cornered kerchief of silk; others have jabots of lace, thickly gathered, descending in a perfect cascade down the back. Thick cords of passementerie are imported in patterns for ornamenting the shoulders, bust, and back of basques, and for draping the sides of the skirt. Passementerie leaves and tassels are often used instead of bows for draping the Marguerite polonaise.

There is a fancy just now for veils of white net dotted thickly with black. They are of simplest shape, merely two or three eighths of the net passed straight across the front of the hat, and covering the face to the chin. They are generally becoming, and are very stylish when worn with a black velvet round hat and black costume.

Loose low-hanging chatelaine braids are fast being replaced by more classically arranged hair. A small knot is now worn, neither high nor low, but at the back of the head, and this knot consists of a French twist with braids (plaited of three tresses) wound around it. A good deal of frizzing, short fluffy hair, and the Pompadour roll are still worn here; but ladies just returned from abroad wear the front hair smooth above the forehead, and put it plainly behind the ears. A lock in front of each ear, called ear-locks, is thick, short, and trained to curve toward the ear.

New cravat bows, called the Alexis bow, are of satin of any and every color, edged with fur. Russian fancies, it is said, will be in order for the winter, and fur used in many ways.

Sleeveless Zouave jackets, like those worn a couple of years since, are shown for the house and for wearing beneath wraps instead of sontags. They are made of black, scarlet, or blue cashmere, with fanciful braiding and ball or tassel fringe, and will enliven breakfast costumes.

Box-pleated waists or blouses, with lengthwise bias bands imitating pleats, have become an important feature in home costumes. They are easily made, comfortable, are useful to wear with skirts that have outlasted the corsage belonging to them, and are capable of being made very dressy. Pretty ones for wearing with black silk skirts are of blue, écru, or scarlet cashmere, with two rows of narrow black velvet ribbon on the pleats, or else bias bands braided or embroidered in small figures or polka dots. Black and gray cashmere blouses of this kind are also worn in the street. Furnishing houses show white opera cloth blouses embroidered in colors on the pleats, and dressy ones of violet or other silk daintily embroidered in the same shade.

BLACK SUITS.

It was predicted this season, as it has been for several previous ones, that black suits would fall into disfavor; but as the season advances modistes have orders for six black suits in proportion to one of colors, and at present the majority of well-dressed women seen on the promenade, at church, matinées, and evening concerts, wear black suits, relieved only by a bright bow at the throat, an ostrich tip of the same shade on the bonnet, and gloves of lavender gray kid. This is the only costume that does not become hackneyed when the wearer has but a limited wardrobe, and, at the same time, no other better displays handsome materials purchased by the rich; indeed, many wealthy women have ordered two or three black suits this fall, varying them by using the many elegant black fabrics and garnitures now in vogue.

The black costume most worn in the present fall weather is of faille, with velvet trimmings, or else faille and cashmere combined. If of faille alone, it has a basque with velvet vest, and an over-skirt with very short and much-wrinkled apron, richly fringed, and a flounced skirt, or else folds and fringe together. The lower skirt in too many cases drags on the ground; but cleanliness forbids this, and the Bazar only mentions it to condemn it. If faille and cashmere are associated in the suit, the skirt is of faille, with a deep flounce almost to the knee, held in massive box-pleats separated by velvet bows; or else the flounce is scantily gathered, and edged top and bottom with two narrow ruffles of velvet or faille. The polonaise is cashmere, richly trimmed with passementerie or braiding inwrought with fine jet beads, longer than broad—short, tiny bugles, in fact. Willow fringe, bullion, netted fringe, or else guipure lace, edges the garment. Bows of faille ribbon are up the front, with a jet buckle in the centre of each bow. Deep square cuffs, with fringe or lace hanging from the lower edge, trim the sleeve, which is a Louis Quinze, a compromise between half-flowing and coat sleeves. Pleated Swiss muslin or lace falls over the wrist, and a ruffle of the same stands about the throat. A neck-tie of bias twilled silk passes around the neck, forms a bow in front, and its brightness is veiled by a black lace barbe, or else the all-prevalent black lace scarf is worn over it. The round hat, always in favor at this transition season, is of mixed black velvet and faille, with soft, puffed crown, and plenty of ostrich tips and pompons, mostly black, but having also a suggestion of the color worn around the neck. Tortoise-shell jewelry, large swinging hoops for ear-rings, and a shell necklace of chain links, with a monogram locket, pale gray kid gloves, and a blue or plum-colored parasol, very large, with walking-stick handle, complete the costume.

On cooler days there is added a double talma of black cashmere, or else a sacque without sleeves, but with a cape, having the effect of double capes. Jet, passementerie, fringe, and lace are lavishly used in ornamenting this garment, which finds its only rival in a cashmere paletot fitted in the back, loose front, cut in deep Gothic points, and so covered with braiding and embroidery that the original fabric is almost lost sight of. The camel's-hair mantles and serge polonaises with fur border, mentioned last week, will appear later in the season. Velvet polonaises will constitute the important feature of black suits for midwinter, and it is said those worn with faille skirts will be preferred to suits entirely of velvet. The beaver mohair, sable brilliantine, and other finer kinds of alpaca, trimmed with velvet or velveteen, also make beautiful black suits, little inferior in appearance to silk.

COLORED COSTUMES.

Some of the colored costumes received within the past week present novelties worthy of description. First is a lapis lazuli blue faille, with plain front of under-skirt, and four deep straight flounces behind reaching to the belt, and dispensing with an over-skirt. Two velvet ruffles of the same shade edge the flounces. In front is the apron of an over-skirt, fringed deeply, and gathered up in wrinkles until it is very short. The basque has a Louis XIV. vest of velvet and square velvet cuffs. Fine Malines lace at the throat and a cascade of lace down the front. This exquisite suit is for receptions and visiting, and should be worn with a Pompadour bonnet of pale blue royale and faintest rose-colored tips.

A velvet costume is of cypress green, almost black. Two box-pleated flounces trim the lower skirt; the velvet polonaise is embroidered and fringed, and a short mantle is trimmed similarly. The bonnet for this is of the velvet of the dress, relieved by faille pipings and tips of lightest Nile green.

A third is of cypress green faille. The skirt has a broad gathered flounce almost covered by velvet drapery of the same color, cut in deep Gothic points. Three alternate folds of velvet and faille head the flounce. The Marguerite polonaise is edged with folds and fringe. The bows draping the back have long streamers, one of velvet, the other faille, fringed at the end, and made to hang on the sides, not behind.

A prune-colored faille has an upper skirt of new design crossed in front, pointed at each side, with two straight breadths behind. The edge of this over-skirt is cut in small points, with two cords on the edge, and the interval discloses a scant ruffle of pale blue and of white silk, fringed at the edge. The basque is short, and it, with the deep flounce on the lower skirt, is pointed and ruffled also.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

DR. CHRONIK, of Chicago, a well-known Jewish rabbi, is forming a new congregation of Israelites, who will in their worship adopt the Berlin prayer-book, and observe the first day of the week as their Sabbath, instead of Saturday. Leading Israelites favor the movement.

—One of the most successful newspaper men in Europe is EMILE DE GIRARDIN, who boasts of having made two millions of dollars by the business. It injured his feelings, though, to lose two hundred and fifty thousand dollars in consequence of the war between France and Germany. He ran short that amount.

—Professor PECK, of West Point, expresses the belief that Professor MAHAN did not commit suicide, but fell overboard accidentally, in consequence of the carelessness of the boat hands in leaving the gangway rail open.

—Gen. WILLIAM H. M'CARTNEY, who writes those droll "Major Muldoon" letters in the World, and who commanded the First Massachusetts Battery during the difficulty, is preparing a lecture on the "Humors of the War," with which during the coming winter he will bring smiles to the face of the peoples.

—The saying, implying contempt, "He hasn't a soul above buttons," has had at least one practical refutation in the success in life of SAMUEL WILLISTON, of Massachusetts. While he was dragging along as a country store-keeper—his eyes having failed him while studying for the ministry—his wife bethought her that she could cover by hand the wooden buttons of the time, and thus earn an honest penny. From that they invented machinery, and then they built an immense factory, and then others, until now his factories are the largest in the world, and he is said to be worth $6,000,000. He has given $400,000 to East Hampton for a seminary and for churches, $200,000 to South Hadley Female Seminary, and $200,000 to Amherst College.

—As means to an end, Madame JANAUSCHEK exhibited her jewelry—valued at $80,000—in the window of a jeweler in Cincinnati; and then the people went to see her wear it in the play. The articles include gifts from various potentates, and a diamond worth $16,000 presented to her by the Czar of Russia.

—Professor GOLDWIN SMITH is in Toronto, where he proposes to deliver lectures to the Canadian youth attending the Toronto University.

—Miss ISABELLA BATEMAN, younger sister of the BATEMAN, has just made a decidedly successful début in London, in a new adaptation of George Sand's "La Petite Fadette."

—Mesdames JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, HORACE HOLDEN, WILLIAM H. OSBORNE, T. C. DOREMUS, WILLIAM E. DODGE, Jun., and Mrs. J. C. HOLDEN are endeavoring to place upon a permanent basis the new organization known as the "Association for Training Christian Workers," who propose "to go among the poor, the vicious, and the neglected, and by words and deeds of kindness, exhortation, and encouragement, to arouse their hope and their self-respect." Thirteen ladies have already volunteered for the work, and the projectors call upon good and generous people to lend the helping hand and the encouraging dollar.

—That Cadet SMITH, who seems to be in water more than tepid, has again given offense to the belles at West Point by distributing a lot of cadet buttons to his colored lady friends, which they exhibit in public. The white girls, disgusted, have dashed their buttons to the cold earth.

—These Americans are members of the Cobden Club, London: CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, EDWARD ATKINSON, GEORGE BANCROFT, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON, H. W. LONGFELLOW, CHARLES SUMNER, and E. P. WHIPPLE.

—The exact figure paid to the Queen of England for every working-day in the year is $6510. And estimating that she may have to sign her name twenty times a day—say at $325 each—it does seem to be fair pay.

—There is a woman on exhibition in London who is perfectly enormous. Her name is CAROLINE HEENAN; she is twenty-two, weighs 560 pounds, measures seven feet around the body, twenty-six inches around the arm, and three feet six inches across the shoulders. Gracious! what an armful! It is said that this copious young person is handsome, pleasing, highly intelligent, and capable of sustaining great physical exertion.

—Two queens, twin sisters, now occupy the castle of Stolzenfels, well known to tourists on the Rhine. The castle was purchased as a ruin by the town of Coblentz, and presented to the late King FREDERICK WILLIAM IV. when crown prince, by whom it was restored at a great expense. It was bequeathed by the king to his widow, the Queen-Dowager of Prussia, who is now occupying this charming retreat; while her twin sister, the Queen of Saxony, and the king are on a visit to her. The late king entertained Queen VICTORIA very sumptuously here in 1845. It is probably little known that a personage still survives in the Prussian royal family who connects the present with an interesting past epoch. The step-mother of the Emperor of Germany lives. Fourteen years after the death of his ill-fated queen, the beautiful LOUISE, King FREDERICK WILLIAM III. contracted a morganatic marriage with a daughter of Count von Harrack, and created her Princess von Leignitz and Countess of Hohenzollern. This lady is now in her seventy-first year.

—HENRY ALDEN, who should not have done it, did commit suicide a few days ago in Gorham, Maine. He had a reasonable competence, a good farm, and, what was better, a good name, for he was a lineal descendant of that JOHN ALDEN who came over in the Mayflower, and who forms one of the principal characters in LONGFELLOW's poem of "Miles Standish's Courtship." But the poor man thought that he was going to the dogs pecuniarily, and so put out life's brief candle.

—LACHAUD, the great criminal lawyer of France, counts his professional gains at about 400,000 francs a year.

—Mr. JAMES GRANT, in his new work, just published in London, on the newspaper press, says that early in life Mr. DISRAELI edited a paper called the Representative.

—Senator FRELINGHUYSEN has the bump of inhabitiveness. He owns the land at Somerville on which his ancestors settled two hundred years ago. His country residence is there, and thence, from metropolitan Newark, he emanates for solitude and self-communion.

—One of the foremost scholars in England is said to be THOMAS ARNOLD, a brother of MATTHEW. He is the author of an excellent manual of poetry entitled, "From Chaucer to Wordsworth." His son THOMAS has taken nearly every prize at Rugby for a number of years, amounting in all to several hundred pounds; and his daughter has in her minority become distinguished among her friends for her literary culture, especially in Spanish literature. The "Chronicle of the Cid," in Macmillan's Magazine, indicates the remarkable ability of the young lady, for whom a career may be predicted in a direction in which few of her sex have hitherto achieved notable successes. It sometimes seems that talent is hereditary, if genius is not.

—General GEORGE L. HARTSUFF, who goes about with the weight of two bullets in his body—one received in Florida, the other at Antietam—has been retired on the full rank of Major-General on account of wounds received in the service. And now he intends to go to Europe for recreation.

—According to "Burleigh," the correspondent of the Boston Journal, the men famous in New York for business and wealth are always accessible to any persons who may have occasion to call upon them for any proper purpose. Thus "Mr. BEECHER, who has quite as much to do as most pastors, is accessible to any one, night or day. Trinity Church has an elegant room down town for her ministers. It is near the Astor House. Some one of the clergy is present daily to receive callers. The eminent lawyers of New York have regular office hours, and respond to every caller except when engaged in actual consultation. A. T. STEWART is hard to get at, but he is an exception to the New York merchants. CLAFLIN is found daily in his store. It is no use to seek for him in the counting-room. Ask for him as you enter, and the answer is, 'He is somewhere around.' He takes a personal supervision of the entire establishment. To a stranger he would be the last man in the house selected. Slightly stooping, with a rosy face, slouched hat, plain dress, he will probably be found sitting on a box talking to a Western merchant. WILLIAM E. DODGE is one of our largest and busiest merchants. With his trade, philanthropy, and religion he is fairly run down with visitors. Yet he sees every one in rotation, hears what is wanted, and then turns the parties over to his clerks. Just out of Broadway, on Prince Street, is the little den where the ASTORS do their gigantic business. The building is low, one story high, and looks like a country bank. On entering, a long row of desks is seen, occupying the entire room. Near the door are the clerks. Next is a desk occupied by WILLIAM B., Jun. Beyond him sits JOHN JACOB. Further on is the desk at which sits a well-preserved, light-haired, heavy-moulded man, with small, sleepy-looking eyes, and a decidedly German-looking face—and that is WILLIAM B. ASTOR himself. Quietness reigns within. A polite clerk steps up to you and asks, 'What is your business, Sir?' On receiving an answer the visitor is assigned to the special desk to which his business refers. All three of the ASTORS are open to an interview to any one who calls. While such men during business hours do not find it necessary to exclude themselves from the public, smaller men would do well to copy them, and not put on airs."

—The Bazar says ditto to the following sentence, once uttered by HORACE WALPOLE: "Had I children, my utmost endeavors would be to breed them musicians. Considering I have no ear, nor yet thought of music, the preference seems odd; and yet it is embraced on frequent reflection. In short, as my aim would be to make them happy, I think it the most profitable method. It is a resource which will last their lives, unless they grow deaf; it depends on themselves, not on others; always amuses and soothes, if not consoles; and of all fashionable pleasures it is the cheapest."

—The living European monarchs now out of the business are: Prince GUSTAVUS VASA of Sweden; Count de Chambord of France; Duke CHARLES of Brunswick; Count de Paris, grandson of LOUIS PHILIPPE; Duke ROBERT of Parma; Grand Duke FERDINAND of Tuscany; Duke FRANCIS of Modena; FRANCIS the Second of Naples; widow of OTHO of Greece; Duke ADOLPHUS of Nassau; King GEORGE of Hanover; the Elector of Hesse; Princess and Empress CARLOTTA of Mexico; Queen ISABELLA of Spain; and the Emperor NAPOLEON the Third and Empress EUGÉNIE of France.

—Mr. HEPWORTH DIXON, a gentleman who has peered into pretty nearly every quarter of the globe, gives it as the result of his observation that manners decline in regular order from East to West. The further east you go the greater suavity characterizes the people; the further west, the more regardless you find men of the feelings of others. In Europe, he found the best manners in Constantinople, the worst in London; in the whole world, the best at Cairo, the worst at Denver and Salt Lake. But he found ill-mannered communities prosperous. People do so want to make money!

Digitized by Google

Fig. 1.—FELT HAT.

Fig. 2.—BLACK VELVET AND LACE BONNET.

Fig. 3.—VIOLET FAILLE AND BLACK LACE BONNET.

Fig. 4.—BLACK LACE BONNET.

Fig. 5.—MAROON FAILLE BONNET.

LADIES' WINTER HATS AND BONNETS.—[SEE PAGE 693.]

LADIES' HOUSE AND STREET DRESSES.—[SEE PAGE 693.]

Digitized by Google

BESIEGED AT MICHAELMAS.

PEOPLE sometimes wonder why the goose, though notoriously a bird possessed of singular acuteness, should be ordinarily regarded as the emblem of folly. The fact is that the goose resembles a certain peer of sporting celebrity, to whom an envious turfite was once heard to say, "You've got a great advantage over the rest of us, my lord, because you look such a fool without being one." If this dictum does not apply to the wild goose, it most decidedly applies to his domestic brethren. As they stand on a common, hissing with outstretched necks, they look most unconscionable fools, though they are in reality something very much the reverse. Try and drive over one of these supposed fools, and you will find that, though he goes along cackling and waddling without paying the slightest apparent heed, he will take very good care that your wheels sha'n't touch him. Pass by a farm-yard at night, and though you may tread so lightly that the watch-dog slumbers on, the vigilant goose will assuredly give warning of your passage. Livy's story of the geese saving the Roman Capitol, though pooh-poohed by modern skeptics, is most likely founded on an actual fact. Then, again, the gander is a most attentive husband and father. When his wife is weary of sitting on the family nest, he quietly takes her place; and when the young brood is hatched, he keeps a watchful eye over their welfare. In these respects he differs widely from his comrade, the cock, who, though not devoid of a certain gallantry toward the fair sex—as, for example, when he summons the beauties of his harem to partake of a rich "find" of oats—yet scorns to assist in any of the nursery duties. It is, we suspect, the strongly developed philoprogenitiveness of the gander which causes the little maiden in our picture to be besieged at Michaelmas.

Papa Goose fancies that every wayfarer must necessarily covet his lovely goslings, and so he summons the whole tribe to the rescue. Sometimes they are not content with hissing, and we have seen a terrified nurse-maid in one of the parks run a hundred yards or more with an infuriated goose holding on by his bill to her skirt. She had unwittingly passed within a disrespectfully short distance of the family nest. Poor, irascible, kindly natured bird! We revenge ourselves on you for your scornful hissings by eating goose to a prodigious extent.

The custom of eating geese at Michaelmas is of ancient origin, and probably originated from the simple fact that stubble-geese were in perfection just at the time when the conclusion of harvest rendered a feast especially welcome. The fact that Queen Elizabeth was eating a goose when the news of the destruction of the Spanish Armada arrived no doubt popularized the habit, but it existed long before her reign. Nowadays the middle and upper classes live so luxuriously at all times that special feast-days are rather despised; while the poor man, who still enjoys the anticipation of roast goose, prefers his treat at Christmas. The anniversary of the saint falls, as is well known, on the 29th of September.

BESIEGED AT MICHAELMAS.

Ladies' Winter Hats and Bonnets.

See illustrations on page 692.

Fig. 1.—FELT HAT TRIMMED WITH MAROON FAILLE. A large bow with flowing ends behind. Two maroon feathers.

Fig. 2.—BLACK VELVET AND LACE HAT, edged with a narrow ruche of black silk. A scarf of black lace is twisted round the hat, and fastened with a large velvet bow, with ends falling over the back of the head.

Fig. 3.—VIOLET FAILLE AND BLACK LACE BONNET. A violet bow with four loops is set on the front, and a simple bow at the side. Violet faille strings tied under the chin. Fall of black lace behind. Violet feather.

Fig. 4.—BLACK LACE BONNET WITH A SCARF, FORMING STRINGS, trimmed with a yellow rose and leaves. Torsade of blue changeable ribbon, fastened by four jet agrafes in the form of a Maltese cross. A bow of the same color as the torsade is set on the back, with ends falling behind over the chignon.

Fig. 5.—MAROON FAILLE BONNET TRIMMED WITH BLACK LACE. Maroon bias folds, strings, and feather compose the remainder of the trimming.

Ladies' House and Street Dresses.

See illustration on page 692.

Fig. 1.—SKIRT OF LEAF BROWN POPLIN, trimmed with a flounce gathered in spaces of six inches, and edged and trimmed with revers and rows of garnet velvet. These gathered spaces are separated by a plain interval of two inches, which is trimmed longitudinally by four large velvet buttons. This flounce is headed with a velvet ribbon two inches wide. Poplin over-skirt, draped on the back, and trimmed with velvet revers, ribbon, and buttons, simulating a tablier.

Digitized by Google

Vest-basque waist of the same poplin, trimmed with velvet revers and ribbons. Brown silk hat, trimmed with garnet velvet and shaded flowers. Green parasol.

Fig. 2.—DEMI-TRAINED SKIRT OF MODE GRAY FAILLE, trimmed on each side with three graduated passementerie ornaments, set between two rows of black guipure lace. Two smaller ornaments close the basque-waist, on which a round cape is simulated with guipure. Flowing sleeves, trimmed in a similar manner. Black velvet bow in the hair.

Fig. 3.—SHORT SKIRT OF TURQUOISE BLUE FAILLE, trimmed with a flounce and folds of the material. Over-skirt of the same, rounded in front, draped behind, and trimmed on the side with two sash ends. Pearl gray cashmere paletot, slashed behind, and trimmed with a fringed cashmere border. Black velvet hat, with black velvet ribbon and blue feathers.

SPEAKING EYES.

THE words of thy speech are silver;
But oh, it is purest gold,
That language all unspoken which
Thine eloquent eyes unfold.

Hereafter, sages tell us,
Shall be no need of speech;
In the cloudless realm beyond, our thoughts
Shall flash from each to each.

The child in its early childhood,
Its young and innocent days,
Speaks, ere it learns to lisp a word,
With its strange, far-looking gaze.

Thou hast kept that angel-language
Through life's advancing years;
Not alone when thine eyes are lit with joy,
Or brimming o'er with tears;

But in life's less strong emotions,
Its myriad sympathies,
I can read thy spirit's inmost thought
In a glance of those speaking eyes.

Ere yet thy troth was plighted,
In happy days of old,
I gathered the secret of thy love
By those tell-tale eyes out-told.

Bless them for their revealment!
The charm that never dies—
The treasure that shall outlast this world—
The speech of those loving eyes?

MAUD'S MISHAPS.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

PERHAPS you can tell us what Maud has been saved for—we all want to know. Something, it is to be presumed, although it seems absurd to presume that any particular providence can be in store for such a flibbertigibbet as she—as gay, as pretty, as irresponsible as any autumn leaf that goes flitting about on the will of the wind. But Nurse Burr says nobody could have had the haps and mishaps by flood and field that have befallen Maud, and all for nothing; and what Nurse Burr says in our house is law and gospel too. So at every fresh escape of Maud's we have that old prophecy over.

"She is reserved for an uncommon fate," says Nurse Burr.

"Yes," answers Aunt Maria, who is Nurse Burr's great rival in the house, "to die in her bed. That is an uncommon fate nowadays—what with your railroads and your steamboats and your powder-mills."

"Dear me, Miss Maria!" cries Nurse Burr, "they ain't my railroads!"

At any rate, whether she is reserved to die in her bed or in somebody else's, Maud's mishaps have reached such a pass that we all of us tremble a little to get on a wherry or cross a bridge with her; and as for going to Boston on the same train, we wonder at the benighted beings that attempt it! Was not Maud in the boat that terrible night when the mast broke and the sprit snapped and the rudder came off? Was not Maud in the carry-all the afternoon when the horse deliberately walked out of the shafts, after a piece of hard pulling, and left us to get home the best way we could? Was not Maud on the picnic when every body got drenched to the skin, and had little thunder-bolts printed off on their dresses? in the surf when the under-tow took us all out? Have we ever had a family disaster in which Maud has not been the pivot and starting-point, so to say? She is, in fact, a sort of scape-goat, we have come to believe; for it really seems as if the rest of us were to go through life scot-free, because her little vicarious shoulders bear all the ills that, in a just allotment, could be distributed among a given number of people; and certainly it would reverse the whole order of nature to have more than one such Jonah in a household; for all these adventures of hers that I am telling you are literally true.

It is several years ago that Maud began her accidental career, if I may call it so; and she might have made her début upon the world of items, had there been a reporter ready, in the act of falling into the fire from the arms of the young girl with whom she had been left for a single moment. Probably Maud knew it was for a single moment, and therefore hurried to take advantage of her opportunity and hurl herself headlong into the open fire-place, and among the glowing coals and embers of the forestick. To be sure, her little guardian had the presence of mind to haul her out by the skirts before she set up her own frightened howl; and when they ran to the rescue from the next room, expecting to find the child more dead than alive, Miss Maud crowed and cooed in their faces from under the shelter of the singed blanket which had protected her head, as if quite satisfied with the trick she had played on them.

After that, except for the usual casualties of swallowed buttons and cents and pins, without which none of us can grow up wholesomely, of bites and bumps and scalds and scratches, Maud made no further call upon her powers, but allowed them to ripen; and we did not have another serious alarm on her ladyship's account until she was well in her third year, when she was found on the edge of an uncurbed well, away in the low field, holding by her hands, her head down, her heels up, while she admired the little girl, red-cheeked, bright-eyed, and with elf-locks hanging round that dimpled face which was doubtless laughing up at her from the dark glass below. Some of the old German tribes, in the days before fences, had a custom of impressing the ancient landmarks upon the children of the new generation by taking them to the boundaries on certain occasions and soundly boxing their ears there. I suppose mamma remembered this tradition; and as the well was to remain there, and remain uncurbed, and Maud's life was to go on for the present in its neighborhood, she felt it necessary to stamp her memory with the fact of its being forbidden ground (if a well can be called ground at all), and, stepping softly down behind her, she laid hold of the pretty imp and used her slipper on the spot.

It was only a couple of evenings after this that again Miss Maud was nowhere to be found. The house and garden were searched for her in vain; she answered no calls, no bells. Mamma began to fear that, after all, the little water-maiden in the well had been too much for her; and one ran to the field, and one to the neighbors, and there was lifting of voices and wringing of hands, when Aunt Maria bethought her of the spy-glass; and, sweeping the horizon with it, there on the high-road, nearly a mile away, and just where it entered a great wood in which our uncles shot many a bear and wolf and catamount, she saw a little figure with flying hair, prancing along on a stick as gayly as the ladies in the "Faëry Queen" ever rode on their piebald ponies. Of course then old sorrel soon caught up with her and brought her home; but no one had the heart to punish the little runaway, when thinking of the night that would presently have fallen round her in that dark wood—a night to which there would have been no dawning in this world for her!

But that was a little matter to Maud; she could do a great deal better than that in her own line—earnest of which she gave us by falling through a trap-door shortly afterward, and when we made haste to pick up her broken bones, we found her actively engaged at the cider barrel, apparently ignorant that there was any thing uncommon in that method of going down cellar. Still, all children tumble down cellar, and think nothing of it; and the next alarm she gave us was of a different character. This was when her little cousin Sam, a youth of about five years, came to spend the afternoon with her. Sam had passed a barn-yard on his way, where some lambs and calves had been butchered, after the disgusting fashion of our civilized cannibalism, and it occurred to the young aspirant to the cleaver that this would be a fine game for the afternoon's play, and quite a novel one; and straightway on his arrival, finding a willing subject, he prepared to put his idea into practice.

It was by the merest chance that somebody looked out of the window in the course of the next half hour, and saw Maud, ready for any new sensation, lying with her neck stretched on a block of wood, and the blood-thirsty little Sam resting the sharp edge of the axe on it before giving as decisive a blow as his slender arm was able. Nobody had time to call attention to this miniature tableau of the death of Mary Queen of Scots. Only a series of shrieks, resounding within the house, stayed the stroke; and as Maud was snatched away from her executioner, it positively seemed as if the tyke knew what he was about, for he looked up with scared eyes, and stammering, "I—I didn't make the bleed come!" scampered home as fast as his fat little red-stockinged legs could carry him; and as he afterward ran away to sea, I should not be at all surprised if some whaler brought us home news that Sam had been promoted to be King of the Cannibal Islands.

It must have been not far from this time that one cool day I perceived that pungent, fragrant smell in the air, often perceptible in autumn days from the smoke of burning woods, or the bon-fires of stalks and vines about the fields; and just as I wondered what made it so strong, I heard Miss Maud, who was springing up and down like a little flame herself, crying, "Come out here! come out here! Got boofle fiyeh!" and I went out—with one bucket of water, and with another; for the sprite had collected the dry dead leaves in a heap beneath the projecting beams of one corner of the house, had helped herself to a lucifer-match, or rather Lucifer had helped her to one, and had lit her fire, and the century-old dwelling-house was blazing like a torch.

This, however, was perhaps more one of our own mishaps than Maud's, though, as Nurse Burr said, it was all pretty much of a muchness. It was on this occasion that, in answer to my reproaches, Maud uttered her famous sentence—aphorism, I might say, since it was accepted and adopted by the whole house and race for a sort of by-word—"How dickolus you is, miss, and besurd besides, and silly too!" What a pretty sight the imp was in her anger then, with her flashing gray eyes, her flushing cheeks, and her dark and rumpled hair, stamping that tiny foot while apostrophizing me!—the image of a little gypsy, said Nurse Burr; and quite as wild as a hawk, said Aunt Maria. I am afraid we used to irritate her after that just for the picture of it.

I believe Maud's next exploit was tumbling into Beaver Brook. They called it a brook; it was as deep as a river, and running rapidly toward some falls. Dancing across the plank that bridged it, in the effort to escape some instance of Aunt Maria's impartial justice, presently the ripples and eddies had dizzied her brain, and over she went; while a parcel of children rose out of the ground, to all appearance, as children have a way of doing, and ran along the banks like hens whose ducklings had taken to the water, only with a million times the uproar. Of course she was fished out, though not till she had twice sunk, and was quite unconscious. A lame gentleman, sitting some way down the stream, waded in and caught her gown on his crutch, as she rose for the last time and was sweeping by on the current, and she was brought to shore and brought to life. Maud always made the most of this mishap; and the number of wonderful rehearsals of the journeys her spirit made during that wet and unconscious time, which she sang and recited to her companions, would make material for librettos to a dozen of the supernatural and demoniacal kind of operas.

Maud had now had so many adventures that she could have afforded to rest on her laurels; and, indeed, a repetition of kindred feats would have become so monotonous that she must needs look about her for some means of infusing a new life into them. She was ten years old; and if this sort of thing was to go on, it was high time that she should tack a moral to it now, or put some of the spirit of the heroine, a dash of martyrdom and self-sacrifice, into the play.

I can not affirm that she had any deep-laid scheme of this nature already prepared to hand when she tripped down the alley at sunset for her pitcherful of yeast, whirling and twirling on tiptoe as she went, never doing any thing in a straight line. I can see her now just as she looked then, a slender and dark little thing, lithe as a reed, the wind in her lilac frock and the sunset on her cheek, while she swung a certain small china pitcher for which she had an intense admiration, and for which she knew mamma had the same, as it was almost the only heir-loom left in the family. "Full of vinegar," said Nurse Burr, watching her; and she probably had not lost any of it as she came tripping and trilling back again up the alley with her yeast, and, running across the street suddenly, found four great shining hoofs trampling her into the dust.

I really should think it must have been a terrific moment to the child—whom the military gentleman on horseback, loftily conversing with the heavens, had entirely failed to observe—when she felt that great black beast above her, rearing and plunging, and, in his efforts not to destroy her, tearing the clothes from her back. She was lifted into the house directly, a mass of rags and bruises—for her shoes had been cut off her feet, her hat had become straws, her frock was torn from her shoulders, and every garment on her rent to shreds. But in her hand, unbroken through all the coil, was the china pitcher. She had held it up, safe, even in the very instant when she saw those four great flashing hoops flying round her head, and the whole cent's worth of yeast was there, with not a drop of it spilled. "Well, that's the crowner!" cried Nurse Burr.

"It came near being crowner's quest," said Aunt Maria. "You naughty child! If you'd looked before you crossed the street, you might have saved all this trouble!"

"Real knock-down argument," said Nurse Burr, as the other swept from the room. "Saved the trouble! She saved the yeast! Well, it's just as well every body shouldn't go to crying over you, you bad thing"—kissing her distractedly, and then bursting out crying herself till the tears ran into the arnica. "I'm sure I thought the child was dead as Chelsea. What's she saved for?" she exclaimed, as she had exclaimed twenty times before. "I can't tell, if 'tain't something!"

Perhaps it was for her next, and, up to date, her final act. This took place one evening in the nursery, as the children were making ready for bed around the air-tight stove, which they had stuffed full of pine-knots, so that an enormous blaze was roaring through its funnel into the chimney, and in some places it was sparkling and red-hot. Miss Maud, in the freedom of her flannel night-gear, had been capering round the room, according to her wont, and having tired of her antics, had, after a brief absence, reappeared among her sisters, behind a broom, wrapped in a sheet, to signify to them that when ghosts walked it was time to be in bed—faint crows of chanticleer, muffled by the bed-clothes, making chorus to her drama out of the inner room, where Laurence was already snugly ensconced. Immediately the terrified group scattered, quite according to expectation, and immediately the kerosene lamp tipped over, not according to expectation. Goodness only knows why there was no explosion and no sudden whirlwind of fire filling the place; but by a blessed chance the flame blew out in falling, and only the gales of Araby the blest; rising round them in the darkness, told that the carpet was soaked in the inflammable oil. But at the very moment of the scattering, the tumult, and the jumping answerable therefor, the front legs of the air-tight stove dropped from their support, and the red-hot thing was on the point of falling forward upon the oil-soaked carpet, when Maud caught it between her two arms, and held the fiery monster from falling, with all its furious and raging heat, till Aunt Maria rushed up, summoned by the united screams, when the stove was replaced, and she was lifted away nearly fainting, but not till the hand and wrist of both arms had been burned nearly to the bone; and she wears the deep scars now—scars, it seems to me, more honorable than ever any soldier won in any battle of them all. At any rate, I can well imagine that to little Maud herself there are the flames of all the martyrs burning in them.

But here the record of Maud's mishaps pauses. It is to be presumed that the mishaps themselves will accompany her through life; yet whether she stumbles at the altar on her wedding-day, or falls off the Yosemite on her bridal tour, or sprains her ankles just as the prince asks her to dance, or meets with direr downfall yet, one thing is certain—however she falls, she will always fall on her feet. Still it is possible that all these promises of her youth are delusive, and she turns out as commonplace as the rest of us. There may be no more mishaps for her at all; for, beginning with fire and ending with fire, the circle may be said to be complete.

"But, Lor'!" says Nurse Burr, "you might as well expect the quicksilver not to rise in the glass as Maud not to get into mischief. Danger is a sort of shadow of hers. But to think," adds Nurse Burr—not regretfully, I am sure, for she loves the subject of her remark like a mother, but yet with a puzzled intonation over Maud's anachronism in coming so much too late—"but to think! all these happenings, and no harm done! Why, they'd 'a hung her for a witch two hundred years ago. What's all that to-do at the door, Aunt Maria?" asks Nurse Burr, suddenly turning about. "Lord bless my soul, if they ain't bringing that child in on a shutter!"

LIVING IN GERMANY.

AMERICAN INCOMPLIANCE.

WE repeat emphatically that, to receive the full benefits of living in Germany, it is necessary to conform more or less to its peculiarities. The American is apt to carry with him into foreign countries a self-assertion which is so marked as to have become a national characteristic. He is thus recognized every where as distinctly as if he wore a perpetual wrapper of stars and stripes. It is not only that he is ever ready, as he should be, to assert his claims to citizenship in a country of which he has reason to be proud, but he too often presumes upon its supposed expansibility of privilege. Independence at home he thinks entitles him to be "a chartered libertine" abroad. He thus scorns to pay that transient allegiance due from every traveler to the foreign land the hospitality and protection of which he is temporarily enjoying. He is often rudely impatient of the formalities and restraints which are, or are supposed to be, necessary to keep in check a people who have not learned self-control in self-government. Reflecting how imperfectly this lesson has been acquired even in his own country, with all the facilities its freedom from authoritative interference may give, he might surely reconcile himself to the more or less official peremptoriness which constrains in foreign countries individual caprice, but secures general order.

For example, the administration of the railways in Germany, which is certainly admirable in effecting the great results of exactness and safety in travel, is associated with a great variety of forms and regulations. These, with their barriers, their locked-up waiting and refreshment rooms, their peremptory orders to go here or go there, do this or do that, guarded and imposed by vigilant and resolute gens-d'armes, are, no doubt, vexatious to most American travelers. Permitted at home to move every where without constraint, with nothing but the faint warning, Look out for the locomotive, to protect them against the chances of a crushed limb or life, they may possibly be more cautious, but they are certainly less safe. The increased safety, even with the diminished cautiousness, which, when necessary, creates anxiety and destroys the pleasure of travel, is not dearly purchased, we think, by conforming to a few regulations, apparently arbitrary, but probably essential to the system. Whether so or not, we advise our countrymen not to attempt to assert their independence; for their willfulness will be sure to receive a check, and their comfort and respect as travelers a sensible diminution.

There are certain forms of ceremony and outward acts of courtesy with which the American, unaccustomed at home to bow his head to king or kaiser, refuses when abroad to comply. He is apt to regard all such as so many deductions from his own boasted equality. They by no means, however, imply a recognition of superiority, or an acknowledgment of inferiority. They are, on the continent of Europe, merely expressions, for the most part, of mutual courtesy. In Germany a much greater social equality prevails than in our republican land. We have, in spite of our political divergence from England, retained a great deal of the caste distinctions, in our manners at least, of that aristocratic country. The relations between the rulers and ruled, between the magistrate and citizen, the merchant and tradesman, the employer and workman, the master and servant, the rich and the poor, are in Germany much less indicative of social difference than with us. The ceremonious observances which universally exist are seldom regarded as tributes to rank, authority, or power. They are bestowed equally upon all. The master of the German hotel, who is the most flexible and varied of posture-masters, expects and receives from his own countrymen, whatever their rank, bow for bow, salutation for salutation. The veriest drudge of serving-girls, yet smutty with her labor, as she brings your polished boots, must have her claim to the title of fräulein (miss) distinctly recognized. All tradesmen and tradeswomen, servants and laborers, salute and are saluted—in Heidelberg at least. There is much that is wearisome, perhaps, in this constant bowing and scraping; but there is nothing in it indicating servility on the one hand or domination on the other; and we advise our countrymen not to insist too much upon their undoubted legal right to keep their hats on their heads, and retain their national perpendicular on all occasions.

Digitized by Google

There is another manner of self-assertion which is offensive to good taste every where, but more especially so in Europe. We allude to a habit which is particularly characteristic of American travelers—of making themselves conspicuous by their ostentatiously costly modes of dress and living. Many of our countrymen seem to move up and down the Continent for no other purpose than to jingle in the hearing of strangers the money in their pockets. If Americans are desirous of asserting their ability to buy expensive articles and pay enormously for them, they can be abundantly gratified in Germany, as elsewhere; but we need not say that this is fatal to all plans of economical living. Less of that show of money and pretension of indifference to its waste common to most Americans would secure them every where on the continent of Europe more consideration from the disinterested, and satisfaction from those who benefit by their expenditure.

DANCING AN IRISH JIG BEFORE ROYALTY.

See illustration on double page.

GLENDALOUGH is a pretty valley nestled amidst the Wicklow hills, celebrated for its round tower, raised in pagan times as an altar to the sun-god, and surrounded by seven old churches, the ruined relics of a later and a Christian age. Some way past these antiquities lies that lake over whose dark wavelets rises "the beetling rock," with the little cave half-way up its face, wherein the good St. Kevin sought refuge from the witchery of Kathleen's eyes. From the opposite shore ascends a richly wooded hill, where the dark foliage of the fir blends with the lighter shade of the feathery larch, while here and there peeps out a neat whitewashed cottage, with gay garden. On Saturday, August 5, there was a mighty bustle around the hotel at Glendalough, since it was rumored among the country folk that the "Seven Churches" were to be honored by a visit from royalty that day. Some rude extempore signs of welcome were raised by willing but inexperienced hands. A laurel arch spanned the gate-way of the hotel, while numerous bits of colored bunting fluttered about the gardens of the same. Close by, upon a slight eminence, was gathered a group of peasantry, watching to catch the first glimpse of "the royal cars." About half past twelve a dense cloud of dust and the sound of furious driving heralded the near approach of the august visitors. "Here they come! here they come!" is the cry; and in a few minutes, greeted by right hearty cheers, the carriages dash up, from whence alight the Prince of Wales, Prince Arthur, the Princess-Marchioness of Lorne, the Lord-Lieutenant, and the Countess Spencer, accompanied by a distinguished suite of lords and ladies. A great man that morning was Jem Bro', the well-known guide of Glendalough, habited in a long frieze coat, white corduroy knee-breeches, and black worsted stockings—the once prevalent but now almost extinct costume of the Irish peasant. A great man was Bro'—indeed, quite the Lord Mayor of "the churches" for the day; and as he strutted before the assembled people, many were the speculations as to the number of "goolden guineas" his services would gain for him. Nor did Bro' prove one whit unequal to the occasion. Under his guidance the royal party was led around the ruins and the tombs of the old church-yard, by the tall tower, by the magic cross, too, embraced by every fair lady desirous of being married happily and soon; and all the while, in his own quaint way, he narrated the legends, often the coinage of his own fertile fancy, which marked each sacred spot. After the royal party had lunched, a military band, judiciously stationed some distance away, struck up a lively strain, and then, with Bro's exertions, some of the lads who stood around were induced to dance in pairs together, and with no small difficulty two country girls were persuaded to join; but either their shyness, or rather, perhaps, their ill-becoming assumed stateliness, in some degree marred the performance. The dancing, however, did not pass off without causing some amusement. An ancient matron, of extremely goodly proportions, who styles herself "Kathleen," claiming to be the representative of St. Kevin's fair persecutor, presented herself upon the board, offering to exhibit her powers. And in downright earnest was the offer made; for Bro' being chosen as a partner, away the pair footed it with marvelous agility and skill, notwithstanding the physical obstacles, at all events, on the lady's side. In the evening, after a row on the lake, the royal party gathered round a tea-table, which, the evening proving so fine, was laid out upon the shore. While thus engaged an old country granny, one of the real old style, clad in long blue cloak, with coal-scuttle bonnet and crooked stick, whether moved by admiration of the "tay" or his Royal Highness it is left to conjecture, drew near to where the Prince of Wales was sitting. Instantly, to the unbounded delight of all her clan, the Prince presented her with one of those never-enough-to-be-wondered-at "goolden" chairs, handing her a cup of tea at the same time. It was quite a picture to see the old creature, who seemed thoroughly to appreciate her position, and freely chatted to the great ones about her, as if all her life accustomed to the presence of royalty. Not one solitary policeman or other official was present during the entire day, yet there was not a single instance by which the respectful order observed by the poor people was in any way disturbed. The beautiful illustration which we give represents the first part of the entertainment alluded to. In the foreground are seen the familiar faces of the Prince of Wales, Princess Louise, and Prince Arthur, flanked by the numerous dignitaries of their train, while before them the sturdy guide and the handsome Irish girl, his partner, seem lost in the exhilaration of their national dance, and forgetful of the presence of royalty.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

HEREAFTER the year 1871 will be marked in history as that in which occurred the great fire of Chicago, even as 1666 has been noted for the great fire in London. Exactly how large a loss of life and property is involved in the desolation which has fallen upon the Garden City may not be known for weeks, if, indeed, it is ever fully known; for Chicago was connected by thousands of fibres with every part of the country, and the suffering from this calamity falls every where. By the great fire in London 13,200 houses were destroyed, and 200,000 persons were forced to encamp in the open fields. In fact, five-sixths of the metropolis were laid in ruins. But London was not linked with the English nation in such intimate relations as Chicago is with our own country. And while the suffering involved in this last great fire is far more wide-spread, on the other hand the sympathy awakened and the aid tendered are infinitely more abounding. It is one of the benefits growing out of this dire calamity that the sympathies of the whole community are aroused. It is good for men and women to have their hearts stirred, and their warmer, better feelings drawn out. This event has touched the heart-depths of every one worthy to bear the impress of humanity. The rich have given of their abundance, the poor of their poverty. It is better than a sermon to read among the records of donations to Chicago, "A Poor Friend, 20 cents." No such spontaneous and lavish aid was tendered to London in 1666 as that which has flowed into the desolated Western city ever since the first knowledge of need was spread through the country. Such willing charity does honor to our age and to our country. From foreign countries, too, help is coming. England opens her hand. She remembers that in times of famine America has fed the starving in her dominions. Wide-spread calamities like this appalling conflagration open the heart of love and charity in all lands, and unclasp purses seldom loosened by ordinary benevolent calls.

Almost every great city in Europe is raising subscriptions to relieve the Chicago sufferers.

Why did Mrs. Stowe reveal this to the world? Why tell the history of many households by saying that a woman armed with sick headache, debility, nervousness, presentiments, and all sorts of imaginary and real ailments, is a walking armory of weapons of subjugation?

An exchange states that the eminent Dr. Hopkins is giving the Senior Class of Williams College lectures on the catechism. Several ladies, being desirous to attend these lectures, requested the privilege. Among these ladies were Dr. Hopkins's wife and the wife of President Chadbourne. But the gallant Senior Class said "No."

A German chemist, Dr. Schwarz, gives a simple recipe, by which he says he has kept for eight days a piece of ice weighing six pounds: Put the ice into a deep dish, cover it with a plate, place the dish on a pillow stuffed with feathers, and carefully cover the top with another pillow, thus excluding the external air. Feathers are well-known non-conductors of heat, and thus ice is preserved from melting.

The completion of the European and North American Railway will secure uninterrupted rail communication between Bangor and St. John. Eventually this will turn the current of European travel from New York to Halifax by rail, and thence by steamer to Liverpool and other foreign ports.

A lady who has had the temerity to visit Tuckerman's Ravine, on Mount Washington, has communicated to the Boston Journal the difficulties she encountered in the excursion. These seem to have consisted chiefly in the opposition she met with from every one when it was known she meditated a trip regarded hazardous. She believes, however, that it is not only possible but safe for any lady possessing good health and a moderate amount of courage to take the walk through Tuckerman's Ravine. She, at least, accomplished it, and felt amply repaid by the magnificent views. She clothed herself in a short water-proof suit, and with thick walking boots and a bamboo staff fared much better than did a gentleman who accompanied her, who, having arrayed himself for his day's work in tight-fitting broadcloth pantaloons, returned with naught but a few rags fluttering in the breeze to proclaim the departed glory of his garments.

The pier of the Brooklyn Bridge has now reached a height of about fifty feet on the Long Island side, and the work is rapidly progressing. The caisson is being sunk on the New York side, but the work is very difficult because of the tides.

The great fire of Chicago broke out on Sunday evening—the fire of the day before having been extinguished. On the Tuesday following an order was received in Buffalo from a Chicago merchant for 250,000 bricks, to commence rebuilding—a good indication of Western enterprise.

What cupidity and baseness could be more shamefully contemptible than that which led fiends in human form, in the midst of the burning horrors of Chicago, to plunder, to rob helpless sufferers, and even to attempt to extend the disaster by incendiary acts? Such deeds make every one with a spark of humanity ashamed and indignant.

A magnificent gold service for the personal use of the Sultan of Turkey has recently been manufactured by goldsmiths in Manchester, England. The service consists of one soup plate, a large hash dish, five large dinner plates, and five dessert plates—all of solid 18-carat gold. They are of circular shape, perfectly plain in design, with the exception of the ornamented edges, and are of exquisite workmanship. There are also solid gold knives, spoons, and forks to match. The spoons and forks are of the thread and shell pattern. The total value of the service is £1200. It is interesting to know that a "large hash dish" is provided for the Sultan's use. This fact should reconcile the occupants of large boarding-houses to their situation.

Perhaps there never was a more remarkable sight than 50,000 or 75,000 men, women, and children fleeing for their lives from the burning streets of Chicago. The wooden pavement, taking fire, made a continuous sheet of flame for miles.

Along the line of the Union Pacific Railroad are millions of acres of rich government land which may be obtained under the provisions of the Free Homestead act. By this law every head of a family, widow, or unmarried person over the age of twenty-one years, may have eighty acres as a free gift if they will come and occupy the land. The emigration to Nebraska has been about sixty thousand since last March.

It shows a lack of consideration and good sense to keep a caller waiting in a too often dark and cheerless parlor for ten or twenty minutes while you dress yourself elaborately. If possible, receive your visitors promptly, and in any dress you may happen to have on, provided it be neat. Moreover, parlors always should be supplied with books, pictures, or something attractive to callers, so that they need not sit in gloomy idleness if they are forced to wait for you.

It would be interesting could we know in fuller details than have been given to the public the habits of life by which Jacob Fournais, that last "oldest man," reached the extraordinary age of one hundred and thirty-four years. That he came from Canada at the youthful age of seventy, and died a few weeks ago in Kansas City, we are informed. Also, that he was never sick, that he was neat in person, and liked quiet seclusion. Moreover, as he is said to have kept pipe and tobacco in his house, we conclude he smoked. But upon numerous other points physiologists will desire to be informed, as well as those who fancy that the same regimen will produce the same results in all cases. Did he drink coffee, or practice gymnastics before breakfast? Did he bathe twice a day, or only twice a week? Did he "never take a drop?" Did he eschew meat, and sleep with his window open in the dead of winter? And how many miles a day did he walk?

Physicians and shoe-makers say that scarcely any young lady who calls herself fashionable is free from corns, bunions, and enlarged joints on the feet. Even the feet of little girls are ruined by wearing wrongly constructed shoes. As a necessary consequence the gait is awkward. Let sensible women—especially now that fashion authorizes a low-heeled boot—release their feet from the harmful pressure resulting from too high heels, and resolve never to allow a foolish fashion again to make walking a misery.

Cod-liver oil butter may be as palatable as butter made from genuine cream, provided one does not know what he is eating. Perhaps that ingenious pharmaceutist thought so who has adopted the plan of administering cod-liver oil to his patients in the form of a condiment to bread. He also recommends mixing it with mustard, egg, and sundry other ingredients, for salad dressing. Every one to his liking. We should prefer our cod-liver oil in its original, unadulterate state, and our food distinct from medicine.

The Chinese visiting card is a huge sheet of scarlet paper, the name inscribed in large characters the better. There are several sizes of cards. That which is used on very [illegible] sessions is folded ten times, and to the [illegible] is written in the right-hand lower [illegible] edized the words, "Your stupid [illegible]," or "Your more than stupid [illegible] case may be), "bows his head and [illegible] pects." The depreciatory appellation is a favorite one, but there are other [illegible] self-designation. It is etiquette to [illegible] card to the visitor, it being presumably, too expensive for general distribution.

An English physician states that in a single year he, as coroner for Middlesex, held a hundred inquests on children found suffocated in bed by the sides of their mothers, and in nine cases out of ten he attributes these deaths to the gross ignorance of the mother with regard to the laws which govern the life of the child. Such ignorance seems amazing to those who realize that an infant's lungs require air, but indicates the necessity of teaching physiology to women of all classes, and of giving to young girls such hygienic instruction as is essential for the preservation of life and health.

Gardening is one of the best forms of out-door exercise for women. Within a few years past many country ladies have experienced the invigorating effect of employing a couple of hours every day in the lighter kinds of garden-work. We know a village where it is the fashion for ladies thus to occupy a part of their time. They do not cultivate fruits and vegetables for the market, but their own tables are bountifully supplied with strawberries, raspberries, currants, pears, apples, tomatoes, melons, and sundry [illegible]ables, all in their own season, and chi[illegible] of their own industry. A [illegible] springs up as to the size and [illegible] articles thus raised. The gardens present a peculiar appearance of neatness and bright [illegible] scattered and there give a most cheerful aspect.

The following characteristic anecdote is related of John Randolph: He was engaged to a beautiful Virginia girl, but was one day seen to leave her father's residence in unusual agitation. It appeared that the lady's father had proposed that Mr. Randolph should settle a sum of money upon the bride, whereupon the spirited lover remarked, "It is not my purpose to purchase. When I desire to purchase, I shall go to the cheapest market—I shall go to Africa."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NAOMI.—Heavy black gros grain dresses, lightened by white lace or muslin pleatings, are often worn in ball-rooms.

JANE.—Make your black silk by the Marguerite Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 37, Vol. IV.

B. R.—You do not need a white bonnet. Get a plum-colored silk suit trimmed with velvet, and have a bonnet to match of the silk and velvet.

CONSTANT READER.—Make a box-pleated habit shirt of scarlet or blue merino, or of flannel, for your daughter to wear with her plaid skirts left from last winter.

MISS M. J. M.—Your samples are blue Lyons poplin and black armure silk. Of course the dress skirt should be the darkest of the two shades of a suit.—A wife retains her husband's arm while walking up the aisle to a seat at a public entertainment, but there is no rule for unmarried people. Usually the gentleman precedes the lady and finds a seat for her.

F. C. E.—Make your blue silk by cut paper pattern of the Worth Basque Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV. Your fringe will trim it stylishly.

JACINTA.—The polonaise costume is what you need. Use either the Marguerite or the Louis XIV. illustrated in Bazar No. 39, Vol. IV. Make the vest and trimmings of velvet.

NELLIE N.—Get a plum-colored suit entirely of silk, or of cashmere over silk. Your gray silk suit with hat to match will be appropriate for you.

S. L. G.—We furnish no cut paper patterns but those set down in our advertised list.

TWO SISTERS.—In rugs the stripes should all be of the same pattern, alternating with plush stripes. The same is true of furniture, though ottoman reps is as satisfactory as plush. A single tapestry stripe down chairs is sufficient, but a sofa requires more stripes. Brown, green, or gray reps would suit you. Variety in the design of the tapestry stripe is preferable to having all the furniture of the same stripe.

MAY.—For hints about making a black silk suit consult Bazar No. 33, Vol. IV.

CARL'S MOTHER.—A long, simply shaped sacque with a deep round cape, all made of black velveteen or brown corduroy, with flannel lining, is the winter cloak for your boy. Get a black velvet turban or a brown one with a fur band.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Get a Marguerite polonaise of brown cashmere the same shade or lighter than your brown silk. Trim it with braiding and fringe, or silk folds or pleatings, and you will have a most stylish fall suit.

LIZZIE M. R.—We approve your taste in selecting your traveling suit, and do not think it too dark. Your idea of the lovely gray silk, velvet polonaise, etc., is also good. Use the Marguerite polonaise suit pattern for your blue, and the Worth basque pattern for your gray dress.

ADMIRER, OF MEADVILLE.—Direct to the firm you mention, Broadway, New York city. Tinted paper with colored initial costs $1 a quire, with envelopes marked to match.—You should make a party call, whether you attended the party or not.

LILLIE.—Keep your geraniums through the winter in as equable a temperature as possible, and water them when the earth in the pot seems to require it. We decline to answer your other questions.

MARY E. S.—We can not tell you, or the many others who ask our counsel on this subject, how to earn a livelihood for yourself and your children.

KEYSTONE STATE.—Are fish caught in a thunder-storm never good? and do the French remove the hearts of their monarchs and marshals before burial? We did not know it.

NANNIE AND JENNIE.—It is so manifestly impossible for us to commend special summer or winter resorts in this column that we are surprised at your question.

EARNEST.—An author who writes under an assumed name usually has confidence enough in his publishers to intrust them with his address. Your other questions are too trivial to answer.

E. N.—We don't know.

M. H. V.—The Marguerite polonaise pattern sent you is one of the best models for a black cashmere polonaise, and also for one of Swiss muslin to wear over your green silk. Arrange a ruffle or lace in vest shape on your corsage.

MISS C. H. L.—We can not give you addresses. Examine Bazar advertisements for the information you want.

MRS. G. V. L.—Make your gray suit by Marguerite polonaise pattern sent you, or by the Louis XIV. vest-polonaise, with vest and bias bands of black silk. A Watteau paletot is the model for your black gros grain. Trim with gimp and fringe.

MRS. H. S.—Twenty-five cents buy the whole set of patterns, six in number, for an infant's wardrobe. Any of the furnishing houses quoted in our columns will send you well-made clothing for infants. We do not reply by mail.

MRS. G. L. M.—We know of no New York dressmaker of repute who will do what you wish. We can not reply by mail.

MRS. KATE K.—The gray poplin will look best trimmed with velvet of the same shade. Make the silk by our Marguerite polonaise pattern, trimmed with pleatings of the same.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—A Watteau paletot of velvet will be handsome for winter.

E. R.—A mantle just imported is very similar to the Metternich. Black satin is not much worn at present.

W. H. C.—We furnish no patterns but those named in our advertised list.

MRS. T.—We have published designs for working letters on canvas.

DOROTHEA.—We have given many designs for slippers, and shall probably give more.

C. A. B.—Your sample is plaid serge, and would dye black. Make a double cape trimmed with fringe. The silk sample is not as good as the quality usually sold here for $3. The narrow flat silk braid called soutache, or else round cord, is used for braiding.

MRS. E. P. B.—Use the over-skirt pattern of the Vest-Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 41, Vol. IV. Bias velvet and ribbon of the color of the dress are used.

F. A. F.—The kilt pleating is fastened top and bottom before it is sewed on, or else is stitched down afterward. Use alpaca folds, or else silk.

L. M. C.—The Marguerite polonaise pattern is suitable for both of your fabrics, and may be worn in-doors as well as out. Trim the gray with bias black silk bands; the grenadine with ruffles. Make pearl gray silk with demi-train and basque, trimmed with white lace.

MISS N. E. W.—Lengthwise bands of velvet may be sewed plainly on the skirt without kilt pleats.

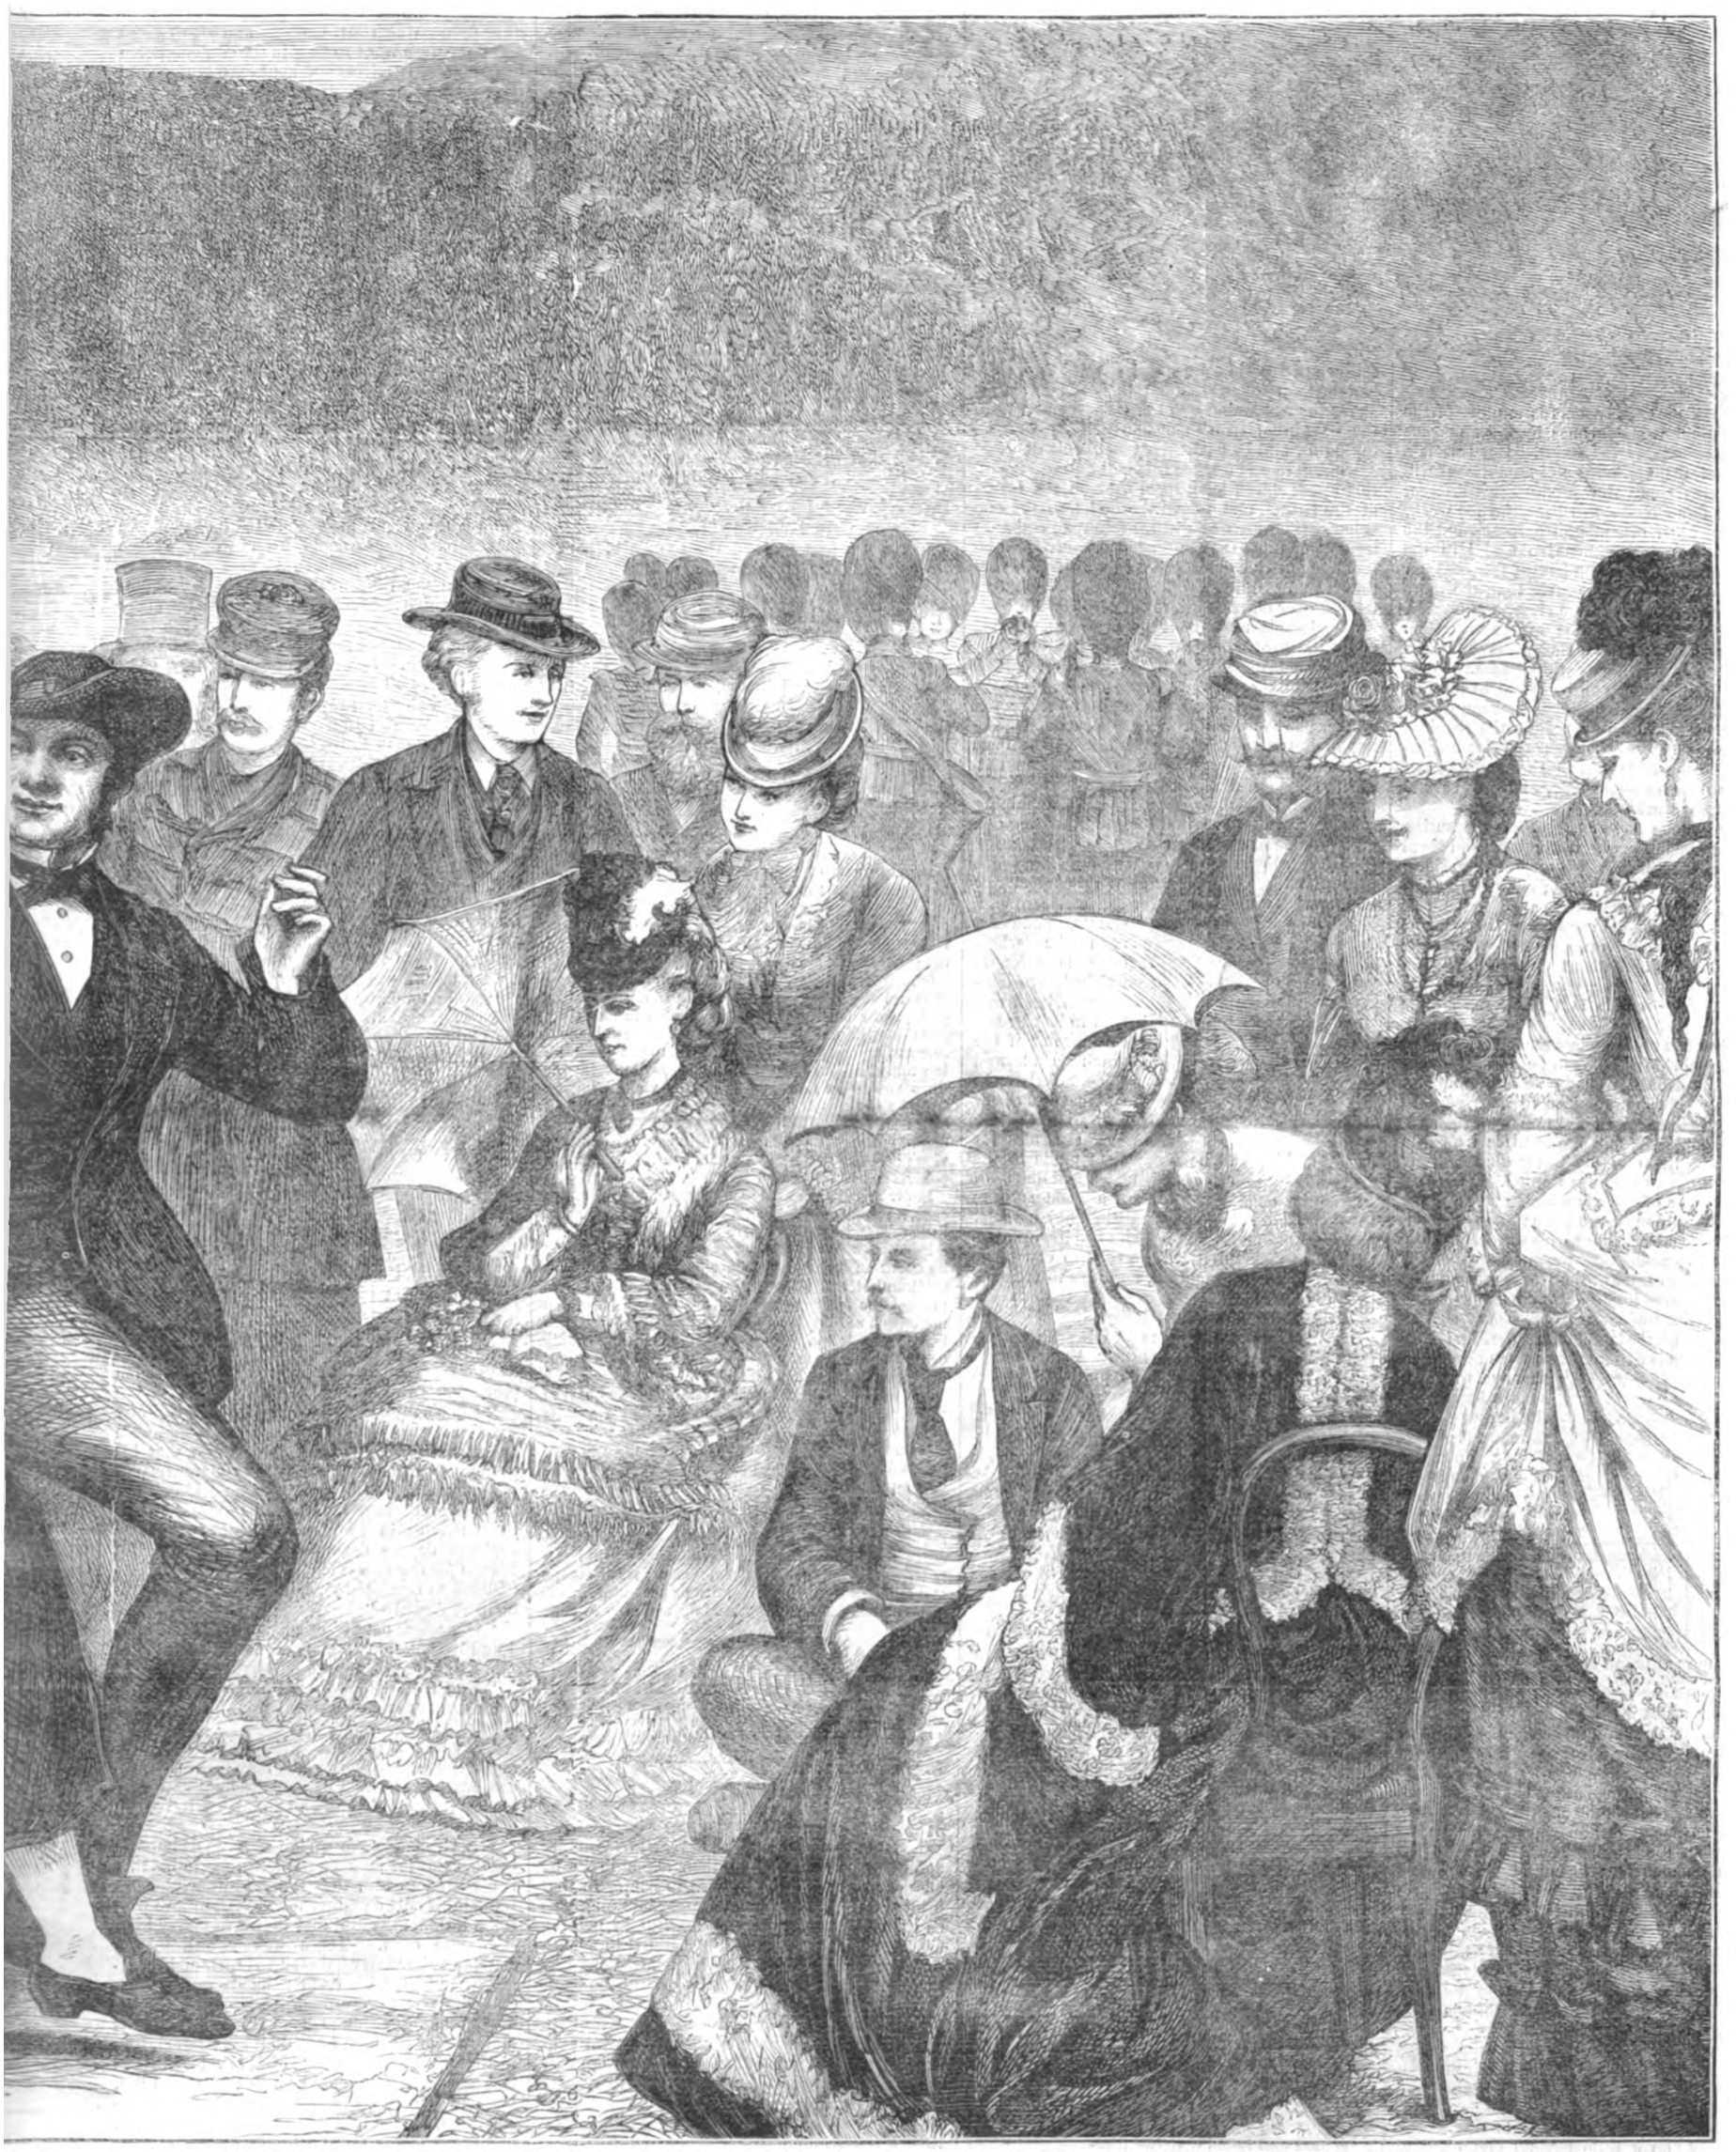
L. T. G.—The Bazar advises that suit skirts should escape, not touch, the ground.

E. H. B.—Make a black silk suit with a polonaise, either the Marguerite or that with Louis XIV. vest. Get a black cashmere polonaise to wear with other skirts.

Digitized by Google

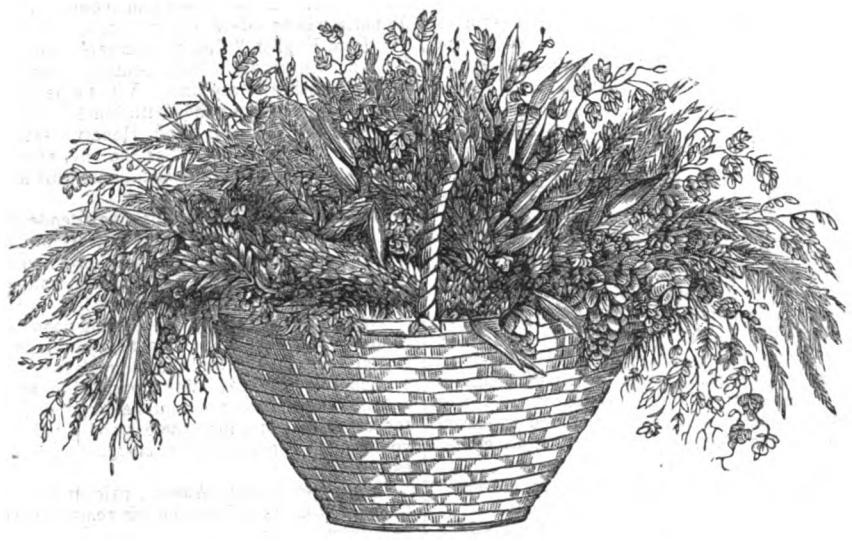
DANCING AN IRISH JIG.

Digitized by Google



ROYALTY.—[See Page 695.]

Digitized by Google



BASKET-MAKING.

THE art of making baskets is another of the useful and valuable ones by most persons considered unsuitable for ladies. But this is a mistake, as a little practice and experiment will show. Not only may they produce the different varieties of fancy baskets so beautiful for work, flowers, and other ornamental purposes, but the strong, substantial specimens so useful in the family may be readily manufactured from coarser materials, with even less trouble than the more delicate kinds and diminutive sizes.

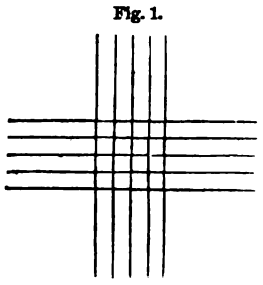
With ladies, the only part of the operation impracticable for them to undertake is the "getting out," or preparing of the splints. Some male friend, no doubt, can be found to do this, or they can be bought very cheaply from a basket-maker. In order to ascertain the required length, measure any basket near the size intended, from the top edge (outside) around and underneath to the opposite side, allowing several inches over for working.

Thus, to make a square basket measuring nine by nine inches across the bottom, and three and one-half in height, with spreading sides, have prepared ten thin splints of oak or ash wood (the latter rather preferable), each to be two feet long, and three-quarters of an inch wide; also fourteen narrow ones, each three feet nine inches in length, and about one-quarter of an inch wide; besides these, one or two long thin ones for the edge, and a stiff thick one for the handle.

First, the ends of the splints must be somewhat sharpened and shaven so as to be thin, and then should all be soaked well for several hours in warm water (if the water cools before you are ready to use them it will not matter); this will render them pliable, and easily to be bent into shape. Keep them in the water all the time, taking them out as they are wanted.

Now take five of the ten widest ones, and lay them side by side upon the table; then take out the sixth one, and weave it across the first five, by taking up and passing over the alternate splints; leave it near the centre of the row, and then take another and weave it across in like manner, covering and passing under the alternate ones, so as to form squares with the last splint. (See Fig. 1.) In this way the whole five must be woven across the first five, when the square bottom of the basket will be formed; be particular, however, that the ends of the splints on all the sides be as nearly even as possible, and that they be pulled closely together, so as to look compact. Now, if the wood has become dry, the centre or woven part may be laid in the water again, as the splints will be either brittle or altogether unmanageable if allowed to become dry. When well moistened, fold down the splints close to the edge of the weaving, laying them flat upon the bottom, but turning all the same way, toward the centre, and so as to form an even line along the square. Give a little blow with the hammer, so as to make the bend more certain; fold the opposite side toward the first, and so on with all four sides: this will cause them to stand upright to form the sides of the basket.

Fig. 1.



SPLINTS LAID IN PLACE TO COMMENCE THE BASKET.

If the sides are to be spreading, so as to form a very shallow basket, these side splints may be split with a knife down to where they fold upward from the bottom; but if straight-sided are preferred, they may be left broad.

Next take one of the narrow splints, which should be well moistened, and weave it around, leaving an inch or two at the end you begin with; draw the sides in an upright position as you interlace the splint, and when it is carried entirely around, go a little beyond and overlap, pushing in the ends so that they will be well secured and concealed under the upward splints. When this first lateral splint is in its place the others will be comparatively easy, and thus the whole twelve which are to build up the sides may be woven closely around; the shaping is to be done as these are being put in by spreading slightly the upright splints, in order to give the sides the desired spread.

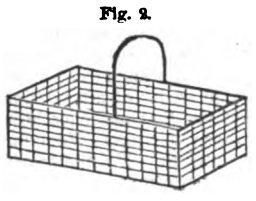
When the whole twelve are thus in place the edge is to be finished, and if the ends of the splints are dry, they must again be wet thoroughly; then cut them off about an inch and a half above the last lateral splint, and sharpen or shave them slightly; trim them down close above the top splint, and be particular how this is done.

Taking one at a time, if it come up outside of this upper splint, let it bend over on the inside of the basket, and weave the end into the one below. The next one will, of course, come up inside, and must therefore bend outward, and be tucked into the outer one below; in this way they will be finished off all round, alternately folding over either on the inside or outside.

The handle must next be prepared. First, cut it the proper length, allowing for the space where it is fastened inside. Make a notch about an inch and a half from the ends, they also being whittled down to a thin edge, and being of a thicker piece of wood, it will require a good soaking in hot water; while pliable it can be bent into shape, and the ends inserted between two splints inside of the basket.

When this is done, take the two remaining splints with the long thin one, and holding one on each side of the upper row, along the top of the basket, begin to wrap or twine the thin splint over the edge, bringing it through the upper row of interstices, and then over the treble row of splints, in and out, until the whole edge is strongly finished. The handle will be firmly held in its place by this means, if the notch is allowed to come below the rim just described. (See Fig. 2.)

Fig. 2.



THE BASKET COMPLETED.

These rules for basket-making will be a sufficient guide to the art; the one described will be a medium-sized, substantial one, and therefore a good style to learn on; but for the pretty little fancy baskets, use very thin and delicate white splints, and if a pattern is at hand it will be easy to count the number of splints required, and also to measure their length.

By coloring the splints before beginning the work with some staining material, such as extract of logwood, Vandyck brown, Venetian red, etc., a pretty variety may be produced in the fancy baskets.

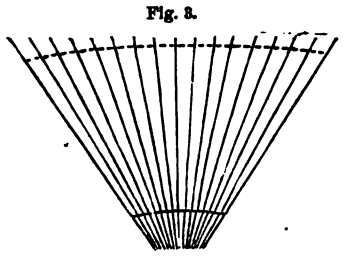
Baskets of another and rather different style, extremely delicate and graceful, are made from the white rye straws, and are beautiful for holding mosses, sea-weeds, dried grasses, etc.

Select perfect straws of new rye, and split them into fine splints; then separate the narrowest ones, which should not be thicker than crochet spool cotton. About twelve or fifteen will be sufficient for the purpose. The remainder should be rather broader, and as nearly as possible of equal width.

Lay them in a saucer of water for half an hour or more before you are ready to begin your basket. Now take a small piece of muslin—say five inches square—place the narrow straws, one at a time, on it, and sew the ends on to the muslin (along one edge) closely together. (See Fig. 3.)

When all are secured, spread out the straws over the muslin in a fan shape, and sew the other ends down in this position to the muslin, so as to look as represented in the cut.

Fig. 3.



SPLINTS ARRANGED FOR A BASKET OF STRAW.

Now, when this is done, take one of the broader splints and begin weaving it across, and when entirely through, pull it down as near as possible to the bottom row of stitching. Then another and another of the splints may be interlaced, alternating in basket fashion, until enough are woven to make the basket high enough to be well-proportioned.

These little straw splints dry very quickly, and therefore it will be necessary occasionally to lay the whole in water.

The basket may now be shaped and finished by trimming off the superfluous edges of the muslin, but allowing sufficient margin for turning in all around; then turn in the top, splints, muslin, and all, sew it down slightly by a few stitches on the under side, and afterward the sides and bottom in the same way, and tack it neatly on to the card-board with needle and thread, the stitches not being allowed to show on the right side.

The handle is formed of a broader splint of the straw, a narrow one with the wrong side turned outward being twined around it. One end of this handle is stitched to the card, and the other to the inside of the basket, so as, when finished, to look something like the cut at the commencement of this article.

The mosses, dried flowers, grasses, or seaweed may then be tastefully gummed into it, and arranged so as to fill it up well, and also to fall over the edge gracefully. When placed in a passe-partout frame, or in one having a convex glass, it will make a beautiful ornament for the parlor wall.

This is an excellent way of preserving mementos of noted places or travel, and when protected in this way from the air and dust, will last for many years.

MADRIGAL.

O DOVE, that dost bewail thy love
As I do mine,
Would that my woe could find the facile flow
Thou hast for thine!

In every wood I hear thy voice
In loud lament,
While I am fain to send the sounds of pain
To banishment.

Yet I divine thy heart and mine
Know the same grief;
But thine has utterance, while silent tears
Are my relief.

Let us divide our burdens, then:
Mourn thou for me;
And I, who am too proud to moan aloud,
Will weep for thee!

USEFUL RECIPES.

APPLE MERINGUE.—Stew the apples, run through a colander, flavor with lemon, and sweeten to the taste. To every quart of the apples, after cooking, allow five eggs; beat the whites very stiff, grease a piece of white paper very well with butter, place in a pan, pile the whites on the paper, and put into a hot oven, where they will brown in about three minutes; slip off the paper on the apples; eat cold with cream.

SPICED PLUMS.—Tie in a thin muslin bag one tablespoonful of cloves, the same quantity of allspice in the grain, and a small portion of cinnamon in the stick; put this with one pint of vinegar and three pounds of sugar in a porcelain saucepan to boil; after boiling a few minutes pour hot over six pounds of plums; for three successive mornings drain the vinegar off the fruit, boil, and pour over hot. Then put plums and all over the fire, give them a good boil, and, removing the bag of spice, bottle the fruit and liquor Peaches are very nice done in the same manner, only taking seven pounds of fruit instead of six.

LIGHT BISCUIT FOR TEA.—One quart of new milk, two eggs, a tea-cupful of yeast, a table-spoonful of lard, a little salt, and flour enough to make a stiff dough.

BEEFSTEAK WITH OYSTER SAUCE.—The steak should be about an inch thick, tender and juicy. Have the gridiron hot, and rub with a small piece of butter to prevent the meat sticking. Broil it carefully, and do not season until done; then lay in a dish, cover tightly, and keep it hot. In a very little juice stew twenty or thirty oysters; season, and add a little cream; pour hot over the steak, and serve.

For lemon-water ice a very good rule is one quart of water, juice of four lemons, and one and a quarter pounds of white sugar.

OMELET SOUFFLÉ.—Break the yolks of six fresh eggs into a basin, beat them until light, add a very small portion of lemon juice, grated lemon, nutmeg, and about half a tea-spoonful of sugar; beat well together, and mix in lightly five table-spoonfuls of cream. Place the omelet pan, with a small piece of butter, when melted, in a quick oven; pour in the eggs, and stir in lightly with a fork the well-beaten whites; let it cook a few minutes—not more than five or six—turn on the dish so that the bottom part is up, and send to table hot.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXI.

AUSTIN.

LATE in the autumn of that year Mr. Granger and his household took up their abode in Paris. Clarissa had expressed a wish to winter in that brilliant city, and Daniel Granger had no greater desire than to please her. But in making any concession of this kind he did it in such a quiet, unobtrusive way that his wife was scarcely aware how entirely her wishes had been studied. He was too proud a man to parade his affection for her; he kept a check upon himself rather, and in a manner regulated his own conduct by the standard of hers. There was never any show of devotion on his part. The world might have taken them for a couple brought together by convenience, and making the best of their loveless union.

So, with regard to the gratification of her wishes, it seemed always that the thing which Clarissa desired happened to suit his own humor, rather than that he sacrificed all personal feeling for her pleasure. In this Parisian arrangement it had been so, and his wife had no idea that it was entirely on her account that Daniel Granger set up his tent in the Faubourg St. Honoré.

The fair Sophia had, however, a very shrewd suspicion of the fact, and for some weeks prior to the departure from Arden existed in a state of suppressed indignation which was not good for the model villagers; her powers of observation were, if possible, sharpened in the matter of cobwebs; her sense of smell intensified in relation to cabbage-water. Nor did she refrain from making herself eminently disagreeable to her step-mother.

"I should not have supposed you would so soon be tired of Arden Court," she remarked, pleasantly, during that dreary quarter of an hour after dinner which Mr. Granger and his wife and daughter were wont to pass in the contemplation of crystallized apricots and hot-house grapes, and the exchange of the baldest commonplaces in the way of conversation. Perhaps if Clarissa and her husband had been alone on such occasions, that air of ceremony might have vanished. The young wife might have drawn her chair a little nearer her husband's, and there might have been some pleasant talk about that inexhaustible source of wonder and delight, the baby. But with Miss Granger always at hand, the dessert was as ceremonious as if there had been a party of eighteen, and infinitely more dreary, lacking the cheery clatter and buzz of company. She ate five hot-house grapes, and sipped half a glass of claret, with as solemn an air as if she had been making a libation to the gods.

Mr. Granger looked up from his plate when his daughter made this remark about Arden, and glanced inquiringly at his wife, with a shadow of displeasure in his face. Yielding and indulgent as he had been to her, there was in his composition something of the stuff that makes a tyrant. His wife must love the things that he loved. It would have been intolerable to him to suppose that Mrs. Granger could grow weary of the house that he had beautified.

"I am not tired of the Court," Clarissa answered, with a sad smile. "There are too many recollections to make it dear to me."

Daniel Granger's face flushed ever so slightly at this speech. It was the past, then, and not the present, that rendered the place dear to her.

"I could never grow tired of Arden," she went on; "but I think it will be very nice to spend a winter in Paris."

"Lady Laura Armstrong has put that notion into your head, no doubt," said Miss Granger, with the faintest suspicion of a sneer. She was not very warmly attached to the lady of Hale Castle nowadays, regarding her as the chief promoter of Mr. Granger's marriage.

"Lady Laura has said that they enjoyed themselves very much in Paris the winter before last," Clarissa answered, frankly; "and has promised me plenty of introductions. She even promises that she and Mr. Armstrong will come over for a week or two while we are there."

"And poor Lady Geraldine Challoner?"

Miss Granger always exhibited a profound pity for Lady Geraldine, and never lost any opportunity of dwelling upon Mr. Fairfax's bad conduct.

"No; I don't suppose Lady Geraldine would go with them," Clarissa answered, coloring a little. The name of Geraldine Challoner was always painful to her. "She doesn't care about going any where."

"Perhaps she would not care to run the risk of meeting Mr. Fairfax," suggested Sophia.

Mr. Granger looked up again, with that shadow of displeasure upon his countenance.

"She would not be more likely to meet him in Paris than at Hale," replied Clarissa. "He has gone to Germany."

"Yes, for the autumn, he said. Depend upon it, he will spend the winter in Paris. I have always observed that those dissipated kind of men prefer Paris to London."

"I don't think you have any right to call Mr. Fairfax dissipated, Sophia," said her father, with an offended air; "and I don't think that his movements can be of the smallest consequence to you, nor those of the Hale Castle people either. Clarissa and I have determined to spend two or three months in Paris, and we are not in the slightest degree dependent upon our English friends for our enjoyment there. If you are disinclined to accompany us, and would rather remain at Arden—"

"Oh, papa, papa!" cried Sophia, with an injured look, "don't say that; don't allow me to think I have grown quite indifferent to you."

"You have not grown indifferent to me; but I don't want to take you away from home against your wish."

"My wish is to be any where with you, papa; any where—even though you may feel me an incumbrance. I could endure the humiliation of feeling that, so long as I was allowed to remain with you."

Mr. Granger gave a sigh that was almost a groan, and, for perhaps the first time in his life, it occurred to him that it would be a pleasant thing if his only daughter were to fall in love with some fortunate youth, and desire to marry him. A curate even. There was Tillott. Why shouldn't she marry Tillott? He, Daniel Granger, would give his child a handsome portion, and they could go through life inspecting model cottages, and teaching village children the works and ways of all those wicked kings of Israel, who made groves and set up the idols of their heathen neighbors: a pure and virtuous and useful life, without question, if tempered with some consideration for the feelings of the model cottagers, and some mercy for the brains of the humble scholars.

In the interval between this little after-dinner scene and the departure from Arden Mr. Granger invited Mr. Tillott to dinner two or three times, and watched him with the eyes of anxiety as he conversed with Sophia. But although the curate was evidently eager to find favor in the sight of the damsel, the damsel herself showed no sign of weakness. Mr. Granger sighed, and told himself that the lamp of hope burned dimly in this quarter.

Digitized by Google

"She really ought to marry," he said to himself. "A girl of her energetic, indefatigable nature would be a treasure to some man, and she is only wasting herself here. Perhaps in Paris we shall meet some one;" and then there arose before Mr. Granger the vision of some foreign adventurer seeking to entangle the wealthy English "meess" in his meshes. Paris might be a dangerous place; but with such a girl as Sophia, there could be no fear. She was a young woman who might be trusted to walk with unfaltering steps through the most tortuous pathways of this life, always directing herself aright, and coming in at the finish just at that very point at which a well-brought-up young person should arrive.

Mr. Granger made his Parisian arrangements on the large scale which became him as a landed gentleman of unlimited wealth. A first floor of some ten spacious rooms was selected in one of the brand-new stone mansions in a brand-new street in the fashionable faubourg; a house that seemed to have been built for the habitation of giants; a house made splendid by external decoration in carved stone-work, garlands of stone fruit and flowers, projecting lion-heads, caryatides, and so on; no gloomy porte-cochère, but a street door, through which a loaded drag might have been driven without damage to the hats of the outside passengers; a house glorified within by egg-and-dart mouldings, white enameled woodwork, and much gilding; but a house in which the winter wind howled as in a primeval forest, and which required to be supplied with supplementary padded crimson velvet doors before the spacious chambers could be made comfortable. Here Mr. Granger took up his abode, with ten of his Arden Court servants quartered on a floor above. The baby had a nursery looking into the broad, bare street, where some newly planted sticks of the sycamore species shivered in the northeast wind; and the baby took his matutinal airings in the Tuileries Gardens, and his afternoon drives in the Bois, while every movement of his infant existence was watched or directed by the tenderest of mothers. The chief nurse, who had lived with more fashionable mistresses, for whom the duties of the nursery were subordinate to the business of society, pronounced Mrs. Granger "fidgety;" a very sweet lady, but too fond of interfering about trifles, and not reposing boundless confidence in the experience of her nurse.

There were a good many English people in Paris this year whom the Grangers knew, and Lady Laura had insisted upon giving Clarissa introductions to some of her dearest friends among the old French nobility—people who had known Lord Calderwood in their days of exile—and more than one dearest friend among the newer lights of the Napoleonic firmament. Then there were a Russian princess and a Polish countess or so, whom Lady Laura had brought to Mrs. Granger's receptions in Clarges Street: so that Clarissa and her husband found themselves at once in the centre of a circle from the elegant dissipations whereof there was no escape. The pretty Mrs. Granger and the rich Mr. Granger were in request every where; nor was the stately Sophia neglected, although she took her share in all festivities with the familiar Sunday-school primness, and seemed to vivacious Gaul the very archetype of that representative young English lady who is always exclaiming "Shocking!" Even after her arrival in Paris, when she felt herself so very near him, after so many years of severance, Clarissa did not find it the easiest thing in the world to see her brother. Mr. and Mrs. Granger had only spent a couple of days in Paris during their honey-moon, and Daniel Granger planned a round of sight-seeing, in the way of churches, picture-galleries, and cemeteries, which fully occupied the first four or five days after their arrival. Clarissa was obliged to be deeply interested in all the details of Gothic architecture—to appreciate Ingres, to give her mind to Gérome—when her heart was yearning for that meeting which she had waited so long to compass. Mr. Granger, as an idle man, with no estate to manage—no new barns being built within his morning's ride, no dilapidated cottages to be swept away—was not easily to be got rid of. He devoted his days to showing his wife the glories of the splendid city, which he knew by heart himself, and admired sufficiently in a sober, business-like way. The evenings were mortgaged to society. Clarissa had been more than a week in Paris before she had a morning to herself; and even then there was Miss Granger to be disposed of, and Miss Granger's curiosity to be satisfied.

Mr. Granger had gone to breakfast at the Maison Dorée with a mercantile magnate from his own country—a solemn commercial breakfast, whereat all the airy trifles and dainty compositions of fish, flesh, and fowl with which the butterfly youth of France are nourished were to be set before unappreciative Britons. At ten o'clock Clarissa ordered her carriage. It was best to go in her own carriage, she thought, even at the risk of exciting the curiosity of servants. To send for a hired vehicle would have caused greater wonder; to walk alone was impossible; to walk with her nurse and child might have been considered eccentric.

She could not even take an airing, however, without some discussion with Miss Granger. That young lady was established in the drawing-room—the vast foreign chamber, which never looked like a home—illuminating a new set of Gothic texts for the adornment of her school. She sorely missed the occupation and importance afforded her by the model village. In Paris there was no one afraid of her; no humble matrons to quail as her severe eyes surveyed wall and ceiling, floor and surbase. And, being of a temperament which required perpetual employment, she was fain to fall back upon illumination, Berlin-wool work, and early morning practice of pianoforte music of the most strictly mathematical character. It was her boast that she had been thoroughly "grounded" in the science of harmony; but, although she could have given a reason for every interval in a sonata, her playing never sparkled into brilliancy nor melted into tenderness, and never had her prim, cold fingers found their way to a human soul.

"Are you going out so early?" this wise damsel asked, wonderingly, as Clarissa came into the drawing-room in her bonnet and shawl.

"Yes; it is such a fine morning, and I think baby will enjoy it. I have not had a drive with him since we have been here."

"No," replied Sophia: "you have only had papa. I shouldn't think he would be very much flattered if he heard you preferred baby."

"I did not say that I preferred baby, Sophia. What a habit you have of misrepresenting me!"

The nurse appeared at this moment, carrying the heir of the Grangers, gloriously arrayed in blue velvet, and looking fully conscious of his magnificence.

"But I do like to have a drive with my pet lamb, don't I, darling?" said the mother, stooping to kiss the plump, rosy cheek. And then there followed some low, confidential talk in the fond baby language peculiar to young mothers.

"I should have thought you would have been glad to get a morning alone for once in a way," remarked Sophia, coming over to the baby and giving him a stately kiss. She liked him tolerably well in her own way, and was not angry with him for having come into the world to oust her from her proud position as sole heiress to her father's wealth. The position had been very pleasant to her, and she had not seen it slip away from her without many a pang; but, however she might dislike Clarissa, she was not base enough to hate her father's child. If she could have had the sole care and management of him, physicked and dieted him after her own method, and developed the budding powers of his infant mind by her favorite forcing system—made a model villager of him, in short—she might have grown even to love him. But these privileges being forbidden to her—her wisdom being set at naught, and her counsel rejected—she could not help regarding Lovel Granger as more or less an injury.

"I should have thought you would have been glad of a morning at home, Clarissa," she repeated.

"Not such a fine morning as this, Sophy. It would be such a pity for baby to lose the sunshine; and I have really nothing to do."

"If I had known a little sooner that you were going, I would have gone with you," said Miss Granger.

Clarissa's countenance fell. She could not help that little troubled look, which told Miss Granger that her society would not have been welcome.

"You would have no objection to my coming with you, I suppose?" the fair Sophia said, sharply. "Baby is not quite a monopoly."

"Of course not. If you'll put on your things now, Sophia, I'll wait for you."

It was a hard thing for Clarissa to make the offer, when she had been waiting so anxiously for this opportunity of seeing her brother. To be in the same city with him, and not see him, was more painful than to be divided from him by half the earth, as she had been. It was harder still to have to plot and plan and stoop to falsehood in order to compass a meeting. But she remembered the stern, cold look in her husband's face when she had spoken of Austin, and she could not bring herself to degrade her brother by entreating Daniel Granger's indulgence for his past misdeeds, or Daniel Granger's interest in his future fortunes.

Happily Sophia had made elaborate preparations for the Gothic texts, and was not inclined to waste so much trouble.

"I have got my colors all ready," she said, "and have put every thing out, you see. No, I don't think I'll go to-day. But another time, if you'll be so kind as to let me know beforehand, I shall be pleased to go with my brother. I suppose you know there's an east wind to-day, by-the-bye."

The quarter whence the wind came was a subject about which Clarissa had never concerned herself. The sun was shining, and the sky was blue.

"We have plenty of wraps," she said; "and we can have the carriage closed if we are cold."

"It is not a day upon which I should take an infant out," Miss Granger murmured, dipping her brush in some Prussian blue; "but of course you know best."

"Oh, we shall take care of baby, depend upon it. Good-by, Sophy."

And Clarissa departed, anxious to avoid farther remonstrance on the part of her step-daughter. She told the coachman to drive to the Luxembourg Gardens, intending to leave the nurse and baby to promenade that favorite resort, while she made her way on foot to the Rue du Chevalier Bayard. She remembered that George Fairfax had described her brother's lodging as near the Luxembourg.

They drove through the gay Parisian streets, past the pillar in the Place Vendôme, and along the Rue de la Paix, all shining with jewelers' ware, and the Rue de Rivoli, where the chestnut-trees in the Gardens of the Tuileries were shedding their last leaves upon the pavement, past the airy tower of St. Jacques, and across the bridge into that unknown world on the other side of the Seine. The nurse, who had seen very little of that quarter of the town, wondered what obscure region she was traversing, and wondered still more when they alighted at the somewhat shabby-looking gardens.

"These are the Luxembourg Gardens," said Clarissa. "As you have been to the Tuileries every day, I thought it would be a change for you to come here."

"Thank you, ma'am," replied Mrs. Brobson, the chief nurse, "but I don't think as these gardings is anyways equal to the Tooleries—nor to Regent's Park even. When I were in Paris with Lady Fitz-Lubin, we took the children to the Tooleries or the Bore de Boulong every day—but, law me! the Bore de Boulong were a poor place in those days to what it is now."

Clarissa took a couple of turns along one of the walks with Mrs. Brobson, and then, as they were going back toward the gate, she said, as carelessly as she could manage to say:

"There is a person living somewhere near here whom I want to see, Mrs. Brobson. I'll leave you and baby in the gardens for half an hour or so, while I go and pay my visit."

Mrs. Brobson stared. It was not an hour in the day when any lady she had ever served was wont to pay visits; and that Mrs. Granger of Arden Court should traverse a neighborhood of narrow streets and tall houses, on foot and alone, to call upon her acquaintance at eleven o'clock in the morning, seemed to her altogether inexplicable.

"You'll take the carriage, won't you, ma'am?" she said, with undisguised astonishment.

"No, I shall not want the carriage; it's very near. Be sure you keep baby warm, Mrs. Brobson."

Clarissa hurried out into the street. The landau, with its pair of Yorkshire-bred horses, was moving slowly up and down, to the admiration of juvenile Paris, which looked upon Mr. Granger's deep-chested, strong-limbed bays almost as a new order in the animal creation. Mrs. Granger felt that the eyes of coachman and footman were upon her as she turned the first corner, thinking of nothing, for the moment, but how to escape the watchfulness of her own servants. She walked a little way down the street, and then asked a sleepy-looking waiter, who was sweeping the threshold of a very dingy restaurant, to direct her to the Rue du Chevalier Bayard. It was tout près, the man said; only a turn to the right, at that corner yonder, and the next turning was the street she wanted. She thanked him, and hurried on, with her heart beating faster at every step. Austin might be out, she thought, and her trouble wasted; and there was no knowing when she might have another opportunity. Even if he were at home, their interview must needs be brief: there was the nurse waiting and wondering; the baby exposed to possible peril from east winds.

The Rue du Chevalier Bayard was a street of tall, gaunt houses that had seen better days—houses with porte-cochères, exaggerated iron knockers, and queer old lamps; dreary balconies on the first floor, with here and there a plaster vase containing some withered member of the palm tribe, or a faded orange-tree; every where and in every thing an air of dilapidation and decay; faded curtains, that had once been fine, flapping in the open windows; Venetian shutters going to ruin; and the only glimpse of brightness or domestic comfort confined to the humble parlor of the portress who kept watch and ward over one of the dismal mansions, and who had a bird-cage hanging in her window, an Angora cat sunning itself on the stone sill, and a row of scarlet geraniums in the little iron balcony.

But this model portress did not preside over the house inhabited by Austin Lovel. There Clarissa found only a little deaf old man, who grinned and shook his head helplessly when she questioned him, and shrugged his shoulders and pointed to the staircase—a cavernous stone staircase, with an odor as of newly opened graves. She went up to the first floor, past the entresol, where the earthy odor was subjugated by a powerful smell of cooking, in which garlic was the prevailing feature. One tall door on the first floor was painted a pale pink, and had still some dingy indications of former gilding upon its mouldings. On this pink door was inscribed the name of Mr. Austin, Painter.

Clarissa rang a bell, and a tawdry-looking French servant, with big ear-rings and a dirty muslin cap, came to answer her summons. Mr. Austin was at home; would madame please to enter? Madame, having replied in the affirmative, was shown into a small sitting-room, furnished with a heterogeneous collection of cabinets, tables, and sofas, every one of which bore the stamp of the broker's shop—things which had been graceful and pretty in their day, but from which the ormolu moulding had been knocked off here, and the inlaid wood chipped away there, and the tortoise-shell cracked in another place, until they seemed the very emblems of decay. It was as if they had been set up as perpetual monitors—monuments of man's fragility. "This is what life comes to," they said, in their silent fashion. This faded rubbish in buhl and marqueterie was useful enough to Mr. Lovel, however; and on his canvas the faded furniture glowed and sparkled with all its original brightness, fresh as the still-life of Meissonier. There were a child's toys scattered on the floor; and Clarissa heard a woman's voice talking to a child in an adjoining room, on the other side of a pair of tall pink folding-doors. Then she heard her brother's voice saying something to the servant; and at the sound she felt as if she must have fallen to the ground. Then one of the doors was opened, and a woman came in; a pretty, faded-looking woman, dressed in a light blue morning wrapper that might very well have been cleaner; a woman with a great deal of dyed hair in an untidy mass at the back of her head; a woman whom Clarissa felt it must be a difficult thing to like.

This was her brother's wife, of course. There was a boy of four or five years old clinging to his mother's gown, and Clarissa's heart yearned to the child. He had Austin's face. It would be easy to love him, she thought.

"Mr. Austin is in his paintin'-room, madame," said the wife, putting on a kind of company manner. "Did you wish to see him about a picture? Je parle très poo de Français, mais si—"

"I am English," Clarissa answered, smiling: "if you will kindly tell Mr. Austin a lady from England wishes to see him. What a dear little boy! May I shake hands with him?"

"Give the lady your hand, Henery," said the mother. "Not that one," as the boy, after the invariable custom of childhood, offered his left—"the right hand."

Clarissa took the sticky little paw tenderly in her pearl gray glove. To think that her brother, Austin Lovel, should have married a woman who could call her son "Henery," and who had such an unmistakable air of commonness!

The wife went back to the painting-room, and returned the next minute to beg the visitor to "step this way, if you please, ma'am." She opened one of the folding-doors wide as she spoke, and Clarissa went into a large room, at the other end of which there stood a tall, slim young man, in a short velvet coat, before a small easel.

It was her brother Austin; pale and a trifle haggard, too old in looks for his years, but very handsome—a masculine edition of Clarissa herself, in fact; the same delicate, clearly cut features; the same dark hazel eyes, shaded by long brown lashes tinged with gold. This was what Mrs. Granger saw in the broad noonday sunshine; while the painter, looking up from his easel, beheld a radiant creature approaching him, a woman in pale gray silk, that it would have been rapture to paint; a woman with one of the loveliest faces he had ever seen, crowned with a broad plait of dark brown hair, and some delicate structure of point lace and pink roses, called by courtesy a bonnet.

He laid down his mahl-stick and came to meet her, with a puzzled look in his face. Her beauty seemed familiar to him somehow, and yet he had no recollection of ever having seen her before. He saw the faded counterpart of that bright face every morning in his looking-glass.

She held out both her hands.

"Austin, don't you know me?"

He gave a cry of pleased surprise, and caught her in his arms.

"Clarissa!" he exclaimed; "why, my darling, how lovely you have grown! My dear little Clary! How well I remember the sweet young face, and the tears and kisses, and the slender little figure in its childish dress, that day your father carried you off to school! My own little Clary, what a happiness to see you! But you never told me that you were coming to Paris."

"No, dear, I kept that for a surprise. And are you really glad to see me, Austin?"

"Really glad! Is there any one in the world could make me gladder?"

"I am so happy to hear that. I was almost afraid you had half forgotten me. Your letters were so few and so short."

"Letters!" cried Austin Lovel, with a laugh. "I never was much of a hand at letter-writing; and then I hadn't any thing particularly pleasant to write about. You mustn't gauge my affection by the length of my letters, Clary. And then I have to work deucedly hard when I am at home, and have very little time for scribbling."

Clarissa glanced round the room while he was speaking. Every detail in her brother's surroundings had an interest for her. Here, as in the drawing-room, there was an untidy air about every thing—a want of harmony in all the arrangements. There were Flemish carved oak cabinets and big Japan vases; a mantel-piece draped with dusty crimson velvet, a broken Venetian glass above it, and a group of rusty-looking arms on each side; long limp amber curtains to the three tall windows, with festooned valances in an advanced stage of disarrangement and dilapidation. There were some logs burning on the hearth, a pot of chocolate simmering among the ashes, and breakfast laid for one person upon a little table by the fire—the remnant of a perigord-pie, flanked by a stone bottle of Curaçoa.

She looked at her brother with anxious, scrutinizing eyes. No, George Fairfax had not deceived her. He had the look of a man who was going the wrong way. There were premature lines across the forehead and about the dark, brilliant eyes; a nervous expression in the contracted lips. It was the face of a man who burns the candle of life at both ends. Late hours, anxiety, dissipation of all kinds, had set their fatal seal upon his countenance.

"Dear Austin, you are as handsome as ever; but I don't think you are looking well," she said, tenderly.

"Don't look so alarmed, my dear girl," he answered, lightly; "I am well enough—that is to say, I am never ill, never knock under, or strike work. There are men who go through life like that—never ill and never exactly well. I rarely get up in the morning without a headache; but I generally brighten considerably as the sun goes down. We move with a contrary motion, Helos and I."

"I am afraid you work too hard, and sit up too late."

"As to working hard, my dear, that is a necessity; and going out every night is another necessity. I get my commissions in society."

"But you must have a reputation by this time, Austin; and commissions would come to you, I should think, without your courting them."

"No, child; I have only a reputation de salon; I am only known in a certain set. And a man must live, you see. To a man himself that is the primary necessity. Your generosity set me on my legs last year, and tempted me to take this floor, and make a slight advance movement altogether. I thought better rooms would bring me better work—sitters for a new style of cabinet portraits, and so on. But so far the rooms have been comparatively a useless extravagance.

Digitized by Google

Clarissa spoke of his wife presently.

"You must introduce me to her, Austin. She took me for a stranger just now, and I did not undeceive her."

"Yes, I'll introduce you. There's not much in common between you; but she'll be very proud of your acquaintance. She looks upon my relations as an exalted race of beings, and myself as a kind of fallen angel. You mustn't be too hard upon her, Clary, if she seems not quite the sort of woman you would have chosen for your sister-in-law. She has been a good wife to me, and she was a good daughter to her drunken old father, one of the greatest scamps in London, who used to get his bread—or rather his gin—by standing for Count Ugolino and Cardinal Wolsey, or any thing grim and gray and aquiline-nosed in the way of patriarchs. The girl Bessie was a model too in her time; and it was in Jack Redgrave's painting-room—the pre-Raphaelite fellow who paints fearfully-and-wonderfully-made women with red hair and angular arms—I first met her. Jack and I were great chums at that time—it was just after I sold out—and I used to paint at his rooms. I was going in for painting just then with a great spurt, having nothing but my brush to live upon. You can guess the rest. As Bessie was a very pretty girl, and neither she nor I had a sixpence wherewith to bless ourselves, of course we fell in love with each other. Poor little thing, how pretty she used to look in those days, standing on Jack's movable platform, with her hair falling loose about her face, and a heap of primroses held up in her petticoat!—such a patient, plaintive look in the sweet little mouth, as much as to say, 'I'm very tired of standing here; but I'm only a model, to be hired for eighteen pence an hour; go on smoking your cigars, and talking your slangy talk about the turf and the theatres, gentlemen. I count for nothing.' Poor little patient soul! she was so helpless and so friendless, Clary. I think my love for her was something like the compassion one feels for some young feeble bird that has fallen out of its nest. So we were married one morning; and for some time lived in lodgings at Putney, where I used to suffer considerable affliction from Count Ugolino and two bony boys, Bessie's brothers, who looked as if the count had been acting up to his character with too great a fidelity. Ugolino himself would come prowling out of a Saturday afternoon to borrow the wherewithal to pay his week's lodging, lest he should be cast out into the streets at nightfall; and it was a common thing for one of the bony boys to appear at breakfast-time with a duplicate of his father's coat, pledged overnight for drink, and without the means of redeeming which he could not pursue his honorable vocation. In short, I think it was as much the affliction of the Ugolino family as my own entanglements that drove me to seek my fortunes on the other side of the world."

Austin Lovel opened one of the doors, and called his wife.

"Come here, Bessie; I've a pleasant surprise for you."

Mrs. Lovel appeared quickly in answer to this summons. She had changed her morning dress for a purple silk, which was smartly trimmed, but by no means fresh; and she had dressed her hair, and refreshed her complexion by a liberal application of violet powder. She had a look which can only be described as "flashy"—a look that struck Clarissa unpleasantly in spite of herself.

Her expressions of surprise did not sound quite so natural as they might have done, for she had been listening at the folding-doors during a considerable part of the interview; but she seemed really delighted by Mrs. Granger's condescension, and she kissed that lady with much affection.

"I'm sure I do feel proud to know any relation of Austin's," she said, "and you most of all, who have been so kind to him. Heaven knows what would have become of us last winter if it hadn't been for your generosity."

Clarissa laid her hand upon Bessie Lovel's lips.

"You mustn't talk of generosity between my brother and me," she said: "all I have in the world is at his service. And now let me see my nephews, please; and then I must run away."

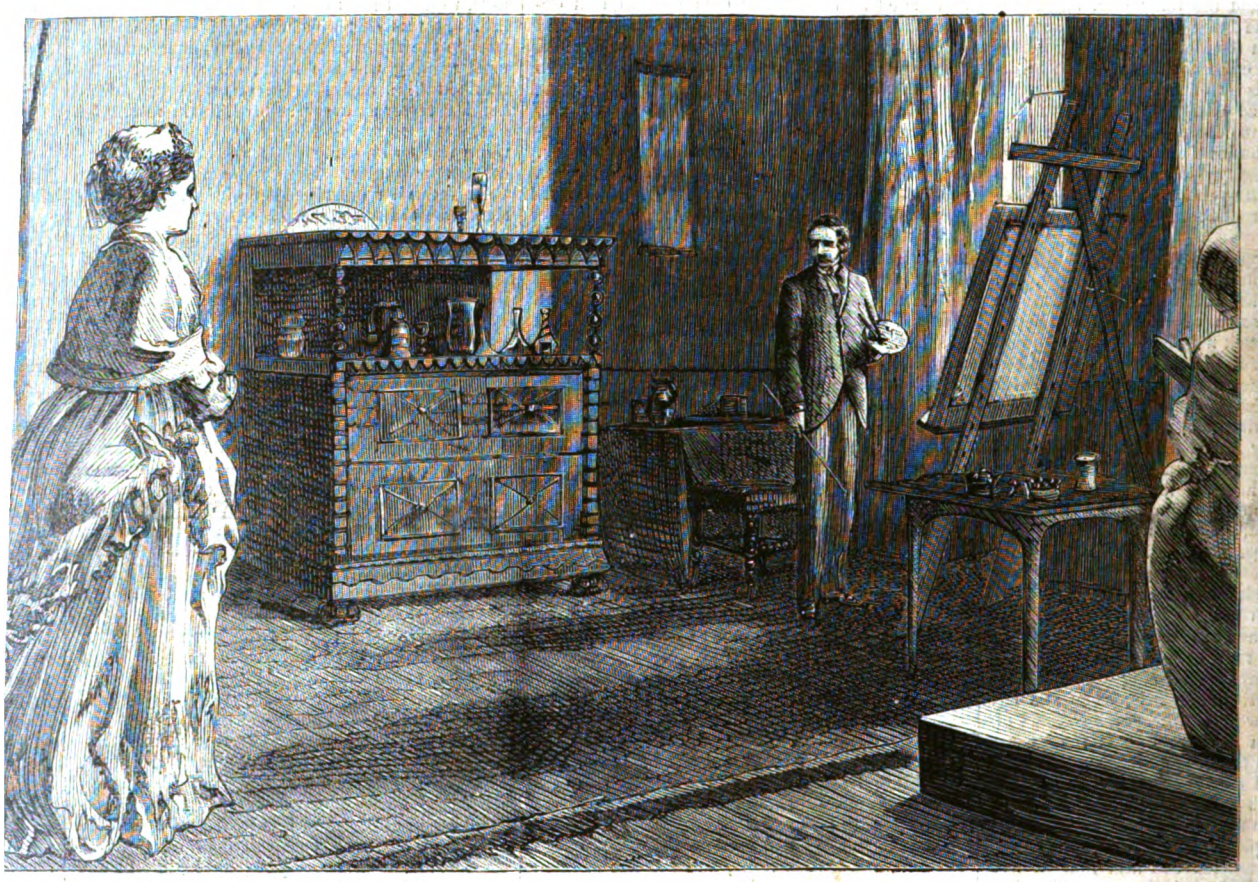
The nephews were produced; the boy Clarissa had seen, and another of smaller growth—pale-faced, bright-eyed little fellows. They too had been subjected to the infliction of soap and water and hair-brushes, clean pinafores, and so on, since Mrs. Granger's arrival.

She knelt down and kissed them both with real motherly tenderness, thinking of her own darling, and the difference between his fortunes and theirs; and then, after a warm caress, she slipped a napoleon into each little warm hand, "to buy toys," and rose to depart.

"I must hurry away now, Austin," she said; "but I shall come again very soon, if I may. Good-by, dear, and God bless you."

The embrace that followed was a very fervent one. It had been sweet to meet again after so many years, and it was hard to leave him so soon—to leave him with the conviction that his life was a wreck. But Clarissa had no time to linger. The thought of the baby in the Luxembourg Gardens had been distracting her for ever so long. These stolen meetings must needs be short.

She looked at her watch when she got back to the street, and found, to her horror, that she had been very nearly an hour away from the nurse and her charge. The carriage was waiting at the gate, and she had to encounter the full fire of her servants' gaze as she crossed the road and went into the gardens. Yes, there was the baby's blue velvet pelisse resplendent at the end of an avenue. Clarissa walked quickly to meet him.



THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.—"IT WAS HER BROTHER AUSTIN."

"My darling!" she cried. "Has he been waiting for his mamma? I hope he has not been tired of the gardens, nurse?"

"Yes, ma'am, he have been tired," replied Mrs. Brobson, with an outraged air. "There ain't much in these gardens to keep a baby of his age amused for an hour at a stretch; and in a east wind, too! It's right down cutting at that corner."

"Why didn't you take him home in the carriage, nurse? It would have been better than running any risk of his catching cold."

"What, and leave you without a conveyance, ma'am? I couldn't have done that!"

"I was detained longer than I expected to stay. Oh, by-the-bye, you need not mention to Miss Granger that I have been making a call. The people I have been to see are—are in humble circumstances; and I don't want her to know any thing about it."

"I hope I know my duty, ma'am," replied Mrs. Brobson, stiffly. That hour's parading in the gardens, without any relief from her subordinate, had soured her temper, and inclined her to look with unfavorable eyes upon the conduct of her mistress. Clarissa felt that she had excited the suspicion of her servant, and that all her future meetings with her brother would involve as much plotting and planning as would serve for the ripening of a political conspiracy.

THE FRIEND OF THE FAMILY.

See Illustration on page 701.

"COME to our mountains, and you will see that bears are still found there; and more, that our flocks do not suffer, and that the villagers are on the best of terms with their hairy neighbors. I know of one instance, at least, where Master Bruin was regularly installed as the friend of the family."

The speaker was a peasant of the Jura Mountains, who was rehearsing his adventures around the camping fire at night to a party of huntsmen, who had expressed themselves skeptical as to the existence of any wolves in Central Europe, apart from those that remained uneaten in the collection at the Jardin des Plantes. "A story! a story!" exclaimed the auditors, who scented in the old man's words a new tale.

"Yes, a true story, as can be proved by the whole country round," resumed the peasant, nothing loath. "I was living in a cottage in the heart of the Jura, far from any habitation, and surrounded by a few fields of potatoes, rye, and barley, beyond which the forest of dark pines formed a belt which extended up to the zone of the rhododendrons. What I am going to tell you happened years ago, in the first part of December. It had snowed all night and part of the morning; but I was obliged to go to the next town on business in spite of the weather. I lost no time, for I was anxious to be home before night. I had walked fast, for the sun was almost down, when suddenly, not a hundred steps from my cottage, I stopped short on seeing familiar tracks on the snow.

"'Well, well!' said I, 'here is a fellow who has nothing to eat at home, and has come to sponge on his neighbors. I shall not invite him to supper, that's certain.'

"You must think that there were in the house three boys, four girls, and my wife. I went into the house, and as soon as supper was over, while my wife was putting the youngsters to bed, I told her the story. My eldest boy heard me, and said, 'Father, perhaps that is the bear that has been prowling all the fall about the pasture. I have never seen him, but the cottager in the chalet above us has, and has warned me that he was after our cows.'

"This visit troubled me a little, not that there was any great danger, for our bears are not savage, but because the children might be frightened. So the next morning I looked again for the tracks, and found them close by the threshold of the door. I warned my wife to look after the little ones, and went to work. Three days passed without seeing any thing more of our visitor, when, you can judge of my astonishment, on opening the barn door to feed the cows, I saw on a bed of litter a bear apparently about two years old, gazing at me with his small eyes as calmly as if he had paid in advance for his lodging. I ran to the stable and seized a pitchfork, my gun being out of reach, for I was not quite sure of my lodger's good intentions. Not wishing to wake my family, who were still asleep, I took care to make no noise, and hastily looked round to see if the cattle were safe. Not only were they all there, but perfectly quiet, not seeming to suspect the neighbor who had passed the night so near them, though these beasts are so terrified at the presence of the wolves that they act as if they were mad when one is in the neighborhood.

"I returned to the barn with my pitchfork in my hand, and on turning the corner saw my lodger leisurely making his way toward the forest. Having no fire-arms, and, moreover, no cause of complaint against him except for his want of ceremony, I did not think fit to disturb him.

"As my wife trembled like a leaf at the very name of a bear, I did not say a word to her of the morning's adventure; but, wishing to carry my gun to the next town, I told my eldest boy, who was a stout lad, that I had seen the bear again about the house, but that he was a young one, and not dangerous. I returned at night, and, after supper, carefully locked all the doors. The next morning I had the satisfaction of finding that my lodger had passed the night elsewhere; but if he had not slept in his bed, it was only because he could not get in, for his tracks on the snow showed that he had several times made the circuit of the barn.

"The next day was a holiday. I told the children not to wander far from the house, and they passed the day playing in the fields under the care of their elder brother. At four o'clock they came home. We were all assembled in the kitchen; my wife was preparing supper, three of the older children were helping her, the others were playing around the stove, and I was seated at the corner of the fireside making a basket, when suddenly the door was gently pushed open, and in walked my lodger of the barn, the bear, in person. My wife, uttering a cry of terror, sprang to her feet, and let fall the basket of potatoes, which rolled on the ground; the children clung to my pantaloons; my eldest son did not stir, but seized a pruning-hook and looked at me, while I grasped a pick, which chanced to be within reach.

Digitized by Google

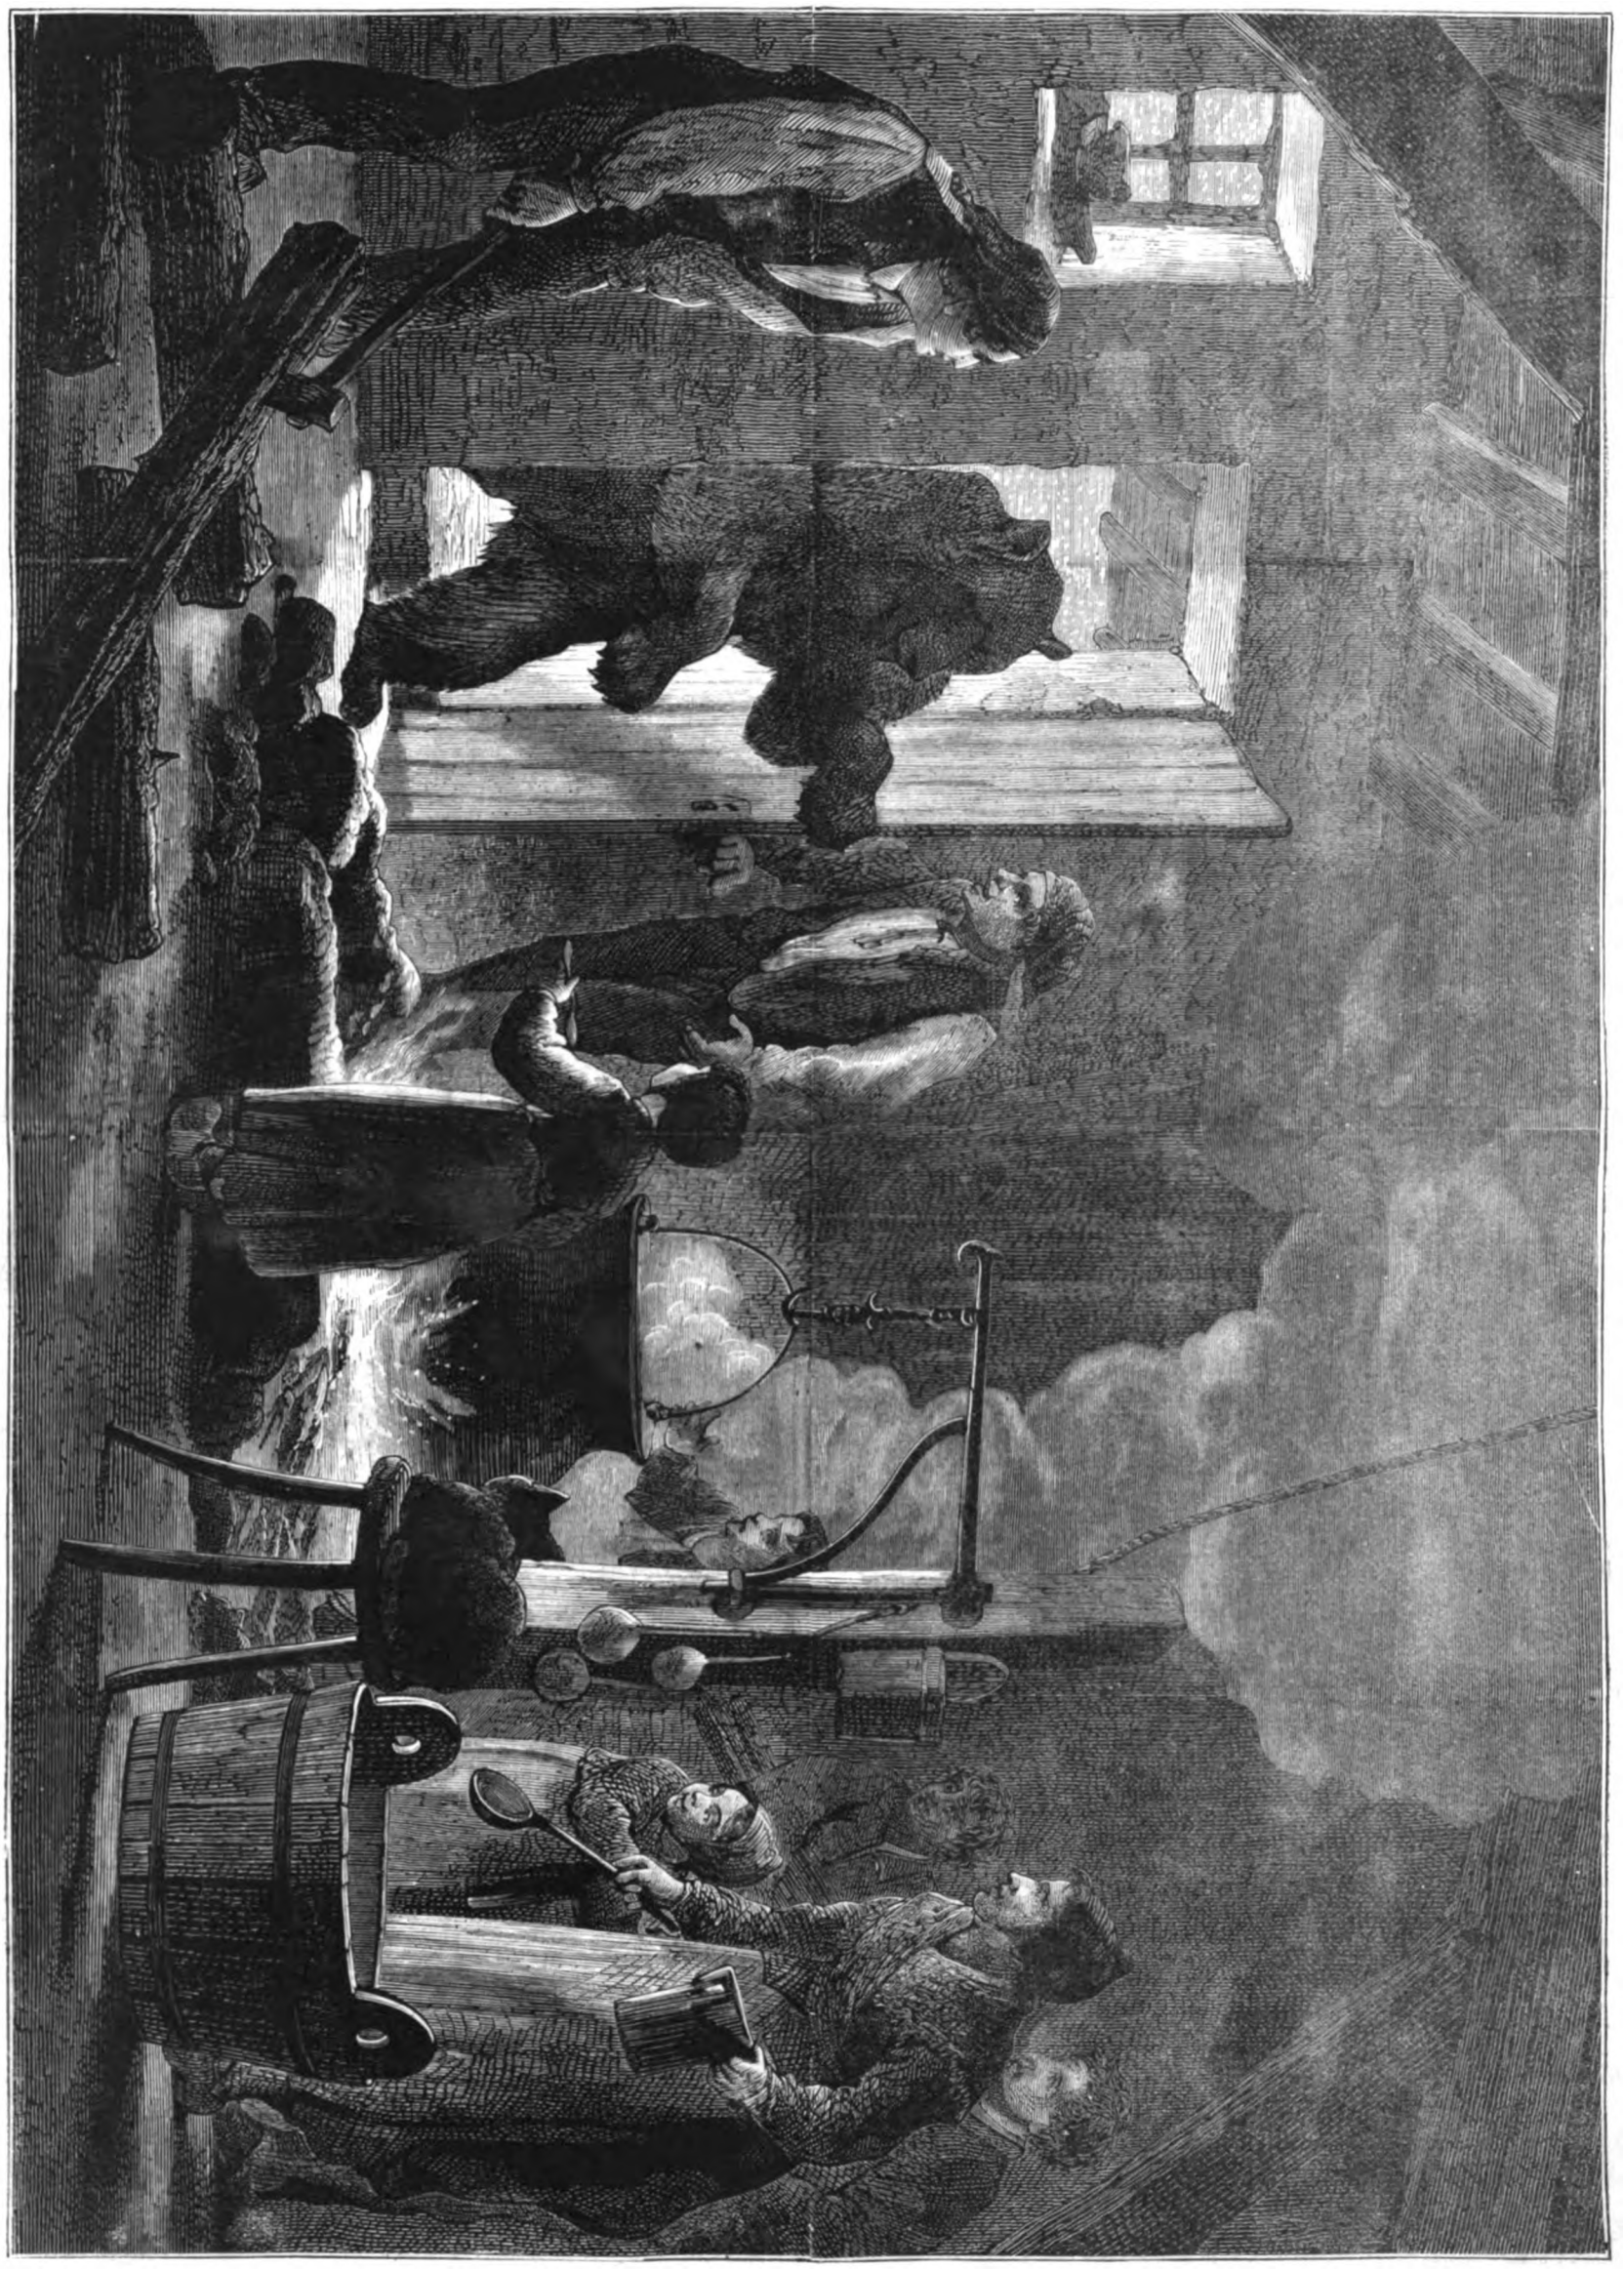
"For a few instants he looked around the room with more astonishment than ferocity; then, taking a step forward, he smelled of the potatoes that strewed the floor, took a single one, and ate it, looking at us with a satisfied air. Spying a door that opened into the entrance to the barn, he advanced to it, looked at the ladder that was planted there, considered it a few moments, and then slowly climbed and disappeared through the trap-door. I followed him noiselessly, and saw him carefully arranging the cut straw in the place which he had occupied two days before.

"The whole thing had happened so naturally, and the bear had shown himself so friendly and easily satisfied, seeing that he had contented himself with one potato, that we determined to let him alone; and at daybreak he set out for the forest, to return the next day punctually at four o'clock. This time we had put a piece of bread and some boiled potatoes near the door. He ate them with an air of great satisfaction, but not without first looking at us as if to ask leave; then climbed the ladder and went to his bed.

"From this time the bear continued our daily visitor through the whole winter, becoming every day more familiar, stopping and seating himself in the kitchen, where my wife and children became accustomed to see him without being afraid; then, after his modest supper, betaking himself to his bed in the barn. At the first fine spring weather he disappeared. My son saw him twice in the pasture. We thought that he never would return to us, and were sorry to lose him; but at the end of autumn, in a blinding snow-storm, we heard the kitchen door shake, and on opening it there stood our good bear, who was received, I had almost said, with open arms, and who seemed equally delighted to see us again. He sat down by the fireside, dried his paws, and, looking complacently at his steaming coat, seemed to say, 'This is famous! you are good people, and, for my part, I am an honest bear!'

"For several years he returned punctually, and all the people round about came to our house to make his acquaintance. When I went out he often followed me; or, if he saw me set out for the next village, he would go with me as far as the little bridge across the brook that formed the boundary of the forest, and wait there for me to return. He was the best of friends and companions, for he was not troublesome, never spoke ill of his neighbors, and took nothing but what was given him. One winter he did not appear; his place in the barn and at the fireside remained empty. We heard that a hunter had killed a bear near the little bridge across the brook, and the news filled us with sorrow, for we knew that it must be he whom we had all learned to regard as the friend of the family."



"THERE STOOD OUR GOOD BEAR, WHO WAS RECEIVED WITH OPEN ARMS."

Digitized by Google

? LADIES.

penhausen Insti- had a Wheeler uary, 1859, em- ing all materials, k (ten years in d for instructing .]

AMERICAN CHEM- fessor of Chemistry ospital, Stockholm, Vegetable Sicilian at it will beautifully al color."—[Com.] face with cold water, e PERSIAN SPRAY, and , detection is absoluteites of Mosquitoes and oison.—[Com.] means of the newly-in- rns may be transferred he greatest ease. This ting patterns of all sorts, s or from the garments wsdealers generally; or pt of 25 cents.

EMENTS.

RMER'S

Music Library,

ADWAY,

abers of Instrumental and residing in New York City usic delivered at their res- Circulars.

NS.

Y & CO.,

SQUARE,

OICE ASSORTMENT OF E TOPS, WITH CARVED LAID WITH GOLD AND NG ENTIRELY NEW.

MAN HAIR SWITCHES

NOW THE FASHION.

eight 2¼ oz., only $5.
eight 2½ oz., only $6.
eight 2¾ oz., only $7 50.
eight 3 oz., only $9.
etails, CHAS. V. PECKHAM, Broadway, near Amity St., and Grand St., corner Chrystie. of sample and price, or by ex-

ON BOUQUET.

NEW PERFUME

HANDKERCHIEF.

H & SON, ROCHESTER, N. Y., and AY (Room 18), NEW YORK.

ATE & CO.'S

E BOUQUET SOAP

but very delightful per- in every respect superior T USE.

ealers in perfumery and es.

from 50 cts

t (postage paid) for Fifty Cents, that Ten Dollars. R. L. WOLCOTT, N.Y.

he Conjurer, his amusing and lventures; his wonderful feats, how formed, more fascinating than fiction. omplete, illustrated, in HANEY'S JOUR- IX months to any new subscriber for JESSE HANEY & CO., 119 Nassau St., N. Y.

KES'

CLECTIC OIL

re, Safe, Sweet, and Economical.

J. H. WICKES,
120 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

ERINE CAKE.

ILET GLYCERINE CAKE is unequaled for g, Shampooing, Tooth Soap, and Baby s a clear, soft, white skin, and prevents pping. Warranted over one-half pure sale by druggists. MARX & RAWOLLE, f Glycerine, 179 William St., New York.

Month easily made with Stencil and ey-Check Dies. Secure Circular and S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

t-class Pianos—Sent on trial—No Ag'ts. U. S. PIANO CO., 865 B'dway, N. Y.

NOTICE.—Buyers of Goods under the names of Wamsutta Prints, Checks, Lindseys, Cambrics, Ticks, and Silesias, are hereby informed that all such goods are not manufactured at the Wamsutta Mills. We limit our Name and the Wamsutta Ticket to our Bleached Shirtings and Sheetings. We have, in addition to our former Trade-Mark, adopted the following, which will in all cases appear with this notice.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., June 1st, 1867.

Thos. J. Bennett Jr. Agent Wamsutta Mills.

OFFICE OF WAMSUTTA MILLS, NEW BEDFORD, September 1st, 1871.

It has been the constant endeavor of our Company for more than twenty years to improve the quality of the goods of our manufacture; so that our fabrics are fully equal to any in the market. We have just completed a New Mill, supplied with machinery of the most approved kinds, and have also added to the machinery in the mills previously built all the latest improvements; so that we are now making our goods finer, heavier, and handsomer than ever before.

The goods are of the full width represented, and not on a basis of 35 inches for a yard.

All the Standard Goods bear our Ticket and the above Trade-Mark, and may be relied on for quality and quantity, and as of our manufacture.

The Agents for the sale of our goods to Jobbers and Wholesale Dealers are ALMY & COMPANY, New York, 65 Leonard Street, cor. Church.

" " Boston, 38 Franklin Street.
CADBURY, THOMAS, & CO., Philadelphia, 221 Chestnut Street.
CHASE, STEWART, & CO., Baltimore, 27 German Street.

JOSEPH GRINNELL, President.
ANDREW G. PIERCE, Treasurer. THOS. BENNETT, JR., Agent.

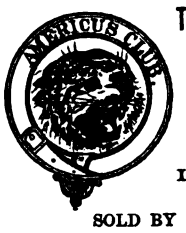
E. RIMMEL,

PERFUMER,

PARIS, LONDON, BRUSSELS.



THE AMERICUS CLUB BOUQUET,
The Perfume of the Season.
JOCKEY CLUB,
WHITE ROSE,
MUSK,
IHLANG IHLANG,
&c., &c., &c., &c.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
Special Representatives for United States,
EDWARDES & RUSSELL, 38 Vesey St., N. Y.

STRASBURGER & PFEIFFER,

(Successors to Strasburger, Fritz, & Pfeiffer),
IMPORTERS OF GERMAN, FRENCH, AND ENGLISH

TOYS,
China & Fancy Goods,

BOHEMIAN GLASS and LAVA WARES,
MUSIC BOXES, ACCORDEONS, HARMONICAS,
CONCERTINAS, &c., &c.,

394 Broadway, near Canal St., N.Y.

Parlor Ornaments, latest novelties in Toys, Fancy and Ornamental Goods constantly arriving to supply the general demand.

LADIES!

Dr. Kennedy's Hair Tea will prevent the hair from falling out, and preserve its health and beauty. Sold by Druggists at $1.00 per bottle.

KEMLO'S Modern Watch Repairer's Guide. Price $1 25. A. WILLIAMS & Co., Publishers, Boston.

Underwear, Hosiery, Gloves, Cardigan Jackets, Shirts, Collars, Drawers,

AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

UNION ADAMS & CO.,

No. 637 Broadway.

SILVER WHITE

Removes tarnish quickly, without injury to the goods. Sold by Jewelers, Druggists, Grocers, Furnishing Stores &c. S. M. MILLER, Sole Proprietor, 65 Liberty Street, N.Y. Send stamp for sample.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

NICOL & DAVIDSON, 686 Broadway,

Are receiving Novelties from Paris and London in

REAL BRONZES, COMPOSITION BRONZES, BISQUE GOODS,
FRENCH CHINA DINNER, DESSERT, AND TEA SERVICES,
VASES, PARIAN STATUARY (from Minton), MANTEL SETS,
GLASSWARE (from Baccarat),
GLASS CHANDELIERS (from Osler), SHEFFIELD TABLE CUTLERY, &c., &c.
ALSO, OF OWN MANUFACTURE,
GAS FIXTURES and FINE SILVER-PLATED WARE.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

THE EASIEST WAY IS BEST.

To send fire and sword through the bowels of the land would be scarcely more cruel than it is to tear and wreck the delicate and sensitive membranes and tissues of the discharging organs with a convulsing purgative. No medicinal preparation at present known so completely, permanently, and painlessly relieves constipation as

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT;

and, as it simultaneously invigorates the digestion, regulates the action of the liver, and refreshes the debilitated system, it is justly esteemed both by medical men and the public at large as an indispensable specific in dyspepsia, bilious attacks, sick headache, physical prostration, and all complaints affecting the secretive, assimilating, and discharging organs.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

NEW YORK CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,

The oldest and best Music School in the country,
NOW OPEN FOR PRIVATE AND CLASS INSTRUCTION
In all branches of Vocal and Instrumental Music, Harmony and Composition, and the Modern Languages.
All Applications for Admission must be made at the
GENERAL CONSERVATORY OFFICES,
820 BROADWAY, near 12th St., over the Music Store.
(The branch at No. 82 Fifth Avenue removes up town.)
BROOKLYN BRANCH, 102, 104, & 106 COURT ST., near State.

ADMIRATION

Is every where elicited at the wonderful purity of tone imparted to the complexion by the use of DEVERNA'S PERSIAN SPRAY. It gives the features a truly oriental beauty and softness of expression. It at once preserves and effectually eradicates Pimples, Moth-Patches, and Tan, and all impurities of the skin. Sold by all Drug and Fancy Stores.

STARR & MARCUS,

No. 22 JOHN ST.

(UP STAIRS), N. Y.,

MAKE A SPECIALTY OF THE

GORHAM M'F'G COMPANY'S

STERLING SILVER-WARE.

Especial attention is requested to the many new and elegant pieces manufactured expressly to our order the past year, and quite recently completed.

An unusually attractive assortment of novelties in fancy silver, cased for wedding gifts, of an inexpensive character.

The works of the Gorham Company are very extensive, enabling them to employ the most accomplished talent in designing, skill in producing, and the best labor-saving machinery and method of manufacture, thus reducing the cost and bringing these beautiful wares within the reach of almost every purchaser.

The standard of this Silver is that of British Sterling, 925-1000.

Fall Importations.

Paris Dress Trimmings,
Rich Ribbons and Cravats,
Laces and Embroideries,
Velvets and Velvet Ribbons,
Bonnets and Round Hats,
Children's Furnishing Goods.

In this space we call attention to only the headings of the articles comprised in our stock. These goods are of our own importation, the designs are new and original, and we offer them at prices which can not fail to be satisfactory to our patrons.

EDWARD A. MORRISON,
WHOLESALE & RETAIL,
827 Broadway, New York,
Between 12th and 13th Sts.

R. H. MACY.

We are now and shall be receiving throughout the season our goods selected by myself,
DIRECT from LONDON,
DIRECT from PARIS,
DIRECT from VIENNA,
DIRECT from BERLIN,
DIRECT from ROME,
DIRECT from NAPLES,
DIRECT from SWITZERLAND.
Including all the novelties, which we shall sell at the lowest possible price.

FOURTEENTH STREET AND SIXTH AVENUE

TRADE-MARK.

"RUSSIAN GORED KNIT UNDERSKIRT,"

A NEW ARTICLE,

Invented and manufactured exclusively by the NORFOLK & NEW BRUNSWICK HOSIERY CO., upon their Patented Knitting Looms, being superior to flannel, much lighter, perfect in shape, and will not shrink nor change in color from washing.

ALSO,

FULL-FASHIONED HOSIERY,

consisting of

Ladies', Gents', Misses', and Boys' Underwear, of every description, superior in quality and style to any goods made in this country, and fully equal to the best hand-loom imported goods, and at greatly reduced prices.

Full lines for sale, to the jobbing trade only, at H. J. LIBBY & CO.'S, 47 & 49 White St., N. Y.

BLEES

NOISELESS,
LOCK-STITCH

SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion. Call and examine. Send for circular. Agents wanted.

MANUFACTURED BY

BLEES Sewing Machine Co., 623 Broadway, N. Y.

RAPID RECKONING, or the Art of Performing Arithmetical Calculations almost instantaneously. Any one can learn and apply. The famous "Lightning Calculator's" exhibitions (same system) were the marvel of thousands. Secret was lately sold for $1. In book form, enlarged, only 25 cts.

JESSE HANEY & CO., 119 Nassau St., N. Y.

Digitized by Google

THE BEAVER BRAND.

SILK-FINISHED

BLACK PURE MOHAIRS.

These GOODS are finished alike on both sides, and are distinguished for their silky appearance, brilliant lustre, and pure shade of fast Black. Being made of the very finest material, they positively excel all other Mohairs ever sold in the United States.

These splendid Goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

☞ Purchasers will know these Goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Beaver, precisely like the above.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 & 429 Broadway, New York,
Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

LADY'S TROUSSEAU "C"

FOR $250.

6 Muslin Chemises	@ $2 25..	$13 50
6 Linen "	@ 4 75..	28 50
1 Bridal Set (3 pieces)		20 00
6 Pairs Muslin Drawers	@ 2 25..	13 50
6 " Linen "	@ 3 50..	21 00
3 Plain Cotton Skirts	@ 2 25..	6 75
3 Tucked " "	@ 3 00..	9 00
3 " " "	@ 3 50..	10 50
1 Under Skirt		6 50
3 Muslin Night Dresses	@ 4 50..	13 50
3 Tucked Cambric Night Dresses	@ 5 75..	17 25
3 Embr'd " " "	@ 9 00..	27 00
2 Flannel Skirts, Embr'd	@ 7 00..	14 00
3 Corset Covers	@ 5 00..	15 00
2 Dressing Sacques	@ 4 75..	9 50
1 " " Embr'd		7 50
1 Robe de Chambre		17 00
		$250 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent, C. O. D., by Express. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials.

LORD & TAYLOR,

BROADWAY & TWENTIETH ST.,

NEW YORK.

Figures will not lie!

How Large Fortunes are made!

☞ FACTS FOR THE PEOPLE. ☜

☞ SEE the prices at which four of the leading Sewing Machines are sold in the UNITED STATES, and ENGLAND.

	Price in England.	In the U. S.
Wheeler & Wilson	$45.00	$85.00
New Singer - -	32.50	65.00
Elias Howe - -	35.00	65.00
Wilson Shuttle -	40.00	45.00

The above Prices are for exactly the same classes of machines as sold in both Countries. There is scarcely any difference in the cost of material and labor in any of the above named machines.

☞ AFFIDAVIT.—W. G. Wilson, President of the Wilson Sewing Machine Co., personally appeared before me, and made oath that the above prices are correct, and taken by him from Circulars published in the United States and England under the corporate names of the Companies manufacturing said machines.

FRED. SMITH,
Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas of Cuyahoga Co., O.

The WILSON SEWING MACHINES are for Sale in most every County in the United States, and

No. 707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER

Is rapidly superseding all other preparations for producing Elegant, Sweet and Wholesome ROLLS, BISCUITS, BREAD, Buckwheat and other Griddle Cakes. Perfectly Pure and Reliable, and always ready for immediate use. The CHEAPEST Baking Powder in the WORLD, and it WILL KEEP ON LAND OR SEA, in any climate, for years. It is well adapted to the use of Housekeepers, Miners, Mariners, Emigrants, &c., and is in fact, in every respect, the BEST YEAST POWDER made "for the Kitchen, the Camp, the Galley."

SOLD BY GROCERS & DEALERS EVERYWHERE.

Manufactured by DOOLEY & BROTHER,
69 NEW STREET, NEW-YORK.

PRANG CHROMO, "Bouquet of Moss Roses," given gratis to every subscriber to the new, enlarged "Star-Spangled Banner" for 1872, equal to Ledger. 75 cts. a year, 3 months for 10 cts. Specimens FREE. Address BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

5000 AGENTS WANTED. Samples sent free by mail, with terms to clear from $5 to $10 per day. Two entirely new articles, salable as flour. Address N. H. WHITE, Newark, New Jersey.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering

A Large Assortment of

PARIS AND BERLIN MADE SUITS IN SILKS, POPLIN, SATINE AND VELVET FABRICS, HANDSOMELY TRIMMED AND VERY CHEAP AND UPWARD.

Richly Embroidered Velvet, Cashmere, and Cloth SACQUES AND POLONAISES, SEAL-SKIN SACQUES, MUFFS, &c., at very attractive prices.

RICH LACES.

REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS,
From $50 each upward.

LADIES' AND MISSES'
PARIS-MADE HATS,
FEATHERS, FLOWERS, &c., &c.

Very choice and elegant
MISSES' AND CHILDREN'S PARIS AND LONDON MADE DRESSES,
IN VELVET, SILK, POPLIN, &c.,
Most tastefully and stylishly trimmed.

An immense stock of
FALL AND WINTER SILKS,
Cloth Colors, with VELVETS TO MATCH,
At Unusually Low Prices.

HOSIERY AND UNDERGARMENTS.

ALEXANDRE'S CELEBRATED KID GLOVES.
1, 2, 3, 4, and 6 Buttons, &c., &c.,
Forming the LARGEST, CHOICEST, & CHEAPEST ASSORTMENT in this city.

A visit of inspection is requested.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH & 10TH STS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

GRAND EXPOSITION,
of
SUITS AND GARMENTS.

VELVETS IN ALL THE CLOTH SHADES.

NOVELTIES IN LONG AND SQUARE
INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS.

"CHOSSON'S CELEBRATED KID GLOVES."

CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, OVERCOATINGS.

UPHOLSTERY DEPARTMENT.

Now open, a large and attractive assortment of Satins, Damasks, Cachemire Moquets. "Broche Satins," Figured and Plain Silk Terries, Cetelaines, Striped S. & W. Pekinades, Satines, Chintzes, Cretonnes. Lace and Nottingham Curtains in choice designs. Mirrors, Cornices, Shades, Bedding, &c., &c., Wholesale and Retail.

CARPET DEPARTMENT.

The Newest Styles and Designs in FINE CARPETS,
From the most celebrated European manufacturers, now arriving by every steamer.

Aubusson, Axminster, Turkey, and Smyrna Carpets, some entire for rooms, in a variety of sizes. Moquette, Axminster, Tournay, and Royal Wiltons, Velvets, and English Body Brussels, and Tapestry Carpets, in a great variety of private patterns. English and American Oilcloths, all at Lowest Market Prices, Wholesale and Retail.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

CARBOLIC HEALING C. S. COMPOUND SALVE

Beautifies the complexion by removing Pimples and all other disagreeable disorders of the skin. Twenty-five cents per box.

JOHN F. HENRY, Sole Proprietor,
No. 8 College Place, New York.

A WORD TO THOSE WHO WISH PROFITABLE EMPLOYMENT. Sell Nast's Almanac and other desirable publications that every person will buy. For further particulars, inquire of or address AVERY BILL,
Care HARPER & BROTHERS, 331 Pearl St., N. Y.

RIFLES, Shot-Guns, Revolvers, Gun Material. Write for Price-List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents wanted.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns,

For Ladies, Misses, Girls, and Children of Both Sexes.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Our business will be conducted in a spirit of progress. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue of 28 pages, containing over two hundred figures, showing the leading fashions of the day. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, ranging from 30 to 46 inches bust measure; also for misses from 10 to 16 years of age, and for children of both sexes under 10. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent to any address free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a list of two valuable premiums, both of which are offered to subscribers for Harper's Bazar. One subscriber will get at least one of these premiums, and we confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premiums offered to each and every new subscriber for the Bazar have no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land. For terms to Agents, or for catalogues, address

JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—Read the following extraordinary offer: The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Co. manufacture and warrant two different Sewing Machines, one called the Elliptic, the other called the Wheeler & Wilson. The Elliptic Machine excels in many important points. It is so light that a child can run it with ease; or an invalid, whose strength is sufficient to walk about the house or to do the work of a child ten years old, can sew all day without being overfatigued. It is impossible to convey by language a tithe of the merits belonging to this deservedly popular Machine. To see it perform the different operations, such as hemming, felling, gathering, embroidering, tucking, cording, frilling, quilting, fringing, etc., it seems more like a thing of life than a machine moved by the will of the operator. It has adjustable guages for every description of work, and can be changed in a moment to suit any material, coarse or fine. The economy of the Elliptic Machine in a family is almost incredible—with one, a good operator can do the work of twelve hands. A breadth of a skirt can be sewed in less than a minute; a gentleman's fine shirt can be made in three hours; or a child's dress, with many tiny pleats, in less time than the hands can fold them—in fact, every description of sewing is reduced from a question of hours to one of minutes. We make the following offer: Any person in the United States desiring one of these celebrated Machines can buy one and pay for it in work (not sewing) furnished at their own home. The work is pleasant and profitable, and can be accomplished by any lady, old or young. We send circulars on receipt of stamp. Address

ELLIPTIC SEWING MACHINE CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA,
with the Green-Tea Flavor. Warranted to suit all tastes. For sale every where. And for sale wholesale only by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 8 Church St., N. Y. P. O. Box 5506. Send for Thea-Nectar Circular.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

☞ New Subscribers will be supplied with either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR, from the present time to the end of the year 1872, for Four Dollars.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year. $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year. 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 50 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	" 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 13
POSTILION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 15
SHORT-SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 17
LADY'S TRAVELING SUIT	" 21
MISS'S POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 7 to 15 years old)	" 23
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)	" 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)	" 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)	" 29
BOY'S BLOUSE, SHIRT-WAIST, and KNICKERBOCKERS (for Boy from 4 to 9 years old)	" 31
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)	" 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt)	" 35
MARGUERITE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 37
LOUIS XIV. POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 39
VEST-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 41
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER	" 43
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 44

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

NAST'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC FOR 1872. With nearly 150 Illustrations, from Original Designs by Thomas Nast, made expressly for this Almanac. Crown 8vo, Paper, 30 cents; Four Copies, $1 00.

THE RISE AND FALL OF THE PARIS COMMUNE. With a full Account of the Bombardment, Capture, and Burning of the City. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE, an Eye-Witness of the Events described, Editor of "Harper's Hand-Book of European Travel," "Harper's Phrase-Book," &c. With a Map of Paris and Portraits from Original Photographs. Large 12mo, 516 pages, Cloth, $2 00.

KINGSLEY'S WEST INDIES. At Last: a Christmas in the West Indies. By CHARLES KINGSLEY. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE TEMPEST. Edited, with Notes, by WM. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High-School, Cambridge, Mass., and Editor of "The Merchant of Venice." Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

BULWER'S KING ARTHUR. King Arthur. A Poem. By EARL LYTTON. 12mo, Cloth, Illuminated, $1 75.

BROUGHAM'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY. The Life and Times of HENRY, LORD BROUGHAM. Written by Himself. Vols. I. and II. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per vol. (To be completed in Three Volumes.)

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

JOSHUA MARVEL. By B. L. FARJEON. 8vo, Paper, 40 cents. (Just Ready.)

ANNE FURNESS. By the Author of "Mabel's Progress," "The Sacristan's Household," "Veronica," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

A DAUGHTER OF HETH. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "Kilmeny," "In Silk Attire," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

NEW LIBRARY EDITIONS by the Author of "John Halifax:"

OLIVE.—OGILVIES.—THE HEAD OF THE FAMILY.—JOHN HALIFAX.—AGATHA'S HUSBAND. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per volume.

FOR LACK OF GOLD. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "Robin Gray." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE ISLAND NEIGHBORS. A Novel of American Life. By Mrs. A. B. BLACKWELL. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

Digitized by Google

LADIES' LUGGAGE.

ow, Parker, are you Sure you have got All? Twenty-four Packages, I think you told me?"
n despair). "And there was Twenty-four, Ma'am; but I've Counted Three Times over up to Twenty-three, and even that won't make Twenty-four!"

"Do you cast things here?" inquired a Yankee the other day, as he entered into a foundry and addressed the proprietor. "You cast all kinds of things in iron, eh?" was the next query.

"Certainly. Don't you see that it is our business?"

"Ah, well, cast a shadow, will you?"

He was cast out, and referred to a brass foundry.

Is a lamp at any time in a bad temper?—Yes; when it is put out.

The following notice is stuck up on a bridge in Denver, in Colorado: "No vehicle drawn by more than one animal is allowed to cross this bridge in opposite directions at the same time." This is concise and comprehensible. We should be inclined to append to it, "This notice, drawn up by more than a donkey, is to be pasted up at both ends of the bridge simultaneously at different times."

Is there any connection between a retailer of stale jokes and a stock-broker?—Yes; for they both deal in fun-dead property.

An examiner says that recently a candidate for government employ was given an essay upon the "Horse—his Uses to Man, and his Qualities." He wrote, "The horse is very diligent and rapacity; he knows his stables, and he knows his master, as well as any animal agoin'."

QUERY.—What is the circumference of the waste of time?

AN AWKWARD QUESTION.—Never wound any one's feelings unnecessarily. Respect all honest prejudices. For example, if, at supper, you have a lady under your charge whose principles you know to be decidedly teetotal, abstain from asking her whether she will take some tipsy-cake.

The extortions some of the et her.

Mont Cenis Tunnel.

irds of the women in lunatic
rs. It would seem from this d husbandman.

ocket.

ned coat: it has neither seam rawl out of your trowsers.

eal (or any other) poultice? or,
sidered a sovereign remedy?

?—When they rest on their ores.

hter to oil her hair, and fainted
d, "Oh no, ma; it spoils the gen-

WOMAN—The essence of thyme.

ary notices we find in the Philahree-year-old boy lament that—ne is lonely,
to-day;
tle toady
ed away."
od.

keep is in the habit of recognizing n it by its master. If he gives it a ndle like a man getting off a horse?

ht.

ends its charms.

society.

NEAT THING IN COLLARS.

DESIGNED FOR THE GENT OF THE PERIOD.

THE GOLDEN RULE.

IMPROVED FROM MODERN AUTHORITIES.

Be you to others kind and true,
As you'd have others be to you,
And neither do nor say to men
Whate'er you would not like again;
But if men do and say to you
That which is neither kind nor true,
Take a good stick, and say to men,
"Don't say or do that same again."

THE MOST LIKELY THING TO BECOME A WOMAN—Why, a little girl.

OUR MATRIMONIAL ADVERTISEMENTS.

A SIMPLE, guileless thing, aged fifty-two or thereabouts. In comfortable circumstances, with dark, flashing eyes. Wishes to correspond with a gentleman in an official capacity, with a not immoderate appetite. Address Editor, or whistle twice down area.

A CHILD of impulse—at present in trouble—would like to be provided for liberally. No objection to a widow in the public line, as he knows a good deal about bars. Address to Editor, or to Old Boston Road, large house on right, going north.

A FOREIGN nobleman, recently out at Elba, is anxious to meet with a comfortable home, with stimulating diet. Has the noblest sentiments, and wears paper collars. Carte with Editor.

A YOUNG and lovely creature, with several thousands. Golden hair, well educated and connected, lovable and rather jolly disposition. Has been vaccinated, and would make an affectionate wife. Strange to say, none of the above qualities have been observed by any one but the advertiser.

I AM young and handsome, bien élevé; use several languages as a rule, good and bad. Have been transported frequently, and enjoyed myself very much. The highest references from the Mayor—if he will give them.

THE "LAY" OF THE BURGLAR—"I know a bank."

THE "BIG INJIN" OF AMERICA—Ingenuity.

FRIENDS (ESPECIALLY PRACTICAL JOKERS).

gazed," he received every Post Apronfuls of Advertisers, and Letters (apparently) from enterprising Tradesmen, all over Town! The Annoyance, to one Nature, may be Imagined!

The following lines, which were sent us for publication in the Bazar, are quite worthy of the Poet of Sierra Flat, and so good that we can not withhold them from our readers, though we doubt whether they were intended for precisely this department:

LINES WRITTEN ON SEEING THE DEVIL'S LAKE, WISCONSIN.

As I rode out one bright clear day
Some rocks and water to survey
At length we came to the lake shore
Where snakes were wont to rattle in days of yore

I was accompanied by two
By my dear mother and brother our cicerone through
But before arriving at the lake shore
We overtook some passengers more

They were the elite away from town
Clad in gray blue black or brown
And long with us they then did ride
To Minawaughkin by the lake side

And when our horses we did tether
Then to the lake all went together
Where we could see the surging waves
As they dashed long from cave to cave

Several canoes were laying by
And the wind and water so very high
That no one then did venture out
With hook or spear to catch the trout

The rocks lay piled all round so deep
Way up the bluffs so very steep
That a grand but solemn sight twas to behold
Such great huge masses up so bold

Twas up three hundred feet or more
Our eyes were stretched bove the lake shore
To take a view of yon towering height
Before departing from the sight

But whats remarkable no inlet to this lake as yet is found
Also no visible outlet above around or underground
And yet the water is so very pure and clear
Still not an Indian of the woods will ever venture here

This lake is three miles long and one mile wide
But fathomless in the middle and shallow at the sides
And the bluffs are dotted oer with pines
Hedged in as tight as wedges
Which look most beautifully
All scattered mong the ledges

HOW TO MAKE AN IMPRESSION—By dint of perseverance.

Why are books your best friends?—Because you can shut them up without offending them.

Which of the plagues of Egypt is most like a hat?—Darkness which may be felt.

SINCERE, IF NOT FLATTERING.

SCHOOL-MISTRESS. "Johnny, I'm Ashamed of you! When I was your Age I could Read as well as I do now!"

JOHNNY. "Aw! but yow'd a Defferent Taycher to wot we'm got!"

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 45.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Lady's Wrapper, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS wrapper is made of black poplin, with the back arranged in the Watteau style. The fronts, which simulate a colored under dress, are of purple poplin, richly trimmed with pleated Swiss muslin ruffles, which are bordered on the under edge with scalloped strips, and on the upper edge with pinked ruches of purple silk. The revers on both sides of the simulated under dress are of black poplin, lined with purple poplin; the tight under-sleeves are of purple poplin. The trimming for the revers consists of black passementerie buttons and crimped black silk fringe an inch and three-quarters wide; the sleeves are trimmed with Swiss muslin ruffles and a silk ruche. The over-sleeves are furnished with revers edged with black lace four inches and a half wide. Cut for the simulated under dress of purple poplin one piece from Fig. 1, Supplement, and two pieces from Fig. 2; these pieces must be lengthened as much as may be required in the direction of the arrow-heads. Having joined the pieces each from 1 to the under edge, face them with a strip of silk four inches wide, and set on the trimming. Lay several pleats at the top, bringing × on ●, and sew the skirt into a poplin belt of the same color. Cut the two fronts of the waist of purple poplin and lining from Fig. 3, and of a double layer of lining two pieces from Fig. 4 and one piece from Fig. 5. Face the fronts with a strip of the material, furnish them with buttons and button-holes, and join each front from 2 to 3 with a side form, and the latter with the back, each from 4 to 5. Lay a pleat in the back, as indicated on the pattern, and cover the back with purple poplin from the top to the straight line on Fig. 5. Cut of black poplin two pieces each from Figs. 6, 7, and 8, lengthening them as much as may be required in the direction of the arrow-heads. Sew up the pleats in the fronts, Fig. 6, and join Figs. 6–8 according to the corresponding figures. Sew up the seam in the back, and arrange the back in a double Watteau fold at the top, bringing × on ●, so that the dotted lines form the outer, and the straight lines the inner folds of the pleats. Baste the parts thus joined on the parts arranged from Figs. 2–5 according to the corresponding figures. The pieces of purple poplin cut from Fig. 2 are sewed each from * to the bottom at both sides to the under side of the pieces cut from Fig. 7. The seam made by sewing on the pleated part, Fig. 8, on the back, Fig. 5, is covered by a ruche of purple poplin lined with black poplin, which is set on as shown by the illustration, Fig. 1. For the revers cut of black and purple poplin, the latter for the lining, two pieces each from Fig. 9, in doing which join on the piece turned down in Supplement, and allow the extra material for the requisite length. Run the material and lining together, join the revers at the middle of the back according to the corresponding figures, furnish them with trimming, and sew them on the wrapper according to the figures and signs. Sew the neck of the wrapper into a double standing collar. Cut the tight under-sleeves from Fig. 68, No. XII., of the present Supplement, and cut the wide over-sleeves and the revers of black poplin from Figs. 10 and 11, the former in one piece, and observing the piece cut out for the under half of the sleeves. Sew up the sleeves from 11 to 12, join them, according to the corresponding figures and signs, with the revers, which have previously been covered with purple poplin on the upper edge to the straight line, trimmed with fringe, and sewed up from 13 to 14, and sew both the over-sleeves and tight sleeves into the armholes, bringing 12 of the sleeves on 12 of Fig. 8.

On the middle of the back, below the ruche, set a bow of purple silk ribbon with long ends. Two belt pieces fastened on the inside at the side seams serve to close the wrapper, and are finished by a ribbon bow with double loops and two ends in front. A similar bow is worn at the throat. Linen standing collar. Swiss muslin and Valenciennes breakfast cap.

Fig. 1.—LADY'S WRAPPER.—BACK.
For pattern see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-11.

Fig. 2.—LADY'S WRAPPER.—FRONT.
For pattern see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-11.

LONGEVITY.

THE appliances of civilization and quiet and regular habits are the chief conditions of long life. We find from statistics, comparing the expectation of life at the age of sixty, given by various authorities, that in England agricultural laborers of that age, belonging to friendly societies, and hence sober, well-to-do men, stand first, and may expect to live nearly eighteen years longer, while confirmed drunkards stand last, with only half that chance of life. The females of the aristocracy come next to the laborers, with sixteen years and a half; the male members of the aristocracy next, with only fourteen and a half; clerks follow, with twelve and a half; men in Liverpool, with twelve; miners, with eleven and three-quarters; while sovereigns of all countries at sixty years of age have an expectation of a little less than eleven years of life. Distinguished men live a shorter time than less distinguished, on account of their harder work; married live longer than unmarried persons, on account, perhaps, of the measured tranquillity of connubial life; women longer than men, because they lead an easier life; and the clergy longer than other professional men, for the same reason.

From these facts it is not difficult to draw the lesson of longevity. After all, the prolonging of their own lives is not a thing about which men should take much thought; as long as they are careful not directly to shorten life, and careful to preserve health, longevity and centenarianism may well be left to take their own way. The celebrated Italian, Louis Cornaro, carefully weighing his egg and measuring his wine for his daily meals, refusing to allow matters of a disturbing nature to come under his attention, and taking a thousand precautions, all to enable his pitiful old frame to vegetate a few years the longer on the earth's face, is not a pleasing figure to contemplate. True it is that he who would save his life shall lose it; for the existence of such a being as Cornaro is not comparable day for day with that of an active man. When the element of intensity is taken into consideration, there is perhaps very til, in fact, there can be charity and patience on the one side perfectly developed, and faithfulness and honor on the other.

Digitized by Google

Certainly the poor peasant girl just landed from a sea-voyage, sick in body and sick at heart, is an object of the best compassion. She enters at once into a strange family, whose peculiarities are a terra incognita to her; she is shown her room, usually the worst and most cheerless and remote in the house; and is introduced to her duties. She is alone, of course—for we are not speaking of her condition in those wealthy households where a dozen divide the labor, but in the American home which thinks itself fortunate with a single maid-of-all-work; the faces around her, be they ever so kindly, are the faces of judges before whom she is conscious of being on trial; there is no sympathetic soul about to give her the reassuring word; she is lonesome with an ineffable loneliness; new to all her work; ignorant of the names of utensils, even of the use of scrubbing-brushes, since her floor at home was the hard earth; ignorant of the manners of the country, of the ways of the family, of the habits of comfortable life; ashamed of her ignorance; sensitive to rebuke; fearful of ridicule; laden with an accent difficult to comprehend, and finding, herself, the same difficulty with the accent of her employers; accustomed to such simple diet as oatmeal and buttermilk, but tempted by more savory dishes to the point of sickness, yet with the routine of work before her; dismally aloof with her terrors at night; and even if in some forgetful moment the song rises to her lips, memories of the cabin, the old mother, the fair, the pigs and the potato-patch, the earth and sky and sunshine of the old land, rising with it, till the apron flies over the head, and tears drown out the whole. If it were a maiden of our own nation thus transplanted, surely we should find her something to be pitied and indulged; and why any less because she is of another nation, one of the noblest in history, degraded now not through any temperament of its own, but through the tyranny of a harder and more selfish one, of which we proudly claim to be an offshoot? What wonder that she demands all her evenings out, the privileges of all the funerals, and every fast and festival of her Church? She is an exile; and only so she touches her people; and the Church takes to her the place of home—it is father and mother, friends and native land and heaven; and she has built for it, with the free offering of her work and wages, throughout the length and breadth of her banishment, fit shrines of stone and brick, of clustered column and springing arch and lofty tower, stained window and marble floor—the palaces of the poor.

Still it is not upon the romantic aspect of the case that the mistress can be all the time expected to look. With the maid it is more or less a matter of feeling, after all; with the mistress it is a matter of life and death. The bondage is a mutual one, indeed; the maid can escape from it the moment she earns sufficient money to take her home to the primitive freedom of County Clare or Tipperary; the mistress can only make fresh indentures with another representative of the same despotism. Her work must be done; she is herself unable to do it; she engages another to do it for a certain sum of money; the happiness of her marriage, the health of her family, and something of her reputation as a member of society largely depend upon having it done, and done well. Perhaps she would live upon toast and tea herself rather than have a rout about it, but her husband will not, and should not. Perhaps she would go without starched elegance forever, dear to her heart as her husband's admiration of her toilette may be, but his linen must be well laundried; what he pays for he has a right to; and while she is, in that regard, merely an agent of the transaction, of whom faithfulness is demanded, yet, as mistress of the house, she experiences, on her own account, the absolute necessity of its being well kept and in order.

If then, added to the hard duty of repressing the unrighteous but natural impatience with ignorance, rawness, or stupidity, she finds that she has to contend with a shirk, a slattern, a shrew, not to speak of the exceptionally worse; if she finds cuffs and collars tucked away in odd holes and corners, instead of being washed and ironed; finds precious glass and china broken, and no word told of it till the moment of its imperative need for use; finds forks in the swill, and spoons in the drain; sees the abstraction of tea and sugar and small wares for the benefit of unnumbered cousins boldly claimed as a rightful spoiling of the Egyptian, rather than as dishonesty; puts up with incapacity, and often with impertinence, month after month, only to be told on the week before expected illness or expected guests that she must look out for another specimen, because that one is going away—why, then, the mistress can not be altogether blamed for her declaration of war upon all the Bridgets that St. PATRICK left alive.

In fact, unless we do indeed invite the Chinese, we see but one rational help for the existing state of things in our families, and which shall work a recognition of mutual partnership out of the present mutual bondage. It is that the mistress, doing Christian duty, shall exert herself to make, as far as possible, a pleasant home for the stranger in her gates, treating her as a friend rather than as a slave, making her feel that her interests are no more to be put out of sight than those of any other member of the family, conducting toward her exactly as she would have the woman of some superior race and fortune conduct toward her own unskilled daughter in like case, making reproof gentle, commendation cordial, and work not beyond the strength; and that, on the other hand, the maid—remembering that rent, fuel, food, and wages have risen thrice in value, but that clothing, the only thing for which she has to expend money, remains at the original price, so that while her board costs her mistress three times as much as formerly, she receives in addition three times the wages without being obliged to spend any more—resolve at least upon not taking payment for work which she does not do, and, endeavoring to do the work faithfully, to agree to her mistress's right to have it done as she chooses, and to understand that the honor of her nation and of her religion is in some degree, however small, in her keeping, to cast lustre on by her honesty and industry; and that in the contract of service it is as much the interest of the mistress to be a good mistress as the servant to be a good servant. Till she does comprehend all this the trouble must renew itself each day, for every American woman would feel herself a free woman; but Bridget having, in the absence of others, control of the situation, is, like every ignorant person in authority, a tyrant.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Shadows.

MY DEAR FELIX,—I was recently in the country, and driving over the hills upon a very lonely road with my friend Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle. We stopped at a small house, brown with age, and of one story, and which seemed, like the houses in Switzerland, to have been built to resist heavy snows and long winters. Mrs. Margery went into the house to ask the mistress if she could knit some warm mittens for the little Honeysuckles—mittens to cover the wrist, and that would be comfortable in Lapland. The mistress said if mother would spin the yarn she would herself dye it and then knit the mittens, and mother, already past eighty, replied that she would gladly spin; and the bargain was made. I did not hear, indeed, what was said, for when Mrs. Margery went into the house I remained in the wagon. It was a solitary scene. There were two or three of the little brown houses clustered together. Around them lay stony pastures and smoother hay fields, and little groves of maples and oaks softened the bareness of the hill-side. The view was broad and beautiful. The hill sloped gradually to a stream, and beyond there were ranges of high hills, misty, far away. Just behind the house, upon the higher part of the hill, was a wood, which, as I sat in the wagon, with the little horse apparently dozing as he stood, sighed in the low breeze.

There was the enchantment of profound silence over all. Nothing disturbed the stillness but the occasional rustle of the trees or the whistle of a bird; and as I sat looking at the wood above and beyond the house, I observed how very black the shadows were. Daylight ended at the edge, and within, under and among the trees, all was mystery and gloom. I understood then all the old and the new romances, all the legends of fairy. My fascinated eyes waited to see elves peering out, and gnomes grinning over the rocks and from behind the trees; and hark! it was a hamadryad whose plaintive whisper died in the faint breeze, or a faun loitered among the mossy tree trunks. Once more I looked, and there was blank darkness only—undisturbed night among the trees. The road upon which the wagon stood in which I sat, the scant, stony pastures, and the old stone walls that divided them were, however, touched with some spell. The shadow of the wood had fallen upon me, and all was a little changed.

Mythology and fairy lore then begin in the shade. It is mystery that makes poetry. It is the shadow that touches the imagination. I turned to the little brown house upon which the late sunlight shone, but despite the sun I knew that the house and all the life in it somehow lay in the shadow. Was it therefore poetic? It certainly was, although the mistress and the mother would not have known what I meant if I had said so. Yet the whole scene was a poem, and could I have written it in music, you would have acknowledged it. Then, as I sat in the little wagon behind the dozing little horse, I observed that not only was there the dense dark shadow under the trees, but that in "the long light" of sunset the houses threw a shadow, and the trees, and the fences, and the little horse; and there was my shadow upon the grassy road-side; and I lifted the whip, and lo! a dark line upon the wall; and even the shrubs and the blades of grass had each a shadow.

Shadows! shadows! There are horrible streets in the cities—slums, they call them—narrow courts of high houses full of poor people huddled wretchedly together, filthy, starving, despairing: and there is constant chill. The sun never shines there. It seems as if a single ray of sunshine would bring infinite relief, but it does not come. There is universal shadow, and in the shade there are disease and crime and death. Yet I remember in Florence, at midsummer, how people stole spectrally along the thin strip of shade from the high houses as if they were walking a narrow plank of safety, and as if death lurked in the universal sunshine as in the wide ocean. In the slum the shadow was death; in the Italian city at midsummer it was life. And in the rich yellow days of late September Mrs. Margery's old uncle came to see her, and all the morning he sat on the south side of the barn, where a great flood of sunshine beat upon him; and looking at the house, he said that it needed to be brought out of the shadow of the trees and planted in the sun, which was his life. But a few weeks before I had talked with an omnibus driver sitting under a spacious umbrella. "Thank God for this shade," he said, "for the sun would be the death of me!"

So I came to see that there are what Robert Collyer, in his admirable discourse, calls healing and hurting shadows. Here and to-day the shade is a bane, but there and to-morrow it is a blessing. It is a bane when it preserves chilliness and dampness and the death that they breed, and a blessing when it tempers the fiery ray of Sirius. It is a hurting shadow in those old woods in which the sullen gnomes and horrid ogres are hid; but a shadow of healing from which the nymphs and dryads and lithe Undines spring. And if every object, even to the blade of grass, has its shadow, not less has every event and every person: and if you have watched closely, you may often see two shadows from the same object. When they are the shadows of events, one of them may sometimes be healing and the other hurting. When a little child of my dear friend Mrs. Margery died, the shade was so dark and cold that life itself seemed to be chilled, and unwholesome fancies and angry doubts, and almost hatred and despair, were bred of it, like the snakes and vermin and foulness that spawn in slimy gloom. But another shadow followed, sober and tender; and patience and tranquillity and faith blossomed in it like the violets and the sweet Solomon's-seal and the superb orchis in the soft shadow of woods. There is a shadow in which only Pluto and the realms and works of utter darkness are to be found; and there is another in which Diana, with the crescent of hope and beauty upon her forehead, flits superbly by.

Here is the great calamity in Chicago—the storm of fire that has devoured human life and wealth and consumed a city. Such immeasurable suffering and loss throw a shadow upon the whole country that seems only black and deadly. As in the old fable of winter, who raises his sceptre and waves it over the earth, and all that its shadow falls upon withers and dies, so it seemed that the small fortunes and livelihoods of widows and orphans far away in remote New England valleys, or on the shores of Southern rivers, must suddenly shrink and die as the shadow of the calamity reached them. A whole country arose one morning and said, as it looked out upon that desolating shadow, "How terrible!" and the next day it looked at the same great shadow and said, "How beautiful!" At the first glance it saw only the misery and sorrow, the gnomes and reptiles of the gloom; but with the second it beheld the tender sympathy, the holy charity, the eager succor, the cheery resolution, the noble character—the flowers and the good fairies that grow in the shade.

These are the two shadows which the same object casts according to the light thrown on them. And if you look back into history, and study the progress which has been made, always with struggling, often with suffering and blood, you will see the same double shadow—the shadow of beauty and the shadow of gloom: that in which the lofty Diana stands serene, and that of the cowering and gibbering imps and sprites of ill. There, for instance, is the old French revolution. From some points it seems only black, a funereal pall, a curse. If you think of the suffering in detail, the moral agony, the suspense, the terror, the tragedy of single households, the breaking of individual hearts—of such scenes as that of the picture representing the calling of the doomed to the guillotine from the great hall of the Abbey, or of the fate of Sidney Carton in Dickens's "Tale of Two Cities"—it is almost beyond endurance. Men and women seem to have dwindled into fiends, and God himself to be withdrawn. But presently you see that while the first shadow is so black and apparently depthless, a shadow of grief and hurt, there is another, softer, healing shadow, in which you detect the wider justice, the great general gain, that have followed the awful convulsion.

Digitized by Google

And so, it seemed to me as I sat behind the dozing little mare, it is with persons as with events. We all cast a shadow, and we can not help it. But the shadow of some of us—of old Bloater, for instance—is it any thing but hurting? You go into his house, or he comes into yours, and suddenly it seems as if there were no god but him of the belly. Eating and drinking, and all that belongs to them, are the chief interest of Bloater. It is distressing, it is humiliating; it is a huge dripping sirloin, it is a hogshead of beer, that throws its preposterous shadow over you. The air reeks with fumes of fat. It is a suffocating shadow. Or there is Cynicus, polite, formal, icy. When he comes he offends no canon of good behavior, but it is like having the statue of the Commendatore in "Don Giovanni" come to visit you. It is a freezing, deadly shadow that he casts, with his cold courtesy and his calm supercilionsness. Then comes Aerio, and throws the exasperating, irritating shadow of his affectation and absurdity. You can always tell what the shadow is by hearing the general estimate of the man. Indeed, we do not know ourselves what shadow we cast, and we can perhaps only ascertain by hearing its effect described. I wonder if Julius and Juliana know what their shadow is? It is thrown from something of which they are probably unconscious; from the constant wrangling and querulousness and peevishness which they indulge when they are alone, and which, therefore, they can not escape when others are with them. I have been there to dine, and the shadow that fell upon the table soured and imbittered all the food. I believe there were fillets and croquettes and jellies and puddings, but I seemed to have dined upon soot and vinegar. It was because my host and hostess could not conceal their testy impatience at every little incident and over every little difference.

I came away very humbly, wishing to test my own shadow. In Hawthorne's beautiful and tragical story of "Rappacini's Daughter," the lover, trained to the fatal air of poison, breathes upon a swarm of summer insects, and they fall dead. He did not know it until he proved it. The poisonous breath he drew seemed to his lungs as soft as summer air. Perhaps our shadows seem so to ourselves. We know our good wishes, our pure resolves, and we deplore our weaknesses and failures, without being conscious that it is they which determine our influence. Juliana dresses herself with taste and care, and the colors of her toilette, her diamonds, and her laces all happily combine. But that little drop of ink, that grease spot, that torn end of lace—it is these, and not the silk and diamonds, that make the real effect of her display; and that is not of beauty, but of carelessness and suspicion. Dear Felix, you and I are not famous people, and our shadows do not chill or refresh nations; but they do affect the little nation, the little world, of our loves and friendships. Let us take constant care that it be a shadow of good fairies, not of gnomes—a shadow in which Diana lingers, and from which satyrs flee. Ours is a small shadow; but 'tis enough for the spot upon which the light of heaven throws it.

"The daisy, by the shadow that it casts,
Protects the lingering dew-drop from the sun."

Your friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CASHMERE WRAPS.

THE wrappings donned with the first frosty days of autumn are made of the various cashmeres, either the single twilled, the barathea cashmere, with crinkles like crape, or else drap d'été, which is the heaviest of all cashmeres. These replace the black gros grain wraps once worn, and are always black, unless the dress is of colored cashmere, when the mantle should match it. The newest paletots have loose sacque fronts, with backs nearly fitted, and held in position by a belt underneath. The patterns in the present Supplement of the Bazar show all the newest designs for these garments; but the sacque which is most popular at the present moment is that with a Watteau fold in the back, made by a pattern given in our last spring's Supplement of wraps. Sacques that have not this Watteau fold are trimmed in some way straight up the back, requiring only an edge or border on the garment to complete it.

Next to sacques come the newer mantles, and these are now considered the most distinguished and stylish of all wraps. The favorite design presents two large round capes, and consists in many cases of two circles; but the better plan is to have a long, loose, sleeveless sacque, with deep talma cape above it, the garment having, when complete, the appearance of two capes. This very simple and graceful wrap can easily be made at home. The under sacque of the garment has seams under the arms only, and should be round and loose below that it may not crush a bouffant tournure, and for the same reason it must not be too long. From thirty-four to thirty-six inches is the length for ladies of medium height. For the present season the sacque without sleeves is preferred, but sleeves will be added later for warmth. The cape worn over this is a quarter of a yard shorter than the sacque, and is a simple talma, open up the entire back and trimmed all around. To be graceful it should slope away gradually from the throat, hanging open to display the buttoned-up front of the sacque beneath; its length should be so proportioned that it will not droop on the shoulders, and the backs, though separated, must not fall widely apart. A simple binding is worn around the neck; there is no collar, as it would look like a third cape. When made in drap d'été or other cashmere the trimming is fringe or guipure lace, with cording or passementerie studded with jet. Solid black trimmings are in best taste, but white and black mixed braiding, machine stitching, and fringe are much used. Three yards of double width cashmere are required for these wraps. At present they are not lined, but for winter they will require a lining of farmer's satin or Italian cloth, or else thin, soft flannel. Furnishing houses charge from $25 to $35 for these mantles, according to the trimmings used. With elaborate braiding and fine jets they cost much more.

CLOTH WRAPS.

New cloths have a diagonal twill like serge, and are as soft as cashmere; these, however, are only found in French garments, and can not be bought here by the yard. The cloths most sold are plain smooth beavers, soft, flexible, and fine, and the tricot beaver, with almost invisible twill. Plain beavers cost from $4 50 to $9 a yard; tricot, from $4 50 to $6. Black is most used; the only colors called for are invisible green, blue, and olive; and occasionally a dark prune and pale gray cloth wrap is made.

The double cape, or sacque with cape, described above, is much used for cloth, and more nearly fills the idea of a cloak than any cloth wrap lately worn. Rich, heavy bullion fringe of thickly twisted silk, or the crimped willow fringe, edges cloth capes; above the fringe are narrow folds of bias faille, or of velvet folded to the centre; or a two-inch band of velvet is studded with jet, and used as a heading for fringe. Passementerie and braiding, unless of heavy, thick patterns, do not look well on cloth. Hand-made trimmings of silk, such as pleatings, marquise puffs, and ruches, have gone out of fashion. The buttons most used are moulds covered with the material of the trimming. A new ornament of three heavy cords, as thick as a lady's finger, is arranged to swing from the shoulder, sometimes toward the centre of the back, while in other cases it begins at the throat and ends on the shoulder. Fortunately only one such ornament is used on a cloak, as they cost from $10 to $12.

Another mantle very handsome in cloth, and especially becoming to stout figures, is the Inverness, a round, sleeveless garment, with an upper cape in front only, the back left plain, or else ornamented in Watteau fashion. In bottle green cloth, with fringe and velvet folds for trimming, or else border of black marten fur, this is a very stylish cloak.

Cloth paletots are so convenient and jaunty that they will remain in favor. They are also most reasonable in price. Among those imported from Berlin are fine cloth jackets, slashed, and in Gothic points, with velvet collar and cuffs, made in the best manner, and sold for $18 or $20. Others of coarser cloth, though all wool, trimmed with fringe and velvet pipings, cost from $15 to $18. For very young ladies, misses, and children, there are jaunty jackets somewhat in sailor fashion, cut and made by a regular tailor. They have double-breasted fronts, with revers and close slashed back. The cloth is blue or black beaver, with revers and facing of thick black faille, piped only on one edge with white cloth. There are deep cuffs on the coat sleeves, a square pocket on one side, and brass buttons. Ladies' sizes cost $18; children's from $12 to $15.

VELVET GARMENTS.

Ponson's blue-black velvet, three-fourths of a yard wide, is the quality found most available for this season's garments. It costs from $11 to $15 a yard. The polonaise, the double cape, and the short paletot are all shown in velvet. A velvet polonaise is the most elegant over garment for completing winter costumes. The styles most popular are the Louis XIV. vest-polonaise, like our cut paper pattern, or the Marguerite polonaise elaborate with jet ornaments and lace, or else a combination of these two that we have already alluded to, having the vest front and Marguerit back. No satin appears on these velvets, only dead black faille enlivened by rich jet passementeries, lace, and fringe. Fur bands, especially the fox furs and black marten, and the tail tips of these furs are also used. The bell sleeve, half-flowing and open up to the elbow, and the wide coat sleeve with Louis Quinze cuff, are appropriate for these polonaises.

The double capes of velvet are much less expensive than polonaises, are graceful and stylish-looking, with the advantage, in addition, of not cutting the velvet in small pieces. A pretty velvet Inverness, with gimp and fringe, is sold for $75; a double cape, or a sacque with cape, for $85. Ladies who have velvet basquines, or loose sacques made two or three years ago, are modernizing them by adding a large talma, open only half-way up the back, and thus concealing that part of the velvet that has lost its lustre or become worn.

The short velvet paletots worn to complete suits that are partly velvet and partly faille are loose, cut in deep points, and trimmed to match the dress. When not made with reference to any special suit they are often so heavily wrought with braid, cording, or embroidery that the fabric of which they are made is almost lost sight of. The work on these makes them very expensive, and, as the fashions of trimming change rapidly, these jackets are only bought by ladies of wealth who have a new garment every season. The simplest velvet sacque has a loose front and basque back, with fullness added below the waist by a single box-pleat, or else one broad or two narrow folds are attached to the back of the neck, and droop like a Watteau pleat.

HOUSE JACKETS.

Bright and warm jackets for the house are made of flannel cloth of two or three red shades, scarlet, cherry, or crimson, braided with white worsted curled braid in Gothic patterns, and fringed or scalloped. White flannel cloth is braided with blue or scarlet, blue with white, and black with white or blue. The collar, cuffs, and a breast pocket are pointed in Gothic fashion. Price $10.

FUR CLOAKS.

The most comfortable garment for midwinter is a fur cloak. Seal will be most worn this year, and the shape is a loose double-breasted sacque, bordered with sea-otter or with beaver. The small round muff must be bordered also. Astrakhan cloaks are given a new effect by borders of another skin, such as fur seal or that of the Persian lamb. These are in fitted jackets, slashed in each seam, and cost from $90 to $120. In furs sold by the yard for trimming the black marten and fox skins will be preferred to mink, though they can never rival sable.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

THE Chicago fire was especially grievous on the book trade and the literary men of that city. Its book trade amounted to $3,000,000 per annum, such firms as the Western News Company, S. C. GRIGGS & Co., W. B. KEEN & COOK, doing an immense business. These three firms did business in adjoining stores—the finest "Booksellers' Row" in the world. It was not unusual to circulate from Chicago 10,000 copies of a subscription book. Chicago had many valuable public and private libraries—among the latter those of JOHN B. RICE, E. G. ASSAY, E. B. M'CAGG, HENRY L. MONROE, and PERRY H. SMITH. Mr. RICE'S library contained about five thousand volumes, including a Dibdin which cost $1800, and was the finest in the world.

—JOHN WOOL GRISWOLD, a grandson of the late General JOHN E. WOOL (a veteran United States officer), and son of JOHN A. GRISWOLD, of Troy (formerly a member of Congress, and Republican candidate for Governor of this State), has been admitted a partner in the firm of JOHN A. GRISWOLD & Co. Although born to wealth and position, he commenced his business career by going into his father's shops, and working at manual mechanical labor with the rest of the workmen—an example that may be emulated with honor and profit by other young gentlemen born with the traditional spoon of silver.

—One-third of the subscribers to the engravings of DORÉ'S paintings are American. The Doré Gallery, in London, is open all the year round. Immensely clever as he is, the more one sees of his work the less one believes in him as a really great artist; but he is a very great merchant, and looks like a Wall Street broker.

—Bishop WILBERFORCE, who is sometimes—indeed generally—called "Soapy Sam," has been in Scotland, and been much praised for having performed divine service in the Scotch Kirk. One critic is full of admiration at the performance of the bishop in his new character. The Scotch people who were present were mostly Presbyterians, and said that it was a "vera eedifying sarvice." Another critic, not quite pleased, says the "sarvice" was not recognized either by Anglicans or Presbyterians. It was neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor good red herring, but a sort of religious "haggis."

—Among the especially notable people in diplomatic circles in Washington are Mr. and Madame DE GARCIA, the very finest-looking couple in that metropolis. Mr. DE GARCIA'S appearance is very striking, and his manners are as attractive as his personal appearance. Gentlemanly, modest, and sensible, he is evidently anxious to please for his own sake and for that of his government. Madame DE GARCIA is splendidly handsome. Large, soft, black eyes, rich, luxuriant hair, graceful and dignified in carriage, you would mark her immediately in the largest assemblage. A beautiful musician, and with considerable literary ability, she is a lady of no little consequence in society.

—Ex-Secretary SEWARD makes the consolatory remark, suggested by any amount of personal experience, that "Americans are the fashion now all over the world."

—If the spirit of GEORGE PEABODY could hover over London, it would see the families of 800 steady and industrious men now occupying the houses erected by his munificence.

—Colonel GREENE, or one of his administrators, successors, or assigns in the Boston Post, says that a Cincinnati widow lately advertised for "every Christian in the city" to send her ten cents. She realized twenty cents, indicating an unexpectedly large number of Christians in that city.

—The PRIME family are given to the doing of good works and the making of good books. Sixteen years ago Dr. S. IRENÆUS PRIME, the youthful veteran of the Observer, published "Travels in Europe and the East." A year later his younger brother, old Mr. WILLIAM C. PRIME, gave to the peoples those delightful books, "Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia" and "Tent Life in the Holy Land;" and now the Rev. Dr. E. C. PRIME, another editor of the Observer, takes off his hat and presents to the intelligent people of the country "Around the World; or, Sketches of Travel through many Lands." Of course there are more PRIMES who will write more books.

—Des Moines, Iowa, is fortunate in having for its wealthiest citizen the Hon. B. ALLEN, whose last year's assessment was $1,140,000. He has des moin-es.

—Princess SALM-SALM has been appointed governess of the daughters of the Prussian Prince FREDERICK CHARLES.

—It has been reserved for Mrs. DICKS, of 39 Worcester Street, Boston, to achieve the wonderful feat of tallying one hundred years on the score of life, which she did on the 14th of October—an anniversary that has been looked forward to with much interest by a large number of friends and relatives. The dear old lady appeared very bright, recognizing her callers, and sending affectionate messages to those who could not be present.

—Miss ELIZABETH STUART, daughter of the late GILBERT STUART, has resided many years in Newport. She inherits her father's genius for the arts, and, without having devoted a lifetime to their pursuit, has executed a great number of paintings which are far beyond mediocrity. She has made several copies of her father's celebrated head of WASHINGTON, and her easel is seldom without a canvas on which is delineated either the face or a full-length copy of STUART'S original of WASHINGTON, which hangs in Faneuil Hall, Boston.

—The nobility are taking root in the United States. We hear that Mr. ALEXANDER, the famous farmer and stock-raiser of Illinois, is about to marry Miss FULLERTON, a member of an old landed family in Ohio. Although he has taken root in this country, Mr. ALEXANDER is Lord of the Manor of Airdrie; and the influential residents of Airdrie and that district have resolved to celebrate the event by presenting a congratulatory address and presentation. Although Mr. ALEXANDER, like a sensible man, prefers to live in America, he still retains his ancestral estate.

—At the laying of the corner-stone of the Boston Post-office a few days since, at which President GRANT assisted, Mrs. GRANT, remembering the services of the late Governor ANDREW, and that he was the first to plan the work which is now about to be finished, considerately invited his widow to be present and sit with her during the ceremonies of the day. Boston seemed to appreciate that bit of courtesy.

—The authoress of the well-known hymns, "Just as I am," "My God, my Father, while I stray," has recently died. She was the sister of the author of "Horæ Apocalypticæ," and of the Rev. HENRY ELLIOTT, and was related on the mother's side to the VENN family.

—A son of ROBERT COLLYER was to have been married at Chicago on the evening after the great fire, but the fire burned up church, furniture, etc. On Wednesday the wedding took place, the young bride being dressed in a calico gown, the only dress saved.

—This, about BENEDICT ARNOLD, from a Norwich, Connecticut, paper: "There was recently exhumed from the garret of an up-town mansion a curiosity of no little local as well as general antiquarian interest—namely, the veritable music-book which BENEDICT ARNOLD used and sung from when he was a young man and resident of this town. The book, now in possession of GURDON FORD, of Brooklyn, through presentation of DANIEL COIT, has ARNOLD'S name written in a bold, clear hand across the title-page; while the music (also manuscript) is written in part in ARNOLD'S hand, and a part, doubtless, by his mother. The latter was a good woman, and letters from her to her son are extant in which she exhorts him to flee temptation and live a godly and upright life."

—DANIEL HOME, the eminent spiritualist, is about to emanate from England and come hitherto to indulge in raps for general edification and pay.

—PUNDJEEB, eldest son of the Maharajah of Lahore, has just died in Paris, of hunger, in a lodging-house of the Rue de Vaugirard. This prince left his native country about fifty years ago in consequence of a serious offense against his father, one of whose wives he had seduced, and since that time he had led a miserable existence in the French capital. He was well known by sight to the neighbors, but the landlord alone could tell his history. He spoke rarely, and adopted the European costume only a few years ago.

—The memoirs of Madame PASTA are about to appear. They have never been written until now. It is said that an English lady living on the Lake of Como, who had always been a great admirer of the mighty prima-donna, had left in her will a handsome sum to PASTA'S daughter, Madame FERRANTÉ. This lady has just made over the sum as a free gift on condition of the "Memoirs" appearing at once. Strange to say, PASTA, although dead many years since, is not buried yet. Her coffin still remains standing on tressels in the chapel, at Bellagio, and the nuns of the convent gather round it every Friday evening and sing hymns. Sometimes these faint, harmonious voices, stealing through the grating of the chapel, float over the lake and fill the soul of the stranger with the deepest awe. "E niente le monache di Pasta?" is the answer of the boatmen to the inquiring gaze of the passenger.

—Mr. ODO RUSSELL, a clever and faithful diplomatic servant of the British government, has been gazetted as minister to Germany—a position for which his previous experience at Rome, in France, and Prussia admirably fit him.

—Emulating the example of Mr. PEABODY, Mr. HOLLOWAY, the famous purveyor of ointment and pills, intends to devote part of his enormous fortune to charitable purposes. He is looking for a site on which to found, at a cost of half a million pounds sterling, an institution that shall bear his name.

—A Roman correspondent writes that PIUS IX., availing himself of the infallibility of his decisions in such matters, has expressed a wish that his successor shall be elected by universal suffrage. He hopes by such a radical reform, which would be a return to the earliest age of the Church in Rome, to counteract the revolutionary principle which now tends to diminish the prestige and authority of the papacy. The realization of the scheme, it is thought, would not be so difficult as may at first appear.

Digitized by Google

3.—BACK OF 0, PAGE 712.

Point Lace Collar.

To make this collar, first draw the outlines for the braid on linen or paper from the design given by Fig. 37, Supplement. Then sew on the point lace braid along the outlines with the aid of the illustration; for each scallop lay the braid in a fold at the corresponding place, which is also for the clover-leaf figures. Having on the braid in this manner, fasten it intersecting points without passing the through the foundation. Then fill ee spaces inside of the figures with lace stitches—the spaces e, those marked 2 in button-hole stitch, and those marked 3 paces marked 4 are worked in point d'Alençon with button- figures of the outer border are worked alternately in point lenciennes. The centre of each clover leaf is trimmed with e in point d'Angleterre, which may be repeated, if preferred, each scallop at the upper edge work a half rosette in point nd descriptions of these lace stitches are given in Supplement 'ol. III. Finally, edge the collar with narrow woven picots. here described may also be used.

Fig. 13.—FRONT OF FIG. 4, PAGE 712.

Fig. 12.—BACK OF FIG. 5, PAGE 712.

Fig. 15.—BACK OF FIG. 8, PAGE 712.

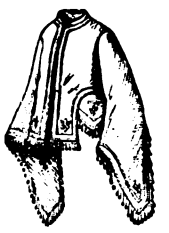

Fig. 14.—FRONT OF FIG. 11, PAGE 712.

Braided Barathea Jacket.

See illustration on p. 709.

THIS half-fitting jacket is of black barathea, interlined with net and lined with lustring. The jacket is trimmed with box-pleated black silk ruffles an inch wide, and richly braided with black silk cord. Before braiding, baste the material on net, sew the jacket together, and line after the braiding is finished.

Fig. 18.—FRONT OF FIG. 1, PAGE 712.

Fig. 19.—FRONT OF FIG. 9, PAGE 712.

Cashmere Jacket.

See illustration on page 709.

THIS jacket, which is short in front and finished with a small basque in the back, is of violet cashmere, trimmed with white silk cord and white silk fringe an inch wide. The jacket is lined with violet silk.

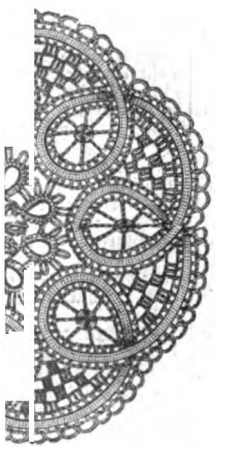
Crape Fichu.

See illustration on page 709.

THIS fichu is made of white crape, trimmed with white guipure lace and white silk fringe, which is knotted to the lace. Take a piece of crape half a yard square, and round off one corner slightly, then fold the fichu in a triangle as shown by the illustration, so that the under rounded corner projects two inches beyond the upper corner; edge the under part with lace two inches and a half wide, and the upper part with lace two inches wide; and in the wider lace knot white fringe of crimped or twisted silk. Lay the back of the fichu in small pleats at the top, as shown by the illustration.

Rosette for Lingerie, Caps, etc.

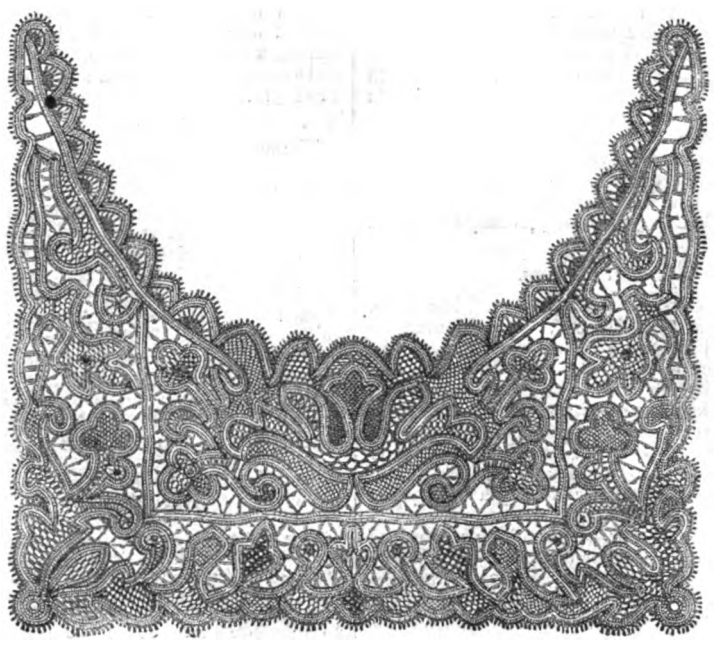
, an eight-leaved tatted figure ully observing the illustration. es of each separate leaflet of coarseness of the cotton; the e free space in the middle of at lace braid. Transfer the or leather, according to the e braid along the outlines. ss each other, and where two with several stitches without the foundation. Then work ie loops of the braid, and the e free spaces, and button-hole e. Finally, set on the tatted ation.



LACE ROSETTE.

Lingerie, Children's , etc.

with two threads (shuttles). centre, and work as follows: working thread only).—1 ds. t, 1 stitch. left), 1 p. (picot), ls., 1 p., finally, 1 more ds. a ring, fasten the thread, and ked with two threads).—Tie orking thread together, work ad, * fasten to a picot of the ation, 2 ds., 1 short p., 2 ds., sten to the last picot, then 2 together without cutting them ork, on the foundation thread ork, with the working thread p., 5 ds.; turn the work, on the foundation thread 3 ds., fasten to ling round, 3 ds., repeat from * to the end of the round; finally, 3 ether and cut them off. 4th round.—Tie the threads together again, and on the foundation thread work 2 ds., * fasten to a picot of the preceding round, 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds.; repeat from *; finally, 2 ds. 5th round.—When the threads have again been tied together, work on the foundation thread 5 ds., * fasten to a picot of the preceding round; with the working thread only, after a thread interval of an eighth of an inch, one ring of 6 ds., 1 p., 6 ds., close to this two similar rings, fasten as shown by the illustration; then on the foundation thread 5 ds. Repeat from . In working this round it is to be observed that, instead of forming the picot of each third ring, it must be fastened to the last picot of the preceding clover-leaf figure, at the same time turning the last figure; by doing this the threads are crossed as shown by the illustration. Besides this, at the end of the round fasten the first ring of the last clover-leaf figure to the first ring of the first clover leaf. 6th round (with both threads). — Fasten to a picot between two leaflets of the preceding round, 9 ds. on the foundation thread, fasten to the picot of the next ad, 9 ds.; repeat from * to the end of the round, where the threads e illustration. This rosette makes a very pretty centre for an infant's aming any kind of fine lingerie.



POINT LACE COLLAR.

For design see Supplement, No. VI., Fig. 37.

TOYS AS TEACHERS.

THE use of toys can not be insignificant, inasmuch as during many years of infancy, a child's mind dwells on the idea of play and playthings with greater interest and attention than on any other subject. Toys and playing are certainly a necessary part of the child's occupation; and therefore an appreciation of the most advantageous descriptions to suit the characters of different children, and the best way in which such toys may be used, are considerations worthy of the attention and thought of all who are really alive to the importance of the early training of the young. In fact, it is evident that toys must be considered as educational.

In saying that they should be educational, it is not intended that a child is to look upon his play as a lesson; for if he do so, it will altogether cease to be play. Nothing is more painful than to see a child without life and spirits, and that delight in playtime which is not only natural, but essential to its well-being. It is believed that nothing is worse than to encourage habits of too strict attention to books and lessons during the earliest years of life. If this be done, the bodily health is not kept in full vigor; and although it is possible for some little children of six or seven years to be taught a number of high-sounding subjects—even to be able to repeat strings of facts in geography, such as the lengths of rivers and the heights of mountains—it must be remembered that this is but the temporary addition of atoms to the memory, and is not the healthy development of the mind.

The primary use of toys to children is to keep them occupied. A mother thinks what her infant, even when only a few months old, requires to amuse him, and she selects a bright-colored bird, or a rattle, or something which it can feel, shake, and look at. An elder child complains of having nothing to do, and a toy or game is found, or a book of pictures or little stories, with which he may amuse himself. The great aim of all those who understand the bringing up of children is to keep them constantly engaged, and at the same time, though encouraging them to play as long as possible with one toy, yet to change and vary their occupations and amusements as soon as they show signs of mental fatigue or weariness. This constant employment is not only desirable for children, but is really essential for them; they must be doing something, and, as has been well remarked, even mischief is but misapplied energy. Toys are the natural instruments on which this energy and activity should be expended. It is the province of the toy-dealer to find objects for the exercise of their minds and fingers, just as much as for the baker to supply them with bread, or the shoe-maker with shoes. Children are essentially active in every sense, and toys can not properly be called toys at all if they are merely capable of being looked at, and do no more than amuse the eye for a few moments. This fact will often account for the peculiar way in which children take fancies to their toys. Of course, the glitter of a new thing, whatever it may be, lasts for some time; but it will be remarked how they generally return to some old plaything, long since bereft of its beauty, because they can do something with it. A broken doll, even with no legs and arms, may be dressed and handled as a baby; a horse without legs may be dragged about the floor, and so on; whereas, a new picture-book is soon put aside after the novelty of the illustrations is forgotten; and a very elaborate mechanical toy, too delicate even to be handled, is not cared much for after it has been exhibited a few times, and has ceased to be a novelty.

While carefully avoiding the mistake of making play a lesson, some few toys, if well selected, may impart a vast ons, Figs. 1 and 2.

TATTED ROSETTE.

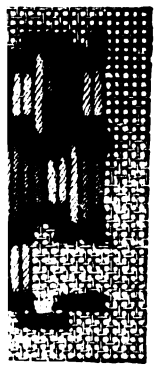
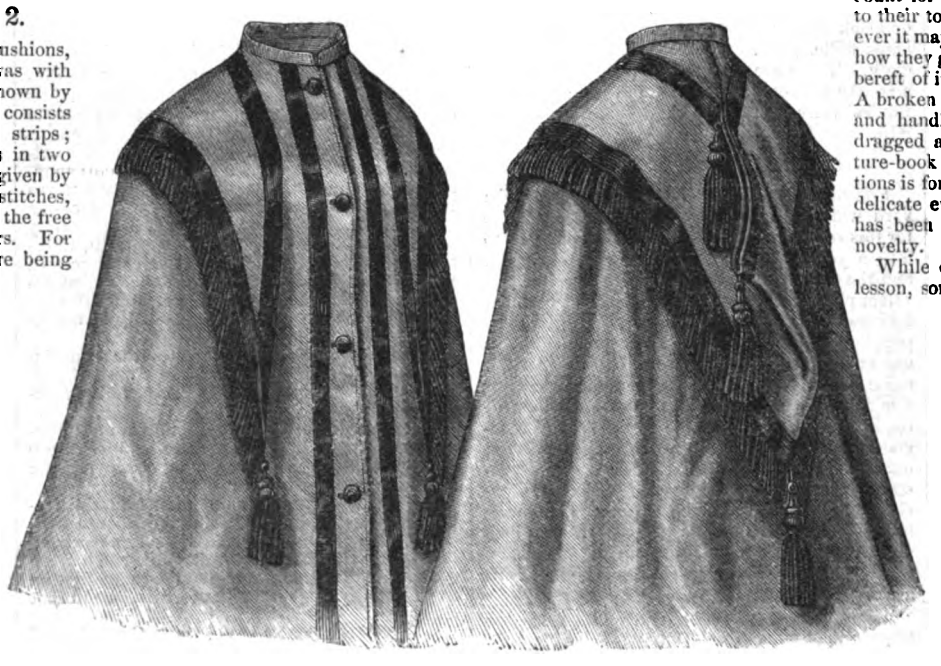
used for slippers, cushions, ked on single canvas with colors, as plainly shown by n given by Fig. 1 consists dark cross stitch strips; long loose stitches in two . For the design given by ation in half cross stitches, ation, and then fill the free two different colors. For n also be used, care being colors.



UNDATION.



WATER-PROOF CLOAK.—FRONT AND BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Fig. 73.

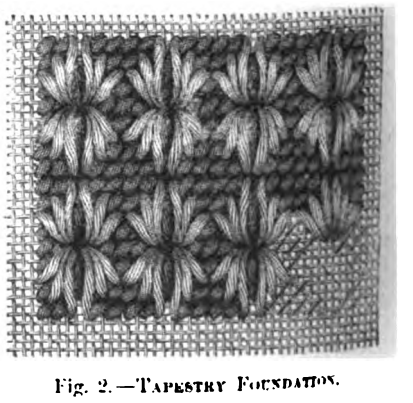


Fig. 2.—TAPESTRY FOUNDATION.

Digitized by Google

amount of instruction, and that without the child having to undergo any undue mental strain. It would, of course, be undesirable to give a little boy five or six years old a direct lesson on the principles of the bridge and the use of the key-stone. Give him, however, a box of bricks capable of making a bridge, with the centring, and show him how to put it together. He will puzzle over it for days, try every sort of arrangement, and unwittingly become gradually and practically acquainted with some important mechanical laws. Again, a little model of a steam-engine made to work by gas or spirit, which may be bought for a few shillings, is a most attractive toy. Children will watch it for hours. They see the spirit poured in; they remark that it is made to boil, and soon has to be replenished; they notice the action of the valves, the piston, the crank, and all the parts. When they come to study the theoretical laws of steam and machines, half the difficulty of their first lessons vanishes. If, during his play, the child is so fortunate as to have a really educated nurse or mother, herself acquainted with the outlines of such general knowledge, the child's play may be made, by simple toys, far more educational and interesting than any set lesson, and the result of the instruction far more fixed on his mind than the simplest theoretical idea could ever be by any number of repetitions and learnings by heart.

EMBROIDERED BARATHEA JACKET.

JACKET WITH VELVET TRIMMING.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 64–68.

POPLIN SLEEVE.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Fig. 74.

CRAPE FICHU.—FRONT.

SLEEVE WITH PLEATED TRIMMING.

For pattern see description in Supplement.

CASHMERE JACKET.

Reading may be taught entirely by means of the various games and toys with letters and words which are in common use. These toys depend for their interest and attraction on the way they are put before children. With one teacher, they are little better than a dry spelling-book; whereas, with another, the finding out of the different letters and the placing them together like a puzzle may interest a child for hours, during which the infant is learning to read and spell in the best possible manner, and in a way he is least likely to forget. The first four rules of arithmetic, again, may be taught almost entirely by means of cube bricks, and a great step made in the formidable multiplication table before the child is wearied out with the monotonous repetition of what too often seems to him an endless and meaningless list of figures. Writing is the only subject which, perhaps, requires more direct lesson-work. Even here, however, the "printing" letters used to teach reading may be copied on a slate, their shape learned, and, what is of still greater importance, the power of holding and guiding a pencil imparted, before the copy-book pot-hook and hanger has made writing an unpleasant and tedious task.

Not only in direct instruction, however, is the use of toys to be considered educational, but those playthings to which a child is accustomed have no small influence on his general tone of thought. To those who are naturally overquiet and studious those toys should be given which are likely to develop the physical powers, such as a rocking-horse, a cart requiring to be drawn about, a wheelbarrow, a set of gardening tools, a drum, and the like. It would be better to encourage such children in this description of plaything rather than to allow them constantly to amuse themselves, after the bent of their inclinations, with books, puzzles, and other sedentary amusements. For those full of life, and whom it is impossible to keep still for many minutes at a time, the occasional use of the quieter toys which are to be avoided in the former case is desirable. In France guns, swords, and miniature war implements are looked upon as almost the only playthings for a boy, and this national taste has undoubtedly had a considerable influence on the national character.

The dressing of dolls may be made a most pleasant mode of teaching a little girl to work. All girls are fond of dressing their own toy-babies, though they soon weary of hemming dusters. By making dolls' clothes exact miniatures of children's garments, so that they will take on and off, agreeable occupation in needle-work will be found for a little girl. The child will easily be made to take a pride in having all her doll's wardrobe as neat and well worked as she can; and good habits of care, neatness, and order may thus be inculcated. In this way, as has already been pointed out, play, and useful instruction, and training may be combined through the agency of toys. In watching a little girl play with her doll, an insight may often be obtained into the mode in which the child herself is being brought up. When young, we all imitate more or less the habits and manners of our elders; and in whichever way a child is seen using her doll, whether it be roughly, kindly, or gently, or by making a great fuss over its appearance, such as thinking chiefly of the fashion of its dress and ornaments, so may the characteristic features of the treatment that child herself receives at home be frequently inferred.

The cost of toys can not be taken as a guide to their usefulness or value. To a certain extent, as in all other articles, it is true that good things can not be had for nothing, but the most expensive playthings are by no means necessarily the best. Nothing is more desirable than to encourage children as much as possible to make some of their own toys; when they do this, it affords them immense pleasure and amusement. It should also be borne in mind that the fewer playthings a child has in use at the same time the better. Too many at once en-

Fig. 1.—GROS GRAIN DRESS.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 12–18.

Fig. 2.—GROS GRAIN DRESS.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 12–18.

Digitized by Google

courage restlessness and a continual want of change and variety, and prevent habits of attention and contentment being developed. The art of showing children how to play to the best advantage, to make toys, and, in short, to enjoy play as much as possible, though natural to some persons, is frequently wanting to a lamentable extent with many nurses, mothers, and teachers.

MARGARET.

THE deep seas sweep above thy namesake—"pearl,"
Yet far beneath them, in unbroken rest,
It maketh in the vast abyss its nest,
Heedless of all the crested waves that curl
Upon the surface. So, amid the whirl
Of madding crowds hast thou the skill to keep
A quiet bower for me, in the deep
True heart of one unswerving, constant girl.
The storm and tempest vex me. "Let them rave!"
I wear a more than monarch's diadem;
And in my coronet one only gem,
The pearl of price thy dear affection gave,
What time those happy words within the cave
Of consciousness resounded, "Thou art loved!"
And to my blest experience softly proved
One treasure in this world that shall outlive the grave.

(Continued from No. 38, page 599.)

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER XIV.

IT was the dreariest of wet March mornings, more like winter than spring, when they met at the station—those two whom, if all the eyes of Easterham had been on them, no one would ever have taken for lovers, so grave, so sad, so silent were they. The only attention Bernard paid to her was the common courtesy of any gentleman to a lady—any kind-hearted man to a suffering woman. For that Hannah did suffer was plain. To rise in the dull dawn of the morning, to breakfast alone, and steal away, unnoticed and uncared for by any member of the family, was outward humiliation enough; but it was nothing to the inward pain. No wonder that her eyes were heavy and sleepless, her face deadly white, and that even the village doctor, whom they met on the platform, noticed how very ill Miss Thelluson was looking.

"Yes; she was my sister's constant nurse, and has been helping us here through all our trouble," said Bernard, hastily. "She is very much worn out, and I am glad to be taking her back at once to her friend Lady Dunsmore."

Hannah recognized the prudence, and was grateful. Yet still that there should be this vital need for prudence, for circumspection, for worldly wisdom, was itself a kind of mute disgrace.

The doctor traveled up with them to London; so they had not one word together, Bernard and she, till they found themselves alone in the cab. Then he seized her hand.

"We have but five minutes, my love. Always my love! Remember that; and for my sake forgive all."

"I have nothing to forgive. Thinking as they do, they could scarcely act otherwise than as they do. But oh! it is hard. I was growing so fond of Easterham—of them too. And now I shall never see the Moat House or them again."

"Do not be too sure of that," said Bernard, passionately. "You may be back again ere many weeks. Back—in a character in which they must receive you."

And then he explained how he had seen in the day's newspapers that the bill was to be brought up to the House of Lords for the second reading that very night.

"The critical night. Lord Dunsmore has been expecting it for long. There will be a debate; still I know he hoped for a majority—small, indeed, but enough to carry it through; enough to save us. Oh, Hannah, if it were right to pray for such a thing—such a common, secular thing as a few votes more or less in Parliament—I, a clergyman, too."

He laughed, but his eye glittered with excitement. Hannah was almost frightened when she looked at him.

"I am glad the suspense will be ended to-night," he continued. "You see the trial is harder for me than for most; though, I believe, by Lord Dunsmore's account, that there are hundreds of men in England in my position—waiting till the bill shall pass. But then I am a 'city set on a hill,' like my house, as you used to say to me—a clergyman contemplating an act which is directly contrary to the canon-law, and in which my very bishop, I understand, is dead against me. I shall be excommunicated, of course—that is, suspended—except, by-the-bye, if my marriage ever takes place, it will be according to law; and then, whatever he thinks, the bishop can not suspend me. Oh, we care quite as much for the law as the Gospel, we clergymen!"

And he laughed again, and still continued rapidly talking in a way very unusual with him. Evidently the trial was becoming past his endurance; and now that there was added the home warfare—to which he never referred—things would be worse still. Suffering, they say, often changes a woman into an angel; but it is not so with men—generally quite the contrary. Hannah was so grieved that she hardly answered a word till they reached their destination.

"Stop a minute!" Bernard said. "I had meant to leave you here, and go—"

"Where?"

"Any where; it does not matter. But I can not do it. Oh, Hannah, keep me beside you! I am good then. Could you not invent some nice little falsehood for my staying?"

"Does it need a falsehood to excuse a father's coming to see his own child?" said Hannah, gravely.

"The child—always the child!" he cried. "You care for nobody else. I do believe you are marrying me—if ever we are married—solely for the sake of the child."

Hannah paused a minute before she answered. His declaration was not exactly true, yet there was some truth in it; and to deny truth is always dangerous. She laid her hand on his very tenderly—the tenderness of a love so baptized in sorrow that almost all earthly passion had been washed out of it.

"Bernard, if what you say were true—I do not allow that it is—but if it were, would it be a wicked thing? Would Rosie's mother, or need Rosie's father, be angry with me for it?"

"No, no!" And for the hundredth time, looking at the saintly patience of her face—a face in which, besides love, were written grief, and loss, and resignation—he learned patience too.

Lady Dunsmore had gone out, and might not be home till dinner-time; but had left a note for Miss Thelluson, in case she returned to-day, which the countess seemed to have expected.

"Why? Does she guess any thing, do you suppose?"

"Every thing, I believe," said Hannah. "But she has never breathed one syllable to me, and never will."

"Good, wise, generous woman! We must tell her all to-morrow."

But Hannah only sighed. She had little faith in "to-morrow." People whose lives have been very sunless gradually cease to believe in the sun.

It was a long, long day. They could hardly have got through it but for the child, who with her little imperative queenliness put aside both past and future, and compelled them to live in the present. Desperately in love as he was, Mr. Rivers had a father's heart, and the mother-heart in Hannah kept it alive. Also, after the domestic storms of the Moat House, there was something in the innocent peace of the baby-life—so absorbed in little things—which soothed them both. Men might have laughed, but angels would have smiled to see these two forlorn lovers, who dared not show their love, to whom one another's presence was always a painful restraint—often an actual dread—comforting one another a little in their mutual love of the child.

Lady Dunsmore smiled too when she saw them building houses of cards for Rosie on the nursery floor, and then blowing them down with the solemnest of faces; but after the smile she turned away with a tear. She had a heart—this brilliant little woman of the world.

Kissing Hannah, she said a few words of gentle condolence to Mr. Rivers.

"I did not wonder that Miss Thelluson was kept at the Moat House, she is such a help to every body in trouble; but I am glad you have brought her back now, and glad you have come to see your little girl. She would have forgotten papa soon. You will stay and dine? We have no guests, for Lord Dunsmore will be at the House. He speaks to-night, if the Marriage Bill comes on for the second reading, as we expect it will."

Bernard made some brief assent.

"See what it is to be a politician's wife," said the countess, turning to Hannah. "All this forenoon I have been acting as amateur whipper-in to get votes for our side. Lord Dunsmore is desperately anxious about it, but very hopeful of the result. He will come straight home with the news; so I shall be most grateful of your company, Mr. Rivers, to congratulate my husband if he wins—to condole if he fails. But as I said to my thane this morning, when I counseled him to go and murder, not King Law, but the tyrant Injustice—

> "'Screw your courage to the sticking-place,
> And we'll not fail.'"

She put the matter thus, with her consummate tact and delicate kindliness, chattering gayly on, and not waiting for any body to answer. And all day she kept them up with her gay, witty, continuous talk—a perpetual fountain of prettiness—never by word or look betraying that she guessed any thing, that any body had any anxiety except herself, for the result which this day must bring.

At dinner they were only three; but in the evening one or two people dropped in. Lord Dunsmore's house was always a sort of rendezvous to discuss what was going on in the House, especially when there was pending such a question as this, in which he was known to be strongly interested. His wife, too—her enemies called her a female politician; but even they acknowledged that she pursued her unfeminine métier in a most womanly way, and that it was chiefly for her lord's sake, in whose projects she joined heart and soul.

"No," she said, when all the comers and goers had left, and she sat waiting for Lord Dunsmore's return, trying in every way to make the time slip by for those other two, to whom she talked fast, but scarcely looked at them—"no; I hate the word party; I despise heartily those politicians who dare not think for themselves, but must vote as their leader bids them, just as much as I despise those feeble legislators who, as in this case, are afraid to do good lest evil might come—to break a bad law, lest good laws might some day be broken. If I were a man, the only question I should ever ask myself would be—is this right or wrong? That once clear, I would risk the rest."

"Would you?" cried Bernard, leaning forward, strongly excited. He had looked very ill all day—indeed, he had owned to Hannah that he was not well, and that before he went home he meant to consult a doctor; but he had the true masculine dislike to be pitied and sympathized with in his ailments, so she asked no more; only she watched him—his changing cheek, his nervous start at every opening of the door—with an anxiety she could not control.

And as, during a pause in his conversation with Lady Dunsmore, he turned and asked Hannah, rather irritably, "why she was so silent?" he little knew what a desperate resolve was forming in her mind, should certain combinations of circumstances force her to it—drive her into the carrying out of that principle, "All for love, and the world well lost." A resolve which no one would have expected possible for such a quiet woman as she.

Ten o'clock struck—eleven; it was near midnight.

"They are having a long debate; that looks well for our cause," said Lady Dunsmore; and then a carriage was heard to drive up, and Lord Dunsmore's foot—he was a large, heavy, ponderous man, not easily moved, physically or mentally, but firm as a rock after he did move—was distinctly audible coming up stairs.

His little bright wife flew to him. "Oh, tell us—I mean, tell me—in two words—"

But he had caught sight of the other two, and looked for the moment as if he wished himself miles and miles away. Still he went up and shook hands with them with a noble affectation of carelessness.

"Pardon. Lady Dunsmore is so anxious about me and my affairs. Well, my dear, there is, unluckily, no news. We have failed this time—beaten; but by the smallest majority yet. Hope on, hope ever! Next session we shall have converted those heretics, and be sure to get our bill through. If we fight on steadily, we shall carry our point at last."

"Of course we shall," cried the countess, with a choke in her throat. "No need to be downhearted. The right always wins. Cheer up, Dunsmore!"

And she patted him on the shoulder, never once turning her eyes—they glittered with tears, in spite of her gay tone—to the two behind her.

Hannah stood motionless. She had expected nothing, and was scarcely disappointed; but Bernard stepped forward excitedly.

"Yes, yes, the right always wins. And you made a brilliant speech, Lord Dunsmore. I—I—con—grat—"

An uncomfortable sound rose in his throat, as if he were struggling to articulate and could not. Then he dropped down, and there was the piteous sight of a strong man swooning dead away. Hannah, as she fell on her knees beside him and lifted his head, thought for the instant it was real death.

"It has killed him," she said, piteously. "He could not bear it—the suspense, I mean; and now— You understand?"

"Yes, I have understood it all along," said Lady Dunsmore, gently, and bade her husband lock the door, so as to prevent any one entering for a minute or two. "We will see after him ourselves. Look, he is reviving a little already!"

Bernard sighed. "Oh, Hannah!" he murmured, and stretched out his arms. She opened hers and took him into them, resting his head against her shoulder, so that he could breathe freer, then looked up to her two friends.

"You see how it is? We could not help it. And you do not think us wrong, I know."

"Wrong! Quite the contrary. And I always knew it would happen. Didn't I tell you so?"

That one little triumph—"I told you so!" The countess could not resist it; but after that she said no more—only helped Hannah, in the kindest and tenderest way, to restore the still half-conscious man. Bernard's illness, however, seemed rather more than an ordinary fainting-fit. When he recovered he wandered in his talk, and scarcely seemed to know where he was.

Then Hannah took at once the motherly part which seems natural to almost all women in cases of sickness—soothing him, tending him, and accepting for him all the arrangements which Lady Dunsmore immediately made, that he should remain in the house. Soon he was able to be half led, half carried, to his room.

"Is it all right, Hannah? You will see that it is all right?" said he, helplessly; and when she answered him in her quieting voice he seemed satisfied, and submitted patiently.

But she had to submit to harder things. When, hearing him call her, she mechanically rose to follow him, Lady Dunsmore detained her.

"Not you; my old housekeeper must be his nurse. Not you."

"But he wants me. He called me."

"Never mind. You can not go. What would the world say?"

Hannah blushed horribly, then answered, in a low, desperate voice, "I care nothing for the world. He is mine. You forget we are engaged; we were to have been married as soon as ever the law allowed. Nobody understands him as I do. Let me go."

"No," said her friend, firmly. "He will be taken every care of; but your care he can not have. For both your sakes, I will not allow it; the world is too wicked. And yet," she added, "the world has common-sense on its side. No man or woman, not related, ought to have been to one another what you and he have been, unless they could be married. You must accept things as they are. I am not cruel to you, but kind."

Hannah knew that. With a stolid patience she did accept her lot, submitting day after day, for a whole week, to the miserable suspense of only hearing second-hand tidings of Bernard's state, of having rights and no rights, of being neither wife nor sister, yet having to endure the agonizing anxiety of both. Not alone, either, in her pain—for Bernard continually sent messages for her to come to him, and Lady Dunsmore would not let her go.

"Cæsar's wife," she said, "must not even be suspected. You are under my protection, and I will protect you to the utmost of my power; but you must also protect yourself. You must give no handle to the bitter tongues which are already beginning to wag about you."

What tongues, she did not state; but Hannah knew. By the manner in which she had often heard other people talked of at the Moat House, she guessed well enough how the Moat House would now be talking of her. And the plan which, in the wretchedness of being parted from him, she had already matured, and intended to propose to Bernard as soon as he got well—namely, that, adhering to the letter of the law, and risking all misinterpretation, she should go back with him to Easterham, and resume her place as his sister and housekeeper—faded into thin air.

"You are right," said the countess, when they discussed, as they did openly now, the actual position of things, and what was the best course to take next. "Such a scheme would never do. The world would never believe in you or him. I can quite understand a woman, conscious of her own innocence, doing the most daring things; but there are things which she has no right to dare. No, my poor Hannah, if ever you are married, you must bring to your husband a spotless name; not a soul must be able to throw a stone at you. And there are those who would stone you to death if they could."

"I know that," said Hannah, sadly; "but perhaps they do not mean it. Don't tell him; he loves them."

So spoke she, and tried to believe the best—that circumstances were chiefly in fault, not individuals. But Lady Dunsmore was very angry, especially when, the ill-tidings about Bernard being necessarily sent to Easterham, Bertha and Mrs. Morecamb rushed up and bemoaned him, and exacted a promise from him that he would come home directly, and let himself be nursed at the Moat House by his own people. That day he did not ask for Hannah—not once.

She sat in her room, and saw nothing of him—saw almost nobody, except the child. She was painfully aware that every person in the house, servants included, guessed her exact position with regard to Mr. Rivers, and watched her with the eager curiosity with which almost all people, good and bad alike, follow a domestic tragedy of this sort—a something which can not be talked of openly, which has all the delightfulness of sin without its dangerous elements.

Thus, when Mr. Rivers at last came down to the drawing-room, Celestine, the countess's maid, ran into Miss Thelluson's room, with the substance of half a dozen French novels written in her face, to communicate the event; assuring mademoiselle that monsieur was looking so much better than any body expected, and she had heard him asking for her; and should she arrange mademoiselle's toilette to the best advantage before she went down stairs?

But, when really summoned, Hannah crept rather than walked to her lover's presence. There was no joy, no eagerness in her face—only a kind of dreamy thankfulness—until they were alone together, and then he called her to his side.

"Hannah, it was not of your own will that you forsook me?"

"No, no!"

"And you love me still? You will not give me up even after what has befallen us? You understand? For another year, at least, there is no hope of our being married."

"No."

"Isn't it sad and strange—sad and strange?" he continued, wistfully, as he lay on the sofa, she holding his hand, for he was very feeble still. "Here are we two, with every blessing under heaven—youth, health, freedom, money—nothing in the world to prevent our being happy; and yet happy we can not be. I see no way out of it. Do you?"

For a minute he looked as if he thought she might; but she shook her head, and kept her eyes down on the ground.

"Then the question is, what are we to do? I must go home directly, but it must be without you. Lady Dunsmore tells me so, and I think she is right."

"I think so too."

"And parting from you, I must also part from my child. You know I promised you I would never claim the child, and I shall keep my word, though I shall miss her sorely. Pretty little Rosie! Still, I give her up—to you."

"Thank you."

And then, looking at him, the thanks seemed cruel—he was so worn, so weak, so joyless; and it was such a joyless, empty life that he was going back to. He was so helpless, too—the kind of man who always wants a woman to take care of him—to whom marriage is, domestically, not merely a comfort but a necessity; and all his little weaknesses she knew—all his innocent wants she was accustomed to supply.

"Oh, you don't know how I have missed you!" said he, with an almost child-like complaining. "Home has not been like home since you went away. There was nobody to do any thing for me, or, when they did it, they did it wrong. Nobody like Hannah. When shall I have you back again?"

"When, indeed?"

"And now, when I was ill—when, once or twice, I thought I was dying, and could not get at you—it was so hard. Will you promise"—he lifted himself up, and clutched her hand tight—"promise faithfully that, if I am really dying, you will come to me, whatever the world says?"

"I will;" and he saw by her face that she would. "But you must not die," she added, desperately; "you must get well as fast as ever you can. You must take the utmost possible care of yourself, for Rosie's sake—and mine. Oh, Bernard! once I told you to part from me and go and marry another woman; but I could not do it now."

He smiled, and tried to draw her closer to him; but she glanced at the door and shrank away.

Digitized by Google

"You don't care for me—you are afraid of caring for me," Bernard said, angrily.

"I! not care for you!"

She wept; and, overcome by the weakness of illness, he wept too. It was cruelly hard for them both—as hard as that most pathetic line in the ballad—

"We took but ae kiss, and we tore oursels away."

But that "ae kiss" of theirs had no sin in it—nothing but sorrow.

"Hannah," implored he, "do not forsake me again. If you knew what a lost creature I am without you—to die without you, or to live without you, is equally dreadful. Can nothing be done? Oh, my dearest! can nothing be done?"

His eyes were so sad, his looks so wan. Even this comparatively trifling illness, following the long mental strain which he must have undergone, had broken him down so completely that Hannah was terrified. There came upon her that mortal dread, which comes upon all who love, and was most natural in her, who had lived to see the grave close over all her nearest and dearest. What if, among all their cares, the one care they never contemplated were to happen? What if Bernard were to fall into ill health, to sicken and die, and she still parted from him? What if, instead of the long lonely years which both had feared so much, there should be allotted to one of them only a brief space of earthly life, was that space to be spent in separation? Would it not be better to clutch at the vanishing joy—to risk all things, and gain one another?

Under the agony of this fear, Hannah was near giving way, and whispering a word or two—offering that fatal sacrifice which, however he needs it and craves it, no woman has a right to make to any man, not even though it may be one which, as in this case, involves no moral guilt, and concerning which her own conscience may be at ease entirely. For the sacrifice is not hers alone. He too is involved in it. Nor he only; but the solemn rights of creatures yet unborn—innocent beings who can not plead and say, "Father, mother, why did you do this? why entail this misery upon us also?"

Whether, noble and pure woman as she was, the motherly heart in Hannah made her faintly hear those voices, with a solemn prevision that no woman ought ever to blush for or to set aside—who knows?—but she hesitated. She could not be the first to propose that marriage abroad which secured nothing at home. Besides, so long as the law was the law, it ought not to be broken.

While she hesitated, Bernard, who had lain silent and thoughtful, said suddenly, in a rather changed tone—the "worldly" tone which she had sometimes remarked in him, the faint reflex of what was so strong in the rest of his family:

"Perhaps, after all, my going back to my parish work alone will be the most prudent course; for I may soon have to make some change in it, and indeed in all my outward surroundings. The girls told me that poor Austin has had another series of fits, worse than ever before. Most likely I shall be Sir Bernard before very long."

He sighed—but it was not a heart-deep sigh; one could not expect it to be; and there was something in his look which corresponded to that tone which always jarred upon Hannah. No, "All for love, and the world well lost," was not the creed of any Rivers; if Bernard tried it, the loss would not be by him quite unfelt. Would it by any man brought up as he had been, and with the nobler half of him never developed at all till he fell in love with poor Rosa—till he afterward walked into love, deeply, deliberately, with such a woman as Hannah Thelluson?

Hannah left her passionate words unsaid, and continued their grave and anxious talk—listening to all the plans he made for her and Rosie, in which he showed the utmost thoughtfulness and tenderness. The most likely scheme, and one which Lady Dunsmore had herself suggested, was that, as the young Ladies Dacre were going to the sea-side for a little, Hannah should accompany them, or rather chaperon them, taking with her Rosie and Grace. This would be a quiet life, and yet not a life quite shut out of the world. No one could say she was "hiding."

"For you must not hide," Bernard argued; "we must not look as if we were ashamed of ourselves. And you must be somewhere where I can get at you—run down to see my child, of course, whenever it is practicable. Still, you are best a little out of the way too, and not going much into society, for the thing is sure to ooze out."

"How?"

"Oh, though my people pledged me to secrecy 'for the honor of the family,' I know what women's tongues are," said Bernard, bitterly. "Still they dare not say or do much, seeing I shall be Sir Bernard some time; and then— But however things end, I had rather, whatever may be the curiosity of the world about you, that it was not gratified; but that you lived a rather secluded life. It is best, especially considering how you stand with respect to my family."

"I comprehend you. Yes."

"Oh, Hannah, have I said any thing to wound you? But I am placed, as it were, between two fires. What can I do?"

"Nothing. Nor I. Fate is too much for us; we had better say good-by for a time. Give me the child and let me go."

And at the moment she felt as if she did not care where she went or what was done to her. It was all pain; nothing but pain. In her sad life all its natural delights seemed turned into bitterness.

Bernard seized her hands—"Tell me the whole truth. Tell me all that is in your mind about me, or against me—which is it?"

Another minute and she might have said, not at all the tender words that a while ago she had meant to say, but others quite opposite—words which might have placed an eternal barrier between her and the man she loved; who after all was only looking upon their position with a man's eyes—always harder and more worldly than a woman's.

But to save her the door opened, and there burst in, with a cry of delight, her Rosie—her "sunshiny child," as she often called her. The little thing, who had been with her papa every day for the last week, climbed upon him in an ecstasy, then turned to Hannah.

"Tannie too, Tannie too! Papa and Tannie kiss Rosie. Both together!"

It was going back to the old ways; childhood and age are alike in clinging to old ways and resisting the smallest change.

"You see," said Bernard, with a smile, "Rosie herself insists upon things being as they used to be—as they ought to be. Rosie herself delights in us 'both together.'"

Hannah said nothing; but, clasping her darling, she laid her weight of secret pain upon the unconscious, childish bosom which was already the receptacle and the comfort of half her woes.

"I will go any where, and do any thing that you and Lady Dunsmore think best, if I may only have Rosie with me. She'll come, I know?" And Hannah curled round her fingers the soft little ring of silky hair—baby hair which had never been cut, and which netted in its dainty meshes all her motherly heart. "Who loves poor Tannie? Who's Tannie's darling?"

"No—papa's darling," said the child, with a pretty waywardness, and then, relenting, came and laid her head in her aunt's lap, repeating words which Hannah had forgotten ever having said to her, only she often murmured her soul out over the little crib at night; and Rosie's observation was growing so sharp, and her memory so clear. "No—papa's darling; Tannie's blessing!" Then with a little silvery, mischievous laugh, "Blessed tild! Rosie blessed tild!"

Ay, she was a blessed child.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

WE who are far removed from the scenes of desolation and suffering can have no adequate realization of the wide-spread ravages of the recent Western and Northwestern fires. Even the burning of Chicago, fearful as it was, seems overshadowed by the devastating forest and prairie conflagrations, which have swept away scores of villages, comparatively isolated, and far removed from easy channels of relief. Read this mournful list: Green Bay, Humboldt, Casco, Red River, Brussels, Rosiere, Robinsonville, Thirty Deames, Glenmore, Hubbard's Mill, Bersey Mill, New Franken, Oak Orchard, Coullard Bridge, Williamsonville, Menekaunee, Marinette, Birch Creek, Union Town, Peshtego, The Sugar Bush, Messiere, Dyckesville, Abnepee, Pierce, Kewaunee: nor are these by any means all the villages which in Wisconsin alone have been either wholly or in part destroyed by the Fire King. In Minnesota probably the area of destruction has been as great as in Wisconsin, and the destruction of houses and crops not less; in Michigan a vast section of country is laid in ruins. We know not whether the end is yet: reports come, as we write, of sweeping flames in Kansas. The mind is unable to take in the idea of hundreds, yes, thousands of miles of flaming field and forest, and turns away, fatigued, from the vast contemplation.

Singling out one instance, the summary fate of Peshtego, Wisconsin, shows the swift strides of the deadly foe. On the evening of Sunday, October 8—Chicago's fatal day—when the inhabitants of the peaceful village were just settling into repose, a rushing, roaring sound was heard in the distance. Like the mutterings of a storm it seemed, or the precursor of a fierce prairie wind. It grew louder, a deadly heat pervaded the air, blazing particles were whirled along by the driving wind. The terror-stricken inhabitants awoke to the knowledge that a relentless fire was rushing toward their homes. The scene of horror that followed can not be imagined, certainly not described. The flames were all around; there was no place of refuge except in the river. Those who were near enough waded in until the water reached their necks. In a few moments the entire village was a blazing sheet of flame. Several hundred—the exact number can not yet be known—perished by fire and water. Hundreds more, in other places, met a like dreadful death; and suffering thousands, bereft of every thing, appeal from their desolated forest and prairie homes to the ready charity of a generous Christian public.

Conflagrations become a part of the history of a country. Among the records of numerous well-remembered and more extensive fires may be noticed the destruction of single buildings of great value. In 1836 the General Post-office and Patent-office at Washington were destroyed, with 10,000 valuable models and numerous papers of great worth. In 1851 the Congressional Library, with 35,000 volumes and works of art, was burned. In 1846 the Theatre Royal in Quebec was consumed, and forty-seven persons perished. The establishment of Harper & Brothers was destroyed by fire in 1853; in 1854 the Metropolitan Ha. nd the Lafarge House; in 1858 the New York Crystal Palace; and the burning of the Academy of Music is fresh in the memories of all citizens.

The first severe snow-storm of the season in Wyoming Territory interfered seriously with the trains on the Pacific Railroad. The snow was three and four feet deep in some places, and there was a delay of twelve hours.

A correspondent of the London Times, who has passed through Mont Cenis Tunnel, says that, although the car windows were open, there was no perceptible difference between the air within and that without the tunnel, and no discomfort from steam or smoke. When the line is in full operation twenty minutes will be the average time allowed for the passage through the mountain—a distance of about eight miles.

There have been times within the last four months when fearful crimes seemed so rife among us that many good people almost lost faith in mankind. Let them modify their bad opinion in view of the fact that in less than ten days the Christian world gave over $5,000,000 to the suffering poor of Chicago.

The recent visit of President Grant and other distinguished public men to Bangor, Maine, was, as our readers are aware, to join in celebrating the opening of the European and North American Railway. By this important national enterprise Halifax and parts of the provinces are connected by rail with Bangor, Boston, New York, and the great railway centres of the country. When fully completed this railway is expected to be the means of reducing the time of passage between New York and London to six or seven days.

French and English authorities have quite recently renewed correspondence on the subject of a tunnel under the English Channel. Its practicability is now generally admitted, and the physical difficulties of piercing through the chalk are believed to be comparatively slight. As the Mont Cenis Tunnel has been relieved from trouble about ventilation, no insuperable difficulty is apprehended on that point. It is rumored that the work will be prosecuted by private enterprise. When that rough sea passage between Dover and Calais is superseded, and a passenger can go from London to Paris without changing cars, the pleasures of European travel will be greatly increased.

Fires of vast extent have been raging among the mountains of California.

The Chicago conflagration brought out the rhetoric of reporters. For example: "Eastward the fire journeyed with its fevered stride, eating like a withering canker through the vitals of the city." "The fire sacked with its cremating arms the corn-stored elevators." "Northward the hell-angel strode to the emporium of rich produce it was longing for. Now it hung around a bank, burst open its doors, shivered its windows, scorched through its roof, and toiled and burned its fiercest, till the great safe—ah, the safe!—had succumbed to its blasting, melting breath." Very likely the flames equaled the language in intensity; certainly it is not strange that in the high excitement of the hour burning words should be uttered.

The establishment of a continuous railway from London to Bombay is in contemplation by the British government. Existing lines of railway, and the Mont Cenis Tunnel to Trieste, will be used. Thence a line of railway is proposed through Austria, European and Asiatic Turkey, Persia, and Beloochistan to Kurachee, and so onward to Bombay. The total distance from London to Kurachee by such a route is 5311 miles by rail, and twenty-eight miles—the Straits of Dover—by sea. Of course, if the projected tunnel is built under the Channel, "through" carriages can be run. It is calculated that the journey could be made in five days, sixteen hours, forty-six minutes.

The burning of Chicago, on Sunday night and Monday, was followed by heavy rains on Tuesday. The fearful fires in Wisconsin, also, were mitigated by copious showers, which fell after a drought of more than two months. These events are regarded as strong confirmation of the famous theory that great fires always produce heavy rains. Confirmation, however, is not exactly proof—the much-needed rain might have fallen if there had been no great fires. At least we hope that fires will not always be necessary to draw water from the clouds.

The supposed "Fasting Girl" of Walton, England, has been found to subsist on food, like other people. Her appetite, to be sure, is poor; so she eats but little. The rumor that she had fasted for sixteen months originated with the public.

It was sad and touching to read in the Chicago papers which were issued a day or two after the fire the inquiries made by friends for the missing. A mother who had lost her baby; little children whose parents had disappeared; men who could find neither wife nor child; babies with no mother to claim them; wives husbandless; and brothers and sisters seeking to find each other. These are but specimens from the columns headed, "Persons Missing."

American history is rising in importance in the estimation of the learned. Cornell University has a Professor of American History—but it is the only one of the three hundred and sixty-nine colleges in our country which has ventured to make such an innovation.

There is a lady connected with the Boston Children's Mission who, within a year, has made 1561 visits to the poor, has trimmed 100 hats and bonnets, and cut out 551 garments. During the same time she has also made two journeys into another State, where she found homes for nineteen destitute children. There is missionary work every where for the willing-hearted and ready-handed.

Attention is already beginning to be directed to the total eclipse of the sun which will occur next December. The track of totality passes over parts of India, Ceylon, and Northern Australia. There are English government astronomers at Madras and Melbourne, and also an excellent observatory; consequently many useful observations will be made, even if England and America do not send out special expeditions.

The old German Cemetery in Chicago was devastated by the fire. Many lots were inclosed by wooden fences, which were, of course, consumed, and stone tablets were overturned and blackened beyond hope of recognition. One large receiving vault, said to have contained at least twenty dead bodies, was utterly destroyed, with its contents.

The faculty of Princeton College very properly have resolved to suppress "hazing;" and the alleged recent "revolt" arose from the suspension of certain Sophomores for "hazing" Freshmen. The so-called revolters had no sympathy from the upper classes, and the whole affair was a failure to raise a sedition. The Naval Academy at Annapolis has just dismissed five youths for "hazing." The example of Annapolis and Princeton may well be followed by all colleges, until this senseless, shameful practice is wholly abandoned.

How many persons have ever attempted to make any such computation as did Sydney Smith? According to his own calculation he ate and drank between his tenth and seventieth year forty-four wagon loads more than was good for him.

Experiments lately tried by skillful chemists establish the fact that certain articles, such as old wearing apparel, rags, and dried wood, are capable of generating spontaneous combustion. It is believed that numerous fires which have been thought the work of an incendiary originated from a rag which had been used with benzine for cleaning garments, or by the heat generated from articles of silk or cotton shut up in a close room.

USEFUL RECIPES.

NICE BREAKFAST RELISH.—Select ten or twelve medium-sized white potatoes, cook until done, drain them, and place on the stove with the lid off the saucepan until the moisture has evaporated. Shake the pan to prevent burning. Pare, mash, season, and add a little butter and hot milk, just as you do for table use. Make a paste of the mashed potatoes around the sides and bottom of a baking-dish; lay in slices of underdone meat until the dish is nearly full, pour gravy over, and, if wished, a little tomato or mushroom catsup; cover with mashed potato. Bake in an oven about half an hour, and serve hot.

CREAM SODA.—In a porcelain saucepan or small preserving-kettle put two quarts of water, three pounds of white sugar, and two and a half ounces of tartaric acid; place over the fire, and let it just come to a boil. Beat to a stiff froth the whites of three eggs, and add to the boiling water, etc. Let it boil just four minutes, stirring constantly; strain, and when cold add one teaspoonful of either lemon, pine-apple, or any flavoring essence that is desired; bottle it tightly. When wanted for use turn two table-spoonfuls of it into half a tumblerful of ice-water, and stir into it one-third of a tea-spoonful of carbonate of soda; it foams very nicely, and is a very agreeable, refreshing beverage.

TO DRESS LOGGERHEAD.—Scald and scale it; cut it under the back leg large enough to admit the hand so as to draw it; wash clean, and sew up in a cloth, and put it on to boil, allowing two and a half hours, should it weigh six pounds; if the weight is greater it will take longer; turn often to prevent sticking to the bottom of the vessel. When done and cool, cut it in pieces, taking out all the bones. For the dressing allow to the six pounds weight before boiling eight hard-boiled eggs; separate the yolk and white, cutting the latter with the meat, and rubbing the yolk smoothly with a quarter of a pound of butter, one table-spoonful of flour; have boiling one pint of water, and into this stir the butter, flour, and egg that have been mixed, let it boil up once, and remove from the fire. It should be of the consistency of thick drawn butter. Place the meat in a pan, season to the taste with salt and pepper, and, if wished, a little mustard; add a small quantity of water, place over the fire, and stir it constantly until it is hot through; then add the drawn butter, and send to table as hot as can be. A tea-cupful of wine is a great improvement, but should not be added until taken from the fire and ready for table. The water in which the turtle is boiled should be kept boiling all the time it is cooking, and more water should be boiling in another vessel to fill up with. Should there be eggs in the turtle, boil separately in a cloth, and put in whole with the meat when seasoned and it is put over the fire to heat for the dressing.

CARAMELS (very nice).—Cream well together a quarter of a pound of chocolate, half a tea-cupful of butter, one tea-cupful of sugar, one tea-cupful of molasses; add one tea-cupful of sweet cream, and boil twenty minutes. Grease tin plates well with butter, pour in the hot mixture until the proper thickness; when nearly cold, with a greased knife mark off into small squares. In summer they must be placed on ice to harden, and in cold weather in a cool, airy place.

In preparing for a party one is often at a loss to know just how much to provide; imagining the outlay is moderate, and you make your own purchases for fifty or sixty persons, the following will be found sufficient: Ten pounds of fruit cake, eight pounds of lady cake, four pounds of fine mixed cake, two pounds of kisses or trifles, three dozen of oranges (for decoration), eight quarts, or four forms, of ice-cream, two two-quart forms of water-ice, ten pounds of grapes, eight chickens for salad, ten quarts of oysters, three quarts of jelly; if lemonade is desired, six dozen lemons will be required.

RICE LEMON PUDDING.—Put on to boil one quart of milk, and when it simmers stir in four table-spoonfuls of rice flour that has been moistened in a little milk; let it come to a boil, and remove from the fire; add one-quarter of a pound of butter, and when cool the yolks and beaten whites of four eggs, sugar to taste, and grated peel with the juice of two lemons having been added just before the eggs were put in; one wine-glassful of wine, put in the last thing, is also an improvement. This quantity makes four puddings.

CINNAMON JUMBLES.—Rub smoothly together one pound of butter, free from salt, and one and a half pounds of flour; the yolks of eight eggs, juice and a very little of the grated rind of one lemon, one ounce of stick cinnamon, ground and sifted; stir in one and a quarter pounds of sugar and the well-beaten whites of the eggs; roll out in sugar.

MARYLAND BISCUIT.—In two quarts of flour mix well one small tea-spoonful of soda, one tea-spoonful of salt, and the same of cream of tartar; cut well through it half a tea-cupful of butter, and add enough cold water to make a very stiff dough; work with the hands long and well; roll quite thin, cut into biscuit, prick often with a fork, and bake well.

INDIAN FLAPPERS.—Pour boiling water over one quart of Indian meal, using enough water to moisten the meal well; when cool, add the yolks of four eggs, salt to taste, and a small quantity of flour; thin to the proper consistency with milk, and add the beaten whites.

MUTTON.—Select a plump, compact leg of mutton, take out the bone, and fill the cavity with a dressing made of bread crumbs, a very little thyme, salt, pepper, and bits of butter; moisten with oyster juice, and add about half a pint of oysters to the quantity of dressing required for one leg of mutton. Sew it up and place in boiling water, having it completely immersed; boil slowly half an hour; then place in a dripping-pan, pouring over the meat a little of the liquor, basting frequently with it.

Digitized by Google

LADIES' WINTER WRAPPINGS, FIGS. 1–19.

For p-

Fig. 2.—MANTLE WITH VELVET TRIMMING AND BRAIDING.
[For Front see Fig. 17, Page 708.]
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—PALETOT WITH HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 25–31.

Fig. 4.—TRICOT BEAVER PALETOT.
[For Front see Fig. 13, Page 708.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 19–24.

Fig. 5.—PALETOT WITH FUR TRIMMING.—[For Back see Fig. 12, Page 708.]
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 6.—PALETOT WITH BOWS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 32–36.

Fig. 8.—BLACK CLOTH PALETOT.—[For Back see Fig. 15, Page 708.]
For description see Supplement.

—[For Front see Fig. 19, Page 708.]
e Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 46–52.

Fig. 10.
CLOTH PALETOT.
—[For Back see Fig. 16, Page 708.]
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 11.—CLOTH PALETOT.
[For Front see Fig. 14, Page 708.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 53–58.

Digitized by Google

Winter Bonnets, Figs. 1-8.

Figs. 1 and 5.—GRAY FELT BONNET, bound with a bias strip of gray gros grain, and trimmed with wide black lace and a gray satin spray of blossoms with gray velvet leaves, to which a long drooping vine is joined in the back, and gray gros grain bows and strings. Set a row of narrow gray blonde along the outer edge on the inside of the bonnet.

Figs. 2 and 7.—BLACK VELVET BONNET, trimmed with velvet bows and black lace, a barbe of which falls over the chignon. A trailing spray of wild roses is set on the left side of the bonnet and twined with the lace barbe. Tulle and lace strings.

Figs. 3 and 6.—MAROON VELVET BONNET. Bows and strings of velvet ribbon of the same color. A maroon ostrich feather and a poppy complete the trimming. A puffing of white silk illusion is set inside of the bonnet along the edge.

Figs. 4 and 8.—DARK GREEN FELT BONNET. The front of the bonnet is trimmed with a side-pleated strip of velvet, edged with a narrow ruffle of the same material, on which are set two upright rows of black lace. On the left side of the bonnet is a velvet bow, and on the right side an olive spray and a scarf of illusion and lace, which falls over the back. Wide strips of illusion, edged with lace, and caught together with a scarf pin, serve for strings.

Fig. 1.—PALETOT FOR CHILD FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.—FRONT.

Fig. 2.—PALETOT FOR CHILD FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 69-72.

MANTLE FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

THE LATER REVELATIONS OF POMPEII.

THE Bourbons have already been engaged for more than a hundred years, with long intervals of neglect, in the disinterment of Pompeii, and not more than two-fifths of the city have yet been laid bare. The first excavations were not only so rudely made that many slight and delicate articles were lost, but much else was either disfigured or stolen, from the carelessness with which the ruins were guarded. Within the last ten or fifteen years they have been so conducted as to destroy the least possible, and preserve the most possible. The Italian government can afford but sixty thousand francs a year (which, however, is very much more than the Bourbons expended) for the work, so that only from thirty to forty laborers can be steadily employed; but if the excavations advance slowly, they advance regularly, and save what they reveal. The ashes are now removed in horizontal sections, beginning at the top, and the walls can thus be strengthened as they are laid bare, preserving not only, in many cases, the arrangement of the upper chambers, but—what is of much more importance—the frescoes which adorned the rooms below. How many of these latter treasures have been stolen, wantonly destroyed, or lost by exposure to the weather we can only conjecture. Those which remain form a collection unique of its kind in the world, and of inestimable value for the insight which it gives us into ancient pictorial art.

FUR-LINED MANTLE FOR ELDERLY LADY.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 38-40.

The walls of Pompeii give us, by almost a miracle, certain knowledge of an art which may be said to have been known to us only by tradition. From the perishable nature of painting, even in fresco, its most durable form, the world could never have hoped to possess a single specimen of the pictorial art of the Greeks and Romans but for the singular chance (or design) by which they have been preserved. The value of the specimens already rescued is more than their artistic character. Not being portable, they were executed on the spot, and for the most part by local artists. Pompeii was but a third-rate city; it had nearly been destroyed by an earthquake ten years previous to its entombment, and the most of its frescoes must have been painted during that period of restoration. What we now possess can not, therefore, be considered as more than the ordinary art of the age; but it is none the less a basis of clear knowledge in regard to modes of painting, treatment of subjects, and skill in the various technicalities of the art.

Many fine pictures must have been lost by the action of the weather since the first private dwellings of Pompeii were opened. Others have been greatly damaged by neglect, while, incredible as it may seem, some were wantonly destroyed, in former years, because it was difficult or expensive to detach them from the walls! At present, every picture of value which is unearthed is carefully sawed from the walls, secured in a solid frame, and transported to the National Museum (formerly the Museo Bourbonico) at Naples. It is singular that Pompeii itself should not only have given the hint, but also the method, of transferring and preserving frescoes. In the Temple of Venus, adjoining the chief Forum of the city, there is still a picture to be seen in one of the chambers occupied by the priests—a fresco representing Bacchus pouring a goblet of wine over his panther, while he leans upon the shoulder of Silenus, who plays the lyre. A close inspection of this picture revealed the fact that it had been transferred from a former building, and was fastened in its place by iron clamps; and, further, that in making the transfer a space was left for the circulation of air at its back, in order to preserve it from possible injury from damp. The Pompeiian paintings are now arranged in the same manner on the walls of the Museum at Naples.

The pictures on these walls, including the decorative arabesques, and those which have been allowed to remain in situ, in the houses of Pompeii, will number nearly, if not quite, a thousand. In Naples they form a marvelous gallery of antique painting, which has not, and can not have, its like in the world.

The decorative painting of Pompeii has been so extensively copied that its colors and its forms are now tolerably well known, and I need not describe it in detail. Its chief characteristic is the employment of a broad, warm field of color—generally that which is now distinguished as "Pompeiian red"—with very gracefully and delicately drawn ornaments of vines, birds, and scroll-work, disposed in irregular panels. The object seems to have been, first,

MANTLE FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 1.—FELT BONNET.—[See Fig. 5.]

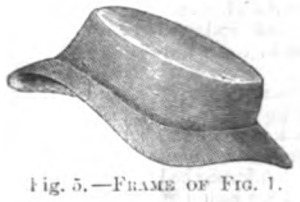

Fig. 5.—FRAME OF FIG. 1.

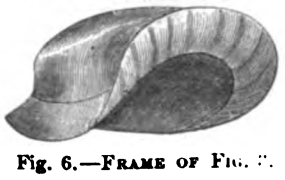

Fig. 6.—FRAME OF FIG. 3.

Fig. 2.—VELVET BONNET.—[See Fig. 7.]

Fig. 3.—VELVET BONNET.—[See Fig. 6.]

Fig. 4.—FELT BONNET.—[See Fig. 8.]

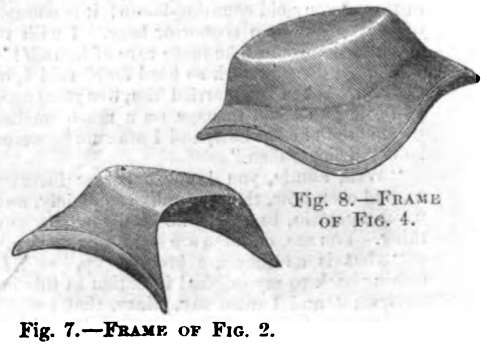

Fig. 8.—FRAME OF FIG. 4.

Fig. 7.—FRAME OF FIG. 2.

FIGS. 1-8.—LADIES' WINTER BONNETS.

Digitized by Google

to cheer by the breadth and warmth of the ground-color, and then to pleasantly occupy the fancy with light, easily untangled labyrinths of form. Nothing could be better adapted for domestic architecture, and the wonder is that, having once been so generally employed, it was ever lost.

The department of still-life is most amply illustrated. Fish, birds, game, fruit, and even drinking vessels were the usual fresco decorations of dining-rooms, of eating-houses, and even in some cases of the kitchen itself. Landscapes, especially in combination with architecture, or as backgrounds to inferior figure-pieces, are also frequent. Genre pictures, the existence of which denotes a certain amount of development and taste, are by no means rare. Of portraits, there are few, if any, which profess to have that exclusive character; but there are many faces and figures which betray an individuality that could only have been derived from living models. Religious and mythical subjects are the most numerous, and represent the highest skill; repetitions of the same subjects enable us to determine how far their treatment was in accordance with conventional or traditional ideas (like that of saints and Holy Families in the Italian schools), and in what particular the individuality of the artist expressed itself. This, the highest field of painting, is, of course, the most interesting and important. Here we find the finest works, whether original or copies of older pictures.

One fact is worthy of notice. In hundreds of pictures, a single example of disagreeable, inharmonious color can scarcely be found. The instinct of the ancients, never equaled since their time in regard to form, appears to have been fully as true and delicate in regard to color. The common workman dealt in ruder effects, and was generally ignorant of the management of half-tints, which is so charming in the best pictures; but if he never triumphed, at least he never offended.

Our modern life is very barren of grace and beauty when contrasted with that of Pompeii, where the vulgarest wine-shop and the poorest abode of the mechanic had their ornamental frescoes. Here, too, is another remarkable evidence of the skill of the cheapest workman. Where the paintings are simple patterns or arabesque borders, they were never executed by means of cut-out models laid upon the plaster and painted through, but with the "free hand." The workman had a ruler and compass, but no more; and the slight differences in the repetition of the same forms in a border attest his dexterity even more than his want of it.

Painting and sculpture were necessities of all domestic or public life in Pompeii. Diomed, Marcus Lucretius, and Cornelius Rufus had their mosaic pavements, their marble and bronze statues, their grottoes of shells, and their illustrations of Homer; but the fuller and soap-boiler had also their terra-cotta heroes and deities, and the pictures of their profession on their walls. In the wine-shop and the eating-house the guests sat under panels of still-life which, no doubt, made their mouths water. It is as difficult to find an undecorated wall in Pompeii as to find one tastefully decorated in London. The town must have been a grand panorama of art, and every street, or arch, or atrium, or peristyle a harmonious picture. What, then, must have been Baiæ, and Capua, and the one supreme Rome?

TRIMMED DRESSES.

ONE morning, not many months ago, my niece, Mary Flamston, came to make her usual daily call, and brought, as was her custom, her two little children to receive kisses and sugar-plums from their affectionate auntie. I heard their voices the moment my hall door opened, and while their ruffles and bead trimmings rattled against the balusters as they ascended to my sitting-room, I concluded to speak to Mary at once on a subject which had long troubled my peace of mind. She and her sister Kate had, before their several marriages, lived in my house, and been educated and provided for as daughters; therefore they were assured of my affection, and whatever I might say to them was certain to be received in a spirit of kindness.

When my niece entered the room, however, she and her lovely children looking like exotics just picked in a forcing-house, I had not the heart to say at once what I intended, and our conversation fell into the ordinary channels.

"How is Fred?" said I at last, after a few moments of chitchat. "I met him yesterday going down to his business, and I can't say that he looks as flourishing as you do, Mary. The color that blooms perennially on your cheeks seems to have faded altogether from his. I wish he had as healthy a look as when he was a light-hearted young bachelor."

"I am sure I wish he had," said Mary, sobering down instantly; "but it's not my fault, aunt, that he hasn't. All day long working away in that gloomy old counting-house! it is enough to use up any man sooner or later. I wish to goodness he would take more care of himself!"

"What does he work so hard for?" said I, in reply. "When you married him, five years ago, you said you could manage on a much smaller income than he has now, and I am sure he never looked delicate then."

"Well, auntie, you know expenses increase so, and even now, though we live so plainly, and never entertain, Fred says he hardly puts by any thing. You see, children are so very expensive."

"That is as they are brought up," said I, coming back to my original intention in this interview; "and I must say, Mary, that I think money spent in the adornment of children is altogether thrown away. You and Kate were brought up without fluted flounces, embroidered petticoats, or French nurses, and I never met more healthy, happy, or pretty children in my life."

Mary blushed a little, and surveyed with complacency her two little daughters, who, arrayed in spotless white from crown to heel, were monuments of the seamstress's and laundress's skill.

"Well, you know it is the fashion now; every body does it; and, besides, Fred likes us all to be well and becomingly dressed."

"So do I, my dear, but *over*dress is not becoming to any one; and if it is the fashion, that is no reason why one should go beyond one's means to follow it."

"I don't go beyond our means, auntie," said Mary, looking a little hurt; "you know you never let us run in debt for any thing; and Fred pays my bills whenever they are presented; and they are not half so big as Kate's, either," she added, with a sigh. "Now she dresses beautifully."

"Well, my dear, Kate has married a very rich man, who can afford to indulge her; but you married for love, and expected to economize. Now, begging your pardon, I think, for your income, you dress more than Kate—certainly more expensively."

"Oh, Aunt Sara! and Kate has just bought a thousand-dollar camel's-hair, and my very handsomest did not cost more than two hundred and fifty!"

"No matter; it is fine enough for any lady to wear; and your husband denied himself his trip to the Adirondacks to purchase it. You ought to be perfectly contented."

"So I am, certainly; and I wouldn't have Kate's husband in place of my Fred for all her India shawls, of course; but, you see, it makes my things look so plain!"

I now took a survey of my niece's dress, and beheld a new gray poplin, trimmed with an immense number of folds, buttons, gimps, beads, and fringes. I counted out aloud five different kinds of adornment on the several parts of her walking suit. She is an amiable woman, and though she looked annoyed, she only laughed when I ended my scrutiny.

"Kate has no handsomer walking dress than this, I am certain; and I should be sorry to see her wear one more trimmed. The original fabric is hardly discernible."

"Well, trimming is every thing to a dress nowadays; and as I got it of Kate's dress-maker, I expect she will let me down easy as to the price. I am going to pay for it this morning."

"Then you may make up your mind to be mulcted a hundred dollars at least. Kate never gets off for less than that, she informed me, for a handsome, fully trimmed dress."

"It is a good deal to pay, auntie; but look at the fit of it; and, besides, it hangs like a real French dress behind. That is the beauty of Madame Plissé's cut. I had to have this one, whatever it might cost, and Fred said I was not to fret about the price."

"Exactly so; and he will only work the harder, and have a few more headaches to make up the difference between this and a dress made at home at one-tenth of the price."

"I hate dresses made at home, they look so dowdy," said Mary, with a slight toss of her head; "we've got the money to enjoy ourselves, and why should I not have what I want?"

"Simply because this money is bought with the health and life of your husband. When he married you you had nothing of your own whatever, and you laughed at me when I told you that you would not be able to have a great many things you were accustomed to. You had made up your mind to every sacrifice for Fred's sake. But look at it now. Fred has succeeded wonderfully in his business, and is making a large yearly income; but he has no time for rest or recreation, and his health is evidently suffering. What if he can manage to pay for all those things! It is wearing him out, and making him an old man before his time. Are you willing to give this price for your luxury? Look, now, at Emma and Lulu's dresses," I continued, waxing eloquent; "they are embroidered, they are fluted and ruffled, at an immense expense of labor and trouble, which will have to be paid for by some one; their sashes alone cost five dollars apiece, I am sure; and what does it all amount to? Somebody says, 'How beautifully Mrs. Flamston dresses her children!' and that is the whole of it."

"You don't want the children to go like little beggars?" said Mary, looking tearfully at her befrilled darlings, who were inspecting their blue kid shoes with immense satisfaction.

"No; nor is that necessary. It is only against the luxury of dress that I am inveighing. It is not the love of the comfortable and substantial that ruins Americans; it is the insidious taste that is creeping over us for finery, for decoration, and useless adornment. The icing on our cake is a perfect wonder of sugar architecture, and it is only when we cut the eatable itself that we find it often made with bad eggs, unstoned raisins, and second-class flour. Pardon this homely simile; but women are no wiser or cleverer for trimmed dresses—only vainer and more eager for admiration."

"Every body don't dress," said Mary at last, after a silence of some minutes. "There is my neighbor Mrs. Brown; she wears her clothes for ever and ever, and people say she is stingy. I don't believe she ever had a flounce to a dress in her life."

"Then," said I, "she must be the one woman I saw out in my morning walk to-day who wore a plain skirt. I noticed, to my disgust, that even the girls carrying their work back to the sewing-machine shops had paltry attempts at that sort of finery, spending their hardly earned money in common gimps and fringes, so as to imitate the richer class. I admire Mrs. Brown, who has strength of mind enough to resist the universal tendency, and go on her way independent of criticism. I do not believe she is miserly; her husband is somewhat richer than Fred, to be sure, but see how well her children are educated! She has no French bonnes, I admit, at enormous wages, with a bad accent and worse morals, to ruin them before they are out of the nursery, but they are admirably taught and thoroughly cared for in every way. Then Mrs. Brown gives largely to charities; that you will admit to be impossible with rich dressing and a moderate income in this expensive city. I happen to know that she denies herself to a great extent, so that neither her husband nor her children nor her outside duties shall suffer by her. We belong to the same charitable society, and Mrs. Brown, in a plain dress, is always the first to head the list for any needed subscription."

Mary rose, evidently much impressed by what I had said, and stood a few moments reflecting.

"I believe you are right about those dirty French nurses," she said, with a sigh. "Sophie, whom I thought a miracle of fidelity, has turned out a regular thief. She has taken my gold thimble, and my initial note-paper; and she goes to-day, to the delight of the whole family."

"And do be more careful of Fred," I said, as I kissed her for good-by; "I know you love him dearly, but spare him as much as you can. His youth is passed in toiling for you and the children; let him feel that he is getting ahead, and that his blood and brains are not exhausted to increase the hoards of Madame Plissé. I should like to go out as a missionary to proclaim against the wicked luxury of the age; but I can do little, though I begin with my nearest and dearest at home."

I saw nothing of Mary for some days, but I heard afterward from Kate that her bill had been double what she expected, and this, with the unlooked-for character of my remarks, kept her away from my quiet habitation longer than any thing else had ever done. However, I did not regret what I had said. The pale, pleasant face of Fred Flamston met me so frequently in my dreams that it haunted my waking moments, and I longed to impress his wife with the forebodings that arose ever in my mind. It was to Kate that I told all my fears, but she was more giddy than her sister, and while kissing away some briny drops that fell below my spectacles, she laughed at me for a croaker, and said that my fears would never be realized.

"And Molly looks sweetly when she is well-dressed," said the light-hearted young woman; "and who would not wish to see her so? Not I, surely."

"You ought not to wish her to dress any better than she can easily afford without strain on her husband's health. You, my dear Kate, would be doing a good action if you set her the example of simplicity, for it is your elegant wardrobe that is constantly a model for imitation in her eyes. Can not you make that sacrifice to sisterly affection? This constant talk, too, about new trimmings, the discussion of other people's jewels and cashmeres, this comparing of laces, is a lowering of the tone of conversation, and perfectly disgusting to sensible people. You and Mary never indulged in such themes when you lived in this quiet little home with me."

"No, dear auntie; but every thing is changed now. My husband is thirty years older than I, and we have no children. I dress to amuse myself and kill time."

"Yes, and kill other people's husbands, who are not as rich as your own! I think Fred needs a journey to Europe most cruelly. If Mary had been economical he would now be able to give up his business, at least until he recovered his usual health. If I were a young man entering life I would never marry any woman who was fond of dress, or who was incapable of practicing prudence or self-denial—no, not if she was as beautiful as Aphrodite herself."

"Fortunately for us, the men are not so wise," said Kate, laughing; "and as to Fred, we shall live to see him a fat old gentleman, with one of the largest bank accounts in the city!"

As if to prove the fallacy of this pleasant prophecy, a note was handed in from Mary, telling me that Mr. Flamston had been ill all night, and was so much worse this morning that my immediate presence was necessary.

Kate and I, shocked by the painful news, lost no time in hurrying to Mary's house, finding a mournful confirmation of my forebodings in the sight of two doctors' gigs at the door.

The family physician met me in the hall, and at my request turned back to give me his opinion of the case.

"It is a very sudden thing, certainly, to all outward appearance," he said; "but he has not been really well for more than a year. I met him only a month ago, and advised him to give up business, at least for some time, and try perfect rest; but he said it was impossible, he could not afford to be idle even for a day; and you see the consequences. His brain is overworked, and he may not now have strength to rally from the attack; but, humanly speaking, it might all have been averted."

"You think he may die, then?" said I, my heart sinking with the words that so truly echoed all my sad presentiments.

"I hope not, but his case is critical. It is a very hard blow to his wife, who is utterly unprepared. I never saw a more broken-hearted woman."

This was all the comfort I got. Fred became rapidly worse, and a few days more saw the end of that short life which he had spent in laboring for "the meat which perisheth," and the fading vanities of a faithless world.

Bitterly did my poor Mary lament her short-sightedness and folly; and although to society her husband's illness bore the name of a bilious fever, and the old family doctor called it a decided case of "typhus mitior," Mary and I are conscious that his death was the result of trimmed dresses.

PARIS MODES.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

IT is time to reconcile the contradictory statements which are put forth at this moment concerning the state of affairs in Paris. "Nothing has changed," say some; "this race is incorrigible. There is still the same luxury, the same expense, and the same extravagance; the greatest calamities that could befall a nation have made no impression on these reckless Frenchmen, who learn nothing and forget nothing." Others—that is, the ardent and impatient reformers, who confound their wishes with the reality, and expect to see their hopes take form at once, without considering how indispensable is time for all human works—say, "See what a change has taken place already! Formerly woolen stuffs were never seen; now nothing else is worn: the ladies who used to drag after them long dresses of satin and velvet, covered with costly lace, appear now in simple dresses made in the plainest style. The reformation that has been wrought in dress will soon be found in the government; for the disorders in the latter are always caused by the follies of the former."

So speak the two antagonistic schools, the pessimists and the optimists, and both are alike right and alike wrong. An artistic people like our own, a nation civilized to refinement in a country rich enough to support the most costly triumphs as well as the most terrible reverses, can not pass without a struggle from the luxury of the Lower Empire to Spartan simplicity. Elegance will always remain a want, a necessity, an unconscious manifestation even of its nature to this race devoted to grace; but luxury proper—that luxury which was considered indispensable even when there was no means of paying for it; that luxury which made its way into all households, to become there the corroding canker of fortune and conscience; that luxury, without disappearing at once, and without being destined indeed to vanish wholly—from the rule is becoming the exception. This is the truth on a subject which is important not alone to cosmopolitan frivolity, but also to the future of France.

The Parisians have discovered this year what they knew in olden times; namely, that there is nothing more dressy than woolen fabrics, or that drapes more gracefully and makes finer folds; consequently their little feet, always so deliciously chaussée, trip along the pavement peeping coquettishly from short suits of cashmere, cloth, or poplin de laine.

Black has become a uniform, and a person almost feels it necessary to apologize for being seen in any other color. Nevertheless, for this very reason, certain fastidious persons dissent from this monotony, and wear very dark blue-black cloth suits over a black silk skirt trimmed with flounces. A very pretty suit of this kind is composed of a skirt of dead-lustre black taffetas with an over-skirt of blue-black cloth. The bottom of the latter is cut in large scallops, which are bound with a broad strip of black gros grain, wide enough to extend a considerable distance above the edge. The waist, of the same material as the over-skirt, has deep basques, scalloped and bound with gros grain. Over the waist is worn a cape of the same cloth, likewise scalloped and bound, and extending just below the elbow. The same style is made up in bronze green, brown, and cendres de Paris gray cloth, but always with a black silk skirt.

The reaction against suits is felt most of all among the ancient nobility, designated in Paris by the name of the Faubourg Saint Germain. There are seen demi-trained dresses of superb fabrics, but without trimming, over which are worn rich India shawls in the olden fashion; but this style must be limited of necessity, and it remains to be seen whether it will be accepted.

The most elegant and richest woolen suits are composed of an over-skirt and waist of cashmere, entirely covered with embroidery of soutache of the same color as the cashmere; these are worn over a silk skirt of the same shade as the cashmere, trimmed with silk fringe to match the soutache.

The most sumptuous visiting costumes consist of a satin skirt, trimmed with a velvet flounce of the same color from ten to twelve inches wide, surmounted by three rather wide bias folds, the middle one of which is velvet, and the other two satin. Over this skirt is worn a polonaise of the same velvet as the flounce. The skirt of the polonaise is draped three times horizontally from the waist. Polonaises are made of any fabric—cashmere, cloth, etc.

We also see wrappings lined with cloth or with silk of a bright color; for instance, black lined with blue, violet, deep purple, or cherry. Revers of the collar and cuffs, and sometimes at the bottom, show the lining. The most original of these wrappings is a dark brown velveteen, lined with light orange cloth, and corded with white. This combination of three tints is very effective.

Almost all the new bonnets have capes and fronts; but they are not worn, like the bonnets of olden times, on the back of the head, but are set on the chignon, to which the cape is forced to conform, while the front is perched on the forehead. Certain bonnets, which look rather like opera head-dresses, are made of colored tulle, embroidered by hand with floss silk of the same shade. Others call to mind the Maintenon head-dress; they are composed of a large ruche of black lace, set upright in such a manner as to form a kind of diadem, and, of course, trimmed with bows and satin flowers. This kind of flowers is very much in favor; flowers and foliage of all sorts are made of satin, with shaded petals; these flowers are thought graver and more substantial than the muslin flowers, which are so easily crumpled.

Digitized by Google

Evening dresses borrow their degree of elegance rather from the trimmings than the fabric employed; for instance, dresses are trimmed with ruches and flounces of tulle of the same color as the dress; that is, gray, lilac, or even black; bluish-gray is still very much in fashion, although it is neither pretty nor becoming, for there are very few colors that do not suffer from its proximity. Elegant mantles are being made for opera cloaks of white, gray, blue, and pink cashmere, embroidered with gold and silver; black soutache is often interlaced with this embroidery to preserve it from insipidity.

Young girls wear mixed toilettes, brightened by the assemblage of colors without being costly; for instance, a skirt of light green and white striped foulard is worn with a bright pink basque-waist, edged all round with a pinked ruche of pink silk; or the same pink waist with a blue and white or white skirt of linos or cashmere.

Paris is peopled anew, and its foreign population has also returned; we see, however, more English than Americans. As to the Germans, it being their habit to meditate and not to spend, their total disappearance has little effect on the trade of Paris, which has more orders than it can fill. For instance, the receipts of one store, the Magasin du Louvre, amounted to sixty thousand dollars more last month than in the corresponding month in the previous year. The nightly receipts of the theatres are larger than ever before: to cite only the Comédie Française, "Adrienne Lecouvreur" is yielding fourteen hundred dollars nightly; but the play is a great favorite, and is admirably represented by Mesdemoiselles Favart and Plessy. The Orleans princes and princesses visit the theatres frequently, and are always welcomed with an enthusiasm in which there seems mingled a feeling of remorse that the personages of the Lower Empire should ever have been placed above men and women of their pure lives. It is already known that they will live in Paris next winter, and that their hospitable doors will be open, if not to the songs of Theresa, at least to classic music; if not to witty doggerel, at least to true poetry; if not to operas bouffes, at least to healthy literature; if not to half-nude women, at least to all that is lofty and honorable in both hemispheres. How refreshing will be the contrast with the last twenty years!

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

RICARDO'S BENEFIT.

"RICARDO, THE CHAMPION ATHLETE OF EUROPE, IN HIS WONDER-INSPIRING EVOLUTIONS. RICARDO, THE UNEQUALED ACROBAT, IN HIS MARVELOUS, UNRIVALED PERFORMANCE ON THE VIBRATING WIRE, FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE INFIRMARY OF THIS TOWN."

I read the glaring letters rather more thoughtfully than I would have cared to confess, but my eyes rested longest on the one large red line in the centre of the long poster:

"NINETTE, THE EQUESTRIAN QUEEN."

Did Ninette, the star of the Royal Cirque d'Afrique, ever stop, as I did, to read the words that were so familiar? Did she ever feel, as I did, a thrill of pride at seeing our two names the chief attractions in the list? Did she ever feel, as I did, that we two, who were connected so closely—

"Signor Ricardo," cried a gay, clear voice behind me, "does it feel like looking at yourself in a glass?"

I turned quickly to Ninette, the gladness of my heart shining in my eyes as I met hers. And well might my heart and eyes be glad to see Ninette. Ah! so plainly can I recall, as I write of her, the little figure beside which I walked so happily that day—that day, for the last time. The slight, small, supple form, whose every movement had a free, light grace which was like the unconscious grace of a little child. The bright, small face whose white skin never needed powder, and whose pink cheeks never needed paint. The big, blue, restless eyes, and the short fair curls which lay flat on the low white forehead. With the brilliant look of perfect health on her face—with the arch glance in her merry, mischievous eyes—with the tasteful, picturesque dress which she always chose, Ninette was a picture to gladden any heart indeed.

"I see it is a grand new programme on purpose for to-night's performance," I said, as we walked on; "and I see, too, that I am intended to eclipse you all."

"Or rather to eclipse yourself, Ricardo. You surely can not imagine it would be possible for you to eclipse the Equestrian Queen?"

As Ninette spoke we passed a high wall on which blazed a huge colored picture representing a girl in an unnatural costume, standing in an unnatural position on the neck of a most unnatural horse. I turned away my eyes, for this was supposed to be Ninette.

"What a look of repugnance, Ricardo!" she said, with her young, musical laugh. "Don't you think it like me?"

"As much like you," I answered, "as the bare, sanded circus ring is like a sunlit meadow of sweet flowers."

Looking at her as I spoke, I saw the color mount in her soft, bright cheeks. Not for a moment did I imagine that my words had called it there, and looking for the cause, I noticed that a gentleman who met us had raised his hat to Ninette with a long look of admiration. And then I walked on beside her still more thoughtfully.

"You seem very cross, Ricardo," said Ninette, presently, glancing coquettishly into my face; "I mean crosser even than usual."

"Who was that gentleman, Mademoiselle Ninette?"

"I'm not quite sure about his name," she answered, with cool slowness. "He is a captain in the militia here, and he admires the Equestrian Queen immensely."

"I suppose so."

"Yes; he admires me very much indeed," she continued, carelessly; "so he comes to every performance."

"It is well, Ninette, that you win admiration," I said, with quiet coldness; "you love it so dearly."

"Don't be grand, Ricardo," she laughed, saucily; "just because you do not win it—nor love it dearly. Why, of course I love admiration. Stars always do."

"Do they?" I said, my eyes full of it as I turned to read her brilliant face.

"The sort of admiration I like," answered Ninette, with complacency, "is Captain—oh, what shall I call him?—Captain Attendant's; it has a charming halo of mystery and romance about it. And the sort of admiration I don't care at all for is that I win from our own company: your own, Ricardo, for instance, wearies me beyond all words."

"You tell me this very often," I said, speaking unsteadily; "but I can not help its being yours through all."

"Why don't you give it to Josephine?" inquired Ninette, with nonchalance, "or to one of the other girls?"

"Such an idea is simply ridiculous," I answered, in passionate scorn. "My love was won from me before either you or I could prevent it; now it must be yours forever. You know this through all your treatment of me. Whether you are kind in this treatment, your own heart may tell you."

"Thank you, signor; but my own heart is very comfortable. I will not disturb it by unnecessary questioning. I wish you were as comfortable, for your own sake. How are you to get through your marvelous and unrivaled performance on the vibrating wire, O Champion Athlete, if you make yourself uneasy over trifles? Remember what is expected of you to-night. Monsieur says" (we always spoke of the manager as monsieur) "that every seat will be filled, and that we shall have a grand night. He almost seems provoked about it, because he reaps no benefit; but I say, if we do profess to aid the Infirmary, let our aid be worth accepting. I wish I was going to do something great in such a cause, Ricardo, as well as you."

"It was given me to do," I put in, sullenly: "I didn't offer."

"Never mind that. You will help in a good cause; and I should like (in the same cause) to have ridden as I learned to do in Morocco. I would have performed what monsieur announced there as my Moorish Feat, if he would have permitted it."

"Oh no!" I cried, quickly. "Never again, I trust, Ninette." For once I had seen Ninette make the daring leap, standing on one foot on Black Hawk's neck, and my heart beat with fear at the very mention of it now.

"Oh! I would," she laughed; "and yet I do believe I'm glad I'm not going to do it. I only feel I ought to have insisted upon it, for I expect monsieur merely waited for that. As it is, the chief honor of this benefit night devolves upon you, Signor Ricardo, and I am jealous."

"You know as well as I do, Ninette," I answered, rather hotly, "that you are always the one great attraction of the circus—monsieur knows it too—and that your name standing alone is a more powerful magnet to the public than mine is with all my feats emblazoned after it."

"Yes, I know it," she returned, laughing coolly. "Now, good-by. I'm going to drink tea with monsieur."

With a quick little nod she ran into the manager's lodgings, and I walked on to my own with my thoughts still full of her. How I loved her! So oddly, too, that sometimes my own love almost bewildered me; its persistency having no hope in it, yet its hopelessness having no despair. It was a love that never was moved by her indifference or scorn, and never weakened by her contempt. She was proud of her own beauty and of her power over us all, and she never attempted to hide this—never domineering over the female performers, who were all older and plainer than herself, but domineering most despotically over every male performer in the circus. But she did it so prettily and bewitchingly that I was not the only one who had laid his love at her feet to be trampled on at her girlish pleasure. I had but poor health even then, and this was one source of Ninette's merry sarcasm.

"The Champion Athlete has not an athletic appearance," she used to say. "I fear the signor is weak in every way." And then, with her eyes full of radiant health, she would demurely recommend me a winter in the South—just because the winter was coming on, and we were in the North. "I must laugh at you, Ricardo," she would sometimes say: "I get so dreadfully tired of you unless I turn you into ridicule."

And I knew that she spoke truth.

I was thinking, as I ever was, of this love of mine, and wondering how Ninette would choose to treat me to-night, when, with my great-coat over my performing dress, I entered the manager's anteroom. I was late, for I had not been well enough to hasten, and all the company had assembled, lounging or bustling about according to their appointed tasks.

"Late, O Monarch of the Vibrating Wire," said Ninette, as I hesitated before her, looking at her half enthralled and half amused. She was leaning against the table, in her crimson velvet habit—for she had no wonderful feats to perform to-night—the little crimson cap, with its white feather, set coquettishly on one side of her bright, fair curls.

"You look," she continued, saucily, "as if you had risen from a sick-bed to perform for the sick. How interesting!"

I moved into the dimly-lighted building which surrounded the tent, and looked in at the performance.

"The circus is crowded," Ninette whispered, as she sauntered out with me. "I hardly ever remember our having such a crowd, Ricardo."

"And I hope we never shall have it again," I panted, unbuttoning my coat. "The place is stifling."

"Oh, I hope we shall," she laughed, merrily; "I should like to see hundreds turned away from the doors, and no room left inside even for one child more."

Ah! Ninette, how soon you were to have your wish fulfilled!

"We shall have a splendid gift for the hospital," she continued; "but, Ricardo, what do you think? A clergyman here, who was going to have a service in his church on Sunday especially for the Infirmary, has declined to do so now because we have taken up its cause. He thinks—he says"—Ninette's voice was low and puzzled here, and her eyes angry—"he says if it will accept money earned—so, his conscience does not allow him to give it money from God's house. Why don't you answer?" she went on, impetuously, as I paused. "Why don't you say something angry?"

"It isn't worth speaking of," I replied, though I think my heart was as hot as her own. "It is only worth laughing over."

And then Ninette, looking searchingly into my face, did laugh her clear, happy laugh, though the puzzled look still shone in her bright, excited eyes.

"Yes, we shall send a worthy present to the hospital, I hope and trust and believe," she continued, slowly, "but our help is only to lower it—or, at least," she went on, as I tried to interrupt her in hasty dissent, "good men think so."

"One man—and who ought to be good," I put in, contemptuously.

"One man," she rejoined, the puzzled look deepening again, "speaking for many who think as he does, and who understand this as we can not. And yet—and yet—Ricardo, look at that mass of eager, expectant faces. Why do they come to see us, why do they encourage us, if we sin in what we do? Why doesn't the world show us so in the only way which there would be no withstanding? Does this thought bewilder you too, Ricardo?"

It had bewildered me many and many a time, but I could not tell her so, for the very shadow of the fear that this life in which we were so much together might be wrong made me shiver coldly. Her earnestness, which had been almost appealing, vanished suddenly. "Never mind," she said, with her quick laugh, tossing back the bright little head in its velvet cap; "all lives have their aching, troublesome moments, I suppose. There! they are waiting for your first feat and your greatest. Go on, signor, and prosper."

With her pleasant words in my ears, I went in amidst the deafening applause of the crowd, and, bowing slightly, walked coolly across the ring. I thought nothing of the mass of faces rising in rows, but I remembered that Ninette could see me, and that she had said I was helping in a good cause. I felt that I performed as I had hardly ever performed before, and the long applause was again and again renewed as I left the ring. What would Ninette say? Would she congratulate me? Passing through the dimly lighted building outside the tent, where the horses waited, I caught sight of two figures standing aside in the shadow—Ninette and the gentleman whom we had met that morning—talking low and earnestly. I had often noticed him in the circus, and noticed his evident admiration of Ninette (but then, did not every one gaze at her in admiration?); still I had never seen him out there among us before, and I started as I came up to them in the gloom. Ninette carelessly turned her eyes upon me for a moment, then went on talking—coquettishly and flippantly, it seemed to me. I took her horse from the man who was bringing it forward, and myself led it toward her.

"Are you ready, Mademoiselle Ninette?" I asked, my voice trembling against my will.

"Ready? Why?" she inquired, with slow contempt.

"Allow me—oh, pray allow me, mademoiselle," exclaimed the stranger, starting forward. And Ninette, smiling, put her foot into his hand.

Seating herself in the saddle with the utmost ease, she carelessly, as it seemed, backed Black Hawk against me. "Signor Ricardo," she said, haughtily, "is this the spot where the gentlemen of our company usually rest between their exercises in the ring?" An ironical answer rose to my lips, but I withheld the words.

"Stand back, if you please, signor. Must you always follow me, always haunt me? Stand back."

With a quick change of voice, and a bright shy smile, she bent to take her little gilded whip as the officer handed it to her.

"Thanks, Monsieur le Capitaine." And while she bent gracefully, and seemed to be only stroking the neck of the splendid black horse, she reined him in, skillfully and imperceptibly, until he touched my shoulder.

"Gently, gently, my hawk," she said, feigning utter unconsciousness of my presence, "would you fly too soon?" Then, with a most demure little face, she cantered through the opening in the canvas.

"A most proud and bewitching little Equestrian Queen," said the young officer, appearing much amused by my discomfiture; "but, like old Rome, I suppose you can well 'bear the pride of her of whom yourself are proud.'"

I turned away without answering; and for the first time Ninette performed without my eyes following her graceful motions. The strange gentleman moved to the opening into the tent, but when she rode back, flushed and triumphant after her success, he came forward again eagerly. She drew up her lissome little figure with a dash of odd pride, and turning Black Hawk rapidly aside, sprang to the ground unassisted. Her part was played for that night, and, while the loud clapping within was continued, she walked slowly out into the darkness, her long crimson habit over her arm, her little cap pushed from her bright, excited face, and her eyes raised to the young officer who walked beside her.

Thus I watched them going together under the awning out into the night, and then I went back to complete the "wonder-inspiring evolutions" which the crowd waited for, while my heart seemed breaking in its jealousy.

After that all is a burning confusion in my brain until one evening when I awoke to consciousness in the hospital for which I had been performing, and heard the physicians (who had seen me fall, and had attended pityingly upon me ever since) whisper that all would be well in time.

"Ricardo, dear fellow," said monsieur, coming forward softly, and bending to whisper to me, "thank God, all will be well. The worst is over."

I hardly knew when the knowledge dawned upon me or how; but as I lay there, my old companions clustering round me, I knew that I had performed among them for the last time. I knew that life had most wonderfully and mercifully been spared me, but that I should never walk again. I do not remember that the knowledge came with any sharp or bitter pain; I think it was a quiet, hopeless conviction from the first. They had given me a small room in the hospital to myself; partly to spare others the sight of my suffering; partly, perhaps, as monsieur said, because I had hurt myself in their cause.

So the days and nights passed on, and slowly, slowly brought me a little ease at last.

One morning monsieur, entering my room with a brighter face than usual, told me Ninette had come to see me. I felt the blood rush into my wan face as I took her little warm hand in both my own.

"Oh! you are so much better, Ricardo," she said, her small lips trembling a little as she looked at me. "We shall soon have you back in your place among us."

I shook my head slowly. "Never again, Ninette."

"Why?" she asked, in feigned astonishment.

"I shall never walk again any where, I think, Ninette; certainly not on the vibrating wire. I know I must be a—be lame all my life; and I'm trying, as I lie here, to get accustomed to the thought, and to feel prepared."

"No! no!" she cried, quickly. "Don't try to get accustomed to it, Ricardo. Try to think of getting well, and that will help you to do so."

"Will it? Then I will try," I answered, struggling with my sadness. "When do you leave here?"

"Leave here? Oh, I don't know. Not till you are well, I should think. Why, Ricardo," she added, as I smiled incredulously, "don't you know that to-night we are all going to perform for your benefit? You've not heard, you say? Why, what has monsieur found to talk to you about, then? for he talks to me of nothing else. I wish I could have brought you one of the enormous bills, headed 'Ricardo's Benefit,' in letters as large as myself. You always were fond of reading your own name in the bills, weren't you?"

"Yes—with yours," I answered, intently watching the bright face.

"Well, you would have seen mine too to-day in letters almost larger, for I am going to—ride."

"Of course," I answered, with a faint smile, while I wondered a little at the sudden change in her voice. "What audience would there be if you did not, Ninette?"

"None," she laughed. "You must wish me success before I go away. But here's monsieur come to dismiss me. I've been telling Signor Ricardo," she added, as the manager joined us, "various particulars of his benefit—how very willingly we all give our services, how all the town is patronizing us."

"And did she tell you," asked monsieur, with a pleased and excited look, "how I offered to double the price of admission if any one would promise a novelty? and how she herself immediately proposed to perform her Moorish Feat? I'll show you one of the handbills. Here it is. 'Mlle. Ninette, the Equestrian Queen, on her magnificent steed Black Hawk, will—'"

"Oh no, no! you must not let her," I exclaimed, in hasty fear. "Oh, monsieur, it is most rash and dangerous."

Monsieur smiled as he put the handbill back into his pocket, and Ninette rose with a vexed glance across at him.

"Do forbid her to do this," I cried again.

"Mlle. Ninette is such a superb horsewoman," the manager said, "that if she feels she can accomplish it safely and brilliantly, I feel it too. And it will make to-night's performance an unrivaled success. She has done it before, you know; and a gorgeous and unprecedented triumph it was."

"It is a willful risking of life," I faltered, the tears starting in my weakness. "I shall be miserable."

"I shall not," laughed monsieur, rising. "I have too much confidence in Ninette."

"Don't think about it at all, Ricardo," Ninette said, giving me her hand as she prepared to leave. "I should never have told you myself, because I know how invalids worry themselves about the safest and most trifling things. I have made up my mind to do it, and Black Hawk understands that same entirely."

"Oh! do not venture it, Ninette," I whisper-

Digitized by Google

"RICARDO'S BENEFIT."

earnestness. "Say

cred, laughing light-
d, steady quietness.
ith my feeble hands,

you before the per-ter a little dismal asked eagerly, as I

"Will you come in hat," she answered,

"I have a startling not recognize me."
om then, and Ninette
about to follow him.
ly, as I feasted my when I saw you first bit, quite rusty, I re-at in your hand, with t touching the ground.
you since, you have were that day—and elvet habit," she laugh-ted article now; and—then, Ricardo?"

w."
her step was soft and
e. d thought of her; pic-figure that would come atrical dress. The twiny silent room, and then hlessly, for I knew she Yet so noiselessly she my waiting ears could step. Without a word
d her. Then she stood lips parted with an irre-
eyes brimming over with in no gay, unusual dress;
g up in one hand the old other dangled the little lume, and her head was oright, fair curls.
breaking my wondering o, I feel as if, through all pless, I could dream that all that I wildly dreamed saw you so for the first coming as you are; but ge your dress again, you t costume."
her cheeks, and her eyes

t; but can not you think see me now, Ricardo? as he people are passing the ds," she went on, turning the window; "I expect a have ever had in England.
nor."
so," I said, very earnestly;
w they go to see your wild
te. How terrible it will se who love you!"
quick laugh, but did not

g of Captain Attendant, I
But you need not, for I him since the night you—ll again."
sprang up in my heart.
my darling, turn your face less here, and shall so soon
Come to me for these few me up to me, and laid her rehead.

of course, is bad for you,
nderly; "and I know it is
; it unnerves my heart and hand. I think," she added, with a little sigh, "that every thing that comes naturally to us seems as if it was to be bad for us. Do you—do you remember what the clergyman here said when we performed for this hospital? Oh, I should so like to know if that could be true."

"Can it be true, dear, when our Father's mercy is as wide as heaven?"

"Hush, Ricardo!" she interrupted, with a quick breath; "you and I do not understand that kind of thing, and—we may be hoping without foundation. He said—said it and wrote it and published it—that no modest English girl would do what—I do; and that no noble and pure-minded man would make himself a spectacle, and willfully risk his life as—as you did. Oh, Ricardo, was it true?"

"No," I said, firmly and quietly.

"I know I've been thoughtless and flippant," she went on, very low; "I know I haven't tried as I might have tried to make my life noble; but I don't feel that my heart has been different from the hearts of modest English girls; and indeed — indeed — my life has been more full of temptation than that of any girl who has a quiet, guarded home."

She bent her head, and as I laid my weak fingers on the soft curls, one deep sob shook the little kneeling figure, but when she rose her eyes were very bright behind their glistening lashes. She did not say a word of farewell to me. With a strange, brave, struggling smile, which would have vanished with a word, she hesitated a moment; her cheeks flushing and her lips wistful. Then quite suddenly, with just the slight gesture with which she acknowledged the plaudits of the crowd, she left me.

I lay and listened as the carriages rolled past the Infirmary gates; and presently, across the river, I could hear our own band strike up merrily. I could follow in fancy the whole performance as I lay with the programme before me and the well-known airs to guide me. At last, with a quickened beating of my heart, I felt that the time was come for Ninette's appearance. I knew the very tune with which the band would greet her. Ah! there it was; but drowned almost in a loud, prolonged applause. Then — knowing she was performing—I lay there quivering in every limb.

It was just as one of the hospital physicians and a nurse came into my room, that a great shout rose on the other side of the river, and rolled joyously across to me. My blood burned in my veins.

"That is to greet her after her leap," I said, speaking aloud and rapidly in my intense relief. "Thank God, it is over!"

"I, too, am glad it is over," said the physician, gravely: "such a feat should never have been attempted."

"And yet every one is gone to see it," I answered, passionately, as the nurse turned my pillows. "Why did they encourage her?"

"Such things would be done in any case," he answered: "at least we judge so; though perhaps we do not try it; for certainly every one has gone to see this leap to-night; all our own household, like every one else's. Yet how can we help disapproving such a dangerous act, performed, too, by a young and beautiful girl, whose life must be one long temptation to display—if to nothing worse?"

"Listen!" I cried, in sudden terror, pushing away the nurse, and starting up with panting breath. "Did the band stop then—suddenly? Hark! it is all silent."

I remember faltering incoherent appeals to be taken to the circus; and I remember how they tried to soothe me, laying me back upon the bed, and drawing down the blind before my wild and staring eyes. But in that hush across the river I knew that I had had my death-blow.

They brought me no tidings for days. They kept me in darkness within and without. But when at last my brain was calm again, and my eyes had lost their restless fever, they told me some few particulars of that fearful night.

Ninette had performed her dauntless feat with perfect success. While she stood daintily upon his neck, Black Hawk took his leap smoothly and safely. But the astonished crowd had not been satisfied with this. With a persistent cry they had summoned her again, and summoned her in my name.

"As the seats for to-night have been taken at double price," she had said, laughingly, to monsieur, "I owe the audience a double appearance."

And so she had ridden in again triumphantly, and, springing lightly upon the neck of her horse, had prepared again for her wonderful leap.

Then came the hush—though no one ever could tell me exactly how it had occurred, some saying Ninette was unusually excited by her brilliant feat, and some that she was tired. She fell—fell with a light, sudden fall, which would not have hurt her, perhaps, but that her temple struck the boards which separated the front row of spectators from the ring.

Thank God that there had been no struggle! There was one deep red stain upon the soft, fair curls; but no anguish on the young, dead face when they lifted it so gently.

In the rare, sweet dreams which visit me as I lie here I always see Ninette just as I saw her first—just as I saw her last. And when I awake I am almost glad to see, in the faces round me, that the time is drawing very near when I shall see her once again.

MRS. CHARLES MOULTON.

TO those Americans who within the last eight years have visited Paris the name of Mrs. Charles Moulton will be familiar. Through her graces and beauty of person, and the superadded charm of a magnificent voice, she was distinguished among her own countrymen, courted by the elegant and refined society of the capital, and at the imperial court the ever-welcome and respected guest. The portrait of this lady we engrave in the present number. Mrs. Moulton is American by birth and education. She was a Miss Greenough, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, and granddaughter of the late Judge S. P. P. Fay, of that place. She gave early indications of the possession of a remarkable voice. Reared with comfortable surroundings, no pains were spared to give her the earliest and best instruction attainable in Boston and New York. While yet very young she went to London, and studied under Garcia, who finally sent her, with a flattering letter, to the great Romani at Florence. At this time Miss Greenough married Mr. Moulton, of Paris. In the society of that city she had every opportunity of exhibiting her wonderful powers. The result was a marked success, not only among her cultivated auditors, but likewise with the great masters Rossini and Auber, both of whom took great delight in teaching her their favorite compositions.

While a resident of Paris Mrs. Moulton, accompanied by a relative, visited the celebrated Delsarte, renowned for his original method of teaching elocution and musical expression. Mrs. Moulton was told by Auber to approach Delsarte in the rôle of a novice, as one who sought elementary instruction in his art. She acted upon this suggestion, and introduced herself as a person of this description. "Mademoiselle," said he, "sing me a few bars, that I may judge of your method."

Mrs. Moulton seated herself at the piano, and had barely uttered half a dozen notes, when Delsarte detected the attempted pleasantry. "Stop, Mademoiselle. You have come here to make fun of me; you are no novice. Now if you will be pleased to act seriously it will give me pleasure to hear you sing." Whereupon Mrs. Moulton sang to him. At the conclusion of her first song Delsarte turned to the relative who accompanied Mrs. M., and said, "It is the greatest voice in the world!" Heretofore Mrs. Moulton's voice has been heard rarely but in social life. Circumstances have occurred inducing her to appear publicly in concert, and she made her first appearance in New York on the evening of October 16. Mrs. Moulton appears at the very maturity of her powers; fresh, young, and distinguée, with a voice whose richness, cultivation, and sympathetic tenderness win ready appreciation.

MRS. CHARLES MOULTON.

Digitized by Google

Fig. 9.—SECTION OF BORDER, FIG. 8.

Irish Guipure Collar, Figs. 1–3.

THIS collar, which is made with twisted crochet cotton, No. 100, consists of separate crochet figures, which are partly worked together and partly joined by short button-hole stitch bars ornamented with picots. In doing this the illustration must be carefully observed. Each of the separate parts consists of a centre rosette, shown in full size by Fig. 2, of three five-cornered leaves (see Fig. 3), and of a coiled stem. These sections of each part are worked together, excepting the small raised rings in the centre of the rosettes and leaves, which are crocheted separately and then sewed on. Begin the work at the middle of a rosette as follows: A foundation of 6 st. (stitch) closed in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch); on this the 1st round.—10 sc. (single crochet); finally, 1 sl. on the first sc. of the round. 2d round.—* 3 ch. (chain stitch), 1 sc. on the next sc. of the preceding round; repeat nine times from . 3d round.— 3 ch., 1 sc. on the next scallop of the preceding round formed of 3 ch.; repeat nine times from *; finally, 3 more ch. 4th round.—Always 4 sc. on each scallop of the preceding round. The 5th round consists of sc., which are worked on the back vein of each sc. of the preceding round, and on a foundation of medium-sized thread. This round must be broken at three points, observing the illustration, Fig. 1, from which points the leaves are crocheted as follows: 5 sl. on the foundation thread (these form the stem), a ring of 7 ch., on which work 7 sl.; this ring forms the centre of the leaf; then on the foundation thread 13 sl., going back on these, and passing over the last of the 13 sl., 11 sc., always passing the needle through the back veins of stitches; fasten to the ring formed of 7 st., going back again 11 sc., finally, again on the foundation thread 12 sc. This completes the first leaf. Begin the second by working 5 sc. over a foundation thread on the last 5 sc. of the preceding round, then 7 sl. on the thread only. Now, as shown by Fig. 3, work two rounds of ch. and sc., between which fasten to the ring in the middle, and, going back from the point of the leaf on the foundation thread, work one round of sc. on each st. of the preceding round. The third and fifth leaves are worked like the first, with this difference only, that instead of the first 5 sl., 5 sc. are worked on the last 5 sc. of the preceding round. The fourth leaf corresponds exactly with the second. After finishing the fifth leaf, crochet on the foundation thread 5 sc. on the 5 sl., which form the stem of the leaf, then continue the broken last round of sc. on the middle rosette. Work the two following leaves in a similar manner, and, finally, the coiled stem; the latter consists of a row of sl. and a row of single crochet, both worked on the foundation thread. The small raised rings in each centre are worked in the following manner: 6 ch. closed in a ring, and on these a close row of sl., then one more row of sc., with which surround the stitches of the first row. The separate parts are partly looped in working, and, partly joined afterward by short button-hole stitch bars ornamented with picots, as shown by Fig. 1. Besides this, work ch. scallops, on which sc. and picots are crocheted, between every two leaves on the outer edge of the collar. This design is an unusually pretty one, and is easily executed with the aid of the illustrations.

Fig. 1.—IRISH GUIPURE COLLAR.

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF IRISH GUIPURE COLLAR.

Fig. 3.—SECTION OF IRISH GUIPURE COLLAR.

Fig. 2.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER.

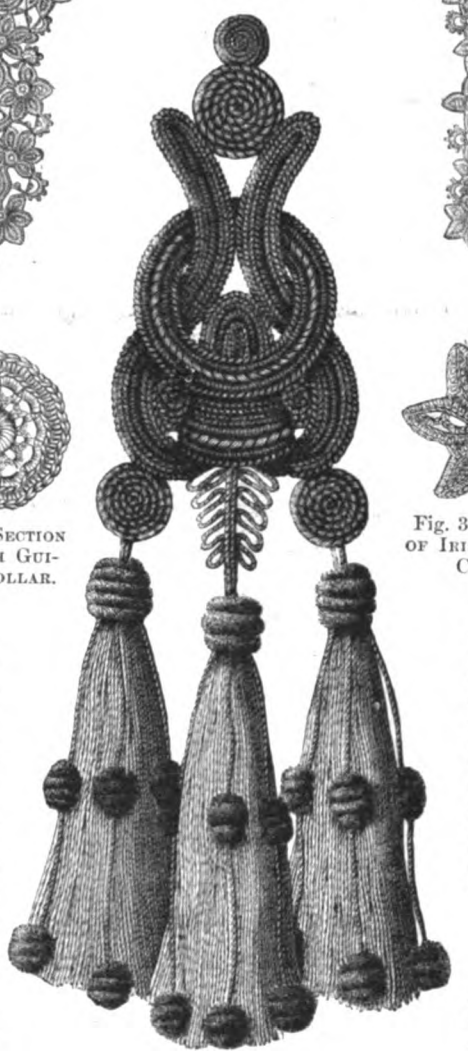

Fig. 1.—AGRAFE WITH TASSELS.

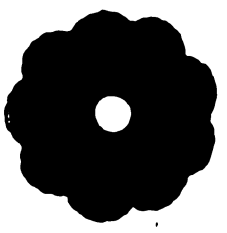

Fig. 11.—SECTION OF BORDER, FIG. 8.

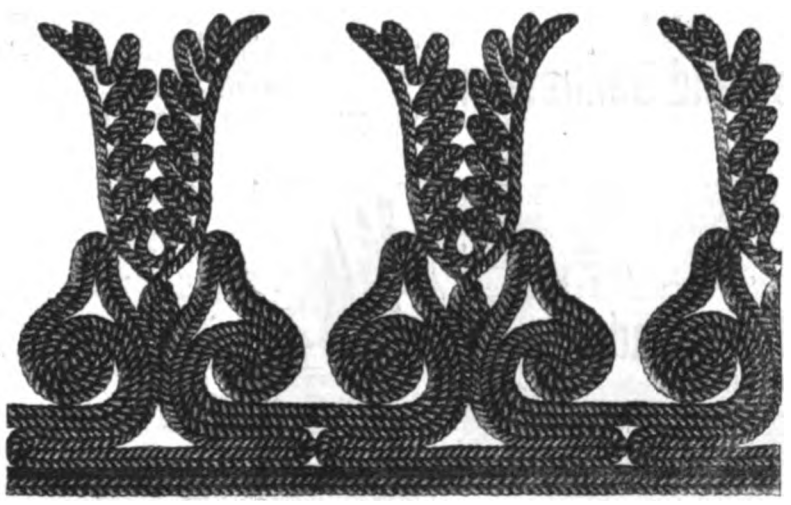

Fig. 4.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER.

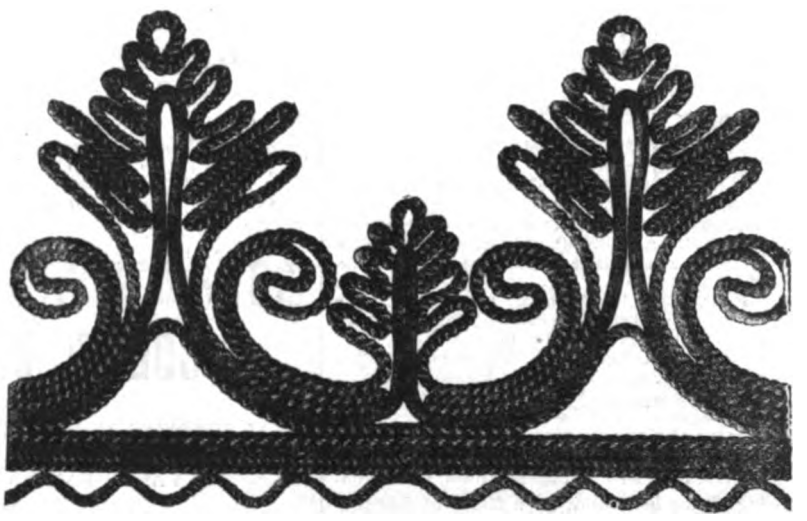

Fig. 5.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER.

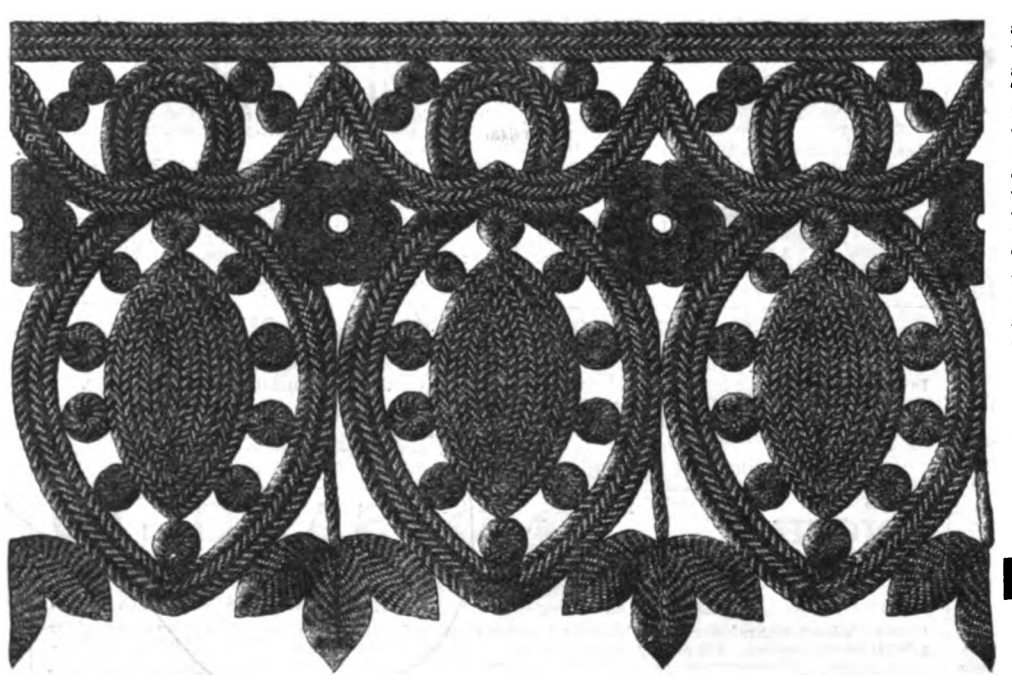

Fig. 8.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER.—[See Figs. 9–11.]

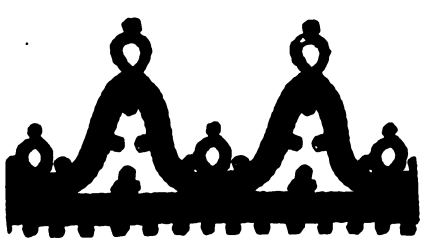

Fig. 6.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER.

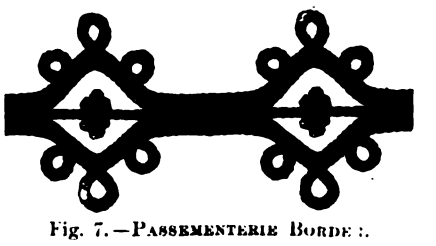

Fig. 7.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER.

Passementerie Trimmings for Winter Wrappings, Figs. 1–11.

Fig. 1.—This agrafe with tassels, which is shown reduced to one-half of the full size, is made of black or colored silk soutache, gimp, and round cord, the latter of different sizes. The tassels are of coarse saddler's silk; the head of the tassels and the grelots are of floss silk.

Of the borders shown by Figs. 2–7, the first is all worked of fine silk round cord; for the borders, Figs. 3–5, use coarser cord and soutache; and Figs. 6 and 7 are worked with fine cord and black cut beads.

The arabesque figures of the border, Fig. 8, which is shown reduced to two-thirds of the full size, are of medium-sized round cord; the remaining figures are crocheted with saddler's silk, and sewed on the arabesques. Work the small dots each, beginning at the middle, with a foundation of four chain stitches, with four to five rounds of single crochet, always going forward from left to right, and increasing the number of stitches. Work the leaves shown in full size by Fig. 10 in a similar manner. The wrong side of the crochet-work forms the right side of the figures. Instead of these leaves, those shown by Fig. 9 may also be worked; they consist each of a chain stitch foundation, on which one round of single crochet from left to right is worked likewise; in doing this the shape of the leaf is formed at the same time, by winding the crocheted round in coils, as shown by the illustration, and fastening them together at the point and the stem of the leaf. For the rosette shown by Fig. 11 work, first, from the middle one ring of chain stitches and single crochet, then three leaf-circles of chain stitch scallops, as shown by the illustration, and on each of these work in single crochet and double crochet.

Fig. 10.—SECTION OF BORDER, FIG. 8.

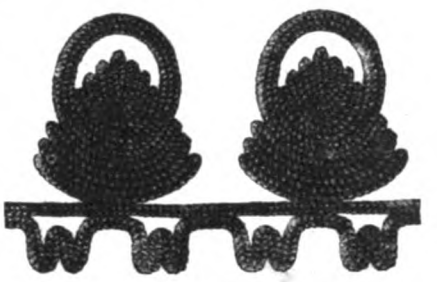

Fig. 3.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER.

CLOCKS AND WATCHES.

THE history of these time-keepers is curious. Clocks were first used in monasteries, and the word originally meant bell; and the two, clock and bell, in calling their inmates to their devotions, performed the same office. These were, however, tower-clocks—not small ones for apartments. One was set up in France in 1734, and created a great excitement, being the wonder of the age. The maker of it was made a nobleman for his services in constructing such an extraordinary piece of workmanship. The first one in England was during the reign of Edward I., and was placed in the tower opposite Westminster Palace. The hour-glass and sun-dial had long been in common use, but this was the first thing which could be called a clock, except the water-clocks, one of which had been brought home from France by Richard Cœur de Lion. The word "watch" is from a Saxon word, meaning "to wake." At first the watch was as large as a saucer; it had weights, and was called "the pocket-clock." The earliest known use of the modern name occurs in a record of 1542, which mentions that Edward VI. had "onne larum, or watch of iron, the cases likewise of iron gilt, with two plummetts of lead."

FIGS. 1–11.—PASSEMENTERIE TRIMMINGS FOR WINTER WRAPPINGS.

Digitized by Google

ADVERTISEMENTS.

G. SCHIRMER'S

New Circulating Music Library,

701 BROADWAY,

Containing over 40,000 numbers of Instrumental and Vocal Music. Subscribers residing in New York City and vicinity can have the music delivered at their residences. Send or call for Circulars.

FANS.

TIFFANY & CO.,

UNION SQUARE, N. Y.,

NOW OFFER A CHOICE ASSORTMENT OF FANS, FINE LACE TOPS, WITH CARVED PEARL STICKS, INLAID WITH GOLD AND COLORS. SOMETHING ENTIRELY NEW.

HAIR. — HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES

NOW THE FASHION.

24 inches long, weight 2¼ oz., only $5.
28 inches long, weight 2½ oz., only $6.
30 inches long, weight 2¾ oz., only $7 50.
32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9.

Only importer who retails, CHAS. V. PECKHAM,
687 Broadway, near Amity St., and
951 Grand St., corner Chrystie.

By mail on receipt of color and price, or by express, C. O. D.

WALTHAM

WATCHES,

(LADIES' SIZE).

WE KEEP CONSTANTLY IN STOCK A FULL ASSORTMENT OF THESE WATCHES, IN VERY HANDSOME GOLD CASES, AND WARRANT THEM AS THOROUGHLY RELIABLE TIMEPIECES.

BALL, BLACK, & CO.,

JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS,

565 & 567 Broadway, N. Y.

LOOK! LOOK! LOOK!

A beautiful and useful article is the Universal Twine and Thread Cutter for ladies. It saves time, twine, thread, fingers, and teeth. Samples mailed on receipt of 25 cents. Address T. B. DOOLITTLE & CO.,
599 Broadway, N. Y.

COLGATE & CO.'S

CASHMERE BOUQUET SOAP

has a novel but very delightful perfume, and is in every respect superior for TOILET USE.

Sold by dealers in perfumery and Toilet Articles.

$9 for an ELEGANT WARDROBE of WALNUT and DAMASK. See Circulars. H. WHITTEMORE & Co., 544 B'dway, N. Y.

STARR & MARCUS,

No. 22 JOHN ST.

(UP STAIRS), N. Y.,

MAKE A SPECIALTY OF THE

GORHAM M'F'G COMPANY'S

STERLING SILVER-WARE.

Especial attention is requested to the many new and elegant pieces manufactured expressly to our order the past year, and quite recently completed.

An unusually attractive assortment of novelties in fancy silver, cased for wedding gifts, of an inexpensive character.

The works of the Gorham Company are very extensive, enabling them to employ the most accomplished talent in designing, skill in producing, and the best labor-saving machinery and method of manufacture, thus reducing the cost and bringing these beautiful wares within the reach of almost every purchaser.

The standard of this Silver is that of British Sterling, 925-1000.

Paris Kid Gloves.

UNION ADAMS & CO.,

637...Broadway...637

Have just opened a beautiful and elegant variety of the celebrated

P. L. AUBERT'S

KID AND DOG-SKIN GLOVES,

FOR

Ladies and Gentlemen.

CURLS! One package of Prof. LEOS' MAGIC COMPOUND will instantly Curl the straightest hair of either sex (without injury) into wavy ringlets or heavy massive Curls, in every case, or money refunded. 25 cents per package, postpaid, or three for 50 cents. E. HOLBROOK, Uxbridge, Mass.

E. RIMMEL,

PERFUMER,

PARIS, LONDON, BRUSSELS.

THE AMERICUS CLUB BOUQUET,

The Perfume of the Season.

JOCKEY CLUB,
WHITE ROSE,
MUSK,
IHLANG IHLANG,
&c., &c., &c., &c.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Special Representatives for United States,
EDWARDES & RUSSELL, 38 Vesey St., N. Y.

STRASBURGER & PFEIFFER,

(Successors to Strasburger, Fritz, & Pfeiffer),

IMPORTERS OF GERMAN, FRENCH, AND ENGLISH

TOYS,

China & Fancy Goods,

BOHEMIAN GLASS and LAVA WARES,

MUSIC BOXES, ACCORDEONS, HARMONICAS, CONCERTINAS, &c., &c.,

394 Broadway, near Canal St., N. Y.

Parlor Ornaments, latest novelties in Toys, Fancy and Ornamental Goods constantly arriving to supply the general demand.

NILSSON BOUQUET.

THE NEW PERFUME

FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.

C. B. WOODWORTH & SON, ROCHESTER, N. Y., and 335 BROADWAY (Room 18), NEW YORK.

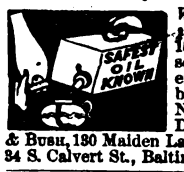
R. H. MACY.

We are now and shall be receiving throughout the season our goods selected by myself,
DIRECT from LONDON,
DIRECT from PARIS,
DIRECT from VIENNA,
DIRECT from BERLIN,
DIRECT from ROME,
DIRECT from NAPLES,
DIRECT from SWITZERLAND,
Including all the novelties, which we shall sell at the lowest possible price.

FOURTEENTH STREET AND SIXTH AVENUE.

DENSLOW & BUSH'S "SAFETY" OIL



Will not explode! Safest and purest oil known! Fire test over 150°. A lighted lamp may be upset and broken without fear of explosion or fire. Recommended by the Fire Underwriters of N. Y. For sale by all Grocers and Druggists in the U. S. DENSLOW & BUSH, 180 Maiden Lane, N. Y.; 40 India St., Boston; 34 S. Calvert St., Baltimore; 51 S. Water St., Chicago.

J. B. SMALL, Manufacturer of

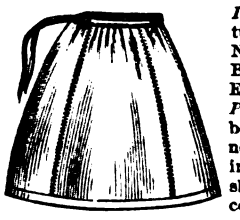
J. CUT PAPER PATTERNS

for Ladies, Misses, Boys, and Children, of all ages and sizes. He furnishes all the Patterns issued with this paper. Illustrated Catalogue sent free. Address
J. B. SMALL, 548 Broadway, New York.

TRADE-MARK.

"RUSSIAN GORED KNIT UNDERSKIRT,"

A NEW ARTICLE,



Invented and manufactured exclusively by the NORFOLK & NEW BRUNSWICK HOSIERY CO., upon their Patented Knitting Looms, being superior to flannel, much lighter, perfect in shape, and will not shrink nor change in color from washing.

ALSO,

FULL-FASHIONED HOSIERY,

consisting of

Ladies', Gents', Misses', and Boys' Underwear, of every description, superior in quality and style to any goods made in this country, and fully equal to the best hand-loom imported goods, and at greatly reduced prices.

Full lines for sale, to the jobbing trade only, at H. J. LIBBY & CO.'S, 47 & 49 White St., N. Y.

NICOL & DAVIDSON, 686 Broadway,

Are receiving Novelties from Paris and London in

REAL BRONZES, COMPOSITION BRONZES, BISQUE GOODS,
FRENCH CHINA DINNER, DESSERT, AND TEA SERVICES,
VASES, PARIAN STATUARY (from Minton), MANTEL SETS,
GLASSWARE (from Baccarat),
GLASS CHANDELIERS (from Osler), SHEFFIELD TABLE CUTLERY, &c., &c.
ALSO, OF OWN MANUFACTURE,
GAS FIXTURES and FINE SILVER-PLATED WARE.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

WEIGH THESE WORDS.

All who suffer from indigestion, bilious disorders, nervous affections, constipation, or undue relaxation of the bowels, are invited to consider these facts, viz.: That the curative operation of

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT,

in all such cases, is proven by overwhelming testimony; that profound medical practitioners indorse it; that Analytical Chemists pronounce it identical with the water of the great German Spa; that it purifies and regulates the system without weakening it; that it is delightfully refreshing; and that every element it contains is either corrective, alterative, or invigorating. Weigh these words.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

NEW YORK CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,

The oldest and best Music School in the country,
NOW OPEN FOR PRIVATE AND CLASS INSTRUCTION
in all branches of Vocal and Instrumental Music, Harmony and Composition, and the Modern Languages.
All Applications for Admission must be made at the
GENERAL CONSERVATORY OFFICES,
820 BROADWAY, near 19th St., over the Music Store.
(The branch at No. 82 Fifth Avenue removes up town.)
BROOKLYN BRANCH, 102, 104, & 106 COURT ST., near State.

ESTB. 1809.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO

For General Household Purposes,

BETTER & CHEAPER THAN SOAP.

Cleans windows, scours knives and table ware, removes stains and rust, and is the very best thing ever used for general house cleaning. For sale by all good Grocery and Drug Stores. Wholesale, 211 Washington St., N. Y.

Ladies!! USE PERSIAN SPRAY The Complexion

HEALTH, ECONOMY, GOOD LIVING.

Just Published, a Revised and Enlarged Edition of

MRS. CORNELIUS'S

COOK BOOK

AND

YOUNG HOUSEKEEPER'S FRIEND.

12mo. Price $1 50.

Since the first publication of Mrs. Cornelius's book it has steadily grown in favor, and the publishers feel warranted in asserting that no book on the subject has attained so wide and deserved popularity.

It is not only an always reliable cook book, but also covers the whole circle of household duties, and is an accepted authority on the subject of which it treats.

This new edition is considerably enlarged in its various departments, and is now more eminently than ever a complete household guide.

Sent by mail on receipt of price.

For sale by all booksellers.

THOMPSON, BIGELOW, & BROWN, Publishers,
25 and 29 Cornhill, Boston.

LADIES!

Dr. Kennedy's Hair Tea will prevent the hair from falling out, and preserve its health and beauty. Sold by Druggists at $1.00 per bottle.

OUR CANVASSING AGENTS EARN $10 to $20 daily. New Monopoly. Sells in every family to entire satisfaction. Agents wanted. Address MYERS M'F'G CO., 104 John St., N. Y.

Digitized by Google

THE BEAVER BRAND.

SILK-FINISHED

BLACK PURE MOHAIRS.

These GOODS are finished alike on both sides, and are distinguished for their silky appearance, brilliant lustre, and pure shade of fast Black. Being made of the very finest material, they positively excel all other Mohairs ever sold in the United States.

These splendid Goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

☞ Purchasers will know these Goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Beaver, precisely like the above.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 & 429 Broadway, New York,
Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

INFANT'S WARDROBE "A"

FOR $75.

2 Flannel Bands	@	$0 87½	$0 75
2 Barrow Coats	@	2 00	4 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@	2 50	5 00
6 Linen Shirts	@	1 00	6 00
4 Night Dresses	@	2 25	9 00
4 Slips	@	2 50	10 00
2 Day Dresses	@	4 00	8 00
1 Robe			7 00
1 Basket, furnished			5 00
6 Pairs Socks	@	62½	3 75
2 Cambric Skirts	@	1 50	3 00
2 " " Tucked	@	2 00	4 00
1 Calico Slip			1 50
1 "Eureka" Diaper			1 00
Set of Linen Diapers			2 00
1 Rubber Bib			50
2 Quilted Bibs	@	50	1 00
1 Lace Cap			3 50
			$75 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent, C. O. D., by Express. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials.

LORD & TAYLOR,

BROADWAY & TWENTIETH ST.,

NEW YORK.

Figures will not lie!

How Large Fortunes are made!

☞ FACTS FOR THE PEOPLE. ☜

☞ SEE the prices at which four of the leading Sewing Machines are sold in the UNITED STATES, and ENGLAND.

	Price in England.	In the U. S.
Wheeler & Wilson	$45.00	$85.00
New Singer	32.50	65.00
Elias Howe	35.00	65.00
Wilson Shuttle	40.00	45.00

The above Prices are for exactly the same classes of machines as sold in both Countries. There is scarcely any difference in the cost of material and labor in any of the above named machines.

☞ AFFIDAVIT.—W. G. Wilson, President of the Wilson Sewing Machine Co., personally appeared before me, and made oath that the above prices are correct, and taken by him from Circulars published in the United States and England under the corporate names of the Companies manufacturing said machines. FRED. SMITH,
Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas of Cuyahoga Co., O.

The WILSON SEWING MACHINES are for Sale in most every County in the United States, and
No. 707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,

31 & 33 VESEY STREET,

P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

CARBOLIC SALVE — HEALING COMPOUND — C.S.

Beautifies the complexion by removing Pimples and all other disagreeable disorders of the skin. Twenty-five cents per box.

JOHN F. HENRY, Sole Proprietor,
No. 8 College Place, New York.

GLYCERINE CAKE.

RAWOLLE'S TOILET GLYCERINE CAKE is unequaled for Washing, Shaving, Shampooing, Tooth Soap, and Baby Wash; produces a clear, soft, white skin, and prevents pimples and chapping. Warranted over one-half pure Glycerine. For sale by druggists. MARX & RAWOLLE, Manufacturers of Glycerine, 179 William St., New York.

WICKES'

ECLECTIC OIL

Is Pure, Safe, Sweet, and Economical.

J. H. WICKES,
120 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS

in

TABLE DAMASKS, TABLE-CLOTHS, NAPKINS, DOYLIES, TOWELS, TOWELINGS, SHEETINGS, SHIRTINGS, PILLOW CASINGS, BLANKETS, QUILTS, FLANNELS, PRINTS, AND DOMESTICS OF EVERY KIND.

Also,

A LARGE INVOICE OF

FINE FRENCH FAMILY LINENS, comprising

TABLE-CLOTHS, TABLE DAMASKS, NAPKINS, DOYLIES, TOWELS, TOWELINGS, SHEETINGS, SHIRTINGS, AND PILLOW LINENS,

AT 33⅓ PER CENT. BELOW REGULAR PRICES.

Among the

TABLE LINENS

of this very superior stock are some of the most costly goods,

in

RARE AND ELEGANT DESIGNS,

to which they respectfully solicit an early inspection.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street, N. Y.,

Have now open

an unrivaled assortment of

RICH SILKS,

INDIA SHAWLS,

RICH LACES,

BLACK THREAD-LACE POINTS,

Medium and Extra Quality

DRESS GOODS,

MOURNING GOODS,

BLANKETS AND FLANNELS,

FALL AND WINTER GLOVES

in

BUCK, CALF, DOG SKIN, CASTOR, KID, CLOTH, &c.

FURS,

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S,

viz.:

SABLE, ERMINE, MINK, BLACK MARTEN, CHINCHILLA, SEAL,

AND MANY SPECIAL NOVELTIES

which can only be found at their establishment.

FUR ROBES,

a large assortment.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

SILVER WHITE

Removes tarnish quickly, without injury to the goods. Sold by Jewelers, Druggists, Grocers, Furnishing Stores &c. S. M. MILLER Sole Proprietor, 65 Liberty Street, N.Y. Send stamp for sample.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

A WORD TO THOSE WHO WISH PROFITABLE EMPLOYMENT.
Sell Nast's Almanac and other desirable publications that every person will buy. For further particulars, inquire of or address AVERY BILL,
Care HARPER & BROTHERS, 331 Pearl St., N. Y.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA,
with the Green-Tea Flavor. Warranted to suit all tastes. For sale every where. And for sale wholesale only by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 8 Church St., N.Y. P.O. Box 5506. Send for Thea-Nectar Circular.

SPLENDID Stories, Sketches, Poetry, Valuable Recipes, Secrets, &c., &c. 40 long columns, size of Ledger, a family paper. The STAR-SPANGLED BANNER. Prang's Chromo and paper till 1873. Only 75 cts. Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.

$290 For first-class Pianos—Sent on trial—No Ag'ts. Address U. S. PIANO CO., 865 B'dway, N. Y.

BAZAR

Cut Paper Patterns,

For Ladies, Misses, Girls, and Children of Both Sexes.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Our business will be conducted in a spirit of progress. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue of 28 pages, containing over two hundred figures, showing the leading fashions of the day. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, ranging from 30 to 46 inches bust measure; also for misses from 10 to 16 years of age, and for children of both sexes under 10. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent to any address free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a list of two valuable premiums, both of which are offered to subscribers for Harper's Bazar. One subscriber will get at least one of these premiums, and we confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premiums offered to each and every new subscriber for the Bazar have no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land. For terms to Agents, or for catalogues, address

JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
548 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—Read the following extraordinary offer: The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Co. manufacture and warrant two different Sewing Machines, one called the Elliptic, the other called the Wheeler & Wilson. The Elliptic Machine excels in many important points. It is so light that a child can run it with ease; or an invalid, whose strength is sufficient to walk about the house or to do the work of a child ten years old, can sew all day without being overfatigued. It is impossible to convey by language a tithe of the merits belonging to this deservedly popular Machine. To see it perform the different operations, such as hemming, felling, gathering, embroidering, tucking, cording, frilling, quilting, fringing, etc., it seems more like a thing of life than a machine moved by the will of the operator. It has adjustable guages for every description of work, and can be changed in a moment to suit any material, coarse or fine. The economy of the Elliptic Machine in a family is almost incredible—with one, a good operator can do the work of twelve hands. A breadth of a skirt can be sewed in less than a minute; a gentleman's fine shirt can be made in three hours; or a child's dress, with many tiny pleats, in less time than the hands can fold them—in fact, every description of sewing is reduced from a question of hours to one of minutes. We make the following offer: Any person in the United States desiring one of these celebrated Machines can buy one and pay for it in work (not sewing) furnished at their own home. The work is pleasant and profitable, and can be accomplished by any lady, old or young. We send circulars on receipt of stamp. Address

ELLIPTIC SEWING MACHINE CO.,
548 Broadway, New York.

RIFLES, Shot-Guns, Revolvers, Gun Material. Write for Price-List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents wanted.

$250 A Month easily made with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Secure Circular and Samples, free. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

☞ New Subscribers will be supplied with either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR, from the present time to the end of the year 1872, for Four Dollars.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 50 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO AS to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT...No. 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS..... " 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS..... " 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT..... " 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT..... " 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS..... " 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER..... " 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK..... " 11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 13
POSTILION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 15
SHORT-SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 17
LADY'S TRAVELING SUIT..... " 21
MISS'S POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 7 to 15 years old)..... " 23
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)..... " 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)..... " 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)..... " 29
BOY'S BLOUSE, SHIRT-WAIST, and KNICKERBOCKERS (for Boy from 4 to 9 years old) " 31
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)..... " 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt).. " 35
MARGUERITE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 37
LOUIS XIV. POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.. " 39
VEST-BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER..... " 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for NOVEMBER, 1871.

THE STUDENT'S ANCIENT HISTORY OF THE EAST. From the Earliest Times to the Conquest by Alexander the Great. Including Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Media, Persia, Asia Minor, and Phœnicia. By PHILIP SMITH, B.A., Author of "The History of the World." Illustrated. Uniform with The Students' Series. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

NAST'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC FOR 1872. With nearly 150 Illustrations, from Original Designs by Thomas Nast, made expressly for this Almanac. Crown 8vo, Paper, 30 cents; Four Copies, $1 00.

THE RISE AND FALL OF THE PARIS COMMUNE. With a full Account of the Bombardment, Capture, and Burning of the City. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE, an Eye-Witness of the Events described, Editor of "Harper's Hand-Book of European Travel," "Harper's Phrase-Book," &c. With a Map of Paris and Portraits from Original Photographs. Large 12mo, 516 pages, Cloth, $2 00.

KINGSLEY'S WEST INDIES. At Last: a Christmas in the West Indies. By CHARLES KINGSLEY. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE TEMPEST. Edited, with Notes, by WM. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High-School, Cambridge, Mass., and Editor of "The Merchant of Venice." Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

JOSHUA MARVEL. By B. L. FARJEON, Author of "Grif." 8vo, Paper, 40 cents.

THE PREY OF THE GODS. By FLORENCE MARRYAT (Mrs. Ross Church), Author of "Her Lord and Master," &c. 8vo, Paper, 80 cents. (Nearly Ready.)

ANNE FURNESS. By the Author of "Mabel's Progress," "The Sacristan's Household," "Veronica," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

A DAUGHTER OF HETH. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "Kilmeny," "In Silk Attire," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

NEW LIBRARY EDITIONS by the Author of "John Halifax:"

OLIVE.—OGILVIES.—THE HEAD OF THE FAMILY.—JOHN HALIFAX.—AGATHA'S HUSBAND. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per volume.

FOR LACK OF GOLD. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "Robin Gray." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

Digitized by Google

THE CRUEL, CRAWLING SEA.

TERRIBLE BATHING-WOMAN. "I'll See you again To-morrow, my little Gentleman—" SHIVERING BOY. "Y-e-e-es. But c-c-couldn't you p-p-put in a Pail of Warm Water, please?"

lays, at an millions in up, for it

who plant-beds, and

May a man who is desirous of opening a wine and spirit store be fairly accused of a vaulting ambition?

When a man turns teetotaler does he necessarily acquire a pail complexion?

A COWARDLY ASSAULT—To beat a retreat.

What is the easiest way for a bad rider to show himself off?—To get on a spirited horse.

SARATOGA.

he fa-drank

that

"And you really like to drink this dreadful Stuff? Why? Is it because you have been told not to do so?"

"Wife, I don't see how they send letters on them 'ere telegraph wires without tearin' them all into bits."

"They don't send the paper," said the wife, "they just send the writing in a fluid state."

Is it classically correct to describe Apollo's darts as the shafts of his chariot?

A QUERY FOR MOTHERS.—Why is a screaming baby like the goddess of morning?—Because it's a roarer (Aurora).

Because a man would fain leave well alone, is he therefore a pump?

It is a mistake to suppose that the sun is supported in the heavens by its beams.

A NOBLEMAN OF EXTRACTION.—Among the papers found at the Tuileries was a letter from a well-known dentist, who asked the title of baron, as sole remuneration for a successful operation performed in a month that calls itself August.

"What are you taking, Sir?" said the waiter.
"The air, my good friend."

An old army officer, writing from his post in Washington Territory, mentions this little incident: "In the State of Nevada strangers, and sometimes old settlers, are taken in and cheated in the most surprising manner by purchasing claims in ledges of rock, commonly known as quartz ledges. The sellers do not always keep truth on their side; hence there is frequent grumbling on the part of purchasers. A man who had been bitten in this way became very wroth, and recommended to the State authorities of Nevada that they should adopt the Irish flag as the coat of arms for the State.

"'Why should we do so?' inquired one of the officers.

"'Because,' replied the indignant purchaser of worthless rock, 'a shamrock and a lyre (liar) are the true symbols for your coat of arms.'"

Who pays the highest price for a home?—The woman who marries for one.

Gordon Cumming, the great lion-slayer, was telling Rogers one day how he once came unarmed upon a huge lion. "Thinking to scare him," said the hunter, "I ran toward him with all my might."

"Whereupon," said Rogers, "he ran away with all his main, I suppose."

"Exactly so," said Cumming.

What is the best kind of shooting in winter?—To have coals shot into your cellar.

A SWELL AMONG FLOWERS—A dandelion.

A lawyer, prosecuting a thief recently on circuit, remarked severely at him that "Opportunity makes the thief."

"Not always, Sir," replied the innocent. "I found a big anchor and chain cable on the pavement once, and didn't touch it; and there was nobody about, neither."

THE BEST PLACE FOR THE BLIND—The sea-side.

NOT CALLED FOR.—A clergyman once posted the following notice on the gate of his church: "Found—Two hats on my strawberry bed. The owners can have them by proving property." We don't believe the owners will call for them.

A DELICATE PARCEL TO BE FORWARDED BY RAIL—A young lady wrapped up in herself.

To judge from the following advertisement, the little "P——'s" must just now be in a very happy state of mind:

"BIRCH ROD.—Will any one inform me where I can purchase, or how to make, a birch rod. MRS. P——"

It is only in Germany where one finds the candles too long and the sheets too short; but what are the odds as long as you're happy?

RONG PLACE.
rch in Fifth Avenue.)
't do at all! We can See Nothing here!"

CHILL OCTOBER.

Winter's approaching,
Summer is done;
Darkness encroaching
Still on the sun,
Shrouded in vapors.
Mary, my lass—
Can't read the papers—
Light up the gas!

Ashen and sober,
Sullen and gray;
Just, "Chill October:
Millais, R.A."
Night 'gins down settle
Slowly in fog.
Mary!—the kettle!—
Make me some grog.

See, on the ceiling—
Cast by the fire,
Shadows revealing
Monsters so dire—
Crabs with huge nippers,
Beasts oddly formed!
Mary!—my slippers!
Have they been warmed?

How the winds mutter,
Whistle, and roar!
Shut every shutter,
Close every door!
Squirrel and dormouse
Sleep months away:
What fun enormous
Sleeping as they!

Such hibernating
Truly were nice!
No dreary waiting,
Winter, or ice.
Let the sheets air well,
Warm blankets bring!
Good Mary!—farewell!—
Call me next spring.

When is a fowl's neck like a bell?—When it's wrung for dinner.

"Come, sheer off," as the ram said to the man who was cutting off his wool.

"So you are going to keep a school?" said a young lady to her maiden aunt. "Well, for my part, sooner than do that I would marry a widower with nine children."

"I would prefer that myself," was the quiet reply; "but where's the widower?"

A SUBJECT FOR TRIUMPH.

"What have you been Crying for, George?"

"'Coth Mamma wouldn't give me a Thpunge-Cake, 'coth I've got a Thrummach-Ache!"

"Ah ha! I've got a 'Punge-Cake and a 'Tummach-Ache too!"

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 46.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

GENTLEMAN'S DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN), AND LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S DRESSES.—[SEE PAGE 722.]

[Cut Paper Patterns of Gentleman's Dressing-Gown and Smoking-Cap, in twelve Sizes, from 28 to 50 Inches, Chest Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Digitized by Google

dark gray gros grain, trimmed with a flounce edged with small square pieces of the material set on by one point, folds, and ruches. Cashmere casaque and basque-waist.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1871.

HARPER'S WEEKLY contains ONE-THIRD more Reading Matter, a larger number of Illustrations, and is conspicuously better Edited and Printed than any other Illustrated Newspaper.

☞ Persons desiring to renew their Subscriptions to HARPER'S PERIODICALS will much oblige the Publishers by sending in their Names as early as convenient BEFORE THE EXPIRATION OF THEIR PRESENT SUBSCRIPTIONS. This will obviate the delay attendant upon re-entering names and mailing back Numbers.

For Terms, etc., see Advertisement on page 735.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the elegant Gentleman's Dressing-Gown and Smoking-Cap, illustrated on the first page of the present Number, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents and Chest Measure. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 735. Dealers supplied on the usual discount.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain an extra-sized Pattern Sheet, with a rich variety of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Ladies' and Children's Knitted and Crocheted Shawls, Capes, Mantelets, Jackets, Sacques, Fichus, Hoods, Petticoats, Cuffs, Gloves, Shoes, etc.; Winter Street and House Dresses and Wrappings, etc., etc.

FLIRTATION.

THE question arises, Where does flirtation end, and love begin? and how is one to know the real thing apart from the semblance? Is flirtation the symptom and love the disease? and how is sweet simplicity to know and make the distinction? Beauty comes from school into society. She has heard about this affair called love; she has read novels and poems that hinged upon it. Then it must be a divine reality; it must be the exponent of a passion of the soul. She has read, and imagined as well, the way in which it expresses itself. By-and-by she meets the Fairy Prince at some rout or summer resort; they exchange glances, they dance together, they walk on the beach or in the wood and sentimentalize; he repeats poetry, emphasized by stolen looks, and perhaps a pressure of the unresisting hand; he wears her ring upon his little finger, begs her photograph, or sketches her profile for himself, and embroiders his small-talk with sunbeams of the most delicate flattery. The long summer evenings grow brief, leaning upon his arm beneath the unreproving stars; they have so much to say to each other that they can never be too much alone; and yet, after all, they do not so much use words as speaking glances and hesitating caresses. Naturally Beauty reads a meaning in these things, slight in themselves if isolated, but significant through frequent repetition—the wrong meaning, if you please; but how do these tones and words, "a thought too tender," translate into the vernacular? Why this solicitude lest the night dews harm her? Is she more delicate than a flower? Why these lingering hand-clasps, this absorption in her society? If they mean any thing, it must be love; and she has perhaps never dreamed of that Dead Sea fruit called flirtation. One day the Fairy Prince makes a sentimental adieu, hopes to meet her again, kisses his hand from the door-way, and as the curtain falls the lights are shut off, and all is over. "What a flirtation you and the Fairy Prince have had!" cries Beauty's friends, who are skilled in the tactics.

"Then this was only a flirtation," sighs Beauty; "I should never have suspected it; but at least it will be convenient for the future to understand the nature of a flirtation!" And the next prince who comes that way will find her able to play her part and out-Herod Herod. But can no one be forearmed? Must every one shrivel in the fire in order to guess the nature of flame, in order to separate the dross from the precious metal? Yet suspicion is such a breach of courtesy; and don't both flirtation and intention wear the same general aspects, begin with the same blandishments, lead on through the same delightful labyrinths? Presently, to be sure, the path diverges; but who is wise enough to tell at the beginning which brings up at a blind alley, which "shows like a broken stair that winds round a ruined palace, and never will lead any where," or which pursues its way through flowers and sunshine to the hymeneal altar? What an outsider calls "just a little simple flirting in order to pass the time," may be the first chassèz in the grand minuet, or it may be only a dress rehearsal, a little balancing and bowing forward and back, ladies' chain, and cast-off; but who can predict of any of these posturings whether they are folderol or feeling?

"But, on the whole," I hear some one say, "flirtation is a pleasant pastime: if it were to go out of fashion, I'm afraid that society would lose much of its impetus: it sweetens commonplaces, and the silliest nothings become eloquence in its enchanted atmosphere. And though some should suffer in the game by reason of inexperience or sensitiveness, shall the many be sacrificed for the benefit of the few?" But is it not a sacrifice to be insincere? to say pretty things because they are pretty, not because they are true? to swear fealty with your eyes, and keep silent with your lips? Is it not a sacrifice of honesty of purpose, of single-heartedness? "You might, at least," cries Shallow, "allow a fellow a little fun. I suppose he mustn't look at a pretty face unless he's ready to propose; he mustn't go home with a girl, to save her; and it would be a sin to ask her to sail. I say, what's a fellow to do with his evenings and his odd moments?"

"Satan finds some mischief still for idle folks to do;" and Shallow might do worse than take the girls out on the river, provided he doesn't persuade any one that he is in love when he is merely amusing himself; for love is as dangerous a plaything as fire: it is more inflammable than nitro-glycerine; and many a man has married the wrong woman, simply because a foolish flirtation has carried him beyond the point of honorable retreat; and many a woman has worn a life-long scar because a fascinating youth preferred her for a brief season, and then forgot his preference.

There are some idle beings, no doubt, who pass their leisure in a perpetual carnival of flirtation, "no sooner off with the old love than they are on with the new;" who, having exhausted their acquaintances, turn their batteries upon total strangers met in traveling; people who flirt in the cars with Tom, Dick, and Harry—with the clerks over a counter—who flirt right and left, with gray-beards and school-boys, till silver hairs and crow's-feet threaten the finale. One might imagine that the griefs that weave a crown of thorns for us each as the years go on might clothe love with such divinity that it would seem sacrilege to counterfeit the blessed reality; but so long as men and women are given in marriage society will, doubtless, be spiced with flirtation, and sweethearts will be left in doubt whether the tender assurances of their Corydons—read in an eye-beam, in the embrace of clasping fingers, in the silent selection that announces itself by a tone, a smile, a gesture—are the expressions of the heart's aspiration, or the unhappy impulses of the moment.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Palimpsests.

MY DEAR EUSTACE,—The other day, after reading an interesting account of a palimpsest, I was taken by a friend to see some writing revealed by heat, and I walked afterward in the Park reflecting upon what I had read and seen. Perhaps you have forgotten that palimpsest is the name given to a manuscript upon which the original writing is covered by a later scripture; while invisible writing is produced by some acid, and reveals itself only when exposed to great warmth. When I saw it I remembered vaguely that, as a boy, I used to work similar miracles with lemon juice. It requires extraordinary skill to decipher the lower layer of writing upon the palimpsest, but it is sometimes done; and a little friendly heat has often betrayed the secret which was committed to blank paper. But how many unread palimpsests there must be in the world! What treasures of wit and wisdom are piled quite unsuspected upon the dusty shelves of old libraries! Yes, and under the written treasures that we see, what more precious treasures are hidden!

I raised my eyes, as I mused, and saw a palimpsest coming toward me. It was not of the usual form; indeed, it had the semblance of a man, and was, in fact, no other than Ignotus, who is one of the persons most familiar to every body in town. He saw me at the same moment, and accosted me in the most smiling manner; and was so glad to see me that I really felt ashamed of my apparent want of ardor in greeting him. As he spoke and smiled I could not help certain reflections, and I am very sorry if they were ungenerous. A habit of suspicion is not my fault, and I am notoriously easily deceived. But with my mind bent upon palimpsests and writing over other writing, I looked at his handsome coat and waistcoat, his clean linen and bright boots, and I wondered if under that well-starched bosom there might possibly be a ragged and unclean under-shirt, and if the socks under those boots required perchance any ministry of the darning needle! And still further my reckless mind pushed on and asked whether the personal cleanliness corresponded with the clean clothes and the bright boots.

For how often as boys and young men, and as travelers who hide no secrets from each other, have we not all learned that the outside wrapper of a man is of a costlier kind than the inside, and that a royal robe may be worn over a foul hair-cloth, or superb brocade over disease. Overwritten so fairly, I said to myself as I looked at Ignotus, what is written under? The outer and evident scripture is that of a pleasant, friendly, clean, and honest man. But the inner—what is that? If you ask me why I wondered, why I was not content to accept what I saw, I can not answer. I only know that a palimpsest is always suspected by the expert's eye, and that in many men there is something that challenges curiosity or suspicion, we know not why. Why did the philosopher gaze so steadfastly at the beautiful Lamia? Have philosophers no manners? I know not; but I know that philosopher had eyes that looked from his soul into hers.

And still, as Ignotus strolled and chattered at my side, a palimpsest which yet I could suspect or even know, although I might not read, I forgot the first aspect—the possible discrepancy between the under and the outer clothes—and began to perceive a still deeper and more subtile resemblance to the palimpsests in the Oriental libraries. For a drinking song, or a love song, or a passionate romance, may be written over a philosophical treatise—yes, and over a gospel. Even the exquisite story of Matthew might have been overwritten by the heresies that vexed the earlier church, and, on the other hand, a song of the Bacchantes by a martyr's confession. And so under the gay tone and ready smile of Ignotus I could feel rather than plainly comprehend a sneering cynicism, a cold distrust, until the air seemed bewitched, and I should not have been surprised to smell brimstone or to see a shadowy hoof in the place of one of those bright, dapper boots. When he spoke of certain men whom we all know and respect and love, there was a nameless insinuation of ill motives, a half-hinted doubt of honesty, a kind of contemptuous incredulity of their purpose and purity, which made me feel as if the neat boot had suddenly split and exposed a ragged sock, or as if the handsome coat had parted and revealed unclean linen. Ignotus is a palimpsest. His essential meanness and misanthropy are covered with the characters of gayety and courtesy. The first and deep scripture of his sordid and suspicious soul is overwritten by an appearance of frankness and geniality.

As he left me, and I walked on alone in the Park, I was like one of the old monks, who, strolling in the convent garden, reads a manuscript from the library, and thinking to pore in the placid sunshine and the sweet air over a written hymn or a recorded prayer, finds to his horror that beneath the fair characters that salute his eye there is a darker, a doubtful and disgusting writing, which forces itself through the other, and fills his mind with base and lascivious images. Then I understood the feeling of the philosopher of whom I spoke. Not the radiant beauty of the Lamia, nor the graceful motion, nor the gay wit, nor the brilliant gems and gorgeous robe, could conceal the loathsome serpent that lay coiled under all. Horrible palimpsest! It was a writing of human beauty; but the terrible eye saw steadily through all the familiar letters the fatal character of the snake. I was not deceived then, nor was it a mere whim of my preoccupied fancy that I saw a palimpsest in Ignotus, and that I could not help reading it.

But while I was thinking of the infinite variety and the mystery of all our fellow-travelers, I heard my name called quietly just as I was stepping into one of the pretty boats to take a turn upon the lake, and I recognized Colin, whom I had not seen for many a month. I am not sure that you know him, but you may have heard his name. Like Browning's Waring, he long ago gave all his old comrades the slip, and, like Milton's shepherd, has hied to fresh fields and pastures new. One by one his friends have turned away from him in wonder and sorrow. The things that once were dear to him, and precious to all the table round of his youthful peers, are now his jest and scorn. The high ideal, whose fading in the mind and heart is the dying out of the celestial glory with which we come into the world, seems for him as if it had never been. Often and often, unable to join in the chorus of censure, and equally unable to explain its occasion, have I wondered what mocking fate had seemingly touched with ice a heart so generous and warm, and chained to a scavenger's cart a steed born for the chariot of the sun.

Digitized by Google

He put out his hand, and I shook the hand of the old Colin whom I knew, and as I touched it I touched a thousand inspiring and tender associations. He smiled as freshly as ever, and chaffed, as you young men say, as gayly. He said that he should go with me upon the water; and there was no pause in the pleasant strain of his talk. As we glided out upon the pretty lake he joked and laughed, but seemed unwilling to pause lest I should ask some question, or say some word he did not care to hear. On he went ridiculing men and things, as if every thing were a jest, and character and life and death, honesty and purity and principle, were equally absurd. "The world owes us all a living," he said, "and why should we let knaves shove us to the wall? We must take things as they are, and fight fire with fire. Those who call others rascals are themselves rascally; and believe me, Bachelor, the wives of saints are not so sure of their husbands' sanctity. Good wine is made for those who can enjoy it, and I mean to have my quaff, and not let destiny be cheated, who did not mean me to be the under dog. 'Tis a jolly world, and men are fools who refuse to enjoy. I read my Horace still, good Bachelor, and use for my own pleasure and my own profit the men whom I despise as much as you, but who are no more despicable than those who despise them! I open my oyster of the world: vive la bagatelle!"

It was another palimpsest. One had left me in the Ramble, and another had joined me upon the lake. What has changed him so? has long been the question of Colin's friends. Good friends, he is not changed. That earlier hymn of faith and courage and aspiration is overwritten with this superficial bacchanal chorus, that is all. This is only what appears, and the grave and friendly naturally turn painfully away. But beneath are the old lines, indelible, the lines of youth and the fresh soul of man. The later does not obliterate the earlier script, although it may wholly conceal it. The song with which the reeling circle rings is read from the roll upon which the matin prayer is still perfectly inscribed, although unsuspected. My dear Eustace, be slow in utter censure as in wrath. Look into yourself and see how complex, how inconsistent, you are—yes, we all are. If we could be read through and through, if every character that lurks under every letter that is legible upon our surfaces were as plainly seen as those letters, with what a sorry set of palimpsests the great library of the world would seem to be stored! I do not ask you to pretend to enjoy the ribald joke as you do the hymn of an inward melody, but reflect only that beneath the joke the hymn is yet perfectly written.

I said that as I parted with Ignotus I remembered the old Greek philosopher who, under the human beauty, saw the deadly snake. Will you not be the American philosopher who, under the seeming snake, perceives the human nature? My dear Eustace, if Circe saw the gluttons of Ulysses to be swine, did not Beauty see the Beast to be a prince royal? They were both palimpsests: but in one the baser strain was overwritten with the better; in the other, the better with the baser. It was not a mere conceit, it was an intelligible sympathy with life, that made Burns—a costly palimpsest!—wish that auld Nickie-ben might tak' a thought and men'. Even he is not wholly bad. "The dear old devil not far off," says Emerson. And surely Milton's Satan is the proudest and truest Satan of all: a noble nature fallen—the celestial scripture overwritten with hate and scorn.

I have said nothing to-day of the invisible writing, dear Eustace: my mind and heart have been full enough with the palimpsests. Another time, if you care for it, we can see whether the writing that only shows in the heat is a writing with which we are familiar. My memory goes back to the turn upon the lake with Colin, and peers curiously at that palimpsest. There are old men, you know, who, taken captive in their childhood, live all their life among alien races speaking another tongue. Their own country and language are as if they had never been. But when death touches the old sojourner in a strange land which has become his own, his fading eyes see freshly and perfect his long-forgotten native home, and his failing tongue whispers the language that he did not know he knew. The gospel was all there, Eustace; it was only overwritten. The boy Colin that I knew is overwritten with the man Colin that I see. But the boy is there unchanged, and as the light of a nearer heaven shines upon him, he will appear. Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

GENTLEMEN'S STYLES.

GENTLEMEN'S DRESSING-GOWNS.

THE wardrobe of most gentlemen contains some kind of a coat especially for in-door wear, called promiscuously a breakfast or smoking jacket, library sack, or dressing-gown. This garment is a favorite holiday gift from a lady to a gentleman, and its value is enhanced when it is the work of the donor's hands; hence we give a cut paper pattern of it to assist our readers in their preparations for the approaching gift season. Our design is the best model for all such garments—viz., a simple sack with a seam in the middle of the back. Those who prefer very jaunty short jackets must have them slightly shorter than that in our illustration, while regular dressing-gowns, or those for invalids, are a quarter of a yard longer, and worn with a cord and tassel. Thick English velveteen, either black, brown, or very dark green, is the fashionable fabric for smoking and billiard jackets. It costs $2 50 a yard, and four yards are required. Black velveteen sacks have the collar and cuffs of blue or scarlet silk, quilted in small diamonds, while a cord of the same color edges the garment and trims the pockets; for brown and green velveteen the facings are silk of the same shade. Tailors line the entire coat with farmer's satin or thin twilled silk, but all-wool delaine or opera flannel of the color of the silk facing is preferred by many. A thin sheet of wadding is placed about the shoulders, back and front. Velveteen in cashmere colors is shown for these jackets; also light qualities of ladies' cloth or light cassimere, either solid color or in small, broken plaids, of dark brown or gray shades. For regular dressing-gowns are figured cashmeres, empress cloths, and solid-colored merinoes of quiet, sober colors that need the relief of gay facings. The last cost $1 or $1 25 a yard. Some tartan gowns are made of heavy all-wool plaid, especially the dark blue and green Forty-second plaid, with bright scarlet facings and cord and tassel. Handsome brocaded silk gowns of India colors in cashmere designs cost from $40 to $75; velveteen jackets, made by a tailor, from $40 to $55; and dark plaid cassimere jackets, with collar and cuffs of scarlet or blue honey-comb cloth, are from $22 50 to $25.

BUSINESS SUITS.

Heavy, rough-looking fabrics and striped cassimeres are chosen for business suits, smooth cloths being reserved for more dressy occasions. Black and white together, or else stripes, are used. The stripe is merely a pencil line, or else of too faint a color to be conspicuous. The entire suit, coat, vest, and pantaloons, is made from the same piece. The coat is a short double-breasted pea-jacket, with square fronts; or, if this is considered too jaunty, a double-breasted Newmarket coat, with fronts well cut away and pockets with flaps. The vest may be either double-breasted, fastened by three buttons, or else single-breasted, buttoning very high, and without a collar. The pantaloons are easy-fitting, larger than those lately worn, and with considerable spring at the ankle. Such a suit, made to order of fine goods, costs $80; of Scotch goods, $70 or $75.

The overcoat worn with business suits is a medium long sack of heavy "Elysian," or else fur beaver. A new cloth for these coats is a velvet beaver with diagonal twill. Black or blue overcoats are most worn. Olives, blue mixtures, and various dark shades are provided for gay young men. The velvet collar and cuffs are of the same shade as the cloth.

SEMI-DRESS SUITS.

The semi-dress suit is worn when making calls, at church, concerts, matinées, and at any private entertainment, such as quiet weddings, dinners, and day receptions, where full dress is not de rigueur. The coat is black or blue broadcloth, double-breasted, and rather longer in the skirt than that worn last season. A vest of the same material as the coat is furnished with such suits, but a white vest is often worn instead. The pale lavender pantaloons are of thick cloth. This is the English suit about which correspondents so often inquire. The overcoat is an English surtout of plain dark beaver or Melton. Fashionably made overcoats, either fine fur beaver sacks, or the plain beaver surtouts, cost from $75 to $95.

FULL-DRESS SUITS.

For balls, large weddings, gay receptions, dinner-parties, and the opera, full-dress suits are required. These are usually of black broadcloth throughout, though white corded silk vests are adopted by many. There is no change in the shape of the swallow-tailed dress-coat. The vest is single-breasted, with rolling collar, very low cut, to display much of the shirt front. Pantaloons are quite close-fitting. The white neck-tie, almost invariably worn now for full-dress, is lawn or silk, folded about an inch wide, with daintily embroidered ends. It is passed around the neck and tied in a small bow. The collar is the English standing shape, almost meeting in front, with the tips of the points slightly turned over, as if done by accident, instead of being pressed down flatly. Very light drab or pale brown sacks are the full-dress overcoats. They are of fine thick cloth, with broad velvet collar and facing, and are lined throughout with twilled silk. They cost from $65 to $75. Gloves for the opera and full-dress concerts are palest lavender kid; white gloves are reserved for weddings, dancing parties, and other private entertainments.

HATS.

The silk hat, worn alike for semi-dress, promenading, and with business suits, is slightly lower, the height of the crown being six and an eighth inches. This crown is bell-shaped all around, hatters say, and the narrow brim, but two inches wide, is turned over very heavily on the sides, but is not much rolled. Price $9. The newest hat for business and general wear is the Grand Duke, of soft felt, with high square crown and narrow brim: price $5. This is taking the place of the Alpine, with sunken crown, which has become common. Stiff-crowned Derbys, with narrow brim, are also worn. The most stylish opera-hat is the English crush hat, of ribbed silk, shaped like a tall silk beaver, and provided with springs inside to make it crush flatly, that it may be carried under the arm in an opera-box or drawing-room: price $9 to $12 for hats of domestic manufacture. In lieu of these many gentlemen use soft hats or caps of light cloth, with the brims stiffened only by cords, so that they may be folded and thrust in the pocket. The fashionable fur caps will be seal-skin turbans, and black Persian lamb caps of various shapes.

Rolling collars of fur seal and of fine otter, fur seal vests, and dog-skin gloves with fur wristlets, are midwinter comforts displayed for gentlemen by the hatters and furriers.

JEWELRY.

Cameo jewelry, especially the sardonyx, with the carved figure showing a white layer of the stone, is in favor for gentlemen. The pins worn in the scarf are large oval medallions. Scarf rings have similar medallions of cameo. Studs are large buttons, rich and massive, but plain, with spiral fastenings. Sleeve-buttons are large and square. The new green-tinted gold is being worn by gentlemen.

In jet jewelry there are many new patterns, both for ladies and gentlemen. The real Whitby jet should always be selected, as it is much lighter and more comfortable to wear than any other kind. This is especially true as regards ladies' ear-rings.

For information received thanks are due, for gentlemen's fashions, to Messrs. W. R. BOWNE; BROOKS BROTHERS; DANIEL D. YOUMANS; and UNION ADAMS; and for jewelry to HOWARD & Co.

PERSONAL.

MR. SYLVESTER MOWRY, who died a few days since in London, was a graduate of the Military Academy at West Point, and served for some time in the army. He was one of the first to discover and make known to the public the auriferous wealth of Arizona, and was a frequent contributor to the press on subjects connected with the mineral resources of that region. A very interesting work of his—"Arizona and Sonora"—was published by HARPER & BROTHERS. He was a man of great persistence, of indomitable personal courage, generous to a fault, and was held in high esteem by the adventurous people of the Territory to which he was so greatly attached.

—It is only a few weeks since that in this column honorable mention was made of Mr. THEODORIC B. PRYOR, a son of General ROGER A. PRYOR. It is now a melancholy duty to announce his sudden decease by drowning. It was only a year ago that young Mr. PRYOR graduated at Princeton with higher honors than had ever before been won in that institution by the most distinguished of its alumni. After that he went to Cambridge, in England, where he won a high prize in mathematics. He was a very gifted and in every respect most admirable young gentleman, who gave promise of a brilliant future, and whose early and unexpected decease is far more than a mere domestic calamity.

—Colonel LEWIS W. WASHINGTON, recently deceased, possessed a valuable collection of relics of WASHINGTON, among which was an elegant sword from FREDERICK the Great, with the inscription, "From the oldest general in the world to the greatest."

—Mr. JOHN R. THOMPSON, the poet, for many years editor of the Southern Literary Messenger, and at present on the editorial staff of the New York Evening Post, is the New York correspondent of the London Standard. His letters to that journal are among the very best sent from New York to London.

—One seldom reads among religious notices a "personal" like this: "The Right Honorable the Earl of Kintore preached in St. Peter's Free Church, Dundee, on Sunday, from the text, 'A time to get, a time to lose, a time to keep, and a time to cast away.'"

—Sir JULIUS BENEDICT, who was one of the JENNY LIND troupe in this country, has recently had conferred upon him, by the King of Portugal, the "Order of Christ." The Portuguese monarch is given to music, and plays the violoncello with royal vigor and skill. In the choicest morceaux of PETRELLI, and in "Old Rosin the Bow," he is equally felicitous.

—Notwithstanding the "short, sharp, decisive" way in which Judge M'KEAN is dealing with the polygamous people in his district, BRIGHAM YOUNG still maintains a steadfast faith in the imm-Utah-bility of Mormonism.

—Western humor was as lively as ever, even amidst the ruins of Chicago. Colonel WOOD has erected a rough board on the spot where his museum stood, on which is inscribed: "Col. Wood's Museum. Standing-room only. R. Marsh, Treasurer." During the height of the fire Mrs. JOE JEFFERSON presented her husband with a child, and they are all right. Mrs. LANDER was at the Sherman House, and enacted the new rôle of portress by dragging away with her own hands her own trunk. Just beyond the Museum, and opposite the ruins of the Court-house, stood Bryan's Fidelity Safe Depository. The building was destroyed and the walls leveled; but within the ruins the vaults and their contents were found intact. The fact is announced on a small board, with rude lettering, as follows: "Fidelity Safe Depository—all safe. Call and receive your money and deposits in perfect order." On a ruin in Madison Street is a sign reading, "Owing to circumstances over which we had no control, we have removed."

—Fifty thousand dollars and expenses is the tempting offer made to Miss KELLOGG to go to California and sing for twenty-eight nights. When Artemus Ward received from a theatrical speculator in San Francisco a telegram asking, "What will you take for fifty nights?" the laughing philosopher telegraphed back, "Brandy and water."

—General SHERMAN is going to Europe to see how military folk do it. He proposes to peer into the armies of various countries, and see if he can find out any thing that will add to the efficiency of the mighty warriors of our own sanguinary establishment.

—Mrs. LLOYD, daughter-in-law of the Bristol County Court judge, has received $50,000 compensation from the Greek government for the murder of her husband by the brigands at Marathon.

—Colonel WHEELER, who succeeds Professor MAHAN as Professor of Engineering at West Point, is a young man who has seen much service, and stands among the foremost men of his corps. He is said to be a natural engineer; born with faculties which made it impossible that he should follow any other profession—uniting both scientific ability and learning with a gift of explaining what he knows to others that is pronounced to be unsurpassed.

—EDMOND ABOUT receives the largest salary at present paid to any French journalist—viz., eight thousand dollars a year. EMILE DE GIRARDIN receives five thousand dollars a year for writing daily one column of editorial matter in the Liberté.

—COTTA, of Stuttgart, has published a complete German translation of SPINOZA'S works, which is preceded by a very full life and critical estimate of that great retrospective thinker, from the pen of B. AUERBACH.

—Elongated JOHN WENTWORTH, of Chicago, was stopping at the Sherman House when the fire occurred. He put some things in carpet-bag and fled. He lost much building on La-salle Street, but has a couple of millions or so left on which to rough it.

—The Rev. WILLIAM BELL WHITE HOWE, recently consecrated Assistant Bishop of South Carolina, was classically known, when in college, as Gulielmus Tintinnabulus Candidus Quomodo—a pleasing name.

—Lord Lytton, whose "King Arthur" has been recently republished by HARPER & BROTHERS, is a tall, florid man, with a slight stoop in his back, and long grayish beard. He is an incessant smoker, indulging in the luxury of a Turkish pipe even when engaged in writing.

—It is quite probable that Mr. SOTHERN and Mr. JEFFERSON will soon appear together in New York at a dramatic performance to be given for the benefit of the Chicago sufferers. To the gentleman who suggested it Mr. SOTHERN promptly expressed the delight he would have in joining his old friend in so good a work. Mr. SOTHERN'S farewell performance in London at the Haymarket Theatre is spoken of in the London journals as being one of the most notable things of its kind ever witnessed in that metropolis—from one to five guineas being paid for seats, and every foot of standing-room being occupied, and the audience, including not merely rank and fashion, but the brightest intellectual men and women of the metropolis.

—Mr. WILLIAM HOWARD RUSSELL has begun in the Army and Navy Gazette the publication of his personal diary of the late war between France and Prussia.

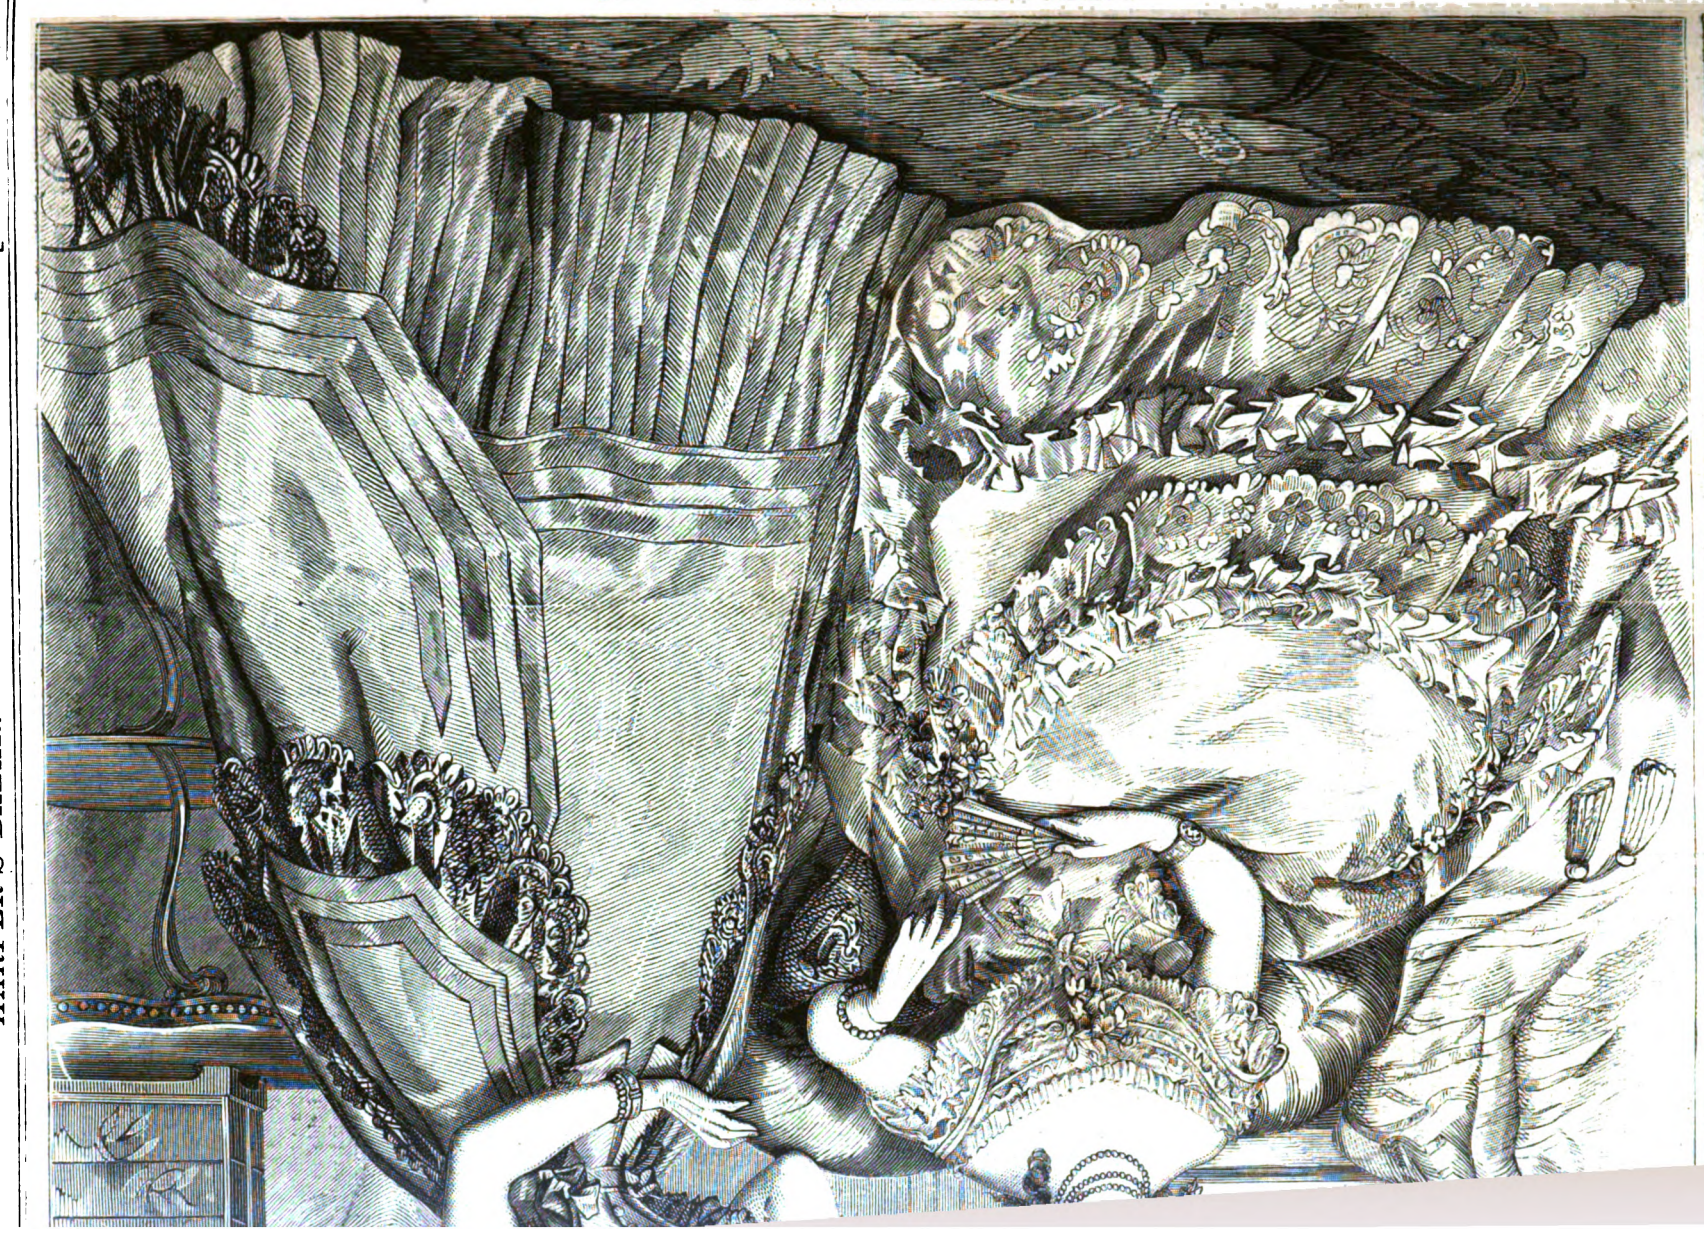
—Fire does try people. Perhaps the principal sufferer, as he was the most indomitable builder, in Chicago, was POTTER PALMER. He went there many years ago, and, by the favor of A. T. STEWART, became the leading dry-goods merchant. During the war his gains were enormous, and he retired from active business at the close of it, placing his two salesmen, FIELD and LEITER, and his brother in his stead. He is a tall man, with reddish cropped whiskers and brown hair, weighing about 165 pounds, with a keen, shrewdish business face. Not long ago he married Miss HONORE, whose father was also a celebrated decorator of the city. She had been called the most lovely girl in the West, and was probably some twenty years his junior.

—That good Chinaman, Ah Sin, of San Francisco, without suggestion from any one, sent to the Chicago sufferers his check for $1000. Yet the wicked Christians of San Francisco are generally pestering the heathen Chinee, and trying to get him out of the country.

—One of the chattiest and most entertaining of those who write letters from New York to the provincial press is "Burleigh." In his latest screed to the Boston Journal he tells how the higher order of gentlemen and lady Christians of New York do not attend the fashionable places of worship. Saith he: "A run round among the churches of a pleasant Sunday afternoon, where the music is superb, and the repute of the preacher national, would astonish a stranger. One or two men secure a good afternoon audience. Dr. JOHN HALL has a large attendance. If it was known that Dr. ORMISTON was to preach, his house would be full after dinner. But nearly every other church in New York will be found nearly empty. The elegant chapel of Trinity Church, with full choral service, will be open to about fifty people. The marble and brown-stone Collegiate churches will have a hundred each. In Dr. ADAMS'S church, where a pew can not be had at any price, where the morning congregation is full twelve hundred, three hundred would be a large assembly. I looked in last Sunday at the new and very elegant Baptist church just thrown open on Park Avenue, with a large morning audience. Even the newness of the place and its attractions could secure but a small company to occupy the centre aisle. The gaping galleries, with seats for four hundred, contained twenty persons. Bishop SOUTHGATE is a very popular preacher. He has a fashionable congregation in a fashionable locality. The finest artists conduct his music. At a concert such performances would be cheap at fifty cents a ticket. Yet his afternoon congregation does not number a hundred, though every seat is free. Dr. PRENTICE, of the Church of the Covenant, is ranked as one of the best preachers of the city. No Presbyterian church in the State has so elegant a property. It is worth not less than a quarter of a million. His audience in the morning is large, rich, and fashionable. In the afternoon it is so sparse that it seems like boy's play to conduct service before such a handful. St. Thomas's Church, the most magnificent Episcopal church in New York, with music, under the lead of WARREN, that is unsurpassed, has an afternoon audience that must mortify the eloquent rector. These are specimens of the churches of our city."

Digitized by Google

LADIES' EVENING TOILETTES.—[SEE PAGE 736.]



LADY'S VISITING TOILETTE.—[SEE PAGE 736.]

Digitized by Google

Lady's Visiting Toilette.

See illustration on page 724.

THIS sumptuous toilette is composed of a demi-trained skirt of rich black velvet, trimmed round the bottom and up the front with two rows of deep violet silk, set on in straight bands with Gothic points at intervals of half a yard. A black velvet basque, with hanging and close sleeves, trimmed with violet silk to match the skirt, completes the costume. The distinguishing feature of the basque is the antique pleated standing collar of black velvet, edged with violet ribbon, which encircles the back of the neck, and under which is worn a jabot collar of fine lace, confined in front with an amethyst brooch. Black velvet bonnet, with violet silk ribbon and aigrette of black ostrich plumes. Straw-colored gloves.

The bias folds of the over-skirt extend up so as to pass over the shoulder. Sash with a bow on each side.

Ladies' Street and House Dresses.

Fig. 1.—BLACK GROS GRAIN DRESS AND BASQUE. Demi-trained skirt without trimming. Deep basque, slashed in the back and at the sides, and trimmed with wide and narrow black guipure lace, a gros grain ruffle pleated through the middle, and a passementerie border. The seam made by sewing on the ruche is covered by a gros grain fold.

Fig. 2.—DARK BROWN GROS GRAIN DRESS, trimmed on the bottom with a wide side-pleated flounce. Loose sacque with mantle of brown beaver, trimmed with fringe of the same color and a passementerie border. Brown velvet bonnet, with black lace and brown feathers.

THE SPHINX.

MUTILATED, defaced by the lances and arrows of Arabs, whose religion teaches them to abhor all images of men or animals—mocked at by vulgar sight-seers and flippant travel-makers, some of whose own statements are rather less worthy of credence, or, at any rate, of study, than the very fables they deride—the Sphinx still reposes in the desert a majesty and a mystery.

The Egyptian Sphinx is the figure of an unwinged lion, the upper part of the head and body being human; it was frequently used to form avenues to temples and other sacred buildings.

The Greek Sphinx differs from the Egyptian in being winged, though retaining the lion's paws, and is frequently varied, both in form and attitude, according to the fancy of the sculptor or poet. Sometimes the face only is human, sometimes the upper part of the body also; occasionally the lion's claws are replaced by those of a vulture, and the wings of an eagle are added, or the tail of a serpent.

The Sphinx is almost invariably represented as a woman, and most of the legends respecting this mysterious monster bear out the supposition, though some authors treat of it as the Androsphinx, or man-headed Sphinx, and speak of it in the masculine gender. Herodotus says that the Egyptians had also their Androsphinges, half lion, half man. The most remarkable representation of the Egyptian Sphinx is that of Ghizeh, or El Geezeh, which stands to the east of, and is slightly smaller than the second Pyramid; and some say 125, some 188 feet in length. It is hewn out of a natural eminence of solid rock; the legs, however, are added in masonry, and some defects of shape are supplied in like manner. There are steps leading up its front to a sanctuary and tablets; but these are partially covered by the sand, which, as often as it is removed, is swept back by the wind, and speedily fills up the hollow. The head was formerly the only portion uncovered; but through the exertions and at the expense of some European gentlemen, much of the accumulation was cleared away. It is placed in the necropolis of Memphis, and is one of the most wonderful of all the strange monuments there. The nearest part of the desert was usually chosen as a burying-ground by the inhabitants and monarchs of Egyptian cities, and hence the situation of the Pyramids, or tombs of the kings.

Memphis, the city to which the necropolis appertained, was founded by the kings of Thebes, and soon eclipsed even the latter city with its hundred gates in splendor; but it declined after the founding of Alexandria, whither a large portion of its population migrated. Its remains stand on the western bank of the Nile, about ten miles from Cairo. The Sphinx had been sent into the neighborhood of Thebes by Juno, who wished to punish the family of Cadmus (its rulers). It proposed enigmas, and devoured the inhabitants if unable to explain them. In the midst of their consternation the Thebans were told by the oracle that the Sphinx would destroy herself as soon as one of the enigmas which she proposed was explained. In this enigma she asked what animal walked on four legs in the morning, on two at noon, and three in the evening. Creon, King of Thebes, promised his crown and his sister Jocasta in marriage to any one who could deliver his country from the monster by solving the enigma. It was explained by

LADIES' STREET AND HOUSE DRESSES.

Ladies' Evening Toilettes.

See Illustrations on page 724.

Fig. 1.—White muslin trained skirt, trimmed with a flounce of white lace, set on plain, and surmounted by a white muslin ruche hemmed on each side and pleated through the middle. Over-skirt of white muslin, trimmed in the same manner, and draped at each side under a spray of pomegranate blossoms. Low waist, with a bertha forming basques, composed of puffings of white muslin and white lace. Pomegranate blossoms are worn at the waist and in the hair.

Fig. 2.—Trained skirt of very light lilac silk gauze, trimmed with a pleated flounce surmounted by two bias folds. Over-skirt open in front, and trimmed with three bias folds and a black lace flounce. Deep basque, trimmed like the over-skirt. Low waist, with basque in front.

Fig. 3.—GRAY MERINO WALKING SUIT. The skirt and the over-skirt, which is long in the back, are trimmed with ruffles and folds of the material, as shown by the illustration. The basque-waist, which is furnished with revers, is trimmed in a similar manner. Bonnet of gray velvet.

Fig. 4.—DRESS OF VIOLET SILK WITH A WIDE SIDE-PLEATED FLOUNCE. Black gros grain basque, trimmed with wide black guipure lace and grelot fringe, and entirely covered with braiding of black silk round cord.

Fig. 5.—WALKING SUIT OF GARNET POPLIN. The skirt is edged on the bottom with a side-pleated flounce headed by an upright ruffle and a row of narrow lace. The seam made by sewing on the ruffle and lace, as well as the flounce, is covered by a wide fold. The over-skirt and paletot are trimmed with a fold, lace, and ruffle.

Digitized by Google

(Œdipus, who replied that man walked on his hands and feet when young, in the morning of life, at the noon of life walked erect, and in the evening of his days supported his limbs with a stick. The Sphinx no sooner heard this reply than she dashed her head against a rock, and immediately expired.

THE LIFE-LEDGER.

Our sufferings we reckon o'er
With skill minute and formal;
The cheerful ease that fills the score
We treat as merely normal.
Our list of ills, how full, how great!
We mourn our lot should fall so.
I wonder do we calculate
Our happinesses also?

Were it not best to keep account
Of all days, if of any?
Perhaps the dark ones might amount
To not so very many.
Men's looks are nigh as often gay
As sad, or even solemn:
Behold, my entry for to-day
Is in the "happy" column.

HANNAH.

A Novel.

By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."

CHAPTER XV.

Alone, in a foreign land, with only a child for company and a servant for protection—this, in the strange vicissitudes of Hannah's life, was her position now. Accidentally, rather than intentionally, for Lady Dunsmore had taken all care of her, and meant her to be met at Paris by Madame Arthenay, the lady to whom she sent her, and who, with herself, was the accomplice of Hannah's running away.

For she had literally "run away"—by not only the concurrence, but the compulsion of her faithful friend, who saw that the strain was growing too hard to bear. Living within reach of Bernard's visits, which were half a joy and half a dread, exposed to the continual gossip of Eastcrham—since, though the Moat House had entirely "cut" her, some of the other houses did not, but continued by letter a patronizing kindness most irritating—above all, suffering a painful inner warfare as to how far she was right in allowing Bernard to come and see her, since every time he came the cruel life of suspense he led seemed more and more to be making him—not merely wretched, but something worse; all these trials, in course of time, did their work upon even the strong heart and healthy frame of Hannah Thelluson.

"You are breaking down," said the countess, when one day toward the summer's end she came to take her young folks home. "This can not last. You must do as I once suggested—go quite away."

"I can not!" said Hannah, faintly smiling. "He would not let me." For she felt herself gradually succumbing to Bernard's impetuous will, and to the strength of a passion unto which impediments seemed to have given a force and persistency that had changed his whole character.

"Not let you go away? The tyrant! Men are all tyrants, you know. Very well. Then you must run away."

"He will follow me—as he once said he should—wherever I went."

"Indeed! Quite right of him. Still, as I object to tyranny, and as you will just now be much better without him than with him, I mean to help you to run away."

"But—the child!—he will miss her so. And I must have the child with me!"

"Of course. But do you think when a man is desperately in love he troubles himself much about a child? Hannah—my dear old goose! you will be a goose to the end of your days. Go and cackle over your little gosling, and leave me to manage every thing for you."

Hannah obeyed, for she had come to that pass when her energies, and even her volition, seemed to have left her. She submitted tacitly to the countess's plan, which was to send her quite out of England—to a distant French town, Avranches, not easily reached, being beyond the limits of railways—where resided a dear old friend of Lady Dunsmore's, of whom she had often talked to Hannah—one Madame Arthenay.

"She will be the best protection you could have, for she herself married her sister's husband, as is constantly done in France; so no need of concealment, my dear. I shall just tell her every thing. And you need not mind even if Mr. Rivers does swoop down upon you some day—after his fashion. But he can't—Avranches is too far off. Nor will I let him, if I can help it. I shall tell him he must leave you in peace, to regain your strength and quiet your nerves. Good-by now, and God bless you!"

The good countess, as she made this hurried farewell on board the French steamboat, left them. Almost before Hannah knew where she was, or what she had consented to, she found herself alone with Rosie and Grace. Lady Dunsmore did not say what deeper reason she had for thus effecting a temporary separation, sudden and complete, between the lovers, even though it involved what she called the "kidnapping" of little Rosie. Knowing the world, and the men therein, a good deal better than her friend did, she foreboded for Hannah a blow heavier than any yet. That hapless elder brother, the present Sir Austin, was said to be in a dying state; and for Sir Bernard Rivers of the Moat House, the last representative of so long a line, to contract an illegal marriage, in which his wife would be shut out of society, and his children held by law as illegitimate, was a sacrifice at which the most passionate lover might well hesitate. While, under these, or any circumstances, for him to doom himself for life to celibacy, was scarcely to be expected.

Lady Dunsmore had come to know Mr. Rivers pretty well by this time. She liked him extremely—as most women did—but her liking did not blind her to a conviction, founded on a certain Scotch proverb: "As the auld cock craws, the young cock learns"—that, when he was put to the crucial test, the world and his own family might be too strong for Sir Bernard. Therefore, on all accounts, she was glad at this time to get Hannah out of the way. But her plans, too hastily formed, somehow miscarried; for at Paris her two friends contrived to miss one another. When Miss Thelluson reached Avranches, it was to find Madame Arthenay away, and herself quite alone in that far-away place, with only Grace and the child.

At first this loneliness was almost pleasant. Ever since crossing the Channel she had felt lulled into a kind of stupor: the strange peace of those who have cut the cable between themselves and home, left all their burdens behind, and drifted away into what seems like "another and a better world." During her few days of traveling she had been conscious only of a sunshiny sky and smiling earth, of people moving about her with lively tongues and cheerful faces. Every thing was entirely new, for she had never been abroad before; and whether the land was France or Paradise did not much matter. She had her child beside her, and that was enough.

She had Grace too. Many a servant is in trouble almost better than a friend, because a servant is silent—Grace was, even to a fault. Trouble had hardened her sorely. Even when, a few months before, the last blow had fallen, the last tie was broken between her and Jem Dixon—for their child had died—poor Grace had said only, "It is best. My boy might have grown up to blame his mother for his existence." Words which, when Hannah heard, made her shiver in her inmost soul.

That the girl knew perfectly well her mistress's position with respect to Mr. Rivers, was evident. When he came, the nurse abstained from intruding upon them, and kept other intruders away, in a manner which, though not obnoxiously shown, occasionally touched, sometimes vexed, but always humiliated, Hannah. Still, in her sad circumstances, she was glad to have the protection of even this dumb watch-dog of a faithful servant.

Grace seemed greatly relieved when the sea rolled between them and England. "It would take a good bit of time and trouble for any body to come after us here," said she, as they climbed the steep hill on the top of which sits the lovely tower of Avranches, and looked back on the long line of straight road, miles upon miles, visible through the green, woody country, which they had traversed in driving from Granville. "It feels quite at the world's end; and, unless folk knew where we were, they might as well seek after a needle in a hay-rick. A good job too!" muttered she, with a glance at the worn face of her dear mistress, who faintly smiled.

"Nobody does know our whereabouts exactly, Grace. We have certainly done what I often in my youth used to long to do—run away, and left no address."

"I'm glad of it, ma'am. Then you'll have a good long rest."

She had, but in an unexpected way. They found Madame Arthenay absent, and her little house shut up.

"We must take refuge in the hotel," said Hannah, with a weary look. "It seems a pleasant place to lie down and rest in."

It was; and for a few hours she lingered about with Rosie in the inn garden—a green, shady, shut-in nook, with only a stray tourist or two sitting reading on its benches; full of long, low espaliers, heavy with Normandy pears. There were masses of brilliant autumn flowers, French and African marigolds, zinnias, and so on—treasures that the child kept innocently begging for, with a precocious enjoyment of the jingle of rhyme. "Give me pretty posie, to stick in Rosie 'ittle bosie!" Hannah roused herself once or twice, to answer her little girl, and explain that the flowers were not hers to gather, and that Rosie must be content with a stray daisy or two, for she never exacted blind obedience where she could find a reason intelligible to the little wakening soul. But when, after a tear or two, Rosie submitted to fate, and entreated Tannie to "come with Rosie find daisies—lots of daisies!" Aunt Hannah also succumbed.

"Tannie can't come; she must go to her bed, my darling. Poor Tannie is so tired."

And for the first time in her life she went to bed before the child, laying her head down on the pillow with a feeling as if it would be a comfort never to lift it up any more.

After these ensued days—three or four—of which she never liked to speak much afterward. She lay in a nervous fever, utterly helpless; and when, had it not been for the few words of French which Grace was able to recall—the Misses Melville having amused themselves once with teaching her—and the quickness, intelligence, and tender-heartedness of the inn-servants—good, simple Frenchwomen, with the true womanly nature which is the same all the world over—things would have gone hard with Hannah Thelluson.

More than once, vague and wandering as her thoughts were, she bitterly repented having "run away;" thereby snatching Rosie from her natural protector, and carrying her off into these strange lands, whence, perhaps, she might never be able to bring her back, but herself lie down to rise up no more. But by-and-by even this vain remorse vanished, and she was conscious of thinking about nothing beyond the roses on the chintz bed-curtains and the pattern of the paper-hangings—birds of paradise, with their sweeping tails; the angle which the opposite house made against the sky, the curious shape of its tiling, and the name of the boutiquier inscribed thereon, the first few letters of which were cut off by her window-ledge. So childish had her mind grown, so calmly receptive of all that happened, however extraordinary, that when one day a kind-looking, elderly lady came into her room, and began talking in broken English to Grace and the child, and to herself in the sweetest French she ever heard, Hannah accepted the fact at once, and took scarcely more than half a day to get quite accustomed to Madame Arthenay.

She was one of those women of whom France may boast so many, as unlike our English notion of a Frenchwoman as the caricatures of John Bull who strut about on the French stage are like a real Briton. Feminine, domestic—though, after having brought up two families, her sister's and her own, she now lived solitary in her pretty little nest of a house; a strict, almost stern Protestant; pure alike in act, and thoughts, and words—you would hardly have believed she was born in the same land or came of the same race as the women who figure in modern French novels, or who are met only too often in modern Parisian society. As Grace said of her after she had gone, "Ma'am, I don't care how often she comes to see you, or how long she stays. She doesn't bother me one bit. She's just like an Englishwoman."

—Which Madame Arthenay certainly was not, and would have smiled at the narrow-judging, left-handed compliment. But she was a noble type of the noblest bit of womanly nature, which is the same, or nearly the same, in all countries. No wonder Lady Dunsmore loved her, or that, as she prophesied, Hannah loved her too—in a shorter time than she could have thought it possible to love any stranger, and a foreigner likewise.

"Strangers and foreigners, so we each are to one another," said the French lady early one morning, after she had sat up all night with Hannah—to give Grace a rest. "And yet we do not feel so; do we? I think it is because we belong to the same kingdom—the kingdom of God."

For underneath all her gayety and lightness of heart, Madame Arthenay was a very religious woman—as, she told Hannah, "we Protestants" generally were; thoroughly domestic and home-loving likewise.

"It is a mistake to suppose that we French all fall in love with one another's wives and husbands, or that we compel our children to make cruel mariages de convenance, as you English fancy we do. My sister's was a love-marriage, like mine, and all my children's were. You would find us not so very different from yourselves, if you once came and settled among us. Suppose you were to try?"

So said she, looking kindly at her; but though, as both knew, she had been told every thing, this was the first time Madame Arthenay had made any allusion to Miss Thelluson's future or her own past. Besides, they did not talk very much, she speaking chiefly in French, which Hannah found it an effort to follow. But she loved to read the cosmopolitan language of the sweet eyes, to accept the good offices of the tender, skillful, useful hands. Years afterward, when all its bitterness, and pain, and terror had died out, the only thing she remembered about that forlorn illness in a far-away French town was the kindness of all the good French people about her, and especially of Madame Arthenay.

But when she was convalescent, Hannah's heart woke up from the stupor into which it had fallen. She wanted to get well all in a minute, that she might have back her little Rosie, who had been spirited away from her by those compassionate French mothers, and was turning into une petite Française as fast as possible. Above all, she craved for news from home: it was a fortnight now since she had had one word—one line. She did not wish—nay, she dreaded—to have a letter from Bernard; but she would have liked to hear of him—how he took the news of her flight, whether he was angry with her, and whether he missed his child. But no tidings came, and she did not want to write till she was better. Besides, Madame Arthenay took all the writing things away.

"You are my slave, my captive. Madame la Comtesse exacts it," said she, in her pretty French. "You are not to do a single thing, nor to stir out of your room until I give you leave, which will likely be to-morrow. And now I must bid you adieu, as I have a friend coming who will stay the whole day. Could you rest here quiet, do you think, and spare me an hour of Grace and Rosie? I should like to show my friend the little English rose."

Hannah promised vaguely, and was left alone—to study, as heretofore, the flowers on the chintz and the long-tailed birds on the wall. She was getting very weary of her imprisonment—she who had never before been confined to her room for a whole week. It was a lovely day; she knew that by the bit of intensely blue sky behind the house-tiles opposite, and the soft, sweet air that, together with the cheerful street noises of a foreign town, entered in at the open window. A longing to "rise up and walk" came over her—to go out and see what could be seen; above all, to catch a glimpse of that glorious view which she had noticed in coming up the hill—the sea view, with Mont St. Michel in the distance; that wonderful rock castle, dedicated to her favorite angel (in the days when she was a poetical young lady she always had a statue of him in her room), St. Michael, the angel of high places, the angel who fights against wrong.

It was a vagary, more like a school-girl than a grown woman; but Hannah could not help it. She felt she must go out—must feel the fresh air and sunshine, and try if she could walk, if there was any remnant of health and strength left in her; for she would need both so much.

She was already dressed, for she had insisted upon it. Searching for her bonnet and shawl, and smiling with a pathetic pleasure to find she really could walk pretty well—also wondering, with childish amusement, as to whether, if Grace met her, she would not take her for a ghost—Hannah stole down through the quiet hotel, and out into the street—that picturesque street of Avranches which leads toward the public gardens, and the spot where, within six square feet, is piled up the poor remnant of its once splendid cathedral.

Madame Arthenay had described it, and the various features of the town, during the gentle, flowing, unexciting conversation which she pertinaciously kept up by the invalid's bedside, so Hannah easily found her way thither; tottering a little at first, but soon drinking in the life-giving stimulus of that freshest, purest air, blowing on a hill-top from over the sea. All her life Hannah had loved high places; they feel nearer heaven somehow, and lift one above the petty pains and groveling pleasures of this mortal life. Even now, weak as she was, she was conscious of a sensation of pleasure as if her life were not all done. She wandered about, losing her way, and finding it again; or amusing herself by asking it of those kindly, courteous French folk, who, whenever they looked in her face, stopped and softened their voices as if they knew she had been ill and in trouble. One of them—a benign-looking old gentleman, taking the air with his old wife, just like an English Darby and Joan—civilly pointed out to her the Jardin des Plantes as being a charming place to walk in, where madame would find easy benches to repose herself upon, and a sea view, with Mont St. Michel in it, that was truly "magnifique." Madame's own beautiful island could furnish nothing finer. Hannah smiled, amused at the impossibility of passing for any thing but an Englishwoman, in spite of her careful French, and went thither.

It was a beautiful spot. Sick souls and weary bodies might well repose themselves there, after the advice of the good little fat Frenchman—how fat Frenchmen do grow sometimes! The fine air was soft as cream and strong as wine, and the cloudless sunshine lay round about like a flood; over land and sea—the undulating sweep of forest country on the right hand, and on the left the bay, with its solitary rock—fortress, prison, monastery—about which Madame Arthenay, in her charming small-talk, so fitted for a sick-room, had told stories without end.

Involuntarily, Hannah sat and thought of them now, and not of her own troubles; these seemed to have slipped away, as they often do in a short, sharp illness, and she woke refreshed, as after a night's sleep, able to assume again the burden of the day. Only she lay and meditated, as one does before rising, in a dreamy sort of way, in which her old dreams came back to her. Looking at that lonely rock, she called up the figure of her saint—the favorite St. Michael of her girlhood, with his head bent forward and his sweet mouth firmly set; his hands leaning on his sword, ready to fight, able even to avenge, but yet an angel always; and there came into her that saving strength of all beaten-down, broken-hearted creatures—the belief, alas! often so faint—that God does sometimes send his messengers to fight against wrong; not merely to succor, but absolutely to fight.

"No, I will not die—not quite yet," she said to herself, as in this far-distant nook of God's earth, which seemed to have His smile perpetually upon it, she thought of her own England, made homeless to her through trouble, and bitter with persecution. "Oh, that I had the wings of a dove! Here, perhaps, I might find rest; but still I will not die. They shall not kill me. They may take my character away—they may make him forsake me, as I dare say he will; but I have strength in my soul, nevertheless. And I will fight against their cruelty—I will protest to the last that I had a right to love him, a right to marry him; that it would have been the best thing for him, for me, and the child. Oh, my Bernard! there is a deal of the angel in you; but if there were more of the St. Michael—if, instead of submitting to wrong, you could take up your sword and hew it down— But you can not. I know, when the time comes, you will forsake me. But still—still—I shall have the child."

Thus sighed she; and then, determined to sigh no more, to complain no more, to any living creature, but to do her best to get health and strength of body and mind, Hannah rose up from the heap of stones where she had been sitting. With one fond look at that glorious picture which lay below her—earth, sea, and sky, equally beautiful, and blending together in the harmony which soothes one's soul into harmony too—she turned her steps homeward; that is, "chez elle," for to poor Hannah Thelluson there was not—would there ever be?—such a thing as home.

As she went, she saw a figure coming toward her, walking rapidly, and looking round as if searching for some one. Had it been possible—or, rather, had not the extreme improbability of such a thing made her stop a minute, and draw her hand across her eyes, to make sure that imagination was not playing her false—she should have said it was Bernard.

He saw her likewise; and the two ghosts—for strangely ghostly they both looked to one another's eyes—met.

"Hannah! how could you—"

"Bernard! oh, Bernard!"

She was so glad to see him—he could not help finding it out; nor did she try to hide it—she was too weak. She clung to his arm, her voice choking, her tears falling fast—tears of pure helplessness, and of joy also. He had not forsaken her.

"How could you run away in this manner? We have been searching for you—Madame Arthenay, Grace, and I—for hours."

Digitized by Google

"Not quite hours," said she, smiling at last. "It was fully one o'clock when I left my room. Was that what you meant by my running away?" For she was half afraid of him, gentle as he seemed, and wished to have the worst over at once.

Bernard shook his head.

"I can not scold you now. I am only too happy to see you once again, my darling."

He had never called her so before; indeed, she was the sort of woman more to be honored and loved in a quiet, silent way, than fondled over with caressing words. Still, the tenderness was very sweet to have—sweeter because she felt so miserably weak.

"How did you find me out?" she said, as they walked up the town. And it seemed as if now, for the first time, they were free to walk together, with no cruel eyes upon them, no backbiting tongues pursuing them.

"How did I find you? Why, I tracked you like a Red Indian. Of course I should—to the world's end! What else did you expect, I wonder?"

Hannah hardly knew what she had expected—what feared. In truth, she was content to bask in the present, with a passionate eagerness of enjoyment which those only know who have given up the future hopelessly and entirely.

In the course of the day she grew so rapidly better that, when Bernard proposed going for an hour or two to the house of Madame Arthenay, she assented. He seemed quite at home there—"flirted" with the sweet old French lady in the most charming manner. He had been with her since yesterday, she said; and was indeed the "friend" to whom she wished to show the little English Rose.

"Monsieur speaks French like a Frenchman, as he ought, having been at school at Caen, he tells me, for two years. He does credit to his Norman blood."

Which Madame Arthenay evidently thought far superior to any thing Saxon, and that the great William had done us Britons the greatest possible honor in condescending to conquer us. But Hannah would not smile at the dear old lady, whom, she saw, Bernard liked extremely.

Soon they settled, amicably and gayly, to the most delicious of coffee and the feeblest of tea, in Madame Arthenay's cottage—a series of rooms all on the ground-floor, and all opening into one another and into the garden—salon, salle-à-manger, two bed-chambers, and a kitchen; half of which was covered by a sort of loft, up which the one servant—a faithful old soul, who could do any thing and put up with any thing—mounted of nights to her bed. A ménage essentially French, with not a fragment of wealth or show about it; but all was so pretty, so tasteful, so suitable. It felt like living in a bird's nest, with green leaves outside and moss within—a nest one could live in like the birds, as innocently and merrily—a veritable bit of Arcadia. Mr. Rivers said so.

"Ah, you should come and live among us," said Madame Arthenay. "In this our Normandy, though we may be a century behind you in civilization, I sometimes think we are a century nearer than you are to the long-past Golden Age. We lead simpler lives, we honor our fathers and mothers, and look after our children ourselves. Then, too, our servants are not held so wide apart from us as you hold yours. Old Jeanne, for instance, is quite a friend of mine."

"So is Grace," Hannah said.

"Ah, yes; poor Grace! she one day told me her story." And then, turning suddenly to Bernard, "I assure you, we are very good people here in Normandy. You might like us if you knew us. Monsieur Rivers, why not come among us and resume the old name, and be Monsieur De la Rivière?"

Bernard started, looked earnestly at her, to see if any deeper meaning lurked under her pleasantry.

"Take care," he said; "many a true word is spoken in jest." And then he suddenly changed the conversation and asked about an old Château de Saint Roque, which some one had told him was well worth seeing, and might be seen easily, as it was on sale.

"I know the present owner, a Lyons merchant, finds it dull. He bought it from the last propriétaire, to whom it had descended in a direct line, people say, ever since the Crusades; and—such a curious coincidence, monsieur—the family were named De la Rivière. Who knows but you may be revisiting the cradle of your ancestors? If Miss Thelluson is able, you ought certainly to go and see it."

Bernard assented, and all was soon arranged. He was in one of his happiest moods, Hannah saw. He, like herself, felt the influence of the sunshiny atmosphere, within and without, in this pleasant nook of pleasant France—the distance from home sorrows, the ease and freedom of intercourse with Madame Arthenay, who knew every thing and blamed nothing. When, next day, they all met, and drove together across the smiling country, amusing themselves with the big, blue-bloused Norman peasant, who kept cracking his long whip and conversing with his horses in shrill patois that resounded even above the jingle of their bells, Hannah thought she had seldom, in all the time they had known one another, seen him looking so gay.

Saint Roque was one of those châteaux of which there are many in Normandy, built about the time of the Crusades—half mansion, half fortress. It was situated in a little valley, almost English in its character, with sleepy cows basking in the meadows, and blackberries—such blackberries as little Rosie screamed at with delight, they were so large and fine—hanging on the hedges, and honeysuckle, sweet as English honeysuckle, perfuming every step of the road. Suddenly they came upon this miniature mediæval castle, with its four towers reflected in the deep clear water of the moat, which they crossed by a draw-bridge—and then were all at once carried from old romance to modern comfort, but picturesque still.

Hannah thought she had never seen a sweeter place. "I only wish I were rich and could buy it. I think I could live content here all my days," said she to the Lyons merchant's wife, whom Madame Arthenay knew, and who, with her black-eyed boy clinging to her gown, politely showed her every thing.

"Did you mean what you said?" whispered Bernard, eagerly. And then he drew back, and, without waiting for her answer, began talking to Madame Arthenay.

That night, when he took them safe to the hotel door, he detained Hannah, and asked her if she would not come round the garden with him in the moonlight.

"The air is soft as a summer night; it will do you no harm. We may have no better chance of talk, and I want to speak to you."

Yet for many minutes he said nothing. The night was so still, the garden so entirely deserted, that they seemed to have for once the world to themselves. In this far-away spot it felt as if they had left all the bitterness of their life behind them—as if they had a right to be lovers, and to treat one another as such. Bernard put his arm round her as they sat; and though there was a solemnity in his caresses and a tender sadness in her reception of them which marked them as people who had known sorrow, very different from boy and girl lovers, still love was very sweet—implying deep content, thankful rest.

"Hannah," he said at last, "I have never yet scolded you properly for your running away—with Lady Dunsmore aiding and abetting you. She would scarcely tell me where you were, until I hinted that, as a father, I had a right to get possession of my child. Why did you do such a thing? You must never do it again."

She laughed, but said nothing. In truth, they were both too happy for either anger or contrition.

"Dearest," he whispered, "we must be married. I shall never have any rest till you are wholly and lawfully mine."

"Oh, Bernard! if that could ever be!"

"It shall be. I have been talking to Madame Arthenay about it, as Lady Dunsmore charged me to do. She loves you well, Hannah; and the dear old French lady loves you too already. Every body loves you, and would like to see you happy."

"Happy!" And it seemed as if happiness would never come any nearer to her than now, when she sat as if in a dream, and watched the moon sailing over the sky, just as she had done in her girlhood and ever since, only now she was lonely no more, but deeply and faithfully loved; loving, too, as she never thought it was in her to love any man. "Happy! I am so happy now that I almost wish I could die."

"Hush!" Bernard said, with a shiver. "Come down from the clouds, my love, and listen to me—to my plain, rough common-sense, for two minutes."

Then he explained that the jest about his becoming Monsieur De la Rivière was not entirely a jest—that in talking with Madame Arthenay she had told him how, upon giving notice to the French government, and residing three years in France, he would become a naturalized French citizen, enjoying all the benefits of French laws, including that which, by obtaining a "dispensation"—seldom or never refused—legalizes marriage with a deceased wife's sister. And such a marriage, Madame Arthenay believed, being contracted by them in the character of French subjects, would be held legal any where, as her own had been.

A future, the bare chance of which made Hannah feel like a new creature. To be Bernard's happy, honored wife, Rosie's rightful mother; to enter joyfully upon that life which to every home-loving woman is the utmost craving of her nature; she could hardly believe it true, or that, if possible, it had not been thought of before—until a sadder thought occurred to her.

"What does 'naturalization' mean? Becoming a Frenchman?"

"Yes; also, that I must 'change my domicile,' as lawyers call it, publicly and permanently; let it be clearly known that I never mean to live in England again."

"Never again? That would involve giving up much. How much?"

"Every thing!" he answered, bitterly. "Home, friends, profession, position; all the ambitions I ever had in my life, and I have had some. Still," added he—was it tenderly or only kindly?—as if he feared he had hurt her, "still, Hannah, I should have you."

"Yes," said Hannah, and fell into deep thought.

How much is a woman to a man—say, the noblest woman to the best and truest man? How far can she replace to him every thing, supply every thing? A great deal, no doubt; and men in love say she can do all. But is it true? Does after-experience prove it true? And it must be remembered that in this case the woman's experience of the man was close, domestic—more like that which comes after marriage than before. She knew Mr. Rivers perfectly well as a brother before she ever thought of him as any thing else. Loving him, she loved him open-eyed, seeing all his weak as well as his strong points as clearly as he saw hers.

Hannah was neither an over-conceited nor an over-humble person. She knew perfectly well her own deserts and requirements—Bernard's too. She was well aware that the ties of home, of kindred, of old associations, were with him passionately strong. Also, that he was, as he said, an ambitious man—that the world had a larger place in his heart than it had ever had in hers. She began to tremble.

"Tell me," said she, "tell me the exact truth. Do you think you could do this? Would it not be a sacrifice so painful, so difficult, as to be almost impossible?"

"You are right," he answered, in a low voice, and turning his head away; "I fear it would be impossible."

Hannah knew it, and yet she wished he had not said it. To her, with her ideal of love, nothing, except sin, would ever have been found impossible.

They sat silent a while. Then Bernard, assuming a cheerful tone, continued—

"But, my dearest, there is a medium course. Why should we not, without being absolutely naturalized, take up our abode in France, where such marriages as ours are universally recognized? We might live here the greater part of the year, and only go to England occasionally. Even then we need not mingle in English society. The curate I have lately taken would be left in charge of my parish, so that I need scarcely ever go to Easterham."

"That means," said Hannah, slowly, "that you could never take me to Easterham. Our marriage, after all, would be like the other foreign marriages of which we have spoken, which at home are no marriages at all. Abroad, I might be held as your wife; in England, I should be only—"

"No, no, no!" broke in Bernard, impetuously, "do not wound me by the cruel word. It is not true. People could not be so harsh, so wicked. And if they were, why need we care, when our own consciences are satisfied? Oh, my love, my love, why can not we be happy? Is it not right to be happy in this short, sad life of ours, which may end at any time? Besides," and his voice altered so that Hannah scarcely knew it, "you are not aware what harm you are doing me. This suspense drives me nearly wild. I can settle to nothing, accomplish nothing. My life is wasting away. I am growing a worse man every day; more unworthy of you, of my child, of"—here he stopped and looked upward solemnly—"of her whom I never forget, my child's mother. Oh, Hannah, listen to me this once, this last time. Here, where it can so easily be done, marry me. For God's sake marry me—and at once!"

It was an awful struggle. Worse even than that which she had gone through when he was ill, and of which he never knew. The questions she had put to herself then she repeated now—arguing them over and over with a resolute will, that tried to judge every thing impartially, and not with relation to herself at all. Other arguments, too, came back upon her mind, arguments belonging to the great conflict of her youth, of which this one seemed to be such a cruel repetition—with a difference. For the marriage with her cousin would have risked only physical evils, but no moral suffering or social disgrace to any human being; while this marriage, which the law would never recognize as such, risked much more. All her father had then said to her—her dear dead father, so tender and wise—of the rights of the unborn generation, of the cruelty of entailing upon them the penalty of our joy, if that can be true joy which is so dearly bought—seemed to return word by word, and burn themselves into her brain. With Rosie even, it might one day be a difficulty—when the young grown-up girl came to discover that her father's wife was not really his wife, but only regarded as such out of courtesy or pity. And—what if Rosie should not always be the only child?

Sitting there, Hannah shuddered like a person in an ague; and then all feeling seemed to leave her, as if she were a dead woman, unconscious of the living arms that were trying to warm her into life.

"You are agitated, my own love!" Bernard whispered. "Take time; do not answer me quickly. Think it well over before you answer at all."

"I have thought it over," said she, looking mournfully in his face, and clinging to his hands, as those cling who know they are putting away from them every happiness of this world. "Not now only, but many a time before, I have asked myself the same question, and found the same answer. No, Bernard, for God's sake, as you say, which includes all other sakes, I will not marry you."

Perhaps they ought to have parted then and there—Hannah thought afterward it had been better if they had; kinder to him and to herself if she had fled away on the spot, nor remained to have to endure and to remember those bitter words which miserable people speak in haste, and which are so very hard to be forgotten afterward—words which are heard afterward like ghostly voices in the silence of separation, making one feel that a parting, if it must be, had better be like an execution—one blow, severing soul and body; then nothingness.

That nothingness, that quiet death, that absence of all sensation, which she had felt more than once in her life, after great anguish, would have been bliss itself to the feeling which came over her when, having pleaded his utmost, and reproached her his worst, Bernard rose up, to part from her in the soft moonlight of that pleasant garden, as those part who never mean to meet again.

"My wife you must be—or nothing," he had said, passionately, and she had answered with an icy conviction that it must be so—that it had best be so. "Yes, that is true—a wife or nothing." And then the lurking "devil" which we all have in us, liable to be roused on occasion, was roused, and she said a few words which, the next minute, she would have given worlds to have left unsaid. For the same minute there came to him, put into his hands by Madame Arthenay's Jeanne, a letter, an English letter, with a broad black edge.

Bernard took it with a start—not of sorrow exactly, but of shocked surprise.

"I must go home at once. In truth, I ought never to have left home, but I thought of nothing, remembered nothing, except you, Hannah. And this is how you have requited me."

"Hush, and read your letter."

She dared not look over his shoulder and read it with him—dared not even inquire what the sorrow was which she had now no right to share.

Nor did he tell it; but, folding up the letter, stood in deep thought for a minute or two, then turned to her coldly, as coldly as if she had been any stranger lady, to whom he gave the merest courtesy which ladyhood demanded from a gentleman—no more.

"I must beg you to make my excuses to Madame Arthenay, and tell her that I am summoned home—I can hardly say unexpectedly, and yet it feels so. Death always feels sudden at last."

He put his hand over his eyes, as if he were trying to realize something, to collect himself after some great shock. Hannah said a broken word or two of regret, but he repelled them at once.

"No; this death needs no condolence. It is no sorrow—if death ever is a sorrow so bitter as life, which I begin to doubt. But it alters every thing for me, and for Rosie. Poor Austin is gone—I am Sir Bernard Rivers."

Was there pride in his tone—that hard, bitter pride which so often creeps into a heart from which love has been ruthlessly driven? Hannah could not tell; but when they parted, as they did a few minutes after, coldly shaking hands like common acquaintances, she felt that it was really a parting, such a one as they had never had before; a separation of souls, which in all this world might never be united again.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A DASHING YOUNG DAMSEL.—There was no impropriety, per se, in giving a button-hole bouquet to a gentleman; but if the manner of presenting it was in keeping with the cognomen you have chosen, we think that it may have constituted an offense against good taste, to say the least.

V. D. P.—To square the circle is to find a square equal in area to the area of a given circle. This problem ranks with the philosopher's stone, perpetual motion, the elixir vitæ, and other secrets as yet beyond the reach of man, which the ancients spent their lives in vain efforts to discover, and which the moderns have wisely given up as insoluble.

BLUEBERRY.—It is impossible to do what you desire.

GRACE AND HONEY.—Halloween falls on the 31st of October, the vigil of All-Saints. We can refer you to no better authority than Burns's poem of this name for the superstitious observances practiced in connection therewith in Scotland, and which we have not room to catalogue here.

RACHEL.—Read the "Ugly Girl" articles published in the Bazar for advice about cosmetics.

LIZZIE.—Lyell's Student's Geology is published by Harper & Brothers, who will send it to your address on receipt of $2.

MIGNON.—In answer to your inquiries about the best method of piercing your ears, our first advice would be, Don't! But if you will mutilate yourself to satisfy the demands of a barbarous fashion, you can go to the jeweler, who will puncture the lobes of your ears with a sharp instrument, and insert a pair of slender gold rings to be worn until the ear is healed, which is the preferable way; or you can let some ancient dame run a darning needle through them in the old-time fashion, and afterward draw through the hole a silken thread, which will act as a seton for some weeks, and keep up a lively irritation, which may be good for weak eyes, but not for an indifferent temper. In the language of the showman, you pays your money and you takes your choice.

SCHOOL-GIRL.—Water-melon is usually served in slices and eaten with a fork; but connoisseurs say that the true way is to serve only the middle, with a spoon, leaving the rind on the plate on which it is brought to table. Callers should always send up their cards or names. Gentlemen usually keep their hats in their hands on making a call. This is an English custom; indeed, Englishmen cling to their hats with such tenacity that we have heard of cases where they have danced with them under their arm. A gentleman offers a lady his hand to assist her from the carriage. At table it is better to pass the cream and sugar to your guest than to help him yourself.

MAUD.—"Yours truly" is merely a conventional phrase, and has no deeper meaning, at the foot of a letter. A lady may accept a ring as a philopena present from a gentleman, it being simply the payment of a debt of honor, and involving no obligation. She should protest, however, against too costly a gift.

T. B. W. AND OTHERS.—We can not look up names in the city directories, and furnish no addresses to our correspondents in this column.

ELLIE.—You are not obliged to meet your gentlemen friends at the dépôt, though it is courteous to send a carriage for them if you have one at your disposal. Your friend should notify you of his safe return.

MRS. ROSE.—We consider Vassar College an excellent institution. A detailed account of it was published last summer in the Bazar.

LELIA.—We know of no book specially devoted to the question of the marriage of cousins. Such marriages are usually discouraged by physicians.

A LOVER OF MUSIC.—A sketch and portrait of Carlotta Patti was published in Harper's Bazar, No. 41, Vol. II. She made her début at the New York Academy of Music in 1861. We think that her sister, Madame Strakosch, is still living.

A CLUB OF TWENTY.—It is impossible to reprint stories that have appeared in the Bazar. Our back numbers are electrotyped, and you can obtain as many copies of the particular story you mention as you wish for yourself and friends.

TWO SUBSCRIBERS.—The famous picture known as "La Joconde" is the portrait of Mona Lisa del Gioconda, the wife of a Florentine merchant, and was the work of Leonardo da Vinci. After Da Vinci's death it was purchased by Francis I. for 4000 gold crowns, or about $9000, an enormous sum in those days. It is now in the Louvre, where it is esteemed one of the choicest gems of the magnificent galleries, and is a great favorite with copyists.

MRS. W. R. R.—The Marguerite is the simplest of polonaises, and suitable for merino. A demi-train is half a yard longer than a short walking skirt. A court train pattern is in Supplement of Bazar No. 12, Vol. III. The skirt of your light silk need not be altered. Make a basque, and trim with lace, or passementerie and fringe.

Digitized by Google

r Table-he own cloth ter shade,

In order
first make by passing the out-
thus perwadding-
he mould,
e material ixed with is best to Now work sign with ie sewingader lines

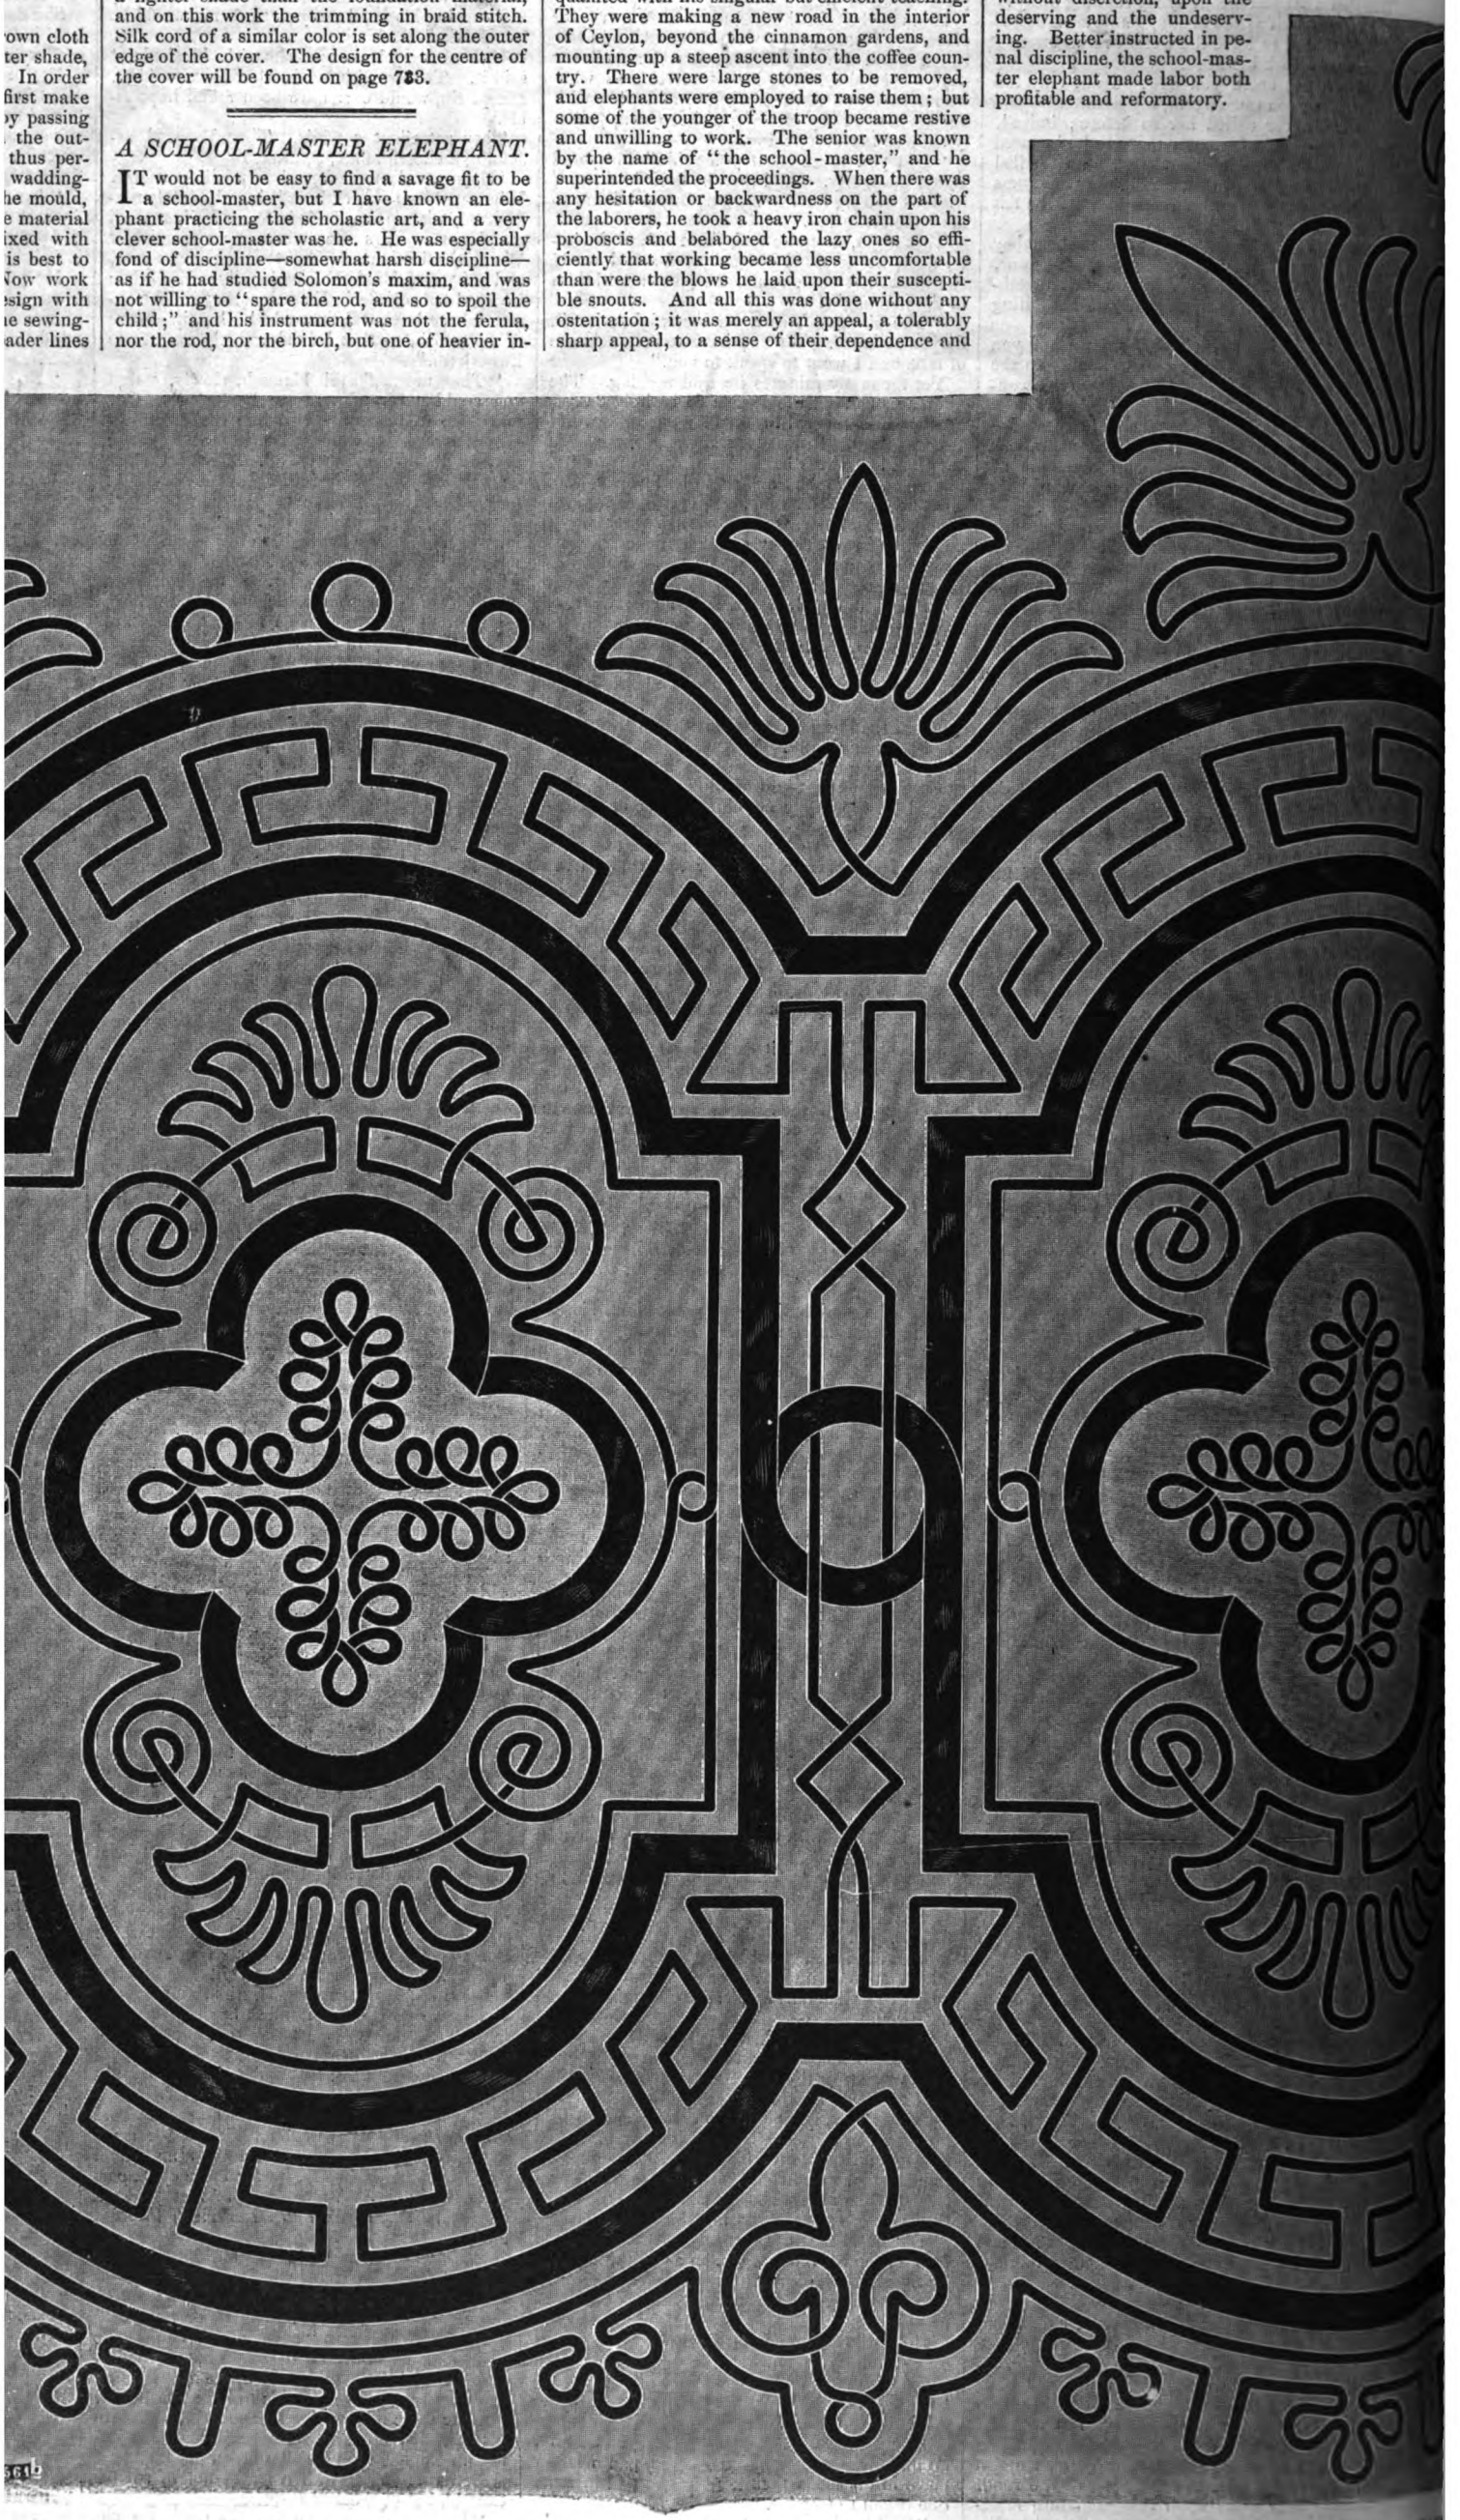
with braid or black velvet ribbon. For the inner quadruple rosette figures lay on silk reps of a lighter shade than the foundation material, and on this work the trimming in braid stitch. Silk cord of a similar color is set along the outer edge of the cover. The design for the centre of the cover will be found on page 783.

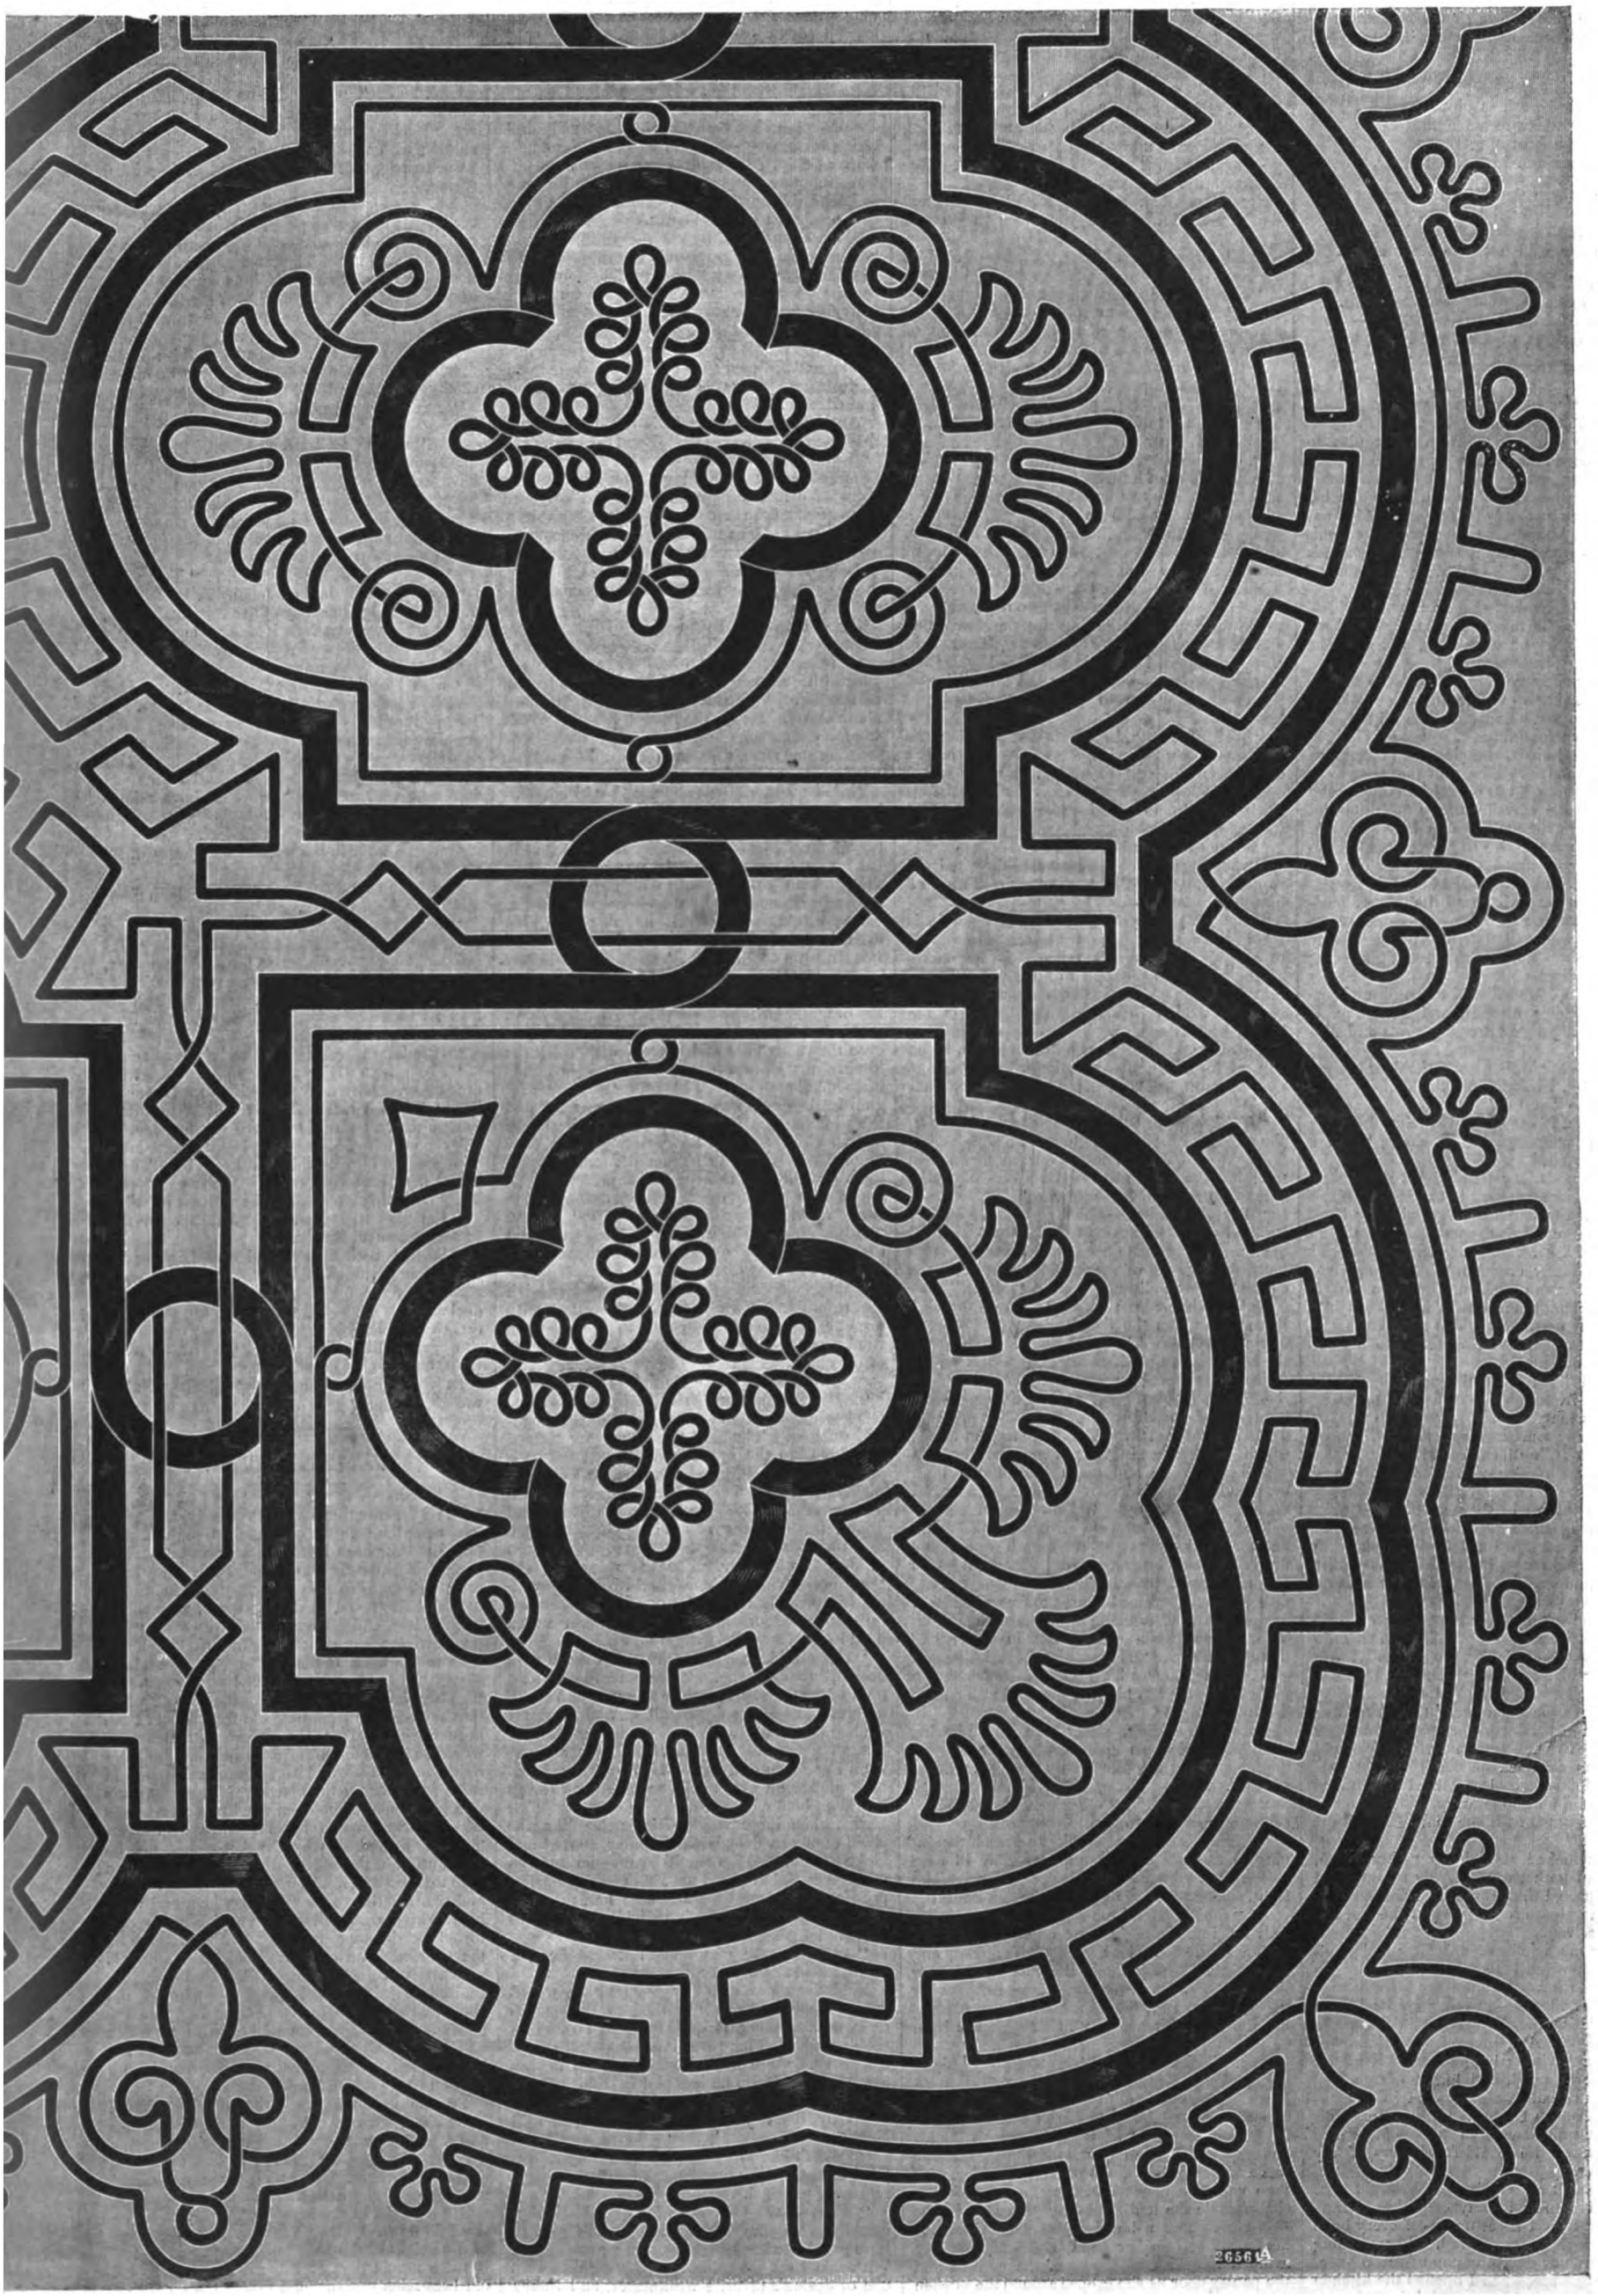
A SCHOOL-MASTER ELEPHANT.

IT would not be easy to find a savage fit to be a school-master, but I have known an elephant practicing the scholastic art, and a very clever school-master was he. He was especially fond of discipline—somewhat harsh discipline—as if he had studied Solomon's maxim, and was not willing to "spare the rod, and so to spoil the child;" and his instrument was not the ferula, nor the rod, nor the birch, but one of heavier infliction—namely, an iron chain. And the matter was in this wise, when I had occasion to be acquainted with his singular but efficient teaching. They were making a new road in the interior of Ceylon, beyond the cinnamon gardens, and mounting up a steep ascent into the coffee country. There were large stones to be removed, and elephants were employed to raise them; but some of the younger of the troop became restive and unwilling to work. The senior was known by the name of "the school-master," and he superintended the proceedings. When there was any hesitation or backwardness on the part of the laborers, he took a heavy iron chain upon his proboscis and belabored the lazy ones so efficiently that working became less uncomfortable than were the blows he laid upon their susceptible snouts. And all this was done without any ostentation; it was merely an appeal, a tolerably sharp appeal, to a sense of their dependence and their duty. Now I have seen punishments inflicted, almost without discretion, upon the deserving and the undeserving. Better instructed in penal discipline, the school-master elephant made labor both profitable and reformatory.



EMBROIDERY DESIGN (BORDER) FOR

Digitized by Google



2.—BRAID AND SOUTACHE EMBROIDERY.

Digitized by Google

IN THE GRAVE-YARD.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

THERE are roses of passionate sweetness
In the gardens under the hill,
Red-lipped and rich with the honey
That the brown bee sips at will.

Lightly their breath is blowing
Wherever the west wind flies,
A part of the breathing rapture
Of laughter and kisses and sighs.

But here, where the silence is perfect
As in undiscovered lands,
The lilies are blooming, like sainted souls,
With their gold harps in their hands.

And I think if the Lord at cool of day
Should again with his servants tread,
It is here that his feet would linger—
In this Garden of the Dead!

NABBY'S HUSBAND.

A KNOCK at the squire's door.

An eager "come in" from the squire, to whom any outside diversion is an inestimable boon, he having just reached that uncomfortable stage of masculine convalescence when life becomes a burden not only to the so-called "patient" himself, but also to those unlucky feminine relatives whose duty it is to officiate as his "ministering angels."

Mary, the servant, came in.

"Please, Mr. Hosley, there's a woman down stairs who says she must see you. She's been here before since you were sick, and now she won't take 'no' for an answer."

"Show her right up, Mary," said the squire, alertly, brightening up visibly, like the war-horse who scents the battle afar off. Not all the cozy comfort of his surroundings, the "Sleepy Hollowness" of his easy-chair, the pleasant pictures on the wall, the wood fire which, now that the wintry twilight was settling down over the bit of gray sky left visible by the curtains' heavy folds, danced and flashed all over the room in rosy shadows, could reconcile the squire to his enforced seclusion. Secretly he pined for his dingy old den of an office, and chafed at the doctor's restrictions, which as yet forbade all thought of business. But now the moral police force, represented by his wife and daughter, being luckily off duty, there was nothing to prevent his seeing this probable client.

"Show her up, Mary," said the squire, cheerfully, straightening himself, and assuming as much of legal dignity as dressing-gown and slippers permitted.

Mary disappeared. Presently the door opened again. "Why, Nabby," said the squire, "is it you? How do you do?"

"Yes, squire, it's me," said Nabby, dropping down with a heavy sigh into a chair; "and I don't do very well."

Nabby was a short, squarely built woman of fifty, with considerable gray in the coarse, black hair drawn stiffly and uncompromisingly back under a bonnet about five years out of date. She had sharp black eyes, and a resolute, go-ahead manner. Evidently a hard-working woman; yet in looking at her you could not help the conviction that something more than hard work had plowed the deep wrinkles which ran across and across her forehead, and threatened to lift her eyebrows up to her hair.

Nabby had lived with the squire's mother fifteen years—from the time when Mrs. Hosley took her in, a ten-year-old orphan, who was, as the good old lady sometimes expressed it, "more plague than profit," until she grew into the steady and reliable handmaiden, who finally, with every one's good wishes, married young Josiah Gould, and set up in the world for herself. Old Mrs. Hosley had long since gone to her reward, but the family still kept up a friendly interest in Nabby and her fortunes, the squire in particular being her "guide, philosopher, and friend" in all the emergencies of life.

"Why, what's the matter now, Nabby?" said the squire, good-naturedly. "Are you sick?"

"Yes, I am," said Nabby, emphatically, with a snap of her black eyes. "I'm sick to death of Josiah. I can't stan' it any longer, and I've come to talk with you about gittin' a divorce. You see he's ben a-growin' worse and worse now for a good while. I've kep' it to myself pretty much, because I was ashamed on't, and then I kep' hopin' he'd do better. I've talked and talked to him, and said and done every thing a woman could, but it seemed as if the more I talked the worse he grew."

The squire looked at Nabby's rather sharp, hard face, and perhaps was hardly so surprised as Nabby expected that Josiah had not been reformed by the vigorous "talking to" he had undoubtedly received.

"He grew more and more shif'less and good-for-nothin'," continued Nabby, "till, finally, he didn't do much but set round the kitchen fire, half boozy. If there's any thing I hate," burst out Nabby, "it's a man forever settin' round the house underfoot. And there I was a-takin' in washin', and a-slavin' early and late, to be kinder decent and forehanded, and him no better'n a dead man on my hands, so far as helpin' any was concerned. And so I told him, time and again. He worked just about enough to keep himself in drink. He knew he couldn't git any of my money for that.

"But I stood it all till about a fortnight ago. I'd been workin' hard all day helpin' Miss Barber clean house, and it seemed as if every bone in my body ached, I was so tired. I came along home, thinkin' how good my cup of tea 'd taste. The first thing I see, when I opened the kitchen door, was old Hank Slater settin' there in my rockin'-chair. He and Josiah were both drunk as—as hogs," said Nabby, slandering an innocent animal in her haste for a simile.

"They'd tracked the mud all over my clean floors. The cookin'-stove was jammed full of wood, roarin' like all possessed. I wonder they hadn't burned the house up before I got there. And they'd got my best tea-pot out to heat some water, and the water 'd all biled away, and the bottom come out. But the worst was to see my husband a-consortin' with such scum of the earth as that miserable, low-lived Hank Slater. I tell you, squire, I was mad. I just flung that kitchen door wide open, and sez I,

"'Git out of this house, Josiah Gould, and don't never let me see your face inside on't again.'

"Sez he, meek as Moses, 'Where shall I go to, Nabby?'

"Sez I, 'I don't care where you go to, so long's you don't come near me. I've always ben a respectable woman, and I don't want none of Hank Slater's friends round my house.'"

"Well?" queried the squire, as Nabby's narration came to a pause.

"Well," said Nabby, in rather a subdued tone, "he went off. And he hain't come back. And I want a divorce."

"Now, Nabby," remonstrated the squire, "you don't want a divorce. I know you better than that. You are not the woman to give Josiah up, and let him go to the bad, without a struggle. You feel a little vexed with him now, and I don't blame you. It is hard, very hard. But you know you took him 'for better or worse.' Do you think, yourself, it is quite right to break your contract because it proves the worse for you—because you are the strong one and he the weak one of the two? That don't strike me as good Bible doctrine, Nabby. 'We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves,' you know."

"Well, I dunno," said Nabby, twisting the corner of her shawl dubiously. "I hadn't thought on't in that light, I must say. It's so aggravatin' to have such a man for a husband. Besides, I dunno's he'd come back now if I wanted him to."

"Hasn't he been back at all?"

"Why, yes, he did come once, for a pair of pantaloons. But I didn't take no notice of him."

"Now, Nabby, you may depend upon it, it wasn't the pantaloons he was after. He wanted to see if you wouldn't relent. If he comes again, be a little pleasant to him, and I'll warrant he will stay. Give him another chance, Nabby. Josiah isn't the worst fellow in the world, by any means. He has his redeeming traits, after all. I believe he will do better, if you will try to help him. You know Josiah is one that bears a good deal of encouragement, Nabby."

"Well, squire, I'll think it over. Anyhow, I'm obleeged to you. You talk so sorter comfortin' to a body. You're your mother's own son; just the same good heart. Would you be able to eat some of my cheese, squire?"

"Try me, and see, Nabby," said the squire, smilingly, not impervious to Nabby's compliments. Nabby made her exit just as Mrs. Hosley rushed in, full of wifely indignation that the squire had been allowed to see a "client."

Nabby's home was over at "the Corners," three miles from the village. She walked rapidly along in the fast-thickening darkness, with the steady, strong gait becoming the self-reliant woman that she was. Yet even her unimaginative nature was not proof against the depressing influence of the chilly, raw November evening. The wind whistled through the bare tree branches, which creaked and groaned mournfully, and waved wildly up and down in the dim light overhead. The wind seemed to cherish a special spite against Nabby. It blew her bonnet off and her hair into her eyes, struggled madly with her for her shawl, took her breath away, and firmly resisted her every step. Finally, it began to send spiteful dashes of cold rain-drops in her face—rain that seemed almost to freeze as it fell.

"Josiah used to come after me with an umbrella when I was caught out in the rain," thought Nabby. "He was always real kind and good to me, after all. I dunno's he ever give me a cross word in his life, even when he'd ben drinkin'."

Here the driving, sleety rain and piercing wind pounced down upon Nabby with renewed fierceness, hustling her madly around in fiendish glee.

"An awful night to be homeless, Nabby," something seemed to say.

"I don't care," said Nabby to herself, beginning to feel cross again and generally ill used as she grew wetter and colder. "It serves him right. He's made his bed, and he can lie in it."

At "the Corners," the light streaming cheerfully out into the night from other homes made Nabby's little house look particularly gloomy and uninviting. Nabby fumbled under the mat for the door-key, fumbled with stiffened fingers for the key-hole, and, finally succeeding in unlocking the door, felt her way in through the little entry.

There is always something "uncanny" about going alone at night into a dark and shut-up house. Even people of the best-regulated minds experience a vague suspicion of something behind them, a sense of possible ghostly hands about to clutch them in the darkness. Nabby was a woman, like Mrs. Edmund Sparkler, with "no nonsense about her;" but, nevertheless, a cheerful tale she had read only yesterday in the Chronicle, about a burglar and a lone woman, kept coming into her head, and she carefully avoided the thick blackness of the corners and the pantry door as she groped around the kitchen for a candle. Of course the fire had gone out.

"Two heads are better than one, if one is a sheep's head," Nabby might have been heard muttering out in the wood-house as she stooped painfully down picking up chips; by which oracular utterance I suspect she was thinking what a good supply of kindlings Josiah always kept on hand for her, and how much more comfortable it was in the old times coming home to a house bright with light and warmth and Josiah's welcome.

For Josiah cherished the most profound admiration for Nabby—an admiration not unmingled with awe. He thought her a most wonderful woman. She was just as beautiful to him now as in the old courting days, before the brightness and quickness of the black eyes had degenerated into sharpness, before the smiling mouth had acquired its hard, firmly set expression, before there were any wrinkles in the smooth forehead. People thought Nabby had done well in marrying Josiah Gould—a pleasant, good-natured young fellow that every one liked; a young mechanic, not very rich yet, it was true; but, with a good trade and such a wife as Nabby, there seemed nothing to prevent his figuring as "one of our first citizens."

Any body can be somebody in this country if they are only determined. But that was exactly the difficulty with Josiah. He never was determined about any thing. He fell into the habit of drinking because he lacked sufficient strength of will to avoid it. Then Nabby's sharp words, and his own miserable sense of meanness and self-contempt, of utter discouragement and despair, drove him lower and lower, and he sank down supinely into the Slough of Despond without effort or hope.

By a beautiful dispensation of Providence, whenever a poor, shiftless, good-for-nothing man is sent into our world, some active, go-ahead little woman is invariably fastened to him to tow him along through, and keep his head above water. It's for the best, of course. What would become of the poor fellow without her? At the same time, she sometimes finds it a little hard.

Nabby was ambitious and proud-spirited, willing to work hard, to save, to do her part—anxious to get on in the world and stand well among the neighbors. The fact, gradually realized, that in her husband she had no help, no support, only a drag and burden, and finally a disgrace, had been a disappointment imbittering her whole nature. To have a husband that no one respected, that even the boys around town called "Si Gould," was dreadful to Nabby. Perhaps it was hardly strange that she grew hard and bitter.

Meantime Nabby had succeeded in starting the fire, and having changed her dress, sat down to dry her feet until the tea-kettle boiled. But even the ruddy light and warmth with which the kitchen now glowed could not fend off the dreariness of the night. The rain "tapped with ghostly finger-tip upon the window-pane," and the wind howled and wailed around the house like the spirits of the lost pleading to be once more taken back into human life and warmth. Such a wind stirs in even the happiest heart a vague sense of loss, of change, of all that goes to make up the unsatisfactoriness of life. Dead sorrows creep forth from their graves on such nights, and stalk up and down the echoing chambers of the heart.

Nabby could not help wondering where Josiah was to-night. It was so lonely sitting there with no one to speak to, listening to the moaning wind, the creaking of the blinds, the loud ticking of the clock.

"And Thanksgivin' a-comin'," thought Nabby. "A pretty Thanksgivin' I shall have!"

The wind wailed and wailed, and Nabby thought and thought. The very fact of having "freed her mind" to the squire had relieved her long pent-up indignation, and now she felt more sad than angry. Up before her seemed to rise a picture of her life: the youthful dreams and hopes, the changes and disappointments, the love turned into wrangling. She even thought of Josiah with pity. For the first time she "put herself in his place," and realized how almost impossible it was for one of his weak nature to resist, unaided, the temptation which would cost a stronger will no effort.

"I'm afraid I've ben a little too sharp with Josiah," thought she. "I've sorter took it for granted I was a saint and he a sinner, and scolded him right along down hill. A nice saint I am! As proud and high-strung as Lucifer himself! Oh dear!" sighed Nabby; "a pretty mess I've made of living! If we could only go back and begin over again, seems to me things would go better."

Just then there was a faint noise, like the clicking of the door-latch. Nabby started and looked round. All was still again—no one visible. Yet Nabby could not rid herself of the impression that some one was near her, that odd sense we have of another's individuality near us though not present.

"There's some one hangin' round here, I know," said she to herself.

Nabby was one who always met things halfway. Accordingly, she walked to the outside door, and, opening it quickly, peered out into the darkness. There stood Josiah—wet, sheepish, sorry. Once he had started to go in, but his courage failing, he lingered in dubious hesitation on the door-step.

"Why don't you come in, Josiah?" said Nabby.

"I didn't know's you'd want me, Nabby," replied Josiah, with all the meekness becoming a returning prodigal.

"Want you? Of course I do," said Nabby, heartily. "Come right along in. I'm goin' to have griddle-cakes for supper, and you must tend 'em while I set the table." Griddle-cakes were one of Josiah's favorite weaknesses, and Nabby knew it.

Josiah came in. If he ever gets into heaven, probably his sensations will not be one whit more delightful than they were now, as from the bleakness and gloom of the night, the forlornness of his wretched wanderings, he came into the cozy brightness of the kitchen, and felt that he was home once more. How good the tea smelled! The fire roared and snapped, the tea-kettle boiled and bubbled and bobbed its lid up and down, and from the griddle the savory odor of the cakes ascended like a homely incense. Josiah's face, shining with mingled heat and happiness as he turned the griddle-cakes, was something worth seeing.

Nabby stepped briskly around getting supper ready. It seemed so pleasant to set the table for two again, to have some one to praise and appreciate her cooking. The November wind might howl its worst now. Its hold on Nabby was gone. In place of all the bitter sadness that had hung heavily around her heart was a warm feeling of happiness, of comfort and hope.

All the explanation they had was this: Josiah drew forth from under his shabby coat an exceedingly awkward and knobby bundle.

"I've bought something for you, Nabby," said he.

The "something," undone, proved to be a very handsome britannia tea-pot. That tea-pot must have known it was a peace-offering, with such preternatural brightness did it shine and glisten. Something in Nabby's eyes shone and glistened too, although she winked hard, and scorned the weakness of a pocket-handkerchief.

"Thank you, Josiah," she said; "it's a regular beauty, and I shall set lots by it."

Which, so long as they understood each other, was, perhaps, as well as if Josiah had made a long-worded speech of repentance and reformation, and Nabby another of forgiveness.

I wish I could say that Nabby never scolded Josiah again. But I can't. However, she "drew it mild," and there was a general understanding between them that this was only a sort of exercise made necessary by habit—a barking by no means involving biting. And Josiah was so accustomed to it that he would have missed it, and not felt natural without being wound up and set going for the day by Nabby.

One day, later in the winter, Nabby was washing for Mrs. Hosley.

"So you've taken Josiah back again, after all?" said Mrs. Hosley.

"Well, yes, I have," said Nabby, giving a last twist to the sheet she was wringing out. "Josiah mayn't be very much to brag of; but then, you see, he's my own, and all I've got. We're gittin' to be old folks, Josiah and me, and we may as well put up with each other the little while we've got to stay here."

"How has he been doing since he came back?"

"First-rate. He's walked as straight's a string ever sence. He's a good provider, now's he quit drinkin', and a master-hand for fixin' up things around the house, and makin' it comfortable. I tell you what 'tis, Miss Hosley, we've got to make 'lowances for folks in this world. We can't have 'em always jest to our mind. We've got to take 'em jest as they are, and make the best on't."

"I'm glad to see you so much happier and better contented, Nabby."

"Well, I used to fret and complain a good deal because things hadn't turned out as I expected 'em to; but lately I've thought a good deal about it all, and I've made up my mind that there's considerable comfort for every one in this world, after all. We mayn't git jest what we want, but we git somethin'."

In which piece of philosophy I believe Nabby was about right.

EXTREMITIES.

THE FEET.

THE feet are the slaves of the body, neglected and abused, and no emancipation proclamation has ever been issued in their favor. They run about patiently all day long, they carry hundreds of pounds avoirdupois, they endure intolerable stockings and blistering boots, they shiver in the snow, and plunge through the mud, while the patrician hands, incased in soft kid, lie at ease in fur-lined muffs and enjoy themselves. When the head and the hands were exempted from the law of bandages, consistency required that the other extremities, the feet, should have been included also; the unfortunate members would be far better off if freed from the thralldom of leather, and allowed to repose on cushions and mats while within the house, protected from the weather, when in the open air, by soft coverings of silk or wool and loose casings of rubber. There is no reason why the feet should not be as beautiful as the hands; and if custom left them bare their owners would take better care of them, and see that they were smooth, white, and well-kept, whereas now they are too frequently distorted out of shape, inflamed by the pressure of the shoe, and variously afflicted with ailments which have called into existence that well patronized artist, the chiropodist. Strip off the boots and shoes, apply gentle cosmetics, and this man's occupation will soon be gone, and the feet will become what nature intended them to be, beautiful, shapely members, such as are now only seen on canvas or in marble.

Custom having decreed that the feet should be clothed, we can not study their peculiarities and meaning as we can those of the hands, and our observations are limited to the boots and shoes which cover them, with the exception of such general characteristics as length, breadth, and the height of the instep. The Greek sculptors laid down the length of the foot as one-sixth of the height of the body, and most antique statues are moulded after this rule. Look at the old bass-relief designs, and notice the length of the feet. So spirited are the attitudes of the draped figures, and so superb the contours of the forms, that we never think of finding fault with the proportions, but fancy we see them walking lightly on their open sandals through the streets of Rome, or, farther still, through the classic cities of Greece. But step out of this legendary atmosphere, and bring our modern ideas to bear upon the forms before us, and the question immediately arises, which is correct, the ancient or the modern taste? Does any one suppose that if the Venus de Medici should come to the next ball, arrayed in the style of the period, she would be esteemed a beauty? Some one would be sure to remark upon the size of her waist, the breadth of her hands, but especially the length of her feet. No doubt Venus walked with the step of a goddess, light and elastic as air, on her shapely white feet; but if she had been obliged to wear a pair of nineteenth-century French-heeled boots of the fashionable length for a woman of her height, I fear she would have remained forever seated in her chariot, and her doves been in danger of overwork.

Digitized by Google

The natural breadth of the foot can be traced under the boot, although the stiff leather does its best to disguise it, and the height of the instep also can neither be hidden by a clumsy shoe nor imitated by the best shoe-maker in the land unless the natural arch is underneath. The old idea that a high instep betokens aristocratic descent arises from the fact that in the days of chivalry walking was considered plebeian, and the nobility were always mounted; being constantly on horseback, their arms and chests expanded and grew strong, but their feet remained inactive, and consequently small. On the other hand, the peasantry labored in the fields, and their feet, from hard labor and heavy burdens, grew broad and flat. Life on the Southern plantations before the war presented in many respects the same features as the times of feudalism; personal labor was considered a degradation, indolence was aristocratic, and, like the knights of old, the young men were constantly on horseback, with a similar physique. The Southern foot is small and high-arched, and Southern belles were wont to boast that water would run under their insteps. The experiment was often tried in boarding-school dormitories, to the discomfiture of Yankee maidens, who revenged themselves by pointing to their high white foreheads, with the sneering remark that they were not in the habit of carrying their brains in their heels! The difference in size between the Northern and Southern foot is, however, only noticeable when comparing extreme specimens, such as Boston and New Orleans, Omaha and Charleston; the Middle-State cities, such as Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and New York, show the two varieties blended into a common medium.

The boot or shoe of the present day has one radical fault: it is elegant, strong, and enduring, but, as a rule, it is too short. Let a person lay his foot down on a sheet of paper and mark its length; then let him allow a full inch for the forward pressure caused by the high heel, and order his boots made according to the measure. That is what Nature demands. But Fashion first puts on a stocking so short that the toes are curled up in the soft web; then comes a boot, broad enough, perhaps, but so deficient in length that it presses against the end of the foot; and what is the result? Enlarged, cramped, suffering joints, and a mincing gait, where each step is calculated, and elasticity impossible. A foot can endure a narrow boot far better than a short one, for the additional length at the end gives room for expansion in the proper direction; and, to a cultivated eye, a long, slender foot is far more beautiful than a short, broad one. The high heels now so much worn by ladies absolutely require an extra length in the boot. They are coquettish appendages, belonging to the era of powdered hair, black patches, and hooped skirts. But, besides being dangerous, they necessitate more or less of that painful attitude, the Grecian bend, which is nothing more than Nature's effort to preserve an equilibrium. Although the French heel is not seen among the sterner sex, their boots have a fault quite as important: the soles are too narrow. In a short walk no difficulty is experienced, but several hours' exercise is sure to bring discomfort. In the early hours of the rebellion, when the gallant Seventh Regiment, of New York city, volunteered for the defense of the capital, a day's march found them completely exhausted. Their courage was unflinching, their ardor glowing, their strength and health perfect; but—the soles of their boots were too narrow, and each step became a torment. They lay along the road-side; they captured a locomotive, and loaded themselves on to the platform cars; they marched barefoot; and they made raids into the neighboring villages and carried off the largest brogans they could find. The difficulty was soon remedied, but there were about a thousand pairs of city boots lying along the road that day, mementoes of the gallant journey which has since been so often described both in prose and verse, the March of the Seventh.

A few words on the principles of adaptation as applied to the coverings for our feet. Boots for both men and women are more generally becoming than slippers. They give a trim, firm outline to the foot, and convey an impression of elasticity and strength, whereas a slipper betrays all the defects, and is a hazardous experiment unless the foot is faultless. Even then fashion often disfigures it with huge bows and rosettes, which, although they may look piquant in front, are hideous monstrosities in profile view, and should be banished from civilized society. The most unbecoming chaussure is that species of embroidered slipper which young ladies are in the habit of presenting to their gentlemen friends—marvels of industry and clumsiness, hard to get on, uncomfortable when on, and almost impossible to get off. We say no more. Every man who reads these lines understands the subject, and if he is a favorite, his closet is full of the ungainly trophies which he never thinks of wearing, preferring the prosaic morocco to all the beaded canvas in the world; and if the heel piece is gone, so much the better.

A man's gait tells us something of his character: unless it is influenced by debility or local imperfection we can read much in his walk, and detect his disposition in his step. Notice, for instance, this person coming toward us; his feet wander along the sidewalk, now almost in the gutter, now rubbing against the fence, zigzag, back and forth, with no apparent purpose in the change; and you know he is an abstracted, impracticable individual even before you look at his face. Try to walk with him, and he is continually swaying against you; if there is one stone in the road he is sure to stumble over it, and if there is one mud-puddle he always walks into it. Here is another specimen coming quickly and firmly up the street, following a straight line with mathematical precision, turning in and out according to the exact necessities of the case, a direct purpose in every step. Such a man may have many faults, but exasperating procrastination is not among them. Look at these two deliberate feet advancing toward us, coming down heavily, heel first, slow and sure, they pound along, steadily advancing toward their destination, and you recognize the highly respectable plodder who sometimes wins the race by sheer force of slow obstinacy, like the tortoise in the old fable. Another variety is the bending gait, wily step, and studied motion, which betray the manœuvrer, and we can not help thinking that we see "rascal in the motions of his back,

And scoundrel in his supple, sliding knee."

Put these four specimens in a drawing-room, and notice how they comport themselves. The plodder looks deliberately around the room, selects the locality he prefers, finds a comfortable chair, and plants himself there for the evening. The rapid walker enters quickly, goes straight up to the friends he best likes without circumlocution, says what he means without disguise, and then departs as quickly as he came. The supple gallant, who, as far as appearance goes, is the drawing-room favorite, glides in gracefully, meanders around among the company, drops a skillful hint here, a meaning look there, and accomplishes a vast amount of evolution with his snake-like feet. The absent-minded man blunders into the room, says the wrong things to the wrong persons, steps on all the ladies' dresses, scrapes the varnish off the furniture by his numerous collisions, and finally departs, stumbling over every intervening chair on his way to the door. Let no one say these differences are merely a matter of habit. They are valuable indications of the true character, for many a man, like Achilles, shows his real weakness only in his heels.

A woman's gait is apt to be the conventional step practiced by all, but yet the individual peculiarities will peep out occasionally. There is the trotting, the ambling, the mincing, the languid, the gliding, and the prancing gait—the latter being the general favorite. An observing Englishman remarked not long since, "The American ladies do not walk, they prance." And the expression was apt. In former days a great deal was written and said about the noiseless tread and gentle gliding step of the lovely Arabella; but nous avons changé tout cela! Arabella now comes sounding through the hall, her little boot-heels clicking on the stairs, and ringing over the pavement so that we hear her coming long before she turns the corner. Once in a while, in some old-fashioned village, we meet a fair vision of the past generation, who softly glides along the street with the willowy gait of her youth; but the gentle apparitions are rare, fading away before the onward march of the booted brigade, jaunty in jackets, natty in hats, and apparently quite forgetful of the old-time song, "Tread soft, for my heart lies under your feet, love."

On the stage the feet and the gait are important accessories to success. Many an actress, otherwise worthy of praise, is spoiled by a stilted stage stride, and many an actor renders himself ridiculous by a loping, awkward walk. One must not, however, criticise these members of the dramatic profession too severely, for often they are obliged by the limited capacity of the stage to perform miracles in the way of pedestrianism, such as a long walk for pleasure in a space of six by nine, or a sharply contested battle, with large armies on both sides, in a circumference of ten feet. There is in existence an opera called "Stradella," composed, no doubt, with good intentions, and containing some very sweet music. In one of the scenes four ruffians are sent to assassinate the hero, who is saying his prayers in a musical way at the foot-lights. But the prayer is long, the stage short, and the assassins are obliged to manœuvre in the background through twelve pages of variations, consuming twenty minutes to cross the intervening space of ten feet, and managing their approach so as only to reach their victim at the final amen. To do all this, and at the same time keep up the appearance of an advance, requires the sinuosity of a snake. The murderers cross and recross the stage in breathless, doubled-up positions, gaining the eighteenth part of an inch each time, glaring, gesticulating, panting, flourishing their weapons, and imposing silence upon each other in pantomime, until, in admiration of their strategy, one almost forgets to wonder why they are so long about it when two strides would end both the victim and the scene.

The ranks of American authors contain one man who stands alone on a plane by himself: powerfully intense, and at the same time exquisitely delicate, Nathaniel Hawthorne has no rival in his peculiar style. He left but few books behind him; but such books! Each one is a mine of wealth, containing characters drawn with the power of a charcoal outline, and finished with the perfection of a miniature in oils. Among his creations stands one so vividly brilliant that we all know her; Zenobia, in the "Blithedale Romance." A few phrases from Hawthorne's pen bearing upon our subject may fitly close this essay.

"Zenobia bade us welcome in a fine, frank, mellow voice, and gave each of us her hand, which was very soft and warm. Her hand was larger than most women would like to have, or than they could afford to have, though not a whit too large in proportion with the spacious plan of Zenobia's entire development. It did one good to see a fine intellect so fitly cased. She was, indeed, an admirable figure of a woman just on the hither verge of her richest maturity, so full of bloom, health, and vigor that a man might well have fallen in love with her for their sake only."

Again:

"After a brief pause at the window she turned away, exemplifying in the few steps that removed her out of sight that noble and beautiful motion which characterized her as much as any other personal charm. Not one woman in a thousand could move so admirably as Zenobia. Many women can sit gracefully; some can stand gracefully; but natural movement is the result and expression of the whole being, and can not be well and nobly performed unless responsive to something in the character. I used to think that music—light and airy, wild and passionate, or the full harmony of stately marches, in accordance with her varying mood—should have attended Zenobia's footsteps."

And at the end of the book, when the three men at midnight are on their way, with horror-stricken hearts, to the sluggish pool that covers the drowned woman, notice the careful touches of Hawthorne's description.

"I showed my companions where I had found the handkerchief, and pointed to two or three footsteps impressed into the clayey margin, and tending toward the water. Silas Foster thrust his face down close to these footsteps, and picked up a shoe that had escaped my observation, being half imbedded in the mud. 'There's a kid shoe that was never made on a Yankee last,' observed he. 'I know enough of shoe-maker's craft to tell that. French manufacture; and see, what a high instep! and how evenly she trod in it! There never was a woman that stepped handsomer in her shoes than Zenobia did.'"

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

MANY ladies take more pleasure in the few choice plants which brighten the parlor window during the winter months, than in all the abundance and variety of the summer garden. The special care which these house plants demand only enhances their value to those who love them, and regard them as living pets. Yet, while some persons seem to have the faculty of coaxing every growing thing into blossoming luxuriance, others have no success; every plant in their charge droops and dies, or, at best, it only grows, but never blooms. Those who are not adepts in the culture of plants would do well to select simple varieties, which will more readily repay their care than rarer and more delicate kinds. It should be remembered, also, that plants can not blossom all the time—a fact which disappoints many who do not consider about the matter. If your fuchsia has been flowering luxuriantly during the summer, it must rest afterward; but if in summer its growth is checked by watering it sparingly, and the flower-buds are nipped off as soon as they appear, when cold weather comes, if it is set in a sunny window and abundantly watered, it will probably blossom freely through the winter. The little insects which so frequently infest house plants are a great annoyance, and sometimes it is almost impossible to remove them. It is said that if sufficient fresh air is admitted to the room this difficulty will not exist. The roses in the gardens of the Shakers at New Lebanon are remarkable for their luxuriant foliage and fine blossoms. The gardener in charge attributes his success in cultivating them to the free use of salt as a top-dressing for the soil of the beds. The salt kills rose insects of every kind, and also improves the health and vigor of the plants.

By the prompt exertions of the special agent of the Post-office Department, all the mails in the Chicago post-office were rescued, with the exception of a small one which came over the Fort Wayne road, and, having been four hours behind time, no one knew any thing about it. About $60,000 worth of postage stamps were on hand, and, though not totally destroyed, were so badly charred as to render their use impossible.

It is an interesting botanical and chemical fact that there is a plant growing in the Neilgherry Hills, in India, which yields carbolic acid. It is reported by the medical officer of the district to be far superior in purity to the ordinary product of coal-tar. It is, however, more expensive than the mineral product, so that the discovery has no commercial value.

Another expedition to the polar sea is about being organized by the Russian Geographical Society—the special object of it being not merely to reach the north pole, but to select such a route as will afford the best opportunities for studying the geography, climate, and industrial conditions of the Siberian coasts. A preliminary expedition is to be sent out to reconnoitre the seas in the vicinity of Nova Zembla.

There were eighty-nine newspaper establishments destroyed in the conflagration of Chicago.

While the rich were freely giving their thousands to the sufferers in the Western States, a poor woman one day entered the Prince-street station-house, and asked whether contributions for Chicago were received there. On being told that they were, she said: "I'm a poor woman, and can give no money; but here are a dozen and a half woolen hoods which I made with my own hands. They will help to keep some poor creatures warm. May God help them!" She would not tell her name or address.

Chambers's Journal thinks it is a mistake to suppose that beef tea is nourishing and strengthening for feeble persons. It says, "Some few practitioners and chemists have long been aware of the fact, and now their view is confirmed by Dr. Marcet. There is no nourishment in beef tea. Mixed with solid food, it imparts a relish which promotes digestion; and the best solid food that can be mixed therewith is the beef from which it was made, reduced to a powder. In two, at least, of the London hospitals the mixing of powdered beef with the best tea has long been practiced; and there the patients get strong on beef-tea diet."

A greenhouse has been erected recently in connection with the Rivington-street Industrial School and Boys' Lodging-House, by the benevolence of certain gentlemen who believe in the elevating and refining influence of flowers. On the day when the greenhouse was publicly opened the children who attend the day school and the lads who make the lodge their nightly home were present in large numbers, as well as many ladies and gentlemen. The greenhouse was filled with beautiful plants. On a long table was displayed a large variety of plants, which, during the past year, have been distributed to the poor children of the neighborhood. These were returned for this occasion, so that those interested might see what care and attention had been given by their owners to the little plants which had brought light, beauty, and fragrance to their otherwise dreary homes.

On Mount Ranier, in Washington Territory, there is a glacier ten miles long by five wide. Many other glaciers are known to exist in America, and they may afford a new field for the investigations of scientific men.

The University of Michigan opened this year with about 1200 students, fifty of whom are young women. The usual examinations previous to admittance are dispensed with in the case of such students as present diplomas of graduation from either of five union schools in Michigan. A new building is in course of erection on the college campus, which will be four stories high, 140 feet deep, 350 feet long, and contain a hall with seating capacity for 3000 persons. Dr. Angel, the new president, is likely so to conduct this noble institution that it will win yet greater renown and added usefulness.

After every revolution in Paris there is a new designation of public ways. The Municipal Council has just decided that at this time eight changes, and no more, shall be allowed. By these changes the names of Napoleon, Eugénie, and other obnoxious personages will be expurgated from the names of certain avenues hitherto known by their familiar appellations.

Many treasures of literature, science, and art were completely destroyed by the Chicago fire, and can never be restored. In the destruction of the Historical Society rooms an extensive library was lost—the original Emancipation Proclamation, complete sets of files of Chicago newspapers, complete sets of Chicago battle-flags, the Healy Gallery of three hundred valuable paintings, Deihl's Hamlet, cartoons of the Prodigal Son, and Volk's bust of Lincoln, the only one for which Mr. Lincoln ever had a life sitting. The oil-paintings in the Opera-House, and Academy of Design art galleries, as well as choice private art collections, were also lost, and the valuable scientific collections in the Academy of Science. Probably there is not a good law library remaining in the city; and all the books belonging to the Library Association and the Young Men's Christian Association were destroyed.

Maine is sending granite for the construction of two of the largest bridges in the world—the East-river Bridge, and the railroad bridge across the Mississippi at St. Louis.

Thoughts of Iceland generally send a shiver through the body—unless it happens to be midsummer. But this bleak country seems to be growing less inhabitable than ever; the winters are colder than formerly, the fisheries failing, and scarcely a tree can be found there. Of course the people can not live upon nothing; so they meditate migrating to more hospitable climes. It is proposed to establish an Icelandic colony in Wisconsin and Nebraska; and, by way of experiment, fifteen Icelanders have already gone to Detroit and Washington Islands, where, for the present, they will support themselves by fishing.

A call is made not only by some thoughtful and humane persons, but by the sparrows themselves every night, for more sheltering houses for these useful little creatures. The nights are growing colder, and the leaves on the trees fast diminishing.

Some passing record of the faithful cat belonging to the Chicago post-office seems not amiss. She had been once before burned out—so say her biographers—and was, therefore, in some measure prepared for this calamity. On the night of the fire the cat was present, and assisted to the best of her ability in the removal of valuables, though she did not go away herself. This is not an obituary, however; for a couple of days afterward, when the work of removing the safes was in progress, the tearing away of a portion of the ruin revealed the faithful public servant in a pail partially filled with water. She had rented this as temporary quarters, and apparently enjoyed the cool shelter which it afforded. From her position it appeared impossible that she could have gone away and returned after the fire, and so she may be set down as the only living being who passed Sunday night and Monday in the burned district.

Goethe says that one ought every day to hear a little song, to read a good poem, to see a fine picture, and, if it be possible, to speak a few reasonable words.

Digitized by Google

JUSTICE IN INDIA.

THIS engraving represents a scene in the street of a town in the northwest provinces, such as Allahabad or Mirzapoor. Fine, richly carved, stone-faced houses of wealthy natives stand beside poor mud hovels, and a mosque with tall minarets is seen in the background. between two policemen armed with sword and shield. The native head police officer stands relating the case. His secretary stands next to him with the report written, with his reed pen in his hand, and his writing-box held by a servant of the office, ready to write on a corner of the report the magistrate's orders. In the foreground, leaning against a projecting part of the basement somewhere, appear in the foreground, while a burkundanze stands in front holding the stolen property—armlets, bracelets, necklaces, etc.—found on the thief. An old woman and a young one appear alone on the earthen embankment in front of their house. Their position in life is not high, or they would not be seen in public and sitting on a bedstead.

AN UP-COUNTRY MAGISTRATE IN INDIA ADMINISTERING JUSTICE.

The magistrate rides out in the early morning to visit the scene of a disputed boundary, accompanied by a mounted policeman, who wears a red or green uniform and a dice-box-shaped hat. During his ride through the town a thief is brought before him who has just been caught in the act; his hands have been tied; he declares his innocence, imploring for mercy. He is held of a house, is a banker, merchant, or money-changer, on his way to his religious ablutions in the sacred Ganges. On his head is a muslin skull-cap in place of the orange & pink turban he wears in full dress. Behind him an old government pensioner is having the matter explained to him by a Mussulman. Two small boys, who have been to carry fruit, vegetables, or sweetmeats

THE FESTIVAL OF THE INFIORATA AT GENZANO.

THE only English flower-festival of which we have any knowledge was the well-dressing at the village of Tissington, in Derbyshire, where the decoration is produced by covering wooden frames, sufficiently large to face the front of the larger scale. Formerly it extended through the length of two streets; this year one only was made use of. A week or ten days before, the middle of the street, through its entire length, to the width of seven or eight yards probably, is carefully broken up or leveled, and covered with fine earth, which is then beaten down, rolled, and hardened into a perfectly smooth and solid village walls, with moist clay, into which are set the entire flowers, cut off close to the stem, side by side, like the tiny stones of the mosaic worker, according to a pattern drawn in outline on the clay beforehand from colored designs on paper, often of great beauty and elaboration, and similar to the page of an illuminated missal. At Genzano, however, the decoration is on a much surface, as of fine stone or marble. The street itself is gradually descending, perhaps five hundred yards in length, and being divided into squares, or oblongs, on each one of these is drawn in strong white outline the pattern or figure designed to be represented, whether heraldic devices, arabesque, architectural designs, diapered designs, or interlacing lines and scrolls. All this being clearly marked out, and in some cases the colors indicated, and the boundary on either side being drawn by a line of posts covered with evergreen, with evergreen chaplets hanging between, the work begins, the patterns and designs being filled in—wrought out rather—by the laying on of flower petals, thousands upon thousands, as a painter lays on colors broadly with his brush. Here a belt of pink rose leaves, there an immense central star, with rays as of prismatic colors, purple and scarlet and orange, blue and green—all flower petals, simply laid on in the mass, the edges clearly defined as by the painter or the weaver. Here will be a bow as of dark blue ribbon edged with gold; there an elaborate design on a creamy ground of scrolls and arabesques, like a lovely piece of Gobelin tapestry, in which the shading is so perfect that, but for your eyes beholding the work rise up before you, nothing would persuade you but that paint of some kind was used to produce the effect. But nature supplies the color, though in this matter of shading I believe that great use is made of minute seeds of various shades and tints, as of browns and greens, olive and gray. As regarded broad masses of full color there seemed no difficulty. The broom, which was in full flower, furnished its golden yellow; the red poppy, which is inconceivably abundant and brilliant in Italy, the intensest scarlet, to which, when the design required it, I observed that a deeper, almost black, tint was given by pressing the petals in the hand before laying them down; while of roses there was every variety of tint and shade, from full rose-pink to velvety crimson or tender maiden's blush. Blues and purples were the same, so were greens, in almost infinite variety, from bright grass to dull sage. Green half-tints, too, were perfect, with buffs and grays and creamy whites.

Digitized by Google

Of course, as the whole work is effected by the simply laying on of loose petals, it is of an evanescent character. If the wind rises, the perfect beauty of the work is marred, color becomes mixed with color, and the outline broken and irregular. Like fire-works, it is a vision of beauty, costing much trouble, care, and thought in the preparation, but gone in a moment. Formerly, when the exquisite flower carpets were laid down the whole length of two streets, the churches opened their doors, and a procession of priests, with banners, lighted tapers, and singing, marched along them, crushing their beauty and destroying their perfected workmanship, till, when they had passed over it, it was like the march of destroying locusts. Now, however, the royal prince and princess, attended by the Cesarini family, walked in simple style along the street, attended by a small crowd, and, entering a small balcony prepared for them in the centre of the street, gazed down upon its whole length and breadth, as we were doing, and, no doubt, admired it no less than we did. The greeting which they received was warm, but not enthusiastic. But we must remember that though these faithful papalini might be well pleased to see the prince, and especially the sweet-looking young princess, of whom they had heard so much, yet they would not forget that they both were excommunicated by the Holy Father, and that to this very festival which had brought them hither the Church had refused her blessing.

The flower-festival was over. The prince and princess and the ladies and gentlemen of their court were gone. The English and the American forestieri were going. That which had been produced with so much thought and loving care, for which, through the night and early morning, and late evenings of the preceding days, flowers had been gathered from woods and fields and hidden glens and wilderness places, and brought hither on asses and mules, in sacks and baskets, and picked and assorted with such artistic care, so that every separate color and shade and tint might be kept distinct, and which had been wrought with such elaboration into a work of beauty, to be gazed on for half an hour or so by the eyes of strangers, was now left to wither in the sun, to be blown away by the wind, to be trampled upon by children, and on the morrow, or the day after at most, heaped together as rubbish, or left to disfigure instead of beautifying the place. It was pitiable to think of.

As regards the festival of the Infiorata, I may add, in conclusion, a change is coming over all that pertains to the Church in Italy; and now that so great an innovation has been made as to celebrate this festival without its sanction, or without even the presence of a priest, it has lost its prestige in the minds of the papalini population. It has been held out of season, to gratify the new rulers, whom they regard as excommunicated robbers, and if it be continued, it will probably only be as a secular show; unless, indeed, the temporal power of the pope be re-established, which does not appear likely, it is the opinion of all that this year has seen the last Infiorata.

The evening was lovely, the nightingales sang in the woods, the ungathered flowers again greeted us as we rode on our way, now through the woods toward Marino, with peasant people, young men and maidens, blooming like flowers with their crimson and orange-colored headgear, and crowds of little lads going the same way likewise. One of our donkeys was unoccupied, and no less than three of these young urchins were perched upon his back, to the infinite amusement of all. So with laughter and merriment we proceeded onward till our road branched off from theirs. The little lads were unseated, and we turned our asses' heads in the direction of the Lake of Albano, on the edge of which stands a deserted villa of the Colonna family, and below it the remarkable old convent of Palazzuola. As ladies are not allowed to enter here, and our party being principally ladies, we were obliged to satisfy ourselves with looking down from the wild, overgrown terrace above upon the great roofs of this extensive building, on the tall bell-tower of which tufts of crimson snapdragon waved like a banner, and which is now a house of correction for refractory monks. We admired the long box alleys and broad walks of the stately old garden below, and remembered that here was discovered one of the most ancient Etruscan tombs, dating back nearly two hundred years before Christ.

DESIGN FOR CENTRE OF TABLE-COVER.—BRAID AND SOUTACHE EMBROIDERY.—[SEE DOUBLE PAGE.]

Digitized by Google

MPLE FOR THE LADIES.

LEUTZ, Philadelphia, Pa., has had a r & Wilson Machine 16 years; for 8 supported a family of nine persons, two invalids, running on an average of 19 day, by different persons, without costing r repairs; some of the original dozen of are still in use; no personal instruction eived, and a child ten years old learned horoughly.—[Com.]

's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer re- bald heads a fine, healthy growth of he hair-cells are not closed up.—[Com.]

MAN HAIR.—Burnett's Cocoaine, for healthful d excellence, is unsurpassed.—[Com.]

G WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-in- opying Wheel patterns may be transferred Supplement with the greatest ease. This equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, from other patterns or from the garments es. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or nt by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SBURGER & PFEIFFER, essors to Strasburger, Fritz, & Pfeiffer),

S OF GERMAN, FRENCH, AND ENGLISH

TOYS,

ia & Fancy Goods,

EMIAN GLASS and LAVA WARES,
BOXES, ACCORDEONS, HARMONICAS, CONCERTINAS, &c., &c., oadway, near Canal St., N.Y.

Ornaments, latest novelties in Toys, Fancy nental Goods constantly arriving to supply l demand.

FANS.

FANY & CO.,

NION SQUARE, N. Y.,

FER A CHOICE ASSORTMENT OF FINE LACE TOPS, WITH CARVED STICKS, INLAID WITH GOLD AND SOMETHING ENTIRELY NEW.

R. — HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES

NOW THE FASHION.
ches long, weight 2¼ oz., only $5.
ches long, weight 2½ oz., only $6.
ches long, weight 2¾ oz., only $7 50.
ches long, weight 3 oz., only $9.
porter who retails, CHAS. V. PECKHAM,
687 Broadway, near Amity St., and
251 Grand St., corner Chrystie.
on receipt of color and price, or by ex- D.

ALTHAM

VATCHES,

(LADIES' SIZE).

EP CONSTANTLY IN STOCK A FULL ENT OF THESE WATCHES, IN VERY IE GOLD CASES, AND WARRANT 3 THOROUGHLY RELIABLE TIME-

L, BLACK, & CO.,

WELERS AND SILVERSMITHS,
565 & 567 Broadway, N. Y.

SSON BOUQUET.

THE NEW PERFUME
THE HANDKERCHIEF.
DWORTH & SON, ROCHESTER, N. Y., and BROADWAY (Room 18), NEW YORK.

GATE & CO.'S

MERE BOUQUET SOAP
ovel but very delightful per- nd is in every respect superior ILET USE.
by dealers in perfumery and rticles.

O from 50 cts.

ts sent (postage paid) for Fifty Cents, that y for Ten Dollars. R. L. WOLCOTT, N.Y.

an ELEGANT WARDROBE of ALNUT and DAMASK. See Circu- H. WHITTEMORE & Co., 544 B'dway, N.Y.

NOTICE.—Buyers of Goods under the names of Wamsutta Prints, Cheeks, Lindseys, Cambrics, Ticks, and Silesias, are hereby informed that all such goods are not manufactured at the Wamsutta Mills. We limit our Name and the Wamsutta Ticket to our Bleached Shirtings and Sheetings. We have, in addition to our former Trade-Mark, adopted the following, which will in all cases appear with this notice.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., June 1st, 1867.

Thos. Bennett Jr. Agent Wamsutta Mills.

OFFICE OF WAMSUTTA MILLS, NEW BEDFORD, September 1st, 1871.

It has been the constant endeavor of our Company for more than twenty years to improve the quality of the goods of our manufacture; so that our fabrics are fully equal to any in the market. We have just completed a New Mill, supplied with machinery of the most approved kinds, and have also added to the machinery in the mills previously built all the latest improvements; so that we are now making our goods finer, heavier, and handsomer than ever before.

The goods are of the full width represented, and not on a basis of 35 inches for a yard.

All the Standard Goods bear our Ticket and the above Trade-Mark, and may be relied on for quality and quantity, and as of our manufacture.

The Agents for the sale of our goods to Jobbers and Wholesale Dealers are ALMY & COMPANY, New York, 65 Leonard Street, cor. Church.

" " Boston, 88 Franklin Street.
CADBURY, THOMAS, & CO., Philadelphia, 921 Chestnut Street.
CHASE, STEWART, & CO., Baltimore, 27 German Street.

JOSEPH GRINNELL, President.
ANDREW G. PIERCE, Treasurer. THOS. BENNETT, JR., Agent.

NICOL & DAVIDSON, 686 Broadway,

Are receiving Novelties from Paris and London in
REAL BRONZES, COMPOSITION BRONZES, BISQUE GOODS,
FRENCH CHINA DINNER, DESSERT, AND TEA SERVICES,
VASES, PARIAN STATUARY (from Minton), MANTEL SETS,
GLASSWARE (from Baccarat),
GLASS CHANDELIERS (from Osler), SHEFFIELD TABLE CUTLERY, &c., &c.
ALSO, OF OWN MANUFACTURE,
GAS FIXTURES and FINE SILVER-PLATED WARE.

NEW YORK CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,

The oldest and best Music School in the country,
NOW OPEN FOR PRIVATE AND CLASS INSTRUCTION
In all branches of Vocal and Instrumental Music, Harmony and Composition, and the Modern Languages.
All Applications for Admission must be made at the
GENERAL CONSERVATORY OFFICES,
820 BROADWAY, near 12th St., over the Music Store.
(The branch at No. 82 Fifth Avenue removes up town.)
BROOKLYN BRANCH, 102, 104, & 106 COURT ST., near State.

WEBSTER'S PATENT
BUTTON-HOLE WORKERS.

Patented June 27, 1871.

One of the most important inventions of the age!
The most perfect Button-Hole Worker ever invented!

So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes, and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction.

The most liberal inducements offered to the trade.

Dry-Goods and Fancy-Goods Merchants find it an excellent selling article.

Local and traveling agents wanted every where.

Samples and terms, with full directions for use, sent prepaid on receipt of 50 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address

A. W. WEBSTER & CO., 599 Broadway, N. Y.

LUNDBORG'S
WHITE ROSE
AND OTHER PERFUMES
SURPASS ALL OTHERS.

LOOK! LOOK! LOOK!

A beautiful and useful article is the Universal Twine and Thread Cutter for ladies. It saves time, twine, thread, fingers, and teeth. Samples mailed on receipt of 25 cents. Address T. B. DOOLITTLE & CO., 599 Broadway, N. Y.

$290 For first-class Pianos—Sent on trial—No Ag'ts. Address U. S. PIANO CO., 865 B'dway, N. Y.

Better Than Gold!!!

UNDERWEAR,

HOSIERY, GLOVES,

Fine Furnishing GOODS.

UNION ADAMS & CO.,

637 BROADWAY.

LADIES!

Dr. Kennedy's Hair Tea will prevent the hair from falling out, and preserve its health and beauty. Sold by Druggists at $1.00 per bottle.

J. B. SMALL, Manufacturer of
CUT PAPER PATTERNS
for Ladies, Misses, Boys, and Children, of all ages and sizes. He furnishes all the Patterns issued with this paper. Illustrated Catalogue sent free. Address
J. B. SMALL, 648 Broadway, New York.

THE WELLINGTON OINTMENT.—For Rheumatism, Paralysis, Sprains, &c. Removes all stiffness, and renders the limb or part soft and pliable. ALEX. HUDNUT, Chemist, 218 Broadway, N. Y., Sole Agent.

WICKES' ECLECTIC OIL

Is Pure, Safe, Sweet, and Economical.
J. H. WICKES,
120 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

STARR & MARCUS,

No. 22 JOHN ST.

(UP STAIRS), N. Y.,
MAKE A SPECIALTY OF THE
GORHAM M'F'G COMPANY'S
STERLING SILVER-WARE.

Especial attention is requested to the many new and elegant pieces manufactured expressly to our order the past year, and quite recently completed.

An unusually attractive assortment of novelties in fancy silver, cased for wedding gifts, of an inexpensive character.

The works of the Gorham Company are very extensive, enabling them to employ the most accomplished talent in designing, skill in producing, and the best labor-saving machinery and method of manufacture, thus reducing the cost and bringing these beautiful wares within the reach of almost every purchaser.

The standard of this Silver is that of British Sterling, 925-1000.

DRESS TRIMMINGS.

IN ALL THE NOVELTIES.

The Paris Manufacturers having recovered from the effects of the war, and got into operation, we are enabled to offer DRESS TRIMMINGS and BUTTONS, all the richest and latest styles of BUTTONS, GIMPS, FRINGES, FEATHER and FUR TRIMMING, &c., &c., at

WHOLESALE and RETAIL

EDWARD A. MORRISON,
No. 827 Broadway, N.Y.,
BETWEEN TWELFTH AND THIRTEENTH STS.

TRADE-MARK.

"RUSSIAN GORED KNIT UNDERSKIRT,"

A NEW ARTICLE,

Invented and manufactured exclusively by the NORFOLK & NEW BRUNSWICK HOSIERY CO., upon their Patented Knitting Looms, being superior to flannel, much lighter, perfect in shape, and will not shrink nor change in color from washing.

ALSO,
FULL-FASHIONED HOSIERY,
consisting of
Ladies', Gents', Misses', and Boys' Underwear, of every description, superior in quality and style to all goods made in this country, and fully equal to the best hand-loom imported goods, and at greatly reduced prices.

Full lines for sale, to the jobbing trade only, at H. J. LIBBY & CO.'S, 47 & 49 White St., N. Y.

REAL JET JEWELRY.

We have just imported from Whitby, England, a large assortment of new patterns of Real Jet Jewelry, consisting of Earrings at $2, $2 50, $3, $3 50, $4 per pair.

Brooches, $2, $2 50, $3, $4, $5 each.
Crosses, $2, $3, $4, $5 each.
Lockets, $2 50, $3, $4, $5 each.
Bracelets, $4, $5, $6, $8, $9, $10 per pair.
Sets of Brooch and Earrings, $4, $5, $6, $8 a set.
Necklaces (beads), $5, $6, $8, $10 each.
Necklaces with Pendants, $6, $8, $10, $12, $15, $18 each.

We will send any of these to any part of the United States by mail, postpaid, on receipt of the price; and if not satisfactory they can be returned in the same way, and the money will be promptly refunded. In ordering please state if a plain or ornamental pattern is desired.

HOWARD & CO.,
Jewelers, No. 865 Broadway, New York.
Also Agents for Waltham Watches.

THEA-NECTAR

IS A PURE
BLACK TEA,
with the Green-Tea Flavor. Warranted to suit all tastes. For sale everywhere. And for sale wholesale only by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 8 Church St., N.Y. P.O. Box 5506
Send for Thea-Nectar Circular

HEART DISEASE. A POSITIVE CURE. Circular containing full information sent free. Address
DR. DE JULIEN, 218 East 13th Street, New York.

FREE. Please send your name and get specimen of STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, the liveliest family paper published. Circulars FREE to all. 75 cts. a year; 3 months, 10 cts. Specimens FREE. Address Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

Digitized by Google

THE BEAVER BRAND.

SILK-FINISHED
BLACK PURE MOHAIRS.

These GOODS are finished alike on both sides, and are distinguished for their silky appearance, brilliant lustre, and pure shade of fast Black. Being made of the very finest material, they positively excel all other Mohairs ever sold in the United States.

These splendid Goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

☞ Purchasers will know these Goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Beaver, precisely like the above.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 & 429 Broadway, New York,
Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

LADY'S TROUSSEAU "A"

FOR $150.

8 Muslin Chemises	@ $2 00..	$6 00
8 Linen "	@ 4 75..	14 25
1 Bridal Set (3 pieces)		12 00
8 Pairs Muslin Drawers	@ 2 00..	6 00
3 " Linen "	@ 2 75..	8 25
3 Plain Cotton Skirts	@ 2 25..	6 75
3 Tucked " "	@ 3 00..	9 00
3 Muslin Night Dresses	@ 3 50..	10 50
3 Tucked Cambric Night Dresses	@ 5 00..	15 00
3 Embr'd " " "	@ 7 00..	21 00
1 Flannel Skirt		5 00
1 " " Embroidered		8 25
2 Corset Covers	@ 3 25..	6 50
2 Dressing Sacques	@ 3 50..	7 00
1 Robe de Chambre		14 50
		$150 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent, C. O. D., by Express. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials.

LORD & TAYLOR,
BROADWAY & TWENTIETH ST.,
NEW YORK.

R. H. MACY.

We are now and shall be receiving throughout the season our goods selected by myself,
DIRECT from LONDON,
DIRECT from PARIS,
DIRECT from VIENNA,
DIRECT from BERLIN,
DIRECT from ROME,
DIRECT from NAPLES,
DIRECT from SWITZERLAND,
Including all the novelties, which we shall sell at the lowest possible price.

FOURTEENTH STREET AND SIXTH AVENUE.

BLEES
NOISELESS,
LOCK-STITCH
SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion. Call and examine. Send for circular. Agents wanted.

MANUFACTURED BY
BLEES
Sewing Machine Co.,
623 Broadway, N. Y.

FOR
Hand and Machine Sewing.
J. & P. COATS'
BEST
SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,
From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY
All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

GLYCERINE CAKE.

RAWOLLE'S TOILET GLYCERINE CAKE is unequaled for Washing, Shaving, Shampooing, Tooth Soap, and Baby Wash; produces a clear, soft, white skin, and prevents pimples and chapping. Warranted over one-half pure Glycerine. For sale by druggists. MARX & RAWOLLE, Manufacturers of Glycerine, 179 William St., New York.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

will make a magnificent display of VELVET, SILK, AND POPLIN SUITS, in all the new Cloth Shades.

Also, A SPLENDID ASSORTMENT
of
PARIS AND LONDON MADE
CHILDREN'S SUITS AND DRESSES,
ELEGANTLY TRIMMED.

And will also offer a fresh importation of PARIS-MADE
VELVET SACQUES AND BASQUES,
PARIS-MADE SEAL-SKIN SACQUES,
$40 each, upward.

PARIS AND LONDON ASTRAKHAN SACQUES AND JACKETS,
$20 each, upward.

PARIS-MADE BLACK CLOTH CLOAKS,
$7 each, upward.

With an immense stock of
PLAIN AND EMBROIDERED POLONAISES,
in
CASHMERE and DRAPS D'ETE,
the latest novelties, &c.

MISSES' AND CHILDREN'S SACQUES AND JACKETS,
In Cloth, Plush, and Velveteen.

Strangers and Customers are respectfully invited to EXAMINE.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH & 10TH STREETS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

DRESS GOODS,
Greatly Reduced.

FRENCH ALL-WOOL PLAIDS,
at 35 cents, former price 50 cents,
at 50 cents, former price 75 cents;
at 65 cents, former price 85 cents;
at 75 cents, former price $1.

FRENCH SATINES, ALL WOOL,
at 50 cents, former price 65 cents;
at 60 cents, former price 80 cents;
at 75 cents, former price $1.

FRENCH ALL-WOOL SERGES,
at 50 cents, former price 75 cents;
at 60 cents, former price 85 cents;
at 75 cents, former price $1.

All the above in the CLOTH SHADES.

FANCY SILKS.

300 Pieces at 75 cents, reduced from $1.
175 Pieces at $1, reduced from $1 25.
200 Pieces at $1 25, reduced from $1 50.
150 Pieces at $1 50, reduced from $2.
Rich FAILLE and ARMURE SILKS, in all the NEW CLOTH SHADES, for COSTUMES.
BLACK SILKS, of every grade, at very low prices.

INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS.

FURS,
Ladies' and Children's, viz.: Sable, Ermine, Mink, Black Marten, Chinchilla, Seal, and many special novelties which can only be found at their establishment.

FUR ROBES,
a large assortment.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street.

Figures will not lie!
How Large Fortunes are made!
☞ FACTS FOR THE PEOPLE. ☜
☞ SEE the prices at which four of the leading Sewing Machines are sold in the UNITED STATES, and ENGLAND.

	Price in England.	In the U. S.
Wheeler & Wilson	$45.00	$85.00
New Singer - -	32.50	65.00
Elias Howe - -	35.00	65.00
Wilson Shuttle -	40.00	45.00

The above Prices are for exactly the same classes of machines as sold in both Countries. There is scarcely any difference in the cost of material and labor in any of the above named machines.

☞ AFFIDAVIT.—W. G. Wilson, President of the Wilson Sewing Machine Co., personally appeared before me, and made oath that the above prices are correct, and taken by him from Circulars published in the United States and England under the corporate names of the Companies manufacturing said machines. FRED. SMITH,
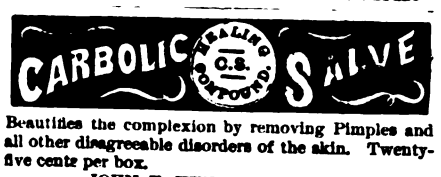
Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas of Cuyahoga Co., O.

The WILSON SEWING MACHINES are for Sale in most every County in the United States, and
No. 707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

GETTING UP CLUBS.
Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.



Beautifies the complexion by removing Pimples and all other disagreeable disorders of the skin. Twenty-five cents per box.

JOHN F. HENRY, Sole Proprietor,
No. 8 College Place, New York.

CURLS! One package of Prof. LEOS' MAGIC COMPOUND will instantly Curl the straightest hair of either sex (without injury) into WAVY ringlets or heavy massive Curls, in every case, or money refunded. 25 cents per package, postpaid, or three for 50 cents. E. HOLBROOK, Uxbridge, Mass.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns,
For Ladies, Misses, Girls, and Children of Both Sexes.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Our business will be conducted in a spirit of progress. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue of 28 pages, containing over two hundred figures, showing the leading fashions of the day. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, ranging from 30 to 46 inches bust measure; also for misses from 10 to 16 years of age, and for children of both sexes under 10. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent to any address free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a list of two valuable premiums, both of which are offered to subscribers for Harper's Bazar. One subscriber will get at least one of these premiums, and we confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premiums offered to each and every new subscriber for the Bazar have no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land. For terms to Agents, or for catalogues, address

JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
548 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—Read the following extraordinary offer: The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Co. manufacture and warrant two different Sewing Machines, one called the Elliptic, the other called the Wheeler & Wilson. The Elliptic Machine excels in many important points. It is so light that a child can run it with ease; or an invalid, whose strength is sufficient to walk about the house or to do the work of a child ten years old, can sew all day without being overfatigued. It is impossible to convey by language a tithe of the merits belonging to this deservedly popular Machine. To see it perform the different operations, such as hemming, felling, gathering, embroidering, tucking, cording, frilling, quilting, fringing, etc., it seems more like a thing of life than a machine moved by the will of the operator. It has adjustable guages for every description of work, and can be changed in a moment to suit any material, coarse or fine. The economy of the Elliptic Machine in a family is almost incredible—with one, a good operator can do the work of twelve hands. A breadth of a skirt can be sewed in less than a minute; a gentleman's fine shirt can be made in three hours; or a child's dress, with many tiny pleats, in less time than the hands can fold them—in fact, every description of sewing is reduced from a question of hours to one of minutes. We make the following offer: Any person in the United States desiring one of these celebrated Machines can buy one and pay for it in work (not sewing) furnished at their own home. The work is pleasant and profitable, and can be accomplished by any lady, old or young. We send circulars on receipt of stamp. Address

ELLIPTIC SEWING MACHINE CO.,
548 Broadway, New York.

PATENTS Solicited by MUNN & CO., Publishers of Scientific American, 37 Park Row, New York.
Twenty-five years' Experience.
Pamphlets containing Patent Laws, with full directions how to obtain Patents, free.
A bound volume of 118 pages, containing the New Census by counties and large cities, 140 Engravings of Mechanical Movements, Patent Laws and Rules for obtaining Patents, mailed on receipt of 25 cents.

Removes tarnish quickly, without injury to the goods. Sold by Jewelers, Druggists, Grocers, Furnishing Stores &c. S. M. MILLER Sole Proprietor, 65 Liberty Street, N.Y. Send stamp for sample.

RIFLES, Shot-Guns, Revolvers, Gun Material. Write for Price-List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents wanted.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

☞ New Subscribers will be supplied with either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR, from the present time to the end of the year 1872, for Four Dollars.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 50 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Cut Paper Patterns
OF
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS
IN
HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	" 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 13
POSTILION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 15
SHORT-SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 17
LADY'S TRAVELING SUIT	" 21
MISS'S POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 7 to 15 years old)	" 23
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)	" 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)	" 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)	" 29
BOY'S BLOUSE, SHIRT-WAIST, and KNICKERBOCKERS (for Boy from 4 to 9 years old)	" 31
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)	" 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt)	" 35
MARGUERITE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 37
LOUIS XIV. POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 39
VEST-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 41
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER	" 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 44
GENTLEMAN'S DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP	" 46

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$250 A Month easily made with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Secure Circular and Samples, free. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

Valuable New Books,
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

ABBOTT'S LOUIS PHILIPPE. The History of Louis Philippe. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Frederick the Great," &c. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20. (Uniform with Abbotts' Illustrated Histories.

THE PREY OF THE GODS. A Novel. By FLORENCE MARRYAT (Mrs. Ross Church), Author of "Her Lord and Master," &c. 8vo, Paper, 30 cents.

THE STUDENT'S ANCIENT HISTORY OF THE EAST. From the Earliest Times to the Conquest by Alexander the Great. Including Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Media, Persia, Asia Minor, and Phœnicia. By PHILIP SMITH, B.A., Author of "The History of the World." Illustrated. Uniform with The Students' Series. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

NAST'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC FOR 1872. With nearly 150 Illustrations, from Original Designs by Thomas Nast, made expressly for this Almanac. Crown 8vo, Paper, 30 cents; Four Copies, $1 00.

THE RISE AND FALL OF THE PARIS COMMUNE. With a full Account of the Bombardment, Capture, and Burning of the City. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE, an Eye-Witness of the Events described, Editor of "Harper's Hand-Book of European Travel," "Harper's Phrase-Book," &c. With a Map of Paris and Portraits from Original Photographs. Large 12mo, 516 pages, Cloth, $2 00.

JOSHUA MARVEL. A Novel. By B. L. FARJEON, Author of "Grif." 8vo, Paper, 40 cents.

KINGSLEY'S WEST INDIES. At Last: a Christmas in the West Indies. By CHARLES KINGSLEY. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

ANNE FURNESS. A Novel. By the Author of "Mabel's Progress," "The Sacristan's Household," "Veronica," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

NEW EDITIONS
OF BOOKS
PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

ROBERTSON'S SERMONS. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

STUDENT'S GREECE. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE PSALMS. Vol. I. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON. Vol. II. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

WILLSON'S NEW SPELLER AND ANALYZER. 12mo, Half Bound, 45 cents.

MARKHAM'S FRANCE. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

UPHAM'S MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. 12mo, Sheep, $1 50.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

Digitized by Google

"SAUCE FOR THE GANDER."

N'T ENJOY YOUR SUPPER, NOW YOU HAVE LOST YOUR GRUMBLE ABOUT TEN HOURS' WORK, GRUMBLE FOR ME, AS I'VE DONE FOURTEEN, AND AIN'T FINISHED YET."

calling m, was d it be-whirlsh was all the
at the ting in fright-

e been r, and there-cause ws on fool, was occa-

npro-
, and when with him ou's

A SCOTCH ENTOMOLOGIST AND HIS GUEST.

There is a story, perhaps forgotten by all but men who were students at a certain college nearly thirty years ago, of an enthusiastic professor of entomology, not celebrated for his exercise of hospitality, who was so delighted at the arrival of an eminent pursuer of insects that he invited him to board and bed in his chambers. Next morning Dr. Macfly greeted his guest, "And how did ye sleep the nicht, Mester Beehemouth?"

"Not very well. A strange bed, perhaps. But—"

"Ah!" quoth the doctor, eagerly, "ye were just bitten by something, eh?"

"Well, to tell you the truth, doctor, I was."

"Just think of that! Bitten, war ye? Now can ye say it was any thing noteworthy that bit ye?—peculiar, eh?"

"Fleas, I think. But such chaps for biting I never saw in my life."

"I should think so, indeed" (with great glee). "They're Sicilian fleas. I imported them myself."

A CROTCHET.—Musical instruction can not fail to be good, because it is sound education.

Are auctioneers naturally a forbidding class of men?

Mummies do not look as though they were in a hurry; yet it is certain that at first they must have been pressed for time.

TREATING A DISCUSSION.—A party of gentlemen in a liquor saloon, disputing whether the American system of treating, or the European system of not treating, was preferable, couldn't settle the matter by talking, and so they went to work testing the matter by practice. First each man took a drink by himself. Then each man invited a single friend to drink. After that each single friend returned the compliment. And finally each man in the party—there were six of them—asked all the rest to drink. When all that was accomplished, not a soul in the room could tell where the discussion originated or what it was about.

POETICAL.—Could this gentleman have been poetic? He has a favorite pig, which he has called Maud. His explanation is that he did so because she is continually "coming into the garden."

CUSTOMER (to horse-dealer's boy). "Sent this horse to show me, eh? Where did your master get him?"

BOY. "Don't know, Sir."

CUSTOMER. "Is he quiet in harness?"

BOY. "Don't know, Sir."

CUSTOMER. "Will your master warrant him sound?"

BOY. "Don't know, Sir."

CUSTOMER. "Confound it, boy, what did your master tell you to say to me about the horse?"

BOY. "He telled me to say, 'Don't know, Sir,' to every thing as you asked me!"

A country school-master who asked a small pupil of what the surface of the earth consists, and was promptly answered, "Land and water," varied the question slightly, that the fact might be impressed on the boy's mind, and asked, "What, then, do land and water make?"

To which came the immediate response, "Mud."

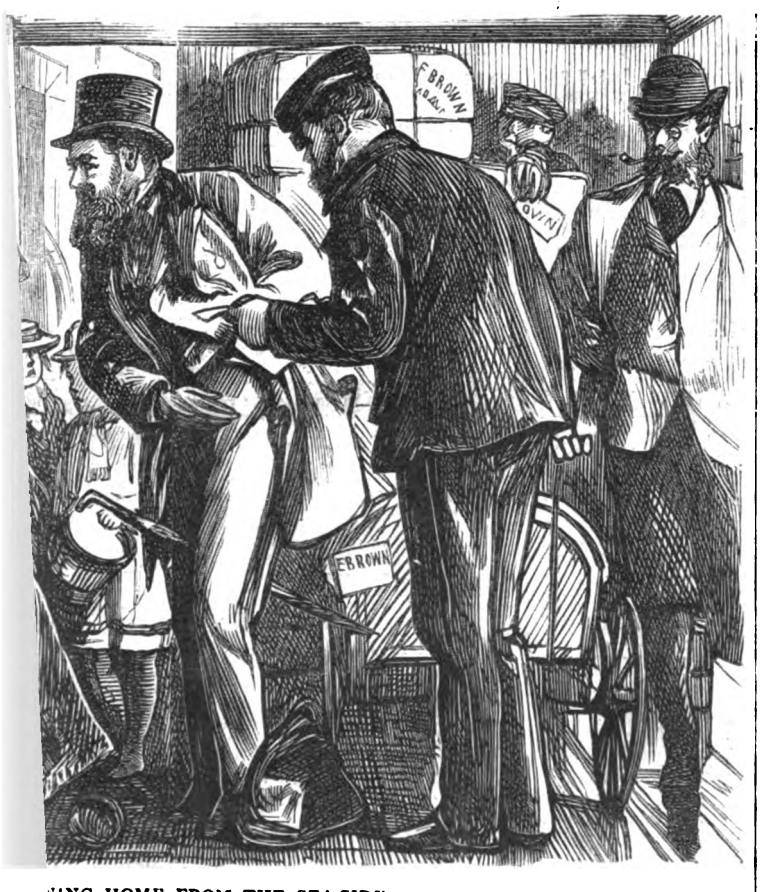
STEELING A MARCH.—A new drum has been invented, in which the head is made of steel instead of parchment. There is a fitness in this. Cold steel is more appropriate for so martial an instrument than the skin of the peaceful sheep.

ACTION!—An Alabama paper speaks of a colored orator as having "dislocated his shoulder in the peroration." He was evidently guilty of disjointed utterances.

If you were the wife of your grandmother's uncle's cousin's half-sister, what relation would you be to your uncle's grandfather's husband, and how many?

ECHO ANSWERS.—What does nature avoid?—A void.

"When a distinguished American dies," said a shrewd and sarcastic observer not long ago, "his admiring friends and countrymen immediately resolve to build him a magnificent monument, and then—they don't build it."



NING HOME FROM THE SEA-SIDE.

ho has a Face-Ache. Poor Materfamilias, who originated the Trip, is in despair at all the rfamilias endeavors to console her with the reflection that he knew how it would be; but althy place that, with Care and Doctoring, they will soon be nearly as well as if they had emplating Paterfamilias and his little group. His interest is totally untinged with envy.

INDIGESTION DELICATELY DESCRIBED.

MAMMA. "Where is your Pain, my Darling?"

EDITH. "Oh, just in that place where a Doll's Wax ends, and it goes all the way down to my Legs!"

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 47.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Frame-work Worsted Square Shawl worn as a Hood.

As full directions for making frame-work were given on page 36 of Harper's Bazar, No. 3, Vol. IV., we presume that our lady readers are already familiar with it, and we shall, therefore, only refer to its principal features. The implements for this work consist of a common wooden board (not a frame, as the name of the work would indicate), a drawing-board or the top of a table may also be used, wire pins an inch and one-fifth long without a head, ruled frame paper, and a long tape-needle. The material used for frame-work consists of zephyr and split zephyr worsted and floss silk. The threads must first be stretched, and then worked together at the intersecting points. Before stretching the threads cut the pattern of the article to be worked; or if the latter has straight edges—as, for instance, a scarf or shawl—cut a piece of the corresponding size from the frame paper above referred to, which is furnished with vertical and horizontal lines that cross each other at right angles, as well as with diagonal lines. The diagonal lines cross the straight lines at their intersecting points. Fasten this piece of paper on the board by means of the wire pins, by driving the pins a quarter of an inch into the board on the outer edge of the paper at regular intervals, indicated by the lines. In doing this care must be taken that the pins stand exactly opposite each other on each two opposite sides of the pattern, and that the vertical lines run parallel with the middle line, in case there is such a line. As the threads are stretched more or less closely according to the pattern used, the pins must, of course, be driven in at lesser or greater distances from each other.

In stretching the threads two or more layers must be laid on each other, according to the design, always beginning with those threads which form the outside of the article, so that the threads for the under side are thus stretched last. The laying on of the stretching threads is done by means of one or more small loops, which are laid on one of the outer pins; in order to fasten the threads, and at the same time to furnish the finished parts with a firm outer edge, wind the threads several times on the pins, laying them alternately before and behind the pins (see illustration, Fig. 5, page 36, Harper's Bazar, No. 3, Vol. IV.) To work the stretched threads together, use the tape-needle and a long thread. Pass one-half of the needle through the next intersecting point underneath all the threads, lay the thread on the point of the needle as for a button-hole stitch, and draw the needle and thread through the loop thus formed until the latter is closed: in doing this, however, draw the part of the working thread before the loop tight with the thumb and forefinger of the left hand. When the thread is used up, tie a new piece to the short end of the thread. On the stretching threads wound on the outer edge of the part work long button-hole stitches with the working thread. In making garments consisting of several pieces, work each part separately, and then sew the finished pieces together. Illustration, Fig. 6, page 749, belonging to Frame-work Half-fitting Jacket, page 748, and Figs. 1–14 on page 36 of Harper's Bazar, No. 3, Vol. IV., will more plainly show the manner of executing this work.

The shawl worn as a hood, as shown by the accompanying illustration, is fifty inches square, and is worked with white zephyr worsted. The simple design of the foundation consists of rows of worsted balls. For these first stretch a worsted strand twelve threads thick in diagonal lines two-fifths of an inch apart in the direction from left to right, then from right to left. Over this strand stretch a double worsted thread, first in vertical and then in horizontal directions, upon which work all the layers of thread together firmly at the intersecting points. After taking the work from the pins cut through the worsted strands, without touching the remaining stretching threads, exactly in the middle between every two intersecting points. The balls thus formed are clipped round with the scissors. For the fringe, which is five inches deep, fasten in worsted strands nine inches and three-quarters long. In arranging the shawl fold it three-cornered, form a deep pleat on both sides of the middle of the front, cross the ends in front, and fasten the corners on the top of the head with a velvet bow, as shown by the illustration.

CROCHET SLEEVELESS JACHET.—[See Page 740.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 36 and 37.

FRAME-WORK WORSTED SQUARE SHAWL WORN AS A HOOD.

ALL-SOULS DAY.

DURING the whole of All-souls Day, the 2d of November, and on the evening that precedes it, the cemeteries in most Continental countries are crowded with visitors, availing themselves of the recurring anniversary to renew their sorrow and their prayers at the graves of their departed friends. Sex, age, grade, rank, and calling are disregarded: the nobleman, driven in his coach and attended by his servants, is there beside the tattered mendicant. It is true, one directs his steps toward the gorgeous monument of sculptured marble, while the other shuffles or creeps toward the fosse commune, there to single out one of the countless wooden crosses which marks his goal; but their object is common, their grief is common, and their devotions are common.

The rich man may take from the obsequious hands of the lackey who follows him a key, and unlock the door of the richly adorned chapel which covers the vault of his ancestors, and contains the remains of wife or child; he can shut himself in, and within those marble walls, which protect his privacy, he can indulge his grief and his contemplations; but the pauper, though kneeling beneath the canopy of heaven, is scarcely less alone. The common feeling which has brought together that vast multitude constitutes his security.

If we would see a new, a striking, and, we may add, a suggestive sight, we must stand on an eminence and take a survey of the whole cemetery. The effect of the countless crosses, bouquets, wreaths, and crowns in all their variegated brilliancy, and, as

CROCHET FICHU WITH BASQUE.—[See Fig. 13, Page 749.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Fig. 35.

Digitized by Google

the day shortens, the scattered taper lights and lamps distributed over the small gardens and inclosures, is imposing in the extreme, and offers a singular contrast to the normal aspect of this silent little city of chapels and monuments. In the centre of all this is reared the central cemetery cross on its turfy mound, which is thickly covered with crowns and wreaths—a united memorial to the departed, contributed by all who have been brought together to indulge a common feeling, perhaps the noblest of our nature—a typical expression of a simultaneous cry—the whispered voice of many faithful resounding that day in heaven—the golden link of hope and love between the living and the dead.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1871.

HARPER'S WEEKLY contains ONE-THIRD more Reading Matter, a larger number of Illustrations, and is conspicuously better Edited and Printed than any other Illustrated Newspaper.

☞ Persons desiring to renew their Subscriptions to HARPER'S PERIODICALS will much oblige the Publishers by sending in their Names as early as convenient BEFORE THE EXPIRATION OF THEIR PRESENT SUBSCRIPTIONS. This will obviate the delay attendant upon re-entering names and mailing back Numbers.

For Terms, etc., see Advertisement on page 751.

☞ A Cut Paper Pattern of a new and stylish Lady's House Dress, with Plain Waist, Apron-front Over-Skirt, and Walking Skirt, will be published with our next Number. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement in our last Number.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain a choice variety of Patterns, Illustrations, and Descriptions of Ladies' Evening Dresses, Redingotes, Jackets, Talmas, Paletots, Fichus, and Cravats; Children's Dresses and Wrappings; Fancy-work Articles for Holiday Gifts, Footstools, Chair Cushions, etc., etc.

GOSSIP.

THE sojourner in great cities, returning to his native place, probably some country town of more or less importance, is almost always, we may say, at first amazed and then distressed by the tone of the daily conversation which awaits him. He has been accustomed—in Washington, for instance—to hear the nobler sort of politics discussed, politics that have sloughed off all their primary baseness of caucuses and frauds, and have risen into lofty altitudes; he has been preoccupied with measures and affairs of state; his mind has been illuminated with wide considerations of public good and of justice, the opening of new lands, the welfare of old races; or, in New York, he has been a part of immense enterprises, or has, at least, touched their outskirts; he has been a link in that golden chain of commerce which binds all the peoples of the earth together; or, in Boston, his talk and that of his neighbors has been of art and philosophy and music; or if it is not precisely such themes, in these or other places, which have kept his attention, it is themes of a similar magnitude.

He returns to his birth-place and the people whom he loves, only to find them taking "The rustic murmur of their bourg

For the great wave that echoes round the world;"

and he hears hardly any thing else mentioned than the peculiarities of this one, the peccadilloes of that one, the follies of the other, the characteristics, crimes, and clothes of all the rest—quite as if there were no absorbing interests, no enticing subjects or speculations, ready for the lips of these "heirs of all the ages." He finds the universe narrowing down on him like the man who saw his prison walls daily contracting to crush him; his world becomes a vacuum, his thoughts mere barrenness. "For the love of Heaven," he presently cries, "talk of things, and not persons!" What to him and what to them is the relation of Mrs. Grey's bonnet to the back of her head? Why shall he be glad or sorry that Mrs. Black's India shawl is discovered, after all, to be imitation? Does it afford him pleasure to be told that this entertaining gentleman starves his wife, that that one can well dispense his elegant hospitality when he cheated a widow and her orphans out of house and home in settling the estate? Why can he be not left to his enjoyment in admiring a handsome woman without being instructed in ghastly secrets of her toilette? Why must the innocence of youth, the loveliness of beauty, be perpetually spelled to him by hints of evil temper, of bad blood, of corrupt habits? Are lies a healthy diet? And since all these people are of the same human flesh and blood, are not such statements more likely to be false than true? And, whether false or true, are they able to help him on in life toward the goal of ambition, or of chosen work, or to the great task of making his own soul white for the searcher's eye? This simple village, that he supposed to be a minor Arcady, he would find peopled, if he could believe the half he heard, with a race of idiots, profligates, and peculators. His soul revolts within him. He asks if the charm of virtue, to and for itself alone, be strong enough to keep any one clean who knows that, let what will be done, slander shall follow it. And aware that presently, in the nature of things, the fangs must be in his own flesh, he either flies the place or drifts into deserving the worst.

We do not mean to say that gossip and scandal do not exist in the large cities, and sometimes in a more virulent form than the rural centres are capable of producing it; but better things are never beyond the reach of all their residents, and people there are kept alive to great thoughts if only by the yells of the newsboys in the streets.

In very truth, as we all know, wherever gossip is cherished, it degenerates into slander, becomes scandal, creates a relish for stronger meat, and no soul within its sound is safe. Has he the make and mien of a god? Yes. But he drinks. Is her benevolence a by-word? Yes. But charity covers a multitude of sins. Lovely? Yes. But then, you know, her mother— To every one, in short, is allowed that which is indisputable, and that only; and, as if human nature were in danger of too heavenly virtue, to every one a counterbalancing "but" that hides the latter end in darkness—a pregnant, sinister, and awful "but!" For no one is there any gilding of the lily allowed; the business is to soil, not to sweeten; to pull down, not to build up; to trample on, not to lift; to tear to pieces, not to heal and make whole.

There are instances of those who having endured great poverty or great worldly disaster, and failed to see God's providence in it, or to have faith that there was a providence in it even if unseen, in whom we can understand the source and meaning of such bitter feeling, and pity if not pardon it—pure envy though the feeling be, envy disguised under the mask of criticism or fastidiousness. But those who are warm in the sunshine of prosperity, and who yet fling their shafts of suspicion or affirmation into the lives and reputations of others, have certainly no claim to any regard or region but such as DANTE gave them. From what malignant spirits must their whispers come! What a poisonous place do they make the earth around them, as the dragons vomiting flame did in the old myths! What pleasure could they ever have in heaven, where the archangels are beyond the reach of their arrows!

It has been in our experience to know a woman, brilliant, beautiful, well-born, and good, beset by the voice of slander, hounded from her home, hounded to proud, innocent death, to death in the open streets of a great city; but to no one could this moral murder be traced, for the first rumors had risen like exhalations from the ground around her, the ascription of a wrong motive, the utterance of a presumed possibility, swelling and growing with a hue and cry till all the dogs were at her throat. Such things, they say, do not exist with the duello; but we deny it. In the one place we have the whispered and spoken insinuation; in the other, the shrug of the shoulder, the lifting of an eyelash, does the work as well. We have seen, too, a man who for twenty years lived under a ban that was a daily crucifixion, accused of setting the fires that ravaged his place of residence, and, although detectives and police proved him guiltless, never acquitted by the acquaintances who saw his pallor on the mornings after every fresh fire, his face knotted with suffering, his sensitive shrinking under the consciousness of their unceasing scrutiny. Why, when at length the confessed incendiary was found and punished, he did not drop down dead from the very rebound at thought of the new free life, the new skies under which he was to walk, the new faces he was to meet, could only have been because in his twenty years of torture he had learned how to despise any and all opinions that those faces could mirror. But how the men and women who had ruthlessly and thoughtlessly made his life a burden to him dared to meet his glance, is among the inscrutable mysteries. Yet we are sure that one place in the world, bubbling over "with gossip, scandal, and spite," has been purified even through fire. Well if all our households and villages were the same, though it required the humiliation of every creature who, in sewing-circle or reading-room, rolls the "sweet morsel under the tongue!"

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Invisible Writing.

MY DEAR MILO,—Writing last week to Eustace, I said that when I was a boy I used, with other boys, to work miracles with lemon juice by writing upon a certain kind of paper, which, however, showed none of the characters until it was exposed to heat. A similar plan of writing with invisible inks has often been useful in war and diplomacy—which is a war of wits; and I remember with what innocent eagerness I privately held to the fire pieces of blank paper which I had picked up, vaguely wondering whether some wonderful secret would not be revealed to me. I have not lost that habit, although now it takes a different form. It is not the writing, but the real significance of the writing which I now wait for and trust to warmth to reveal. Only yesterday I received a letter from an old friend, which, as I read it, was as blank as this surface upon which I am writing, although the paper was covered with words that were distinct and plain. It was grammatical, and the words were intelligible, and I could readily follow the obvious sense, but I was conscious that the meaning was hidden.

I reflected that my correspondent, an old friend, had called upon me some time before, and that in the press of many matters—which you can not imagine because you know me only as the most unoccupied of men, and yet, on the day when I am to pay the premium of my life-insurance, the event hurries and confuses me more than the myriad payments of a great business confuse its managers—I say that in the press of that day I was, perhaps, not so cordial as usual to my friend, and he had, probably, been a little hurt, and the hurt and the coldness showed themselves in the letter, entirely courteous, but not cordial, as is his wont. Indeed, the letter was like one of those beautiful May days in New England which, while the sun still shines and there is no cloud, are suddenly chilled by the east wind, so that the sun is a mockery, and the beauty of the landscape is like apples of Sodom: the form of summer is untouched, but the soul is fled.

So, as I held the letter to my heart, as it were, its real meaning appeared, and it was a manly and grieved protest against my supposed fickleness. The more my friendship warmed the letter, the more distinctly the invisible writing was revealed. I was like a general who receives a dispatch, in which, judging by the words, he seems to be informed that there is a full supply of bacon and molasses upon the way; but when he studies it carefully he perceives that the same letters spell different words, and that the real and chief significance of the dispatch is that his disaffection is suspected. My heart revealed the meaning of my friend's dispatch, and I wrote him accordingly. And how many a book is written with invisible ink in the same way! It is all a blank to a thousand patient plodders, but a blessing to the one who reads with interpreting warmth in his eyes. One of the common jests about Browning is that when his "Sordello" was published, Douglas Jerrold, who was ill in the country, and read all the new books from town, opened the poem eagerly and began to read. Presently his wife heard him calling, and hastening in, fearing to find him worse, he said to her, "My dear, will you read this, and tell me what you think of it?" And when, after a futile struggle, she replied that she could not understand a word of it, he exclaimed, energetically, "Thank God! for I thought I was losing my wits."

To a distinctively British mind "Sordello" was invisible writing. But I have known men and women who as they read it were transported to the Italy of the Middle Ages; the Italy to which the old Lombard cathedrals point; the Italy of mingled romance and crime, of barbarism and civilization; the age of Rudel and the troubadours; the time that we all so vaguely and inadequately conceive. They say that to read it is to lie dreaming under the shadow of cypresses upon a terrace in the Villa d'Este—to behold in the picturesque masquerade of an age remote the passions and the genius which are always the same, because they are those of human nature. More than old histories teach of those times, and of all times, these persons find in the poem of "Sordello." Jerrold would sneer or smile, as his mood chanced to be, that they gazed into the dark, and peopled the fog with their own fancies. But I should not wonder if the poem were an invisible writing which was truly blank to his cold eye, but which to their warm sympathy reveals an exquisite meaning. How often have I not heard some one read what seemed an idle rhyme with a tone of rollicking fun and a ludicrous ting-a-ling-ling! But when I read it a great fire seemed suddenly to blaze up in my heart, and the lines were full of the tenderest and most melancholy music. It is not that I am a great critic, or that I am gifted with profound insight, but only that on what seems to be a blank surface warmth reveals a writing full of significance.

I think we find this kind of writing elsewhere than on paper and in books. A young man or boy prefers one person among all those whom he is in the habit of seeing. With some persons he is painfully shy and awkward. He can not even command his grammar so as to speak correctly, and he seems to have nothing to say that is not contemptible. He burns and chafes inwardly, and to escape is to be relieved of an incubus of himself. Other persons silence him. He longs to speak; and if, indignant at the constraint, he bursts into words, it is only to regret it, and to doom himself to further silence. Others, again, make him volatile, extravagant, foolish. Like a tipsy man, he giggles and laughs hysterically, and says a hundred things which vainly he would unsay. Coarse jokes and foul innuendoes flow from his lips, and the youth is startled and ashamed of himself, which does not seem to be himself, but some foolish changeling. Then comes the person whom of all men the youth prefers. His coming is like that of the cool, serene, dewy morning after a night of fever and passion. Once more the world is created. Once more hope and faith and purity seem no bewildered estrays in the world, but the familiar facts of life. This person—for it may be either a man or a woman—quickens every noble pulse in the young man's heart. He is master of himself. It is easy for him to speak, and he is surprised by the thick-thronging thoughts that occur to him. Whatever is noble and generous seems to him best, and in that moment and in that presence he feels that he is truly himself. He is right, that glowing, blooming, beautiful youth—the youth in whom once more Apollo comes, and all heroes and holy men are possible. He is right; and when he believes and hopes and loves he is most himself. All that is the meaning of his being, and that is revealed upon the daily blank of his life by the warm and lofty and inspiring sympathy of the man whom his heart follows. That sympathy is the heat that reveals the invisible writing, and lo! it is a hymn of praise.

Do we not see the same truth illustrated among others of our fellow-passengers? One of the loveliest whom I have ever known was Lucy, and I think Wordsworth must have known another very like her, or he could never have been so fond of that simple name. Every body said that she was the most amiable little woman that was ever known, but nobody said much more. Always modest, attentive, obliging; the small duties of her life were all punctually done. Her parents were not rich; the family was large, and Lucy, the oldest child, was nurse and doctor and maid and cook and lady, and whomsoever else she was required to be. She was very comely, and in her dress and her manner there was nothing rude or careless or without taste. "Oh yes; sweet as sugar," said every body; "but as flavorless. She has no snap; no character: it is all monotonous goodness." She seemed a surface unsullied, indeed, but blank. And when I used to hear Melodio sing Moore's lines—

"Take back the virgin page,
White and unwritten still;
Some hand more calm and sage
The leaf must fill"—

I turned and looked at Lucy, who listened without the least sentimentality in her aspect, and I said to myself, half in despair, that she was that white page, and unwritten she would remain forever.

Now if we do not see any thing, the reason is not necessarily that there is nothing to be seen—it may be that we are blind. By-and-by Harry came into the village where Lucy lived, and where I was then living. We had all thought her a blank page; but was Memnon dumb because through the night he was a stone image, and did not fill the world with music until the dawn touched his lips? Was there nothing written upon the paper which the prisoner held in his hand because it seemed all a blank, until the warm sunshine revealed the writing that directed him how surely to escape? Harry came, and Lucy was an unwritten page no longer. Her very beauty deepened and was transfigured—"another, yet the same." All the character that had seemed to be only a possibility was at once a reality. Yesterday she was "a goody;" to-day wit, feeling, intelligence, were all positive and fascinating. The effect was most ludicrous. None of the young fellows had ever thought of being in love with Lucy, when suddenly Harry came, and every youth was jealous. The reason was plain enough. Harry brought love, and in that divine heat all the celestial writing that had been invisible in Lucy was revealed in immortal beauty. Love was the interpreter. For the first time she knew herself when love came, and we also knew her. Harry had wrought a miracle, but it was a miracle of every day.

The consciousness of this invisible writing makes one very patient of those who are called commonplace people. To a man who has once found a diamond in a dust heap, even dust is valuable for its possibilities; and he who, by holding it to the fire, has drawn from the blankest paper the precious secret inscribed upon it, respects all blank papers afterward. Wait till the commonplace is tried by sympathy, and you will see a thousand times what uncommon qualities that warmth of sympathy discloses. Sometimes, indeed, the revelation will be grotesque, like Charles Lamb's silent man, whose silence and dullness he had decided to be a blank full of the most significant invisible writing. But, warmed by the prospect of dumplings for dinner, the writing suddenly appeared, and it was only "Them's the jockeys for me!" But, on the other hand, let a mishap befall the train or the steamer by which you are traveling, and the man who seemed to you so blank will suddenly shine all over with heaven's own characters of coolness, energy, and wise intelligence. Remember Memnon and invisible writing, dear Milo, and be patient.

Digitized by Google

Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CROCHETED AND KNITTED GARMENTS.

WE illustrate this week many pretty and useful garments made of Berlin wool. The best black and white zephyr wool, either single or double, is sold for from 12 to 15 cents an ounce; split zephyr is 20 cents an ounce; four and eight fold wool of common colors is 20 cents; high, bright colors, and the new gas-light green, blue, and shaded wools, cost from 20 to 35 cents an ounce. The Saxony yarn, finer than single zephyr, but coarser than split zephyr, is used for fine knitting and embroidery on honey-comb canvas. It costs 30 cents an ounce.

Breakfast shawls are now crocheted in Afghan or Tunisian stitch, as this firm stitch is not easily drawn out of shape. The ground is usually chinchilla wool; the border is embroidered, or is shaded scarlet or blue, and is edged with fringe. They cost from $4 50 to $8. Fringe is added this season to most crocheted garments. Ladies' sleeveless jackets for the house, and to be worn beneath cloaks, are crocheted of double zephyr, and shaped to the figure as prettily as any basque, fashioned by darts and side forms: price $4 50. Slashed sacques for small children are of bright blue or cherry double zephyr, in Afghan stitch, with white border of single zephyr in shell stitch: price $3 25. Those for infants are of split zephyr. A soft, warm scarf, called the sea-foam scarf, is of white double zephyr, in knotted shell stitch: price $2 50. Smaller scarfs for children are in stocking stitch, twenty-four rows lengthwise of the scarf: these are $1. Hoods for baby girls have a white split zephyr veil covering them, overwrought with silk floss: these are $2 50. Plainer ones, in Afghan stitch, are $1 50. For boy babies are white turbans in thick Afghan stitch, edged with a scallop of color, and a band of swan's-down: $1 50. Infants' shirts of fine Saxony yarn, knitted in ribs, are $1 25 to $2. For children in short clothes are heavy overalls of white wool, a combination of drawers and leggings, to be worn outside the shoes: price $2 50.

EMBROIDERY.

Preparation for the approaching gift season begins to be seen in the fancy stores, where are sold designs for the embroidery on canvas now so much in vogue for ornamenting fanciful articles of furniture. Fine embroideries in wool and silk are now imported with the design done in quarter stitch—that is, four small stitches in the place of one cross stitch. The purchaser then fills out the background with double cross stitch, oblong stitch, or some other simple stitch that is easily and quickly done, and is heavy enough to throw the fine work of the design into relief. Pale blue and Nile green "fillings" are much used, as they match Pompadour furniture, and display effectively the designs of shaded autumn leaves, now wrought on cushions, screens, and pillows. Gobelin designs in the faint tints of tapestry require dark, rich backgrounds. Beaded pieces, of white beads shaded to gray, and enlivened by a few black and gilt beads, are not new, but are liked because they can have a background of any color to correspond with the color that prevails in the room. The long, loose satin stitch is showy, but frays easily.

The pièce de résistance with ladies given to embroidery is a banner screen to place before the grate. Tropical flowers and fruits, with beautifully shaded leaves, are the designs for these. Sometimes they are framed, as a picture, in bamboo or in gilt frames; but the latest fancy is for a standard of rose-wood, ebony, or gilt, from which the banner swings. The wooden standard costs from $7 50 to $15; large bamboo frames are $16. Light-screens, for shading the eyes when reading or sewing by gas-light, are useful and pretty. They may also be held in the hand as fire-screens, as the handle can be separated from the stand. The small banner, wrought in beadwork, costs $3; in satin stitch, $4; in fine quarter stitch, $5. One pretty design for $5 50 has the background traced in pale blue silk stitches, requiring only to be crossed to complete the picture. The material for filling is furnished with this. The stands for light-screens are of gilt, porcelain of various colors, and of bronze, and cost from $3 to $6.

A stripe for the centre of an Oriental chair is also a favorite piece of embroidery. Those most sold have the design begun in cross stitch. They cost from $8 to $20, with zephyr wool furnished for completing them. Persian designs are admired for these chairs. Narrower stripes are sometimes added each side of the wide stripe. These cost from $4 to $16. Narrow bands for shawl straps, and long enough for bell-ropes, cost from $2 25 to $4. For a sofa-pillow are designs commenced in cross stitch, with materials for finishing, costing from $2 to $15. Slippers for gentlemen are worked on canvas, kid, cloth, or velvet; for ladies are Persian designs on velvet. Lambrequin drapery for brackets is shown wrought in Egyptian designs of mummies and sphinxes, some costing $25. For rugs, sofa-pillows, bed and carriage rugs, the Persian patterns are selected. For chamber furniture there are towel racks in designs of shaded beads, costing $2 50; the wooden frame for the rack is from $1 to $5. Frames for hat racks for a bedroom cost from $2 to $10; a medallion contains a monogram or bouquet of flowers wrought by the giver. A new gift for gentlemen is a spring boot-jack with an embroidered foot-rest: price $6. Another boot-jack is quite a piece of furniture, having an embroidered screen front: price $20. A slipper-holder is a case to be hung on the wall for holding slippers. The frame of walnut costs from $2 to $6, and the wrought piece on canvas $5. Hair, clothes, and hat brushes of rose-wood and of yellow ivory have medallions to be filled by the embroidered monogram of the owner.

GUIPURE AND POINT LACE WORK.

The guipure and point lace work introduced in this country by the Bazar has grown into great favor. Ladies make at small expense many tasteful and pretty things of guipure net, such as tidies, covers for cushions, vestibule and window curtains formed of alternate blocks of Swiss muslin and net, pillow shams, coverlets, and infants' afghans, with colored quilted silk lining. There has been some difficulty in obtaining the materials, but they are now found at all the fancy stores. Squares of plain guipure net, with twenty-five or twenty-six stitches in a square, are sold for 15 cents. This net is handmade, and may be cut without raveling. If larger pieces are required, another net is darned to these. A single square, mounted in a frame ready for working, with the design of the lace darned in one corner for a pattern, and the linen thread for darning, costs $1 25 or $1 50. It is cheaper, however, to buy a box of nine squares, with one pattern commenced, three extra patterns, and darning linen, for $3 50. Single squares, finished and ready for mounting on colored satin cushions, or to use as tidies, cost from 50 cents to $4.

Point lace is much used for pillow-slips, bureau covers, tidies, etc. The braid for making it costs from $1 to $1 25 a piece, measuring from twelve to eighteen yards. The linen thread necessary is like that used for guipure lace, and costs 7 cents for a small ball, or 50 cents for a spool of 500 yards.

FURS.

Boas of fur are the fashionable choice this season, notwithstanding collars are far more comfortable. These boas vary in length from a mere neck-tie to those two yards long; a yard and a half or three-quarters is the favorite length. When made of fur having long fleece the boa is round; the shorter furs, such as mink and seal-skin, are usually flat boas. Muffs are small and round, and the handsomest are furnished with thick faille ribbon, in preference to tassels of passementerie or fur.

The novelty this winter is sets of silver or black fox. These are very rare, and are as costly as Russian sable. The long fur is light gray, with occasionally a longer hair tipped with silver. It is as soft and downy as marabout feathers, and almost as perishable. A small muff of it costs $250. This fur is now prized above any other for trimming velvet cloaks. A border of fox fur half an inch wide on the leather side, making a trimming nearly three inches wide, as the fleece is long, costs from $10 to $12 a yard.

The black marten fur, sometimes called Alaska sable, is still considered exceedingly stylish. A set of it of excellent quality, consisting of long round boa and small muff, may be had for $25; some handsomer specimens cost $30 or $40. This is the popular and inexpensive fur trimming for cloth, cashmere, silk, and velvet. In selecting this trimming readers are advised to buy that costing $3 or $4 a yard, instead of lower-priced qualities, made worthless by dyes, or so badly dressed that the odor of the animal is discovered when the fur is worn in a warm room. A single narrow fur border, showing only two or three inches on the right side, is more stylish than a broader one or a double row of fur.

There is nothing new to relate of sables. Mink, though not so universally worn as formerly, is still a most desirable fur. Medium sets of dark mink of good quality cost from $60 to $80, according to length of boa; choicest dark mink sets are $125. Coarse light mink is sold very low.

Evening sets of ermine are small round muffs and very long boas, often more than two yards in length, wound around the neck. Fine sets cost from $45 to $55, according to the length of the boa. Very fine chinchilla sets are also worn on dressy occasions: price $50.

A boa and muff of fur seal make an inexpensive and serviceable set that will be worn by young ladies and misses. The boa costs from $5 to $25, the muff from $12 to $20.

Fur sacques, the most comfortable of all cloaks, are short this year, measuring from twenty-four to twenty-six inches, and are made quite loose below, or else slashed to give room for a bouffant tournure. The newest have bell-shaped sleeves (half-flowing), but the close coat sleeve is generally preferred. The sacque most in favor is of velvet-like fur seal, not in its natural wood brown color, but that dyed a dark maroon shade. These are often bordered with other furs; but plain, untrimmed sacques, handsomely fitted, are in best taste. $75 is the lowest price for a sacque of good sound seal-skin, and this will not be of finest quality; handsomer qualities cost from $100 to $150. The various curly furs called Astrakhan are still worn in sacques. The reader is warned against buying these at very low prices, as those sold for $25 or $30 are apt to be of unsound leather that will not last a single winter. It is better economy to pay a reliable furrier $40 for an Astrakhan sacque that he will warrant to be of good, sound skins, though not of fine quality. $75 buys a handsome curled fur sacque, and many cost as high as $150 or $200. Sets of these black furs are usually preferred for deep mourning.

For children there are sets of squirrel lock, made of the sides of the Siberian squirrel. The tiny muff and boa cost from $5 to $7. Sacques of white cony are shown for children of from three to twelve years, and are also made for infants: these cost from $13 to $20.

Fur turbans for gentlemen have higher round crowns than those formerly worn. Made of seal, the fashionable fur for gentlemen, they cost from $12 to $15; Astrakhan turbans are $6. The seal-skin facing on the collar and cuffs of a gentleman's overcoat costs from $30 to $40.

Carriage robes of white arctic fox fur are still the choice for ladies' use: they cost from $100 to $125.

For information received thanks are due, for fancy-work, to Messrs. A. SELIG; and JOHNSON, BURNS, & Co.; and for furs, to Messrs. C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS; F. W. LASAK'S SON; and D. D. YOUMANS.

PERSONAL.

PRESIDENT GRANT, while at Bangor during the recent grand railway celebration, did honorable duty as the national kisser. The editor of the Portland Tribune happened to be so near him when he kissed the great bevy of Bangor girls at Norambega Hall that he could bear witness to the fact that it was not a feat of mere passive endurance. He met the gay beauties half-way. His face was as impassive as ever, but there was unmistakable fire in his eyes. The girls were those who represented the several States in the procession, and, of course, it was in their representative rather than their personal character that they were kissed. Still, if there had been one hundred States, we are convinced the President would have performed his whole duty in the premises.

—JOHN RUSKIN says: "Though I have kind invitations enough to visit America, I could not even for a couple of months live in a country so miserable as not to possess any castles."

—It was recently reported that the Empress EUGÉNIE had completed a new history of MARY Queen of Scots. The work, however, was actually written by Professor PETIT, of Beauvais. The Empress, who is of Scotch descent, has taken great interest in the preparation of the book, and has supplied some historical papers bearing on the subject, but is not otherwise responsible for the authorship. The French professor approached his task with a firm belief in the guilt of Queen MARY, but was compelled by the evidence he discovered to change his opinion, and the book is another vindication of her reputation.

—"Mrs. Partington" is delivering a lecture in all those funny little villages in New England, without any subject. It contains no "views."

—Mr. GEORGE VANDENHOFF has a new history of the exodus from Eden. One chapter is as follows: "The devil drove woman out of Paradise, but he could not drive Paradise out of woman."

—How odd that Miss MIRIAM COLE, authoress of "The Sutherlands" and other novels, should become a "Mrs. HARRIS!"—a Mrs. SIDNEY S. HARRIS, of this city. To that extent has she changed her "local habitation and her name."

—RUBINI is said to have discovered a splendid tenor, of the name of DEVILEIER, at Boulogne. The owner of this desirable voice is now having it cultivated under the auspices of the discoverer.

—A prominent clergyman of Ohio, the Rev. GEORGE BROWN, D.D., died last week at Springfield, at the age of eighty. He was formerly president of a college at Uniontown, Pennsylvania, and had been a clergyman for fifty-six years.

—M. HANKE, the well-known banker, of Denmark, who lived many years in Paris, and owns a splendid residence on the Champs Elysées, was the chief counselor of the French Minister of Finance in conducting the heavy financial operations arising out of the German indemnity.

—THOMAS GADSDEN, a member of the historical old family of South Carolina GADSDENS, and once a prominent politician of that State, died last week, aged seventy-three.

—A London correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser intimates that Lord WALTER CAMPBELL, a brother of the Marquis of Lorne, is engaged to an American young lady of great personal attractions and considerable wealth, the daughter of a hotel proprietor in this city. Lord W. C. is third son of the Duke of Argyle, and is twenty-three years of age. He is, or was until recently, connected with an eminent mercantile house down town, and is said to display the proverbial aptitude and thrift of his countrymen.

—At present the ex-Emperor of France is compelled to rough it on an income of $25,000 a year; but when his wife realizes on her Spanish property it will be increased to $80,000.

—Madame MARIE SEEBACH has engaged to write fifty letters for the Presse, of Vienna, relating to what she saw and heard in this country.

—The Rev. JOEL S. EDWARDS, of Marshalltown, Tennessee, is said to have inherited a great estate in England. In 1772 ROBERT EDWARDS, his grandfather, leased to the crown a valuable piece of land for ninety-nine years. The lease expired on the 19th day of last July, and Mr. E. has received notice through BOARDMAN, BROWN, & WILLIAMS, of Marshalltown, that he, with thirty-four other persons, was heir to the estate, which has now reached the almost fabulous value of $82,000,000. Mr. EDWARDS is a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, having a charge in Grundy County, although his residence is in Marshalltown.

—Hon. RUSSELL GURNEY, Recorder of London, and now representing the British government at Washington on the Claims Commission, went to meeting at Mr. BEECHER'S church on the morning and evening of the last Sunday in October. Commodore ASHBURY ditto in the evening.

—Contrary to general opinion, the first husband of the late Madame GRISI is still alive. In order to convey property to her surviving daughters the signature of M. DE MELCY was lately obtained by the executors. The separation from his wife took place after his duel with Lord Castlereagh, some thirty-five years ago.

—Colonel CHESNEY'S famous bit of sarcasm, the "Battle of Dorking," has just entered upon the seven hundredth thousand of its sale.

—General MARMADUKE, famous during the war of the rebellion as one of the sanguinariest of Southern chieftains, has turned his sword into a plowshare, and is editor, perhaps a (plow)share proprietor, of an agricultural paper in St. Louis.

—LOUIS NAPOLEON has written, and AMYOT, of Paris, has just published, a work on the organization of the Prussian army. The Emperor is said to be at present engaged in composing a work on the reorganization of the French army.

—HOME, the noted spiritualist, has been married to a Russian lady of some social distinction, and is going to bring her to the United States. Our contributor, Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY, says: "I have been at spiritual séances, but, sinner and skeptic that I am, I was never allowed to see any thing worth recording. But I have met Mr. HOME, and heard him recite poetry of a half-humorous, half-tragic kind, and I thought the performance admirable. HOME is rather a handsome, yellow-haired man, still quite young, with a quick, nervous manner, and a persuasive, penetrating eye. He is just the man to have female devotees. I believe he tried the stage without success; but in a drawing-room I never heard a more effective reader, or rather reciter, for he does not read."

—The Baroness de Rothschild supports, at Jerusalem, a school for the education of Jewish girls.

—Mr. SANTLEY, the chief attraction at the DOLBY concerts, is said to be admirable in opera, performing in Italian and Spanish, and in some parts being without a rival.

—Major A. G. CONSTABLE, the gentleman upon whom Chief Justice DALY devolved the care of taking the opulent Parsee merchant, BYRAMJEE BOMANJEE COLAH, to Bombay to be delivered to the jurisdiction of the courts of that country, is a son of the late Mr. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE, the eminent publisher of Edinburgh, and the first publisher of the novels of Sir WALTER SCOTT. Major CONSTABLE was formerly in the army in India, and speaks the language of that country with fluency. It was by his efforts that the fortune of Mr. COLAH was preserved, and Judge DALY very properly confided to him the delicate and responsible duty of taking Mr. COLAH back to his friends.

—Russia has just produced a new tenor, who is pronounced to be the most wonderful singer the world has ever seen. His father, a rich proprietor of Kewno, wishing to prevent his son from following the bent of his inclination, and becoming a public performer, sent him to one of his distant estates to learn agriculture. Here he competed for the moujik's prize, which, in some parts of Russia, is awarded by ancient custom to the native singer who can approach the nearest in harmony and volubility to the nightingale. MIEROVITCH won the prize, and escaped to St. Petersburg. Here he suffered the greatest hardships, singing in the streets for a scanty living, and imitating the birds of his native province. Chance led him to sing one night before the hotel where Madame LUCCA was staying during her engagement at the opera. The prima-donna was enraptured. She sent for him, and, learning his history, supplied him with means to procure food and clothing, then sent him to RUBENSTEIN, who procured his admission to the Conservatoire, where he is studying manfully, and promises to become one of the first singers of the age.

—The Rev. ENOCH SANFORD, of Raynham, Massachusetts, an eminent clergyman, celebrated recently the seventy-sixth anniversary of his birth by planting an oak-tree and publishing a history of the town of Berkley, Massachusetts, the place where a century or so ago the people refused an organ, the gift of Bishop BERKELEY, in honor of whom the town was named. For many years Mr. SANFORD has occupied his leisure hours in calculating the movements of the heavenly bodies. It is stated that his astronomical calculations are accurate, and his eclipses come to time. He has also made it a practice every winter to read critically some such author as HOMER or XENOPHON. The Greek Testament is as familiar as the English version, and equally so is the patriotic literature of the early fathers of the Christian Church. His longevity is hereditary, and the oak-tree may have a chance to furnish shade to its planter. Mr. SANFORD'S grandfather was nearly one hundred years old when he died, and Mr. SANFORD still enjoys the health and vigor of a young man.

—MACDONALD says of one who suffered: "Patience had mossed her over, and made her warm, soft, and sweet."

—The personal history of JOHN ROGERS, whose brown statuettes have made him famous, may be concisely stated thus: He was born in Massachusetts. In early life he was a dry-goods clerk in Boston; then he learned the trade of machinist; but seeing a boy modeling figures in clay determined his vocation. In 1856, still being poor, and having no hope of supporting himself by modeling, he went West, and took charge of a machine-shop in Hannibal, Missouri. The financial crisis of the next year carried him to Chicago, where he was appointed clerk in the City Surveyor's office. While there he produced his first finished work, the "Checker-Players," which was very well received, and followed by the "Town Pump" and the "Slave Auction." Learning from an Italian the manner of making flexible moulds for casting forms, he went to New York, set up his studio, and prospered. ROGERS has produced about forty groups in all, and has sold some 50,000 copies of his works.

Digitized by Google

Knitted Fanchon.

THIS fanchon is knitted plain, in rounds going backward and forward, with blue split zephyr worsted and white Shetland wool, on fine steel and fine wooden knitting-needles. Begin with the blue split zephyr worsted, make a foundation of 20 st. (stitches) with steel knitting-needles, and knit six rounds. Then cut off the thread three-fifths of an inch from the last st., lay on the Shetland wool with a cross knot, and knit eighteen rounds with wooden knitting-needles, going backward and forward. Widen 1 st. at the end of every second round. Tie the blue worsted on in a similar manner, knit six rounds without widening, and again work with the white wool. After alternately working one close blue stripe and one looser white stripe (the latter is always widened in the manner described) eight times each, the fanchon has reached one-half of its size. Then work one blue stripe for the middle, and eight more white and eight blue stripes for the other with four white and four purple rounds in the manner described, but narrow in the last round of the third white stripe in the first and last three puffs; in the first two of these puffs narrow three times each from the edge, in the third puff twice, so that the number of stitches altogether is lessened by sixteen. From this it will be seen that in the fourth white stripe there are two puffs less, thus only nine puffs can be worked. Repeat the narrowing in the last round of the sixth, eighth, and tenth white stripes; as, however, the tenth white stripe counts only five puffs, narrow three times in each. In the eleventh white stripe narrow in the first and last puff three times each, gather the edge stitches at both sides of the knitted part on a needle, and with purple worsted knit four rounds plain, which form a ribbed stripe similar to that on the front edge, and must be knit together with this. Now edge the cap with a row of lace crocheted with simple white zephyr worsted in the following manner: 1st round.—

KNITTED FANCHON.

KNITTED AND CROCHET CAP TO WEAR UNDER THE BONNET.

CROCHET MANTELET.—[See Page 741.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 6ª and 6ᵇ.

tight, ∗ 6 k. (knit plain); in order to work these very loosely, wind the thread on the needle three times for each; 2 k. very tight, throwing the thread over once. Repeat from ∗. Again k. the last 2 st. tightly. In a similar manner knit the second white round plain, the third purled in the same way, and the fourth knit plain again. These four rounds must form three purled rows on the right side. Now follow four rounds all worked tightly in purple worsted, which must all appear knit plain on the right side. Alternate regularly

CROCHET AND KNITTED MANTELET.
[See Page 741.]
For description see Supplement.

At the end of every second round of each white stripe, how-ne stitch is now narrowed, that is, the last two stitches are ether, so that in the last blue stripe 20 st. are again on the which are cast off after working the last round. Finally, fanchon on the middle of the back and the ends with tas-lue worsted.

ed and Crochet Cap to wear under the Bonnet.

ght, flexible cap for elderly ladies is designed to be worn bonnet. The original is worked with purple zephyr worst-ite split zephyr worsted; the latter forms puffed stripes, knit purled, and separated by narrow purple stripes knit-losely. For the front edge of the cap, on medium-sized ng-needles, make a foundation of 92 st. (stitches) with ted, and knit five rounds plain, going backward and forward. Then begin the first puffed stripe with double split zephyr worsted. Slip the first st., knit the following st. plain, drawing the thread

CROCHET JACKET WITH SHORT SLEEVES.
[See Figs. 3 and 14, Page 749.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 16–20.

1 sc. (single crochet) on one of the purple edge stitches, ∗ 4 stc. (short treble crochet) on the second following edge st., 1 sc. on the second following edge st. Repeat from ∗. 2d round.—Always alternately 1 sc. and 5 ch. (chain stitch), the sc. always between the middle 2 of the 4 stc. Finally, furnish the cap with purple silk ribbons for tying.

Knitted Lace for trimming Mantelets, etc.

See illustration on page 741.

THIS lace, which is suitable for trimming mantelets, dresses, etc., such as the Crochet and Knitted Mantelet shown on this page, is worked with black Shetland wool and coarse steel knitting-needles. Make a foundation of 35 st. (stitches), and on this, always going backward and forward, first knit two rounds all plain. Then begin the pattern as follows: 1st round.—∗ 1 st. sl. (slipped), 3 k. (knit plain), k. 2 st. together, twice t. t. o. (thread thrown over), k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, twice t. t. o., twice k. 2 st. together, twice t. t. o., k. 2 st. together, 4 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together twice, t. t. o. twice, sl. 1 st., k. 2 st. to-escription see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 7ª and 7ᵇ.

—BRAIDED TALMA.—FRONT.

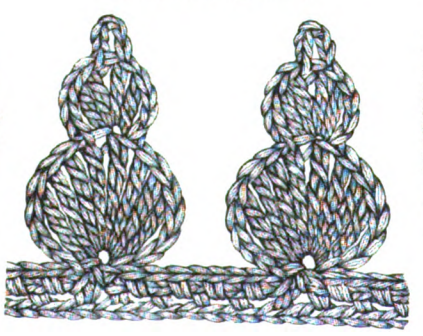
KNITTED CUFF.
For description see Supplement.

KNITTED AND CROCHET FRILL WITH JABOT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXIII., Figs. 51–53.

KNITTED AND CROCHET CUFF.
For description see Supplement.



CROCHET TRIMMING FOR SLEEVELESS JACKET.—[See First Page.]

Fig. 2.—BRAIDED TALMA.—BACK.
For pattern, design, and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 7ª and 7ᵇ.

Digitized by Google

gether, draw the sl. st. over. 2d round.—T. t. o. once, the remainder all knit plain; on the t. t. o. of the preceding round always 1 k., 1 p. (purled). Like this round all the following rounds denoted by even numbers are worked, we shall therefore make no further reference to them. It must be observed, however, that in order to form the points the thread is thrown over once each at the beginning of the 2d, 4th, 6th, 8th, 10th, and 12th rounds; in the 14th, 16th, 18th, and 20th rounds this t. t. o. is omitted. Again throw the thread over at the beginning of the 22d, 24th, 26th, 28th, 30th, and 32d rounds, but not in the 34th, 36th, 38th, and 40th rounds. 3d round.—1 st. sl., 1 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 8 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 3 k., work off the t. t. o. of the preceding round as st. 5th round.—1 st. sl., 3 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 4 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k. 7th round.—1 st. sl., 1 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together twice, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 9 k. 9th round.—1 st. sl., 3 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together twice, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 12 k. 11th round.—1 st. sl., 1 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 21 k. 13th round.—1 st. sl., 3 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 11 k., k. 3 st. together. 15th round.—1 st. sl., 1 k., 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together twice, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 8 k., k. 2 st. together. 17th round.—1 st. sl., 3 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 2 k., k. 2 st. together. 19th round.—1 st. sl., 1 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 8 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 2 k., k. 2 st. together. 21st round.—1 st. sl., 3 k., 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 4 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 3 st. together. 23d round.—1 st. sl., 1 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 8 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 3 k. 25th round.—1 st. sl., 3 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 4 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 5 k., k. 2 st. together. 27th round.—1 st. sl., 1 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together twice, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 9 k. 29th round.—1 st. sl., 3 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 4 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k. 31st round.—1 st. sl., 1 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 15 k. 33d round.—1 st. sl., 3 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 11 k., k. 3 st. together. 35th round.—1 st. sl., 1 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 8 k., k. 2 st. together. 37th round.—1 st. sl., 3 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice 2 st. k. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 4 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 5 k., k. 2 st. together. 39th round.—1 st. sl., 1 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 6 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, twice k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 8 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 2 k., k. 2 st. together, 8 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. twice, k. 2 st. together, 3 k., k. 2 st. together. This completes one pattern figure of the lace. Repeat from * until the lace is of the desired length.

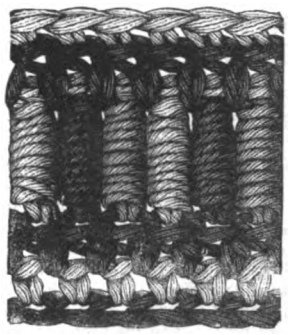


Fig. 2.—SECTION OF BORDER OF SLEEVELESS BASQUE.

Fig. 1.—CROCHET SLEEVELESS BASQUE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 30–34.

